8. The next things by which we are to try our spiritual state, are, how we stand affected to Christ and to our brethren, to this world and to the other; by these this man was tried. For, (1.) If he have a true affection to Christ, he will come and follow him; will attend to his doctrine, and submit to his discipline, whatever it cost him. None shall inherit eternal life, who are not willing to take their lot with their brethren, to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. (2.) If he have a true affection to his brethren, he will, as there is occasion, distribute to the poor, who are God's receivers of his dues out of our estates. (3.) If he think meanly of this world, as he ought, he will not stick at selling what he has, if there be a necessity for it, for the relief of God's poor. (4.) If he think highly of the other world, as he ought, he will desire no more than to have treasure in heaven, and will reckon that a sufficient, abundant recompense for all that he has left or lost, or laid out for God in this world.

9. There are many that have a great deal in them that is very commendable, and yet they perish for lack of some one thing; so this ruler here, he broke with Christ upon this, he liked all his terms very well, but this one, he would part between him and his estate. In this, I pray you, he was excused. If this be the bargain, it is no bargain.

10. Many that are both to leave Christ, yet do leave him. After a long struggle between their convictions and their corruptions, their corruptions carry the day at last; they are very sorry that they cannot serve God and mammon both; but if one must be quit, it shall be their God, not their world in him.

II. Christ's discourse with his disciples upon this occasion: in which we may observe,

1. Riches are a great hindrance to many in the way to heaven. Christ took notice of the reluctance and regret with which the rich man broke off from him; he saw that he was very sorrowful, and was sorry for him; but from thence he infers, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God? (v. 25.)

2. First, He could not go to heaven. If we must sell all, or break with Christ, who then can be saved? v. 26. They do not find fault with what Christ required, as hard and unreasonable. No, it is very fit that they who expect an eternal happiness in the other world, should be willing to forego all that is dear to them in this world, in expectation of it. But they know how closely the hearts of the most of men cleave to this world, and are ready to despair of their being ever happy hereafter, or cut off from them, if they have not the world in heaven.

3. There are such difficulties in the way of our salvation as could never be got over but by pure omnipotence, by that grace of God which is almighty, and to which that is possible, which excesses all created power and wisdom. The things which are impossible with men, (and utterly impossible it is that men should work such a change upon their own spirits as to turn them from the world to God, it is like drawing the sea, and driving Jordan back) these things are possible with God. His grace can work upon the soul so as to alter the bent and bias of it, and give it a contrary ply; and it is he that works in us both to will and to do.

4. There is an aptness in us to speak too much of what we have left and lost, of what we have done and suffered, for Christ. This appears in Peter; (v. 28.) Lo, we have left all, and followed thee. When he was often reproaching and magnifying his own and his brethren's affection to Christ, in quitting all to follow him. But this we should be so far from boasting of, that we should rather acknowledge it not worth taking notice of, and be ashamed of ourselves that there have been any regret and difficulty in the doing of it, and any hankering toward those things afterward.

5. Whatever we have left, or laid out, for Christ, it shall without fail be abundantly made up to us in this world and that to come, notwithstanding our weaknesses and infirmities; (v. 29, 30.) No man has left the comfort of his estate or relations for the kingdom of God's sake, rather than they should hinder either his services to that kingdom, or his enjoyments of it. They shall not receive manifold more in this present time, in the graces and comforts of God's Spirit, in the pleasures of communion with God and of a good conscience, advantages which, to those that know how to value and improve them, will abundantly counterbalance all their losses. Yet that is not all; in the world to come they shall receive life everlasting, which is the thing that the ruler seemed to have his eye and heart upon.

31. Then he took unto him the twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. 32. For he shall be delivered unto the Gentiles, and shall be mocked, and spitefully entreated, and spitted on; 33. And they shall scourge him, and put him to death: and the third day he shall rise again. 34. And they understood none of these things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken.

Here is,

I. The notice Christ gave his disciples of his sufferings and death approaching, and of the glorious issue of them, which himself had a perfect sight and foreknowledge of, and thought it necessary to give them warning of, that it might be the less surprise and terror to them.

Two things here are, which we had not in the other evangelists. 1. The sufferings of Christ are here spoken of as the fulfilling of the scriptures, with which consideration Christ reconciled himself to them, and would reconcile them; All things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man, especially the hardships he should undergo, shall be accomplished. Note, The Spirit of Christ in the Old-Testament prophets, testified his sufferings and death, and his sufferings and death shall follow, 1 Pet. 1. 11.

This proves that the scriptures are the word of God, for they had their exact and full accomplishment; and that Jesus Christ was sent of God, for they had their accomplishment in him; this was that should come, for, whatever was foretold concerning the Messiah, was verified in him; and he would submit to any thing for the fulfilling of scripture, that not one jot or tittle of that should fail to the ground. This makes the office of the cross to convince, and puts an honour upon it. Thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, thus it became him. 2. The ignominy and disgrace done to Christ in his sufferings, are here most insisted upon. The other evangelists had said that he should be mocked; but here it is added, He shall be spitefully treated, Cephe's Ance—ye shall be loaded with contumely and contempt; shall have all palatable reproaches put upon him. This was that part of his sufferings, by which in a spiritual manner he satisfied God's justice for the injury we had done him in his honour by sin. Here is one particular instance of disgrace done him, that he was spit upon, which had been particularly foretold, Jsa. 50. 6. But here, as always, when Christ spake of his sufferings and death, he foretold his resurrection as that which took off both the terror and reproach of his sufferings; The third day he shall rise again.
He cured as he went out of Jericho, Mark 10. 46.
Matthew speaks of two, whom he cured as they departed from Jericho, Matt. 20. 30. Luke says it was πάντα ἐκ τούτου when he was near to Jericho, which might be when he was going out of it, as well as when he was coming into it.

IV. Those who are in good earnest for Christ's favours and blessings, will not be put by from the pursuit of them, though they be, with opposition, repellent, and troublesome to the Master, noisy and impertinent, and bid him hold his peace; but when he went on with his petition, nay, the check given him was but as a dam to a full stream, which makes it swell so much the more: he cried the louder, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. Those who would speed in prayer, must be importunate in prayer.

VI. Though Christ knows all our wants, he will not, as often is the case, immediately grant them, but may sometimes defer doing it, even if it be long, for the general good, and to discourage importunity. And Christ's doing us good when we least expect it, and in a manner we should least expect, is a part of his goodness, and a great lesson to us of patience and confidence in his goodness.
should, else we are not fit to receive it. This man poured out his soul before Christ, when he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight. Thus particular should we be in prayer, upon particular occasions.

VII. The prayer of faith, guided by Christ's encouraging promises, and grounded on them shall not be in vain: nay, it shall not only receive an answer, as Christ saith, Receive thy sight, thy faith has made thee whole. True faith will produce fervency in prayer, and both together will fetch in abundance of the fruits of Christ's favour; and they are then doubly comfortable, when they come in that way, when we are saved by faith.

VIII. The grace of Christ ought to be thankfully acknowledged, to the glory of God, v. 43. 1. The poor beggar himself, that had his sight restored, followed Christ, glorifying God. Christ made it his business to glorify his Father; and those whom he healed, then praised him best, when they praised God, as those shall praise God best, who praise Christ, and do him honour; for in confessing that he is Lord, we give glory to God the Father. It is for the glory of God if we follow Christ, as those who see, whose eyes are opened. 2. The people that saw it, could not forbear giving praise to God, who had given such power to the Son of men, and by him had conferred such favours on the sons of men. Note, We must give praise to God for his mercies to others as well as for mercies to ourselves.

CHAP. XIX.

In this chapter, we have, I. The conversion of Zaccheus the publican at Jericho, v. 1—10. II. The parable of the publican and the Pharisee, v. 11—23. III. Christ's riding into triumph, and his lamentation in prospect of the ruin of that city, v. 28—41. IV. His teaching in the temple, and casting of the buyers and sellers out of it, v. 42—45.

1 AND Jesus entered and passed through Jericho. 2. And, behold, there was a man named Zaccheus, which was the chief among the publicans, and he was rich. 3. And he sought to see Jesus who he was; and could not for the press, because he was little of stature. 4. And he ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree to see him; for he was to pass that way. 5. And when Jesus came to the place, he looked up, and saw him, and said unto him, Zaccheus, make haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house. 6. And he made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully. 7. And when they saw it, they all murmured, saying, That he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner. 8. And Zaccheus stood, and said unto the Lord, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold. 9. And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham. 10. For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

Many, no doubt, were converted to the faith of Vol. v.—H Christ, of whom no account is kept in the gospels; but the conversion of some, whose case had something in it extraordinary, is recorded, as this of Zaccheus. Christ passed through Jericho, v. 1. That city was built under a curse, yet Christ honoured it with his presence, for the gospel takes away the curse. Though it ought not to have been built, yet it was not therefore a sin to live in it when it was built. For when the people of Joshua sent to the king of Jordan to Bethany near Jerusalem, to raise Lazarus to life: when he was going to do some good work, he contrived to do many by the way. He did good both to the souls and to the bodies of people; we have here an instance of the freer. Observe, 1. Who, and what, this Zaccheus was. His name bespeaks him a Jew. Zaccheus was a common name among the Jews; they had many to call them, much about this time, of that name. Observe, 1. His calling, and the post he was in; He was the chief among the publicans, receiving general; other publicans were officers under him; he was, as some think, farmer of the customs. We often read of publicans coming to Christ. But here was one that was chief of the publicans, and Christ wrought much among all sorts; Christ came to save even the chief of sinners, and therefore even the chief of publicans.

2. His circumstances in the world were very considerable; He was rich. The inferior publicans were commonly men of broken fortunes, and few in the world; but he that was an officer of the publicans, was raised a good estate. Christ had hitherto showed how hard it is for rich people to enter into the kingdom of God, yet presently produces an instance of one rich man that had been lost, and was found, and that not, as the prodigal, by being reduced to want. 11. How he came in Christ's way, and what was the occasion of his acquaintance with him. 1. He had a great curiosity to see Jesus, what kind of a man he was, having heard great talk of him. 2. It is natural to us, to come in sight, if we can, of those whose fame has filled our ears, as being apt to imagine there is something extraordinary in their circumstances; at least, he would be able to say hereafter, that he had seen such and such great men. But the eye is not satisfied with seeing. We should now seek to see Jesus with an eye of faith, to see who he is: we should address ourselves in holy anointings with this in our eye, We would see Jesus. 2. He could not get his curiosity gratified in this matter, because he was little, and the crowd was great. Christ did not study to show himself, was not carried on men's shoulders, (as the pope is in procession,) that all men might see him, neither nor his kingdom came with observation; he did not ride in an open chariot, as princes do, but, as one of us, he was set in a crowd, for that was the day of his humiliation and of his exaltation; he was overtopped by all about him, so that he could not get a sight of Jesus. Many that are little of stature, have large souls, and are lively in spirit. Who would not rather be a Zaccheus than a Sand, though he was higher by head and shoulders than all about him? Let not those that are little of stature, take thought of adding cubits to it. Because Zaccheus did not disappoint his curiosity, he forgot his swaggery, as chief of the publicans, and ran before, like a boy, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree, to see him. Note, Those that sincerely desire a sight of Christ, will use the proper means for gaining a sight of him, and will break through a deal of difficulty and opposition, and be willing to take pains to see him. Those that find themselves little, must take all the advantage they can get to raise themselves to a sight of Christ, and not be ashamed to own that they needed them, and all little enough. Let not dwarfs despair, with good help, by following him, to help it.

III. The notice Christ took of him, the call he gave to a further acquaintance, (v. 5) and the efficacy of that call, v. 6.

1. Christ invited himself to Zaccheus’s house, not doubting of his hearty welcome there; and, wherever Christ comes, as he brings his own entertainment along with him, so he brings his own welcome, he spins the heart, and inclines the receiver. Zaccheus climbed up into the tree, and saw Christ. He came to look upon Christ, and resolved to take particular notice of him, but little thought of being taken notice of by Christ. That was an honour too great and too far above his merit, for him to have any thought of. See how Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and outdid his expectations; and see how he encouraged very young beginnings, and helped them forward. He that had a mind to know Christ, shall be known of him; he that only courted to see him, shall be admitted to converse with him. Note, Those that are faithful in a little, shall be intrusted with more. And sometimes those that come to hear the word of Christ, as Zaccheus did, only for curiosity, beyond what they thought of, have their consciences awakened, and are called to an acquaintance with Christ, who called him by name. Zaccheus, for he knew his chosen by name; are they not in his book? He might ask, as Nathaniel did, (John 1. 48.) Whence knowest thou me? But before he climbed the sycamore-tree Christ saw him, and knew him. He bid him make haste, and come down. Those that Christ calls, must come down, must humble themselves, and not think to climb to heaven by any righteousness of their own; and they must make haste, and come down, for delays are dangerous. Zaccheus must not hesitate, but hasten; he knows it is not a matter that needs consideration, whether he should welcome such a guest to his house. He must come down, for Christ intends this day to bathe at his house, and stay an hour or two with him. Behold, he stands at the door, and knocks.

2. Zaccheus was recommended to have such an honour put upon his house; (v. 6) He made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully: and his receiving of him into his house, was an indication and token of his receiving of him into his heart. Note, When Christ calls to us, we must make haste to answer his calls; and when he comes to us, we must receive him joyfully; Lift up your heads, O gates. We may well receive him joyfully, who brings all good along with him, and, when he takes possession of the soul, opens springs of joy there, which shall flow to eternity. How often has Christ said to us, Often to me, when we have, with the spouse, made excuses, Cant. 5. 2. Zaccheus’s readiness to receive Christ will shame us. We have not now Christ to entertain in our houses, but we have his disciples, and what is done to them he takes as done to himself.

IV. The offence which the people took at this kind greeting between Christ and Zaccheus. Those narrow-souled, censorious Jews murmured, saying that he was gone to be a Guest with a man that was a sinner, with a sinful man; and were not they themselves sinful men? Was it not Christ’s errand into the world, to seek and save men? Zaccheus, they think, to be a sinner above all men that dwelt in Jericho; such a sinner as was not fit to be conversed with.

Now this was very unjust to blame Christ for going to his house; for, 1. Though he was a publican, and many of the publicans were bad men, it did not therefore follow that they were all so; we must take heed of condemning men in the lump, or by common name, for at God’s bar every man will be judged as he is. 2. Though he had been a sinner, it did not follow that he was now as bad as he had been; though they knew his past life to be bad, Christ might know his present frame to be good. God allows room for repentance, and so must we. 3. Though he was now a sinner, they ought not to blame Christ for going to him, because he was in no danger of getting hurt by a sinner, but in great hopes of doing good to a sinner; whither should the philanthropist go, but to the place where he is most wanted? And how that is well done, may be ill construed.

V. The proofs which Zaccheus gave publicly that, though he had been a sinner, he was now a fit, and a true convert, v. 8. He does not expect to be justified by his works as the Pharisee who boasted of what he had done, but by his good works he will, through the grace of God, evidence the sincerity of his faith and repentance; and here he declares what his determination was. He makes this declaration standing, that he might be seen and heard by those who murmured at Christ for coming to his house; with the mouth confession is made of repentance as well as faith. He stood, which denotes his saying it deliberately and with solemnity, in the nature of a vow to God. He addressed himself to Christ in it, not to the people, (they were not on the mount then,) but as if he said, when I came, I went to the house, and it were at his bar. What we do that is good we must do as unto him; we must appeal to him, and approve ourselves to him, in our integrity, in all our good purposes and resolutions. He makes it appear that there is a change in his heart, (and that is repentance,) for there is a change in his way.

His resolutions are of second-table duties; for Christ, upon all occasions, laid great stress on them, and they are such as are suited to his condition and character; for in them will best appear the truth of our repentance.

1. Zaccheus had a good estate, and, whereas he had been in it hitherto laying up treasure for himself, and doing hurt to himself, now he resolves that for the future he will be all toward God, and do good to others with it. Behold, Lord, the half of my goods, I give to the poor. Not, “I will give it by my will when I die,” but, “I do give it now.” Probably, he had heard of the command of trial which Christ gave to another rich man, to sell what he had, and give to the poor, (Matth. 19. 21.) and how he broke with Christ upon it. “But so will not I,” said Zaccheus, “I agree to it at the first word; though hitherto I have been uncharitable to the poor, now I will relieve them, and give so much for having neglected the duty so long; even the half of my goods.” This is a very large proportion to be set apart for works of piety and charity. The Jews used to say that a fifth part of a man’s income yearly was very fair to be given to pious uses, and about that share the law directed; but Zaccheus would go much further, and give one moiety to the poor, and he would continue so, this being a part of his extravagant expenses, as his retrenching of these would enable him to relieve many with his superfluities. If we were but more temperate and self-denying, we should be more charitable; and were we content with less ourselves, we should have the more to give to them that need. This he mentions here as a fruit of his repentance. Note, It well becomes converts to God to be charitable to the poor. Zaccheus, though he had not gotten all he had honestly and fairly, but some by indirect and unlawful means, and of what he had gotten by such means he promises to make restitution; “If I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, or if I have wronged any man in the way of my business as a publican, exacting more than was appointed, I promise to restore him four fold." This was the restitution that a thief was to make, Exod. 22. 1. (1.) He seems plainly to own that he had done wrong; his office as a publican, gave him opportunity to do wrong, imposing upon the merchants, to curry favour with the government. True penitents will own themselves to be guilty before God, but will particularly reflect upon that which has been their own iniquity, and which, by reason of their business and employment in the world, has most easily beset them. (2.) That he had done wrong by false accusation; this was the temptation of the publicans, which John Baptist had warned them of particularly, Luke 3. 14. They were financially dishonest, and by stretching in favour of the revenue, gave them an opportunity of gratifying their revenge if they bore a man an ill-will. (3.) He promises to restore four-fold, as far as he could recollect or find by his books that he had wronged any man. He does not say, "If I be sinned against, and compelled to it, I will make restitution;" (some are honest when they cannot help it;) but he will do voluntarily. It shall come to his house, for that he has owned it. Those who are convinced of having done wrong, cannot evidence the sincerity of their repentance but by making restitution. Observe, He does not think that his giving of half his estate to the poor, will atone for the wrong he has done; God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, and we must first do justly, and then love mercy. It is no charity, but hypocrisy, to give that which we got by our own dishonesty. Now it appears, that our own which we have not come honestly by, nor that our own which is not so, when all our debts are paid, and restitution made for wrong done.

VI. Christ's approbation and acceptance of Zacchaeus's conversion, by which also he cleared himself from any imputation in going to be a guest with him, 19, 10. 1. Zacchaeus is declared to be now a happy man; now he is turned from sin to God, now he has bid Christ welcome to his house, and becomes an honest charitable good man; This day is salvation come to this house. Now that he is converted, he is, in effect, saved, saved from his sins, from the guilt of them, from the power of them; all the benefits of salvation are his; Christ is come to his house, and where Christ comes, he brings salvation with him; and will be. He was advanced to eternal salvation to all that own him as Zacchaeus did. Yet this is not all. Salvation this day comes to his house. (1.) When Zacchaeus becomes a convert, he will be, more than he had been, a blessing to his house. He will bring the means of grace and salvation to his house, for he is a son of Abraham indeed now, and therefore, like Abraham, will teach his household to keep the way of the Lord. He that is greedy of gain is full of iniquity, and brings a curse upon it; (Hab. 2. 9.) but he that is charitable to the poor, does a kindness to his own house, and brings a blessing upon it and salvation to it, temporal at least, Ps. 112. 3. (2.) When Zacchaeus is brought to Christ himself, his family also became related to Christ, and his children are admitted members of his church, and so salvation comes to them as well as to him, and therefore interested in God's covenant with Abraham, that blessing of Abraham, which comes upon the publicans, upon the Gentiles, through faith, that God will be a God to them and to their children; and therefore, when he believes, salvation comes to his house, as to the gardener's, to whom it was said, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt receive, and thy house, Acts 16. 31. Zacchaeus is by birth a son of Abraham, but, being a publican, he was deemed a heathen; they are put upon a level, Matt. 18. 17. And as such the Jews were shy of conversing with him, and expected Christ should be so; but he shows that, being a true penitent, he is become reatus in curia, or right in court, as good a son of Abraham as if he had never been a publican, which thereof ought not to be mentioned against him.

2. What Christ had done to make him, in particular, a happy man, was constant to the great design and intention of his coming into the world; (v. 10.) with the same argument he had before justified his conversing with publicans, Matt. 9. 13. There he pleaded, that he came to call sinners to repentance; now that he came to seek and to save that which was lost; to save, the lost thing. Observe, (1.) The degenerate case of the sons of men; they were lost; but here the whole race of mankind is spoken of as one body. Note, The whole world of mankind, by the fall, is become a lost world; lost, as a city is lost when it is revoluted to the rebels; as a traveller is lost when he has missed his way in a wilderness; as a sick man is lost when his disease is incurable; or as a prisoner is lost when sentence is passed upon him. (2.) The gracious design of the Son of God: he came to seek and to save, to seek in order to saving. He came from heaven to earth, (a long journey!) to seek that which was lost, (which had wandered and gone astray,) and to bring it back; (Matt. 18. 11, 12,) and to save that which was lost, which was perishing, and in a manner destroyed and cut off. Christ undertook the cause when it was given him to bring those to themselves, that were lost to God and all goodness. Observe, Christ came into this lost world, to seek and to save it. His design was to save, when there was not salvation in any other. In prosecution of that design, he sought, took all probable means, to effect that salvation. He seeks those that were not worth seeking to; he seeks those that sought him not, and asked not for him, as Zacchaeus here.

11. And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. 12. He said therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. 13. And he called his ten servants, and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come. 14. But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us. 15. And it came to pass, that when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading. 16. Then came the first, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds. 17. And he said unto him, Well, thou good servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities. 18. And the second came, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds. 19. And he said likewise to him, Be thou also over five cities. 20. And another came, saying, Lord behold here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin: 21. For I feared thee, because thou art an austere man: thou takest up that thou layedst not down, and reapest that thou sowedst not sown. 22. And he saith unto him, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow: 23. Wherefore then gavest thou not my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? 24. And he said unto them that stood by, Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds. 25. (And they said unto him, Lord, he hath ten pounds.) 26. For I say unto you, That unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away from him. 27. But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me.

Our Lord Jesus is now upon his way to Jerusalem, to his last passover, when he was to suffer and die; now here we are told,

I. How the expectations of his friends were raised upon this occasion; They thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear, v. 11. The Pharisees expected it about this time, (ch. 17. 20.) and, it seems, so did Christ's own disciples; but they both had a mistaken notion of it. The Pharisees thought that it must be introduced by some other temporal prince or potentate. The disciples thought that their Master should introduce it, but with temporal pomp and power, which, with the power he had to work miracles, they knew he could clothe himself with in a short time, whenever he pleased. Jerusalem, they concluded, must be the seat of his kingdom, and therefore now that he is going directly thither, they doubt not but in a little time to see him upon the throne there. Note, Even good men are subject to mistakes concerning the kingdom of Christ, and to form wrong notions of it, and are ready to think that should immediately appear, which is reserved for hereafter.

II. How their expectations were check'd, and the mistakes rectified upon which they were founded; and this he does in three things.

1. They expected that he should appear in his glory now presently, but he tells them that he must not be thought to be the foundation of his kingdom while yet. He is like a certain nobleman, οἰκονομής τοῦ ναοῦ—a certain man of high birth, (so Dr. Hammond,) for he is the Lord from heaven, and is entitled by birth to the kingdom; but he goes into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom. Christ must go to heaven, to sit down at the right hand of the Father there, and to receive from him honour and glory, before the Spirit was poured out by which his kingdom was to be set up on earth, and before a church was to be set up for him in the Gentile world. He must receive the kingdom, and then return. Christ returned when the Spirit was poured out; when Jerusalem was destroyed, by which time that generation, both of friends and enemies, which he had personally conversed with, was wholly worn off by death, and gone to give up their account. But his chief return here meant, is, that at the great day, which we are yet in expectation of. I that which they thought should immediately appear, Christ tells them will not appear, till this same Jesus, which is taken from you, shall in like manner come again; see Acts 1. 11.

2. They expected that his apostles and immediate attendants should be advanced to dignity and honour; that they should all be made princes and peers, privy-counsellors and judges, and have all the pomp and preferments of the court, and of the town; but Christ here tells them, that, instead of that, he designed that they should be men, and that he must expect no other preferment in this world than that of the trading end of the town; he would set them up with a stock under their hands, that they might employ it themselves, in serving him and the interest of his kingdom among men. That is the true honour of a Christian and a minister, which if we be as we ought to be truly ambitious of, we shall be able to look upon all temporal honours with a holy contempt.

The apostles had dreamed of sitting on his right hand, and on his left, in his kingdom, enjoying ease after their present toil, and honour after the present contempt put upon them, and were pleasing themselves with this dream; but Christ tells them that which, if they understood it aright, would fill them with care, and concern, and servile engagements instead of those aspiring ones which they filled their heads with.

(1.) They have a great work to do now; their Master leaves them to receive his kingdom, and, at parting, he gives each of them a pound, which, the margin of our common Bibles tells us, amounts in our money to three pounds and half a crown; this signifies the same thing with the talents in the parable parallel to this, (Matt. 25.) all the gifts with which Christ's apostles were endued, and the advantages and capacities which they had, of serving the interest of Christ in the world, and others, both ministers and christians, like them in a lower degree. But perhaps it is in the parable thus represented, to make them the more humble: their honour in this world is only that of traders, and that of first-rate, merchants, who have vast stocks to begin upon, but that of poor traders, who must take a great deal of care and pains to make any thing of what they have.

He gave these pounds to his servants, not to buy rich liveries, much less robes, and a splendid equipage, for themselves to appear in as they expected, but with this charge, Oee each one of you that hath earned it, and make it to bring again to me the same, and as much more (it might much better be translated,) Trade till I come. Πράττε ἀλληλούϊαν—Be busy. So the word properly signifies; "You are sent forth to preach the gospel, to set up a church for Christ in the world, to bring the nations to the obedience of faith, and to build them up in it: Ye shall receive power to do this, for ye shall be filled with the Holy Ghost," Acts 1. 8. Then when Christ comes, then, saith he, saying, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, then did he deliver them ten pounds. "Now," saith he, "mind your business, and make a business of it: set about it in good earnest, and stick to it: have yourselves to do all the good you can to the souls of men, and to gather them in to Christ. Note, [1.] All christians have business to do for Christ in this world, and ministers especially; the gospel they have to carry abroad, to be spread. [2.] Those that are called to business for Christ, he furnishes with gifts necessary for their business; and, on the other hand, from these to whom he gives power he expects service. He delivers the pounds with this charge, Go work, go trade. The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man, to forestall, 1 Cor. 12. 7. And as every one has received the gifts, so let him minister the same, 1 Pet. 4. }
10. [3.] We must continue to mind our business till our Master come, whatever difficulties or oppositions we may meet with in it; those only that endure to the end, shall be saved.

(2.) They have a great account to make shortly. These servants are called to him, to show what use they made of the gifts they were dignified with, what service they had done with Christ, and what good to the souls of men, that he might know what every man had gained by trading. Note, [1.] They that trade diligently and faithfully in the service of Christ, shall be gainers; we cannot say so of the business of the world, many a labouring tradesman has been a loser, but those that trade for Christ, shall be gainers; though Israel be not gathered, yet they shall be glorious. [2.] The conversion of souls is a very true convert; clear gain to Jesus Christ. Ministers are but factors for him, and to him they must give account what fish they have inclosed in the gospel-net; what guests they have prevailed with, to come to the wedding-supper; that is, what they have gained by trading. Now in the account given up, observe,

First. The good account which was given by some of the servants, and the master's approbation of what they had done, Luke, x. 16, 19.

1. They had both made considerable improvements, but not both alike; one had gained ten pounds by his trading, and another five. Those that are diligent and faithful in serving Christ, are commonly blessed in being made blessings to the places where they live. They shall see the travail of their soul, and not labour in vain. And yet, all that are alike faithful, are not alike successful, and perhaps though they were both faithful, it is intimated that one of them took more pains, and applied himself more closely to his business, than the other, and sped accordingly. Blessed Paul was surely this servant that gained ten pounds, double to what any of the rest did, for he laboured more abundantly than they all, and fully preached the gospel of Christ.

2. They both acknowledged their obligations to their Master, for intrusting them with these abilities and opportunities to do him service; Lord, it is not my industry, but thy pound, that has gained ten pounds. Note, God must have all the glory of all our gains; not unto us, but unto him, must be the praise, Ps. 113. 1. Paul, who gained the ten pounds, acknowledges, "I laboured, yet not I. By the grace of God, I am what I am, and do what I do; and his grace was not in vain," 1 Cor. 15. 10. He had not merited, but of what God had done by him, Rom. 15. 18.

3. They were both commended for their fidelity and industry; Well done, thou good servant, v. 17. And to the other he said likewise, v. 19. Note, They do that which is good, shall have praise of the same. Do well, and Christ will say thee, Well done; and if he said Well done, the matter is not great who with otherwise. See Gen. 4. 7. And to the other he said likewise, v. 19. Note, The sciences are hereby promised the apostles; (1.) That, when they have taken pains to plant many churches, they shall have the satisfaction and honour of presiding in them, and governing amongst them; they shall have great respect paid them, and have a great interest in the love and esteem of good Christians. He that keepeth the fig-tree, shall eat the fruit thereof; and he that laboureth in the word and doctrine, shall be counted worthy of double honour. (2.) That, when they have served their generation according to the will of Christ, though they pass through this world despised and trampled upon, and perhaps pass out of it under discouragement and persecution, as the apostles did, yet in the other world they shall reign as kings, satraps, and governors over cities. He that had gained but five pounds, had dominion over five cities. This intimates that there are degrees of gain in all; some shall have more, others less; in the kingdom, it may not be alike full, but not alike large. And the degrees of glory there, will be according to the degrees of usefulness here.

Secondly, The bad account that was given by one of them, and the sentence passed upon him, for his slothfulness and unfaithfulness, v. 20, &c.

1. He owned that he had not traded with the pound which he had been intrusted; (v. 20.) Lord, I knew thee, etc. He had no trade, he had no pound; I have not made it more, but withal I have not made it lose; I have kept it safely laid up in a napkin. This represents the carelessness of those who have gifts, but never lay out themselves to do good with them; it is all one to them, whether the interests of Christ's kingdom sink or swim, go backward or forward; for their parts, they will take no care about it, no pains, be at no expenses, run no hazard; those are the thoughts of the slothful, who think it is enough to say that they have done no hurt in the world, but did no good.

2. He justified himself in his omission, with a plea that made the matter worse and not better; (v. 21.) I feared thee, because thou art an austere man, rigid and severe, \\

\[\text{\(\text{Lestere,} \) the Greek word itself; a harsh man; Thou tookst up that thou laidst not down.\) He thought that his master put a hardship upon his servants, when he required and expected the improvement of their pounds, and that it was reaping where he did not sow; whereas really it was reaping where he had sown, and, as the husbandman, expects in proportion to what he had sown. He had no reason to fear his master's austerity, nor blame his expectations, but this was a mere shame; a frivolous, groundless excuse for his idleness, which was not only mere imbecility, but sin.}

Note, The pleas of slothful professors, when they come to be examined, will be found more to their shame than in their justification.

3. His excuse is turned upon him; (v. 22.) Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. He will be condemned by his crime, but self-condemned by his plea. "If thou didst lock upon it as hard, that I should expect the profits of thy trading, I could not have done it; but if I had put it in my hand, yet, if thou hadst any regard to my interest, thou mightest have put it into the bank, into some of the funds, that I might have had, not only mine own, but mine own with usury, which, though a less advantage, would have been some." If he durst not trade, for fear of losing the principal, and so being made accountable to his lord for it, though it was lost, which he pretends, yet that he might have been the greater excused for his not trading it to interest, where it would be sure. Note, Whatever may be the pretences of slothful professors, in excuse for their slothfulness, the true reason of it is a reigning indifference to the interests of Christ and his kingdom, and their coldness therein. They care not whether religion gets ground or loses ground, so they can live at ease.

4. His pound is taken from him, v. 24. It is fi that those should lose their gifts, which will not use their gifts; and that those who have dealt falsely should be no longer trusted. Those who will not serve their Master with what he bestows upon them, why should they be suffered to serve themselves with it? Take them from them the pound.

5. It is given to him that had got the ten pounds. When this was objected against by the stands-by, because he had so much already, (Lord, he has ten pounds, v. 25.) it is answered, (v. 26.) Unto every one that hath been given.

It is the rule of justice, (1.) That those should be most encouraged, who have been most industrious, and that those who have lived to themselves must do good, should have their opportunities of doing good enlarged, and be put into a higher and more extensive sphere of usefulness. To him that hath gotten shall more be given, that he may be in a capacity to get more. (2.) That those who have their gifts, as if they had them not, who have them to no purpose, who do no good with them, should be deprived of them. Those who endeavour to increase the grace they have, God will increase it; those who neglect it, and suffer it to decline, can expect no other than that God should do so too. This needful warning Christ gives to his disciples, lest, while they were gaping for honours on earth, they should neglect their business, and so come short of their happiness in heaven.

3. Another thing they expected was, that, when the kingdom of God should appear, the body of the Jewish nation should immediately fall in with it, and submit to it, and all their aversions to Christ and his gospel should immediately vanish; but Christ tells them that, after his departure, the generality of them would persist in their obscurity and rebellion, and it would be their ruin. This is showed here,

(1.) In the message which his citizens sent after him, v. 14. They not only opposed him, while he was in obscurity, but, when he was gone into glory, to be invested in his kingdom, then they continued their enmity to him, protested against his dominion, and said, We will not have this man to reign over us. [1.] This was fulfilled in the prevailing infidelity of the Jews after the ascension of Christ, and the setting up of the gospel-kingdom; they would not submit their necks to his yoke, nor touch the top of his golden sceptre. They said, Let us break his bands in sunder, Ps. 2. 1—3. Acts 4. 26. [2.] It speaks the language of all unbelievers; they could be content that Christ should save them, but they will not have him to reign over them; whereas Christ is a Saviour to those only to whom he is a Prince, and who are willing to obey him.

(2.) In the sentence passed upon them at his return; (v. 27.) Those mine enemies bring hither. When his faithful subjects are preferred and rewarded, then he will take vengeance on his enemies; and particularly on the Jewish nation, the doom of which is here read. When Christ had set up his kingdom, there was a kind of substitution upon the gospel ministry, then he comes to reckon with the Jews; then it is remembered against them, that they had particularly disclaimed and protested against his kingly office, when they said, We have no king but Caesar, nor would own him for their King; they appealed to Caesar, and to Caesar they should appeal if the Caesar shall be their ruin. Then the kingdom of God was set up, when he was taking those irreconcilable enemies to Christ and his government; they were brought forth, and slain before him. Never was so much slaughter made in any war as in the wars of the Jews. That nation lived to see Christianity victorious in the Gentile world, in spite of their enmity and opposition to it, and then it was taken away as dress. The wrath of Christ came upon them to the uttermost, (1 Thess. 2. 15, 16.) and their destruction reddened very much to the honour of Christ and the peace of the church. But this is applicable to all others who persists in their infidelity, and will undoubtedly perish in the end. Note, [1.] Utter ruin will certainly be the portion of all Christ's enemies; in the day of vengeance they shall all be brought forth, and slain before him. Bring them hither, to be made a spectacle to saints and angels; see Josh. 10. 22, 24. Bring them hither, that they may see the glory and happiness of Christ and his followers, whom they hated and persecuted. Bring them hither, to have their frivolous plea overruled, and to receive sentence according to their merits. Bring them, and slay them before me, as Agag before Samuel. The Saviour whom they have slighted, will stand by, and see them slain, and not interpose on their behalf.

[2.] Those that will not have Christ to reign over them, shall be rejected and dealt with as his enemies. We are ready to think that none are Christ's enemies but persecutors of christianity, or scoffers at least; but you see that those will be accounted so, that dislike the terms of salvation, will not submit to Christ's yoke, but will be their own masters. Note, Whoever will not be ruled by the grace of Christ, will inevitably be ruined by the wrath of Christ.

28. And when he had thus spoken, he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem.

29. And it came to pass, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount called the mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples, 30. Saying, Go ye into the village over against you; in the which, at your entering, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat: loose him, and bring him hither. And if any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? This shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him. 32. And they that were sent went their way, and found even as he had said unto them. 33. And as they were loosing the colt, the owners thereof said unto them, Why loose ye the colt? 34. And they said, The Lord hath need of him. 35. And they brought him to Jesus: and they cast their garments upon the colt, and they set Jesus thereon. 36. And as he went, they spread their clothes in the way.

37. And when he was come near, even now at the descent of the mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice and praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works that they had seen.

38. Saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; peace in heaven, and glory in the highest. 39. And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto him, Master, rebuke thy disciples. 40. And he answered and said unto them, I tell you, that if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.

We have here the same account of Christ's riding in some sort of triumph, (such as it was,) into Jeru salem, which we had before in Matthew and Mark; let us therefore here only observe.

1. Jesus Christ was forward and willing to suffer and die for us. He went forward, bound in the Suffer, to Jerusalem, knowing very well the things that should befall him there, and yet he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem, v. 28. He was the foremost of the company, as if he longed to be upon the scene of action, to present himself, and be laid open to the public view and action. Was he so forward to suffer and die for us, and shall we draw back from any service we are capable of doing for him?

2. It was no way inconsistent, either with Christ's humility, or with his present state of humiliation, to make a public entry into Jerusalem a little before he died. Thus he made himself to be the more taken with, of the ignorance of his disciples might appear the greater.

3. Christ is entitled to a dominion over all the creatures, and may use them when and how he pleases. No man has a property in his estate against Christ, but that his title is prior and superior. Christ sent to fetch an ass and her colt from their owner's and master's crib, when he had occasion for their service, and these were the beasts of the forest are his, and the tame beasts too.

4. Christ has all men's hearts both under his eye and in his hand. He could influence those to whom the ass and the colt belonged, to consent to their taking them away, as soon as they were told that the Lord had occasion for them.

5. Those that go on Christ's errands, are sure to speak well of him, that are sent, found what he told them they should find, and the owners willing to part with them. It is a comfort to Christ's messengers that what they are sent for, if indeed the Lord has occasion for it, they shall bring it.

6. The disciples of Christ, who fetch that for him from others, which he has occasion for, and which they have not, should not think that enough, but, whatever they have themselves, wherewith he may be served and honoured, they should be ready to serve him with it. Many can be willing to attend Christ at other people's expense, who care not at being at any charge upon themselves; but those disciples not only fetched the ass's colt for him, but cast their own garments upon the colt, and were willing that those should be used for his trappings.

7. Christ's triumphs are the matter of the disciples' joy and praise. When Christ came to Jerusalem, God put it of a sudden into the hearts of the whole multitude of the disciples, not to the twelve only, but abundance more, that were disciples at large, to rejoice and praise God; (v. 37.) and their spreading of their clothes in the way, (v. 36.) was a common expression of joy, as at the feast of tabernacles. Observe, 1. What was the matter or occasion of their joy and praise. They praised God for all the things he had done; all the miracles Christ had wrought, especially the raising of Lazarus, which is particularly mentioned, John 12. 17, 18. That brought others to mind, for fresh miracles and mercies should revive the remembrance of the former. 2. How they expressed their joy and praise; (v. 38.) Blessed be the King that comes in the name of the Lord; Christ is the King, he comes in the name of the Lord, clothed with a divine authority, commissioned from heaven to give law, and treat of peace; blessed be he. Let us praise him, let God prosper him. He is blessed for ever, and we will speak well of him. Peace in heaven. Let the God of heaven send peace and success to his undertaking, and then will there be glory in the highest. It will redound to the glory of the most high God: and the angels, the glorious inhabitants of the upper world, will give him the glory of it. Compare this song of the saints on earth with that of the angels, (ch. 2. 14.) they both agree, giving glory to God in the highest, there the praises of both centre: the angels say, On earth peace, rejoicing in the being and love of men on earth have by Christ; the saints say, Peace in heaven, rejoicing in the benefit which men on earth have by Christ; such is the communion we have with the holy angels, that, as they rejoice in the peace on earth, so we rejoice in the peace in heaven, the peace God makes in his high places, (Job 25. 2.) and both in Christ, who hath reconciled all things to himself, whether things on earth or things in heaven.

8. VIII. Christ's triumphs, and his disciples' joyous praises of them, are the vexation of proud Pharisees, that are enemies to him and his kingdom. They were some Pharisees among the multitude, who, having no more to ask of them than that they were curaged at them, and Christ being a famous Example of humility, they thought that he would not admit such acclamations as these, and therefore expected that he should rebuke his disciples, v. 59. But it is the honour of Christ, that, as he despises the corrupt of the proud, so he accepts the praises of the humble.

9. When other men praise Christ, or no, he will, and shall, and must, be praised; (v. 46.) If these should hold their peace, and not speak the praises of the Messiah's kingdom, the stones would immediately cry out, rather than that Christ should not be praised; which was, in effect, literally fulfilled, when, upon men's reviling Christ upon the cross, instead of praising him, and his own disciples' sinking into a profound silence, the earth did quake, and the rocks rent. Pharisees would silence the praises of Christ, but they cannot gain their point; for as God can cut out stones raise up children unto Abraham, so he can out of the mouths of those children perfect praise.

41. And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, 42. Saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. 43. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side. 44. And shall lay thee even when the ground, and thy children within thee, and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation. 45. And he went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold therein, and them that bought; 46. Saying unto them, It is written, My house is the house of prayer: but ye have made it a den of thieves. 47. And he taught daily in the temple. But the chief priests and the scribes, and the chief of the people, sought to destroy him; 48. And could not find what they might do: for all the people were very attentive to hear him.

The great Ambassador from heaven is here making his public entry into Jerusalem, not to be respected there, but to be rejected; he knew what a nest of vipers he was throwing himself into, and yet see here two instances of his love to that place, and his concern for it. 1. The tears he shed for the approaching ruin of the city; (v. 41.) When he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it. Probably, it was when he was coming down the descent of the hill from the mount of Olives, where he had a full view of the city, the large extent of it, and the many stately structures in it, and his eye affected his heart, and his heart his eye again. See here, 1. What a tender spirit Christ was; we never read that he laughed, but we often find him in tears. In this very place his father David wept, and those that were with him, though he and they were men of war. There are cases in which it is no disparagement to the stoutest of men, to melt into tears. 2. That Jesus Christ wept in the midst of his triumphs, wept! when all about him were rejoicing, to show how little he delighted in the vanities of this world, and how little he valued the applause of the people. Thus he would teach us to rejoice with trembling, and as though we rejoiced not. If Providence do not stain the beauty of our triumphs, we may ourselves see cause to sully it with our sorrows. 3. That he wept over Jerusalem. Note, There are cities to be wept over, and none to be more lamented than Jerusalem, that had been the holy city, and the joy of the whole earth, if it be degenerated. But why did Christ weep at the sight of Jerusalem? Was it because “Yonder is the city in which I must be betrayed and bound, scourged and spit upon, condemned and crucified”? No, he himself gives us the reason of his tears. (1.) Jerusalem has not improved the day of her opportunities, and so she had known, even than at least in this the last day, if thou wouldst but yet know, while the gospel is preached to thee, and salvation offered thee by it; if thou wouldst at lengthbethink thyself, and understand the things that belong to thy peace, the making of thy peace with God, and the securing of thine own spiritual and eternal welfare—but thou dost not know these things, thou art not ready to receive them, as is speaking is abrupt: If thou hast known on O that thou hast, so some take it; like that O that my people had heartened unto me, Ps. 81. 13. Isa. 48. 18. Or, If thou hast known, well; like that of the figtree, ch. 13. 9. How happy it had been for thee! Or, If thou hast known, thou wouldst have wept for thyself, and I should have no occasion to weep for thee, for I have reproved rather. So that he saith lays all the blame of Jerusalem’s impenitence, and ruin upon herself. Note, [1.] There are things which belong to our peace, which we are all concerned to know and understand; the way how peace is made, the offers made of peace, the terms on which we may have the benefit of peace. The things that belong to our peace, are those things that relate to our present and future welfare; these we must know with application. [2.] There is a time of visitation, when those things which belong to our peace, may be known by us, and known to good purpose. When we enjoy the means of grace in great plenty, as powerfully preached to us, when the Spirit strives with us, and our own consciences are startled and awakened, then is the time of visitation, when we should not be turned to day of their dead bodies. The things of their peace are revealed to them, but are not minded or regarded by them; they hide their eyes from them, as if they were not worth taking notice of. They are not aware of the accepted time and the day of salvation, and so let it slip and perish through mere carelessness. None are so blind as these that will not see; nor have any the things of their peace more certainly hid from their eyes, than those that turn their back upon them. [3.] The sin and folly of those that persist in a contempt of gospel-peace, are a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and should be so to us. He looks with weeping eyes upon lost souls, that continue impenitent, and running楼上 upon their own ruin; he had rather that they would turn and live than go on and die, for he is not willing that any should perish. (2.) Jerusalem cannot escape the day of her desolation. The things of her peace are now in a manner hid from her eyes; they will be shortly. But that after this the gospel was preached to them by the apostles; all the house of Israel were called to know and feel Christ was their Peace, (Acts 2. 36.) and multitudes were convinced and converted. But as to the body of the nation and the leading part of it, it was sealed up under unbelief, God had given them the spirit of slumber, Rom. 11. 8. They were so prejudiced and enraged against the gospel, and those few that did embrace it then, that nothing less than a miracle of divine grace (like that which converted Paul) would work upon them; and it could not be expected that such a miracle should be wrought, and so they were justly given up to judicial blindness and hardness. The peaceablethings are not hid from the eyes of particular persons; but it is too late to think now of the nation of the Jews as such, becoming a christian nation, by embracing Christ, and therefore they are marked for ruin, which Christ here foresees and foretells, as the certain consequence of their rejecting Christ. Note, Neglecting the great salvation often brings temporal judgments upon a people; it did so upon Jerusalem in less than forty years after this; when all that Christ here foretold was exactly fulfilled. [1.] The Romans besieged the city, cast it into a rampart, encompassed it with ramparts, and raised towers in every part of it. Josephus relates, that Titus ran up a wall in a very short time, which surrounded the city, and cut off all hopes of escaping. [2.] He laid it even with the ground. Titius commanded his soldiers to dig up the city, and the whole compass of its was levelled, except three towers; see Josephus’s history of the wars of the Jews, ch. 6. 1. 1. and 2. and 3., but the citizens, were laid even with the ground, (thy children within thee,) by the cruel slaughters that were made of them: and there was scarcely one stone left upon another. This was for their crucifying of Christ, this was because they knew not the day of their visitation. Let other cities and nations take warning. 11. The zeal he shewed for the present purifying of the temple. Though it must be destroyed ere long, it does not therefore follow, that no care must be taken of it in the mean time. 1. Christ cleared it of those who profaned it. He went straight to the temple, and began to cast out the buyers and sellers, v. 45. Hereby (though he was represented as an Enemy to the temple, and had injured it, and brought into it his charger before that it was consecrated to the sacred use of the Priest) he made it appear that he had a true love for the temple than they who had such a reverence for its corban, its treasury, as a sacred thing; for its purity was more its glory than its wealth. Christ gave a reason for his dislodging of the temple merchants, v. 46. The temple is a house of prayer set apart for communion with God: the buyers and sellers made it a den of thieves by the fraudulent bargaains they made there; which was by no means to be suffered, for it would be a distraction to those who came there to pray. 2. He put it to the best use that ever it was put to, for he taught daily in the temple, v. 47. Note, It is not enough that the corruption of a church be purged out, but the preaching of the gospel must be put an honour upon the preachers of the gospel, and upon their office and work, how much severer they are despised by a vain world. It puts an honour upon the popular preachers of the gospel; Christ condescended to the capacities of the people in preaching the gospel, and taught them. And observe, when he was preaching the gospel to the people, he had the agents of Satan and his agents do all they can to hinder the preaching the gospel to the people, for nothing weakens the interest of Satan's lie, more.

II. That his enemies are here said to come upon him—viz., that word is used only here, and it implies, 1. That they thought to surprise him with this question; they came upon him suddenly, hoping he would not be able to answer it. If this were not a thing he had himself thought of. 2. That they thought to frighten him with this question. They came upon him in a body, with violence. But how could he be terrified with the wrath of men, when it was in his own power to restrain it, and make it turn to his praise? From this story itself we may learn,

1. That it is not to be thought strange, if even that which is evident to a demonstration, be disputed, and called into question, as a doubtful thing, by those that shall shut their eyes against the light. Christ's miracles plainly showed what authority he did these things; and sealed his commission; and yet this is which is here arranged.

2. Those that question Christ's authority, if they be but catechised themselves in the plainest and most evident principles of religion, will have their folly made manifest unto all men. Christ answered those priests and scribes with a question concerning the baptism of John, a plain question, which the meanest of the common people could answer. Was it from heaven or of men? They all knew it was from heaven, there was nothing in it that had an earthly relish or tendency, but it was all heavenly and divine. And this question gravelled them, and proved an agrument, and served to shame them before the people.

3. It is not strange if those that are governed by reputation and secular interest, imprison the plainest truths, and smoother all the strongest convictions, as these priests and scribes did, who, to save their credit, would not own that John's baptism was from heaven, and had no other reason why they did not say it was of men but because they feared the people. What good can be expected from men of such a spirit?

4. Those that bury the knowledge they have, are justly denied further knowledge. It was just with Christ to refuse to give an account of his authority to them that knew the baptism of John to be from heaven, and would not believe in him, nor own their knowledge, v. 7, 8.

9. Then began he to speak to the people this parable: A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to husbandmen, and went into a far country for a long time. 10. And at the season he sent a servant to the husbandmen, that they should give him of the fruit of the vineyard: but the husbandmen beat him, and sent him away empty. 11. And again he sent another servant: and they beat him also, and entreated him shamefully, and sent him away empty. 12. And again he sent a third: and they wounded him also, and cast him out.

13. Then said the lord of the vineyard,
What shall I do? I will send my beloved son: it may be they will reverence him, when they see him. 14. But when the husbandmen saw him, they reasoned among themselves, saying, This is the heir: come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. 15. So they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. What therefore shall the lord of the vineyard do unto them? 16. He shall come and destroy these husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard to others. And when they heard it, they said, God forbid. 17. And he beheld them, and said, What is this then that is written, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner? 18. Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder. 19. And the chief priests and the scribes the same hour sought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people: for they perceived that he had spoken this parable against them.

Christ spake this parable against those who were resolved not to own his authority, though the evidence of it was ever so full and convincing; and it comes very reasonably to their charge, by quibbling on his authority they forfeited their own. Theirowning of the lord of their vineyard, was a defiance of their lease of the vineyard, and a giving up all their title.

I. The parable has nothing added here to what we had before in Matthew and Mark. The scope of it is to show that the Jewish nation, by persecuting the prophets, and at length Christ himself, had provoked God to take away from them all their church privileges, and to abandon them to ruin. It teaches us,

1. That those who enjoy the privileges of the visible church, are as tenants and farmers that have a vineyard to look after, and rents to pay for it. God, by setting up revealed religion and instituted orders in the world, has planted a vineyard, which he lets out to those people among them that tabernacle is, v. 9. And they have vineyard-work to do, needful and constant work, but pleasant and profitable. Whereas man was, for sin, condemned to till the ground, they that have a place in the church, are restored to that which was Adam's work in innocence, to dress the garden, and to keep it, for the church is a paradise, and Christ the Tree of life in it. They have also vineyard-fruits to present to the Lord of the vineyard. There are rents to be paid, and services to be done, which, though bearing no proportion to the value of the premises, yet must be done, and must be paid.

2. That the work of God's ministers is to call upon those who enjoy the privileges of the church to bring forth fruit accordingly. They are God's rent-gatherers; to put the husbandmen in mind of their arrears, or rather to put them in mind that they have a Landlord who expects to hear from them, and to receive some acknowledgment of their dependence on him, and obligation to him, v. 10. The Old-Testament prophets were sent on this errand to the Jewish church, to demand from them the duty and obedience they owed to God.

3. That it has often been the lot of God's faithful servants to be wretchedly abused by his own tenants; they have been beaten and treated shamefully by those that resolved to send them empty away. They that are resolved not to do their duty to God, cannot be called to upon to do it. Some of the best men in the world have had the hardest usage from it, for their best services.

4. That God sent his Son into the world to carry on the same work that the prophets were employed in, to gather the fruits of the vineyard for God; and one would have thought that he should have been more welcome than the former. rejoice on the reception of Christ's servants. Thus with the Lord; but Christ as a Son, among his own, Verily I say unto you. Putting such an honour as this upon them, to send him, one would have thought, should have won upon them.

5. That these who reject Christ's ministers, would reject Christ himself, if he should come to them; for it has been tried, and found, that the persecutors of the ministers of Christ, were the persecutors and murderers of him himself. They said, This is the Heir, come let us kill him. When they slew the servants, there were other servants sent; but if we can but be the death of the son, there is never another son to be sent, and then we shall be no longer molested with these demands; we may have a quiet possession of the vineyard for ourselves. Pharaohs promised themselves, that if they could but get Christ out of the way, they should for ever ride masters in the Jewish Church; and therefore they took the bold step, they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him.

6. That the putting of Christ to death, filled up the measure of the Jewish iniquity, and brought upon them a curse of divine wrath and curse without remedy. No other could be expected than that God should destroy those wicked husbandmen. They began in not paying their rent, but then proceeded to beat and kill the servants, and at length their young Master himself. Note, Those that live in the neglect of their duty to God, know not what degrees of sin and destruction they are running themselves into.

II. To the application of the parable is added here, which we had not before, their depreciation of the doom included in it; (v. 16.) When they heard it, they said, God forbid, Master. Let not this be done; so it should be read; though they could not but own that for such a sin such a punishment was just, and what might be expected, yet they could not bear to hear of it. Note, It is an instance of the folly and stupidity of sinners, that they proceed and persevere in their sin, and at the same time they have a foresight and dread of the destruction that is at the end of those ways. And see what a cheat they put upon themselves, to think to avoid it by a cold God forbid, when they do nothing toward the preventing of it; but will this make the threatening of no effect? No, they shall know whose word shall stand, God's or theirs.

1. What Christ, in answer to this childish depreciation of their ruin. He beheld them. That is taken notice of only by the evangelist, v. 17. He looked upon them with pity and compassion, grieved to see them cheat themselves thus to their own ruin. He beheld them, to see if they would blush at their own folly, or if he could discern in their countenances any show of repenting. He rebuked them and them to the scriptures quoted above: What is this then that is written? How can you escape the judgment of God, when you cannot prevent the exaltation of him whom you despise and reject? The word of God hath said it, that the stone which the builders rejected, is become the Head of the corner. The Lord Jesus will be exalted to the Father's right hand, he has all judgment and all power commended to him, the Head of the church, and if so, his enemies can expect no other than to be destroyed; for even those that slily him, that stumble at him, and are offended in him, they shall be broken, it will be their ruin; but those that not only reject him, but hate and persecute him, as the Jews did, he will fall upon them and crush them to pieces, will grind them to powder. The condemnation of spiritual persecutors will be much sorer than that of careless unbelievers.

Lastly, We are told how the chief priests and scribes were exasperated by this parable; (v. 19.) They perceived that he spoke this parable against them; and so he did. A guilty conscience needs no accuser; but they, instead of yielding to the convictions of conscience, fell into a rage at him who awakened that sleeping him in his bosoms, and sought to lay hands on him. Their corruptions rebelled against their convictions, and got the victory. And it was because they had not any fear of God or of his wrath before their eyes, but only because they feared the people, that they did not now fly in his face, and take him by the throat. They were just ready to make his words good: This is the heir, come let us kill him.'

Note, When the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil, the fairest warnings both of the sin they are about to commit, and of the consequences of it, make no impression upon them. Christ tells them, that instead of killing the Son of God, they would kill him; upon which they should have said, What, is this servant a dog? But they did, in effect, say, 'Him will we not have; hurt not this man.' And though they depurate the punishment of the sin, in the next breath they are projecting the commission of it.

20. And they watched him, and sent forth spies, which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor. 21. And they asked him, saying, Master, we know that thou sayest and teachest righteously, neither acceptest thou the person of any, but teachest the way of God truly: 22. Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Caesar, or no? 23. But he perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, Why tempt ye me? 24. Shew me a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? They answered and said, Caesar's. 25. And he said unto them, Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things which are God's. 26. And they could not take hold of his words before the people; and they marvelled at his answer, and held their peace.

We have here Christ's evading a snare which his enemies laid for him, by proposing a question to him about tribute. We had this passage before, both in Matthew and Mark, but here.

1. The mischief designed him, and that is more fully related here than before. The plot was to deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor, v. 20. They could not themselves put him to death by course of law, nor otherwise than by a popular tumult, which they could not depend upon. And since they cannot be his judges, they will willingly condense to be his prosecutors and accusers, and will they themselves inform against him. They hoped to gain their point, if they could but incense the governor against him. Note, It has been the common artifice of persecuting church-rulers, to make the secular powers the tools of their malice, and oblige the kings of the earth to do their drudgery, who, if they had not been instigated, would have treated their neighbours by quietly by them, as Pilate did Christ till the chief priests and the scribes presented Christ to him. But thus Christ's word must be fulfilled by their cursed politics, that he should be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles.

II. The persons they employed. Matthew and Mark told us that they were disciples of the Pharisees, with some Herodians. Here it is added, They were spies, which should feign themselves just men. Note, The craftiness of men is such, that the Jews, us themselves just men, and to cover the most wicked projects with most specious and plausible pretences. The devil can transform himself into an angel of light, and a Pharisee appear in the garb, and speak the language, of a disciple of Christ. A spy must go in disguise. These spies must take on them to have a value for Christ's judgment, and to depend upon it as an oracle, and therefore must desire his advice in a case of conscience. Note, Ministers are concerned to stand upon their guard against some that feign themselves to be just men, and to be used as serpents, when they are in the midst of a generation of vipers and serpents.

III. The question they proposed, with which they hoped to ensnare him. 1. Their preface is very courteously, 'Master, we know that thou sayest and teachest righteously, neither acceptest thou the person of any, but teachest the way of God truly.' 2. Their question is, Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Caesar, or no? 3. This is the language of those who, in matters of conscience, think they know not how to accede to the dictates of their consciences, and yet are acquainted with the general rules of the moral law. Here their principle is, either we shall be true, and may claim the benefit of any rule in the moral law, or we shall not. Now Christ was not at all concerned to answer this question, as to the observance of the letter of the civil laws of the heathen empire, in which he recommended not government, nor the headship of the church, but the practice of religion itself. But he knew that they might use his answer to this question to their advantage, and so he dealt with them accordingly. Note, Those that are most crafty in their designs against Christ and his gospel, cannot with all their art conceal them from his cognizance. He can see through the most political disguises, and so break through the most dangerous snare; for surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird. He did not give them a direct answer, but reproved them for offering to impose upon him; (Why tempt ye me?) and called for a proof of more current matter, 'Shew me a penny, and ask them whose image it was: whose stamp it bore: who coined it. They owned, It is Caesar's money.' Why then,' saith Christ, 'you should first have asked whether it was lawful to pay and receive

Caesar's money among yourselves, and to admit that to be the instrument of your commerce. But you having granted that by a common consent, are con cluded by your own act, and, no doubt, you ought to give tribute to him who furnished you with this con venience for your trade, protects you in it, and lends you the sanction of his authority for the value of your money. You must therefore render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. In civil things you ought to submit to the civil powers, and so, if Caesar protects you in your civil rights by laws and the admin istration of justice, you ought to pay him tribute;

but in sacred things God only is your King, you are not bound to be of Caesar's religion; you must ren der to God the things that are God's, must worship and adore him only, and not any golden image that

Caesar sets up;* and we must worship and adore him in such a way as he has appointed, and not ac cording to the inventions of Caesar. It is God only that has authority to say, My son give me thy heart.

V. The confusion they were hereby put into, v.

26. 1. The snare is broken; They could not take hold of his words before the people. They could not fasten upon any thing where with to incense either the governor or the people against him. 2. Christ is honoured; even the wrath of man is made to praise him. They marvelled at his answer, it was so discreet and unexceptionable, and such an evi dence of that wisdom and sincerity which make the face to shine. 3. Their mouths are stopped; they held their peace. They had nothing to object, and dared ask him nothing else, lest he should shame and expose them.

27. Then came to him certain of the Sad ducees, which deny that there is any resur rection: and they asked him, 28. Saying,

Master, Moses wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, having a wife, and he die with out children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.

29. There were therefore seven brethren:

and the first took a wife, and died without children. 30. And the second took her to wife, and he died childless. 31. And the third took her: and in like manner the sev en also; and they left no children, and died.

32. Last of all the woman died also.

33. Therefore in the resurrection whose wife of them is she? for seven had her to wife. 34. And Jesus answering said unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage. 35. But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in mar riage: 36. Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. 37. Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the hour, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abra ham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. 38. For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him.

This discourse with the Sadducees we ad before,

just as it is here, only that the description Christ gives of the future state is somewhat more full and large here. Observe here.

1. In every age there have been men of corrupt minds, that have endeavoured to subvert the funda mental principles of revealed religion. As there are deists now, who call themselves free-thinkers,

but are really false-thinkers; so there were Sad ducees in our Saviour's time, who bantered the dec

tree of every Sadducee. To the dead and the life of the world to come, though they were plainly re vealed in the Old Testament, and were articles of the Jewish faith. The Sadducees deny that there is any resurrection, any future state; so whatever may signify; not only no return of the body to life, but no continuance of the soul in life; no world of spi rits, no state of recompense and retribution for what was done in this; but to make away this, and all religion falls to the ground.

II. It is common for those that design to under mine any truth of God, to perplex it, and load it with difficulties. So these Sadducees here did;

when they would weaken people's faith in the de crine of the resurrection, they put a question upon the supposition of it, which they thought could not be answered in any way to satisfaction. The case was perhaps matter of fact, however it might be so,

of a woman that had seven husbands. Now in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be? Whereas it was not at all material whose she was, for when dead puts an end to that relation, it is not to be re sumed again.

III. There is a great deal of difference between the state of the children of this earth and that of the children of God in heaven; a vast unli

keness between this world and that world; and we wrong ourselves, and wrong the truth of Christ, when we form our notions of that world of spirits by our pre sent enjoyments in this world of sense.

1. The children of men in this world marry, and are given in marriage, Isa. 2:17—22; the chil dren of this age, this generation, both good and bad, marry themselves, and give their children in mar riage. Much of our business in this world is, to raise and build up families, and to provide for them.

Much of our pleasure in this world is in our rela tions, our wives, and children; nature inclines to it.

Marriage is instituted for the comfort of human life, here in this state where we carry bodies about with us. It is likewise a remedy against fornication, that natural passion which may be the cause of great breath, but be under direction and control. The chil dren of this world are dying, and going off the stage, and there fore they marry, and give their children in mar riage, that they may furnish the world of mankind with needful recruits, that, as one generation passes away, another may come, and that they may have some of their own offspring to leave the fruit of their labours to: especially the choice of God in future ages may be introduced, for it is a godly seed that is sought by marriage. (Mal. 2: 15.) a seed to serve the Lord, that shall be a gen eration to him.

2. The world to come is quite another thing; it is called that world, by way of emphasis and emi

nency. Note, There are more worlds, a present world, and an invisible world; and it is the concern of every one of us to compare worlds, this world, and that world, and give the preference in our thoughts and cares to that which deserves them. Now observe,

(1.) Who shall be the inhabitants of that world; they that shall be accounted worthy to obtain it, that is, that are interested in Christ's merit, who purchased it for us, and have a holy meekness for it thought in them by the Spirit, whose business it is to prepare us for it. They have not a legal worthi ness, upon the account of any thing in them done by them, but an evangelical worthiness upon the account of the inestimable price which Christ paid for the redemption of the purchased possession. It is a worthiness imputed, by which we are glorified, as well as justified: "righteousness, they are made acceptable to that world. The disagreeableness that there is in the corrupt nature, is taken away, and the dispositions of the soul are by the grace of God conformed to that state. They are by grace made and counted worthy to obtain that world; it intumes some difficulty in reaching after it, and danger of coming short. We must so run as that we may obtain. There shall be all the rewards of the ‎true* from the dead*, that is, the blessed resurrection; for that of condemnation, (as Christ calls it, John 3. 29.) is rather a resurrection to death, a second death, an eternal death, than from death.

(2.) What shall be the happy state of the inhabitants of that world, we cannot express or conceive, 1 Cor. 2. 9. See what Christ here saith of it.

[3.] They shall be at rest, and according to the glory of their Lord, are entirely taken up with that, and need not the joy of the bridegroom in his bride. The love in that world of love is all sincere, and such as eclipses and loses the purest and most pleasing loves we entertain ourselves with in this world of sense. Where the body itself shall be a spiritual body, the delights of sense are all vanished; and where there is a perfection of holiness, there is no occasion for marriage as a preservative from sin; that new Jerusalem there enters nothing that defiles.

[4.] They shall be at liberty. This comes in as a reason why they do not marry. In this dying world there must be marriage, in order to the filling up of the vacancies made by death; but where there are no burials there is no need of weddings. This crown the comfort of that world, that there is no more death there, which subdues all the beauty, and damps all the comforts of this world. Here death reigns, but hence it is forever excluded.

[5.] They are equal unto the angels. In the other evangelists it was said, They are as the angels—angelous; but here they are said to be equal to the angels—maschafangeli—angels' peers; there they have a glory and bliss no way inferior to that of the holy angels. They shall see the same sight, be employed in the same, shall be in the same joys, with the holy angels. Saints and angels were originally one, and shall be naturalized, and though by nature strangers, yet, having obtained this freedom with a great sum, which Christ paid for them, they have in all respects equal privileges with them that were free-born, the angels that are the matrizes and aborigines of that country. They shall be companions with the angels, and converse with those blessed spirits that live in everlasting doubts, and with an innumerable company, to whom they are now come in faith, hope, and love.

[6.] They are the children of God, and so they are as the angels, who are called the sons of God. In the inheritance of sons, the adoption of sons will be completed. Hence believers are said to wait for the adoption, even the redemption of the body, Rom. 8. 23. For till the body is redeemed from the grave, the title will not be completed. Now are we the Sons of God, 1 John 3. 2. We have the nature and disposition of sons, but that will not be perfected till we come to heaven.

IV. In the world to come there is another life after this, and there were eminent observers made of this truth in the early ages of the church; (v. 57, 58.) Moses showed this, as it was showed to Moses at the bush, and he hath showed it to us, when he calleth the Lord, as the Lord calleth himself, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, they were the chief of men: in our world, they were departed out of it many years before, and their bodies were turned into dust in the cave of Machpelah; how then could God say, not I Jesus, but I am the God of Abraham? It is absurd that the living God and Fountain of life should continue related to them as their God, if there were no more of them in being than what lay in that cave, undistinguishable from common dust; we must therefore conclude that they were then in being in another world, for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Lake here adds, For all live unto him, that is, all who, like them, are true believers; though they are dead, yet they do live; their souls which return to God that gave them, (John 12. 7.) live to him as the Father of spirits; and their bodies shall live again at the end of time by the power of God: for he calleth things that are not as though they were, because he is the God that quickeneth the dead, Rom. 4. 17. But there is more in that: when God called himself the God of these patriarchs, he meant that he was their Felicity and Portion, a God abounding to them, (Gen. 17. 1.) their exceeding great Reward, Gen. 15. 1. Now it is plain by their story, that he never did that for them in this world, which would answer the true intent and full extent of that great undertaking, and therefore there must be another life after this, in which he will do that for them that will amount to a discharge in full of that promise—that he would be to them a God; which he is able to do, for all live to him, and he has witherewithal to make every soul happy that lives to him; enough for all, enough for each.

39. Then certain of the scribes answering said, Master, thou hast well said. 40. And after that they durst not ask him any question at all. 41. And he said unto them, How say they that Christ is David's son? 42. And David himself saith in the book of psalms, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 43. Till I make thine enemies thy foot-stool. 44. David therefore calleth him Lord; how is he then his son? 45. Then, in the audience of all the people, he said unto his disciples, Beware of the scribes, which desire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts; Which devour widows' houses, and for a show make long prayers; the same shall receive greater damnation.

The scribes were students in the law, and expounders of it to the people; men in reputation for wisdom, and influence, the generality of them, were enemies to Christ and his gospel; now here we have some of them attending him, and for things we have in these verses concerning them, which we

1. We have them here commending the reply which Christ made to the Sadducees concerning the resurrection; (v. 38.) Certain of the scribes said, Master, thou hast short even of the spirit of his adversaries, that he said well; and therefore the scribes were his enemies, because he would not conform to the traditions of the elders; but yet when he vindicated the fundamental practices of religion, and appeared in defence of them, even the scribes commended his performance, and owned that he said well. Many that call themselves christians have been as foolish as the scribes, and have here, and therefore the scribes were his enemies, because he would not conform to the traditions of the elders; but yet when he vindicated the fundamental practices of religion, and appeared in defence of them, even the scribes commended his performance, and owned that he said well. Many that call themselves christians have been as foolish as the scribes, and have here, and effectually carried on of their worldly and wicked projects; for assembled piety is double iniquity.

CHAi, XXI.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The notice Christ took, and the approbation he gave, of a poor widow that cast two mites into the treasury, v. 1. 4. II. A prediction of future events, in answer to his disciples' inquiries concerning them, v. 5. 7. 1. Of what should happen between that and the destruction of Jerusalem, and between them, and particularly of prayer, which they had made use of as a pretence for the more plausible and effectually carrying on of their worldly and wicked projects; for assembled piety is double iniquity.

1. AND he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury. 2. And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites. 3. And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, That this poor widow had cast in more than they all. 4. For these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God: but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had.

This short passage of story we had before in Mark. It is thus recorded twice, to teach us,

1. That charity to the poor is a main matter in religion; our Lord Jesus took all occasions to commend it, and recommend it. He had just mentioned the barbarity of the scribes, who devoured poor widows; (ch. 20.) and perhaps this is designed as an aggravation of it, that the poor widows were the best benefactors to the public funds, which the scribes had the disposal of.

2. That Jesus Christ has his eye upon us, to observe what we give to the poor, and what we contribute to works of piety and charity. Christ, though intent upon his preaching, looked up, to see what gifts were cast into the treasury, v. 1. He observes whether we give largely and liberally, in proportion to what we have, or whether we be sneaking and pitiful in it. And I will conclude, whether the observers whether we give charitably and with a willing mind, or grudgingly and with reluctance. This should make us afraid of coming short of our duty in this matter: men may be deceived with excuses which Christ knows to be frivolous; and this should encourage us to be abundant in it, without desiring that men should know it; it is enough that Christ does; he sees in secret, and will reward openly.

3. That Christ observes and accepts the charity of the poor in a particular manner. Those that have nothing to give, may yet do a great deal in charity, by ministering to the poor, and helping them, and begging for them, that cannot help themselves, or beg for themselves. But here was en-that was herself poor, and yet gave what little she had to the treasury. It was but two mites, which make a farthing; but Christ magnified it as a piece of charity exceeding all the rest; She has cast in more than they all. Christ does not blame her for indiscretion, in giving what she wanted herself, nor for vanity in giving among the rich to the treasury; but commended her liberality, and her willingness to part with what little she had for the glory of God; which proceeded from a belief of, and dependence upon, God’s providence to take care of her. Jesus-val-jure— the Lord will provide.

4. That whatever may be called the offerings of God, we ought to have a respect for, and to our power, ye, and beyond our power, to contribute cheerfully to. These have cast in unto the offerings of God. What is given to the support of the ministry and the gospel, to the spreading and propagating of religion, the education of youth, the release of prisoners, the relief of widows and strangers, and the maintenance of poor families, is given to the offerings of God; and it shall be so accepted and recompensed.

5. And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, he said, 6. As for these things which ye behold, the days will come, in the which there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down. 7. And they asked him, saying, Master, but when shall these things be? And what sign will there be when these things shall come to pass? 8. And he said, Take heed that ye be not deceived: for many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and the time draweth near, go ye not therefore after them. 9. But when ye shall hear of wars and commotions, be not terrified: for these things must first come to pass; but the end is not by and by. 10. Then said he unto them, Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: 11. And great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences, and fearful sights: and great signs shall there be from heaven.

12. But before all these, they shall lay their hands on you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons, being brought before kings and rulers for my name’s sake. 13. And it shall turn to you for a testimony. 14. Settle it therefore in your hearts, not to meditate before what ye shall answer: 15. For I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist. 16. And ye shall be betrayed both by parents, and brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends; and some of you shall they cause to be put to death. 17. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name’s sake. 18. But there shall not a hair of your head perish. 19. In your patience possess ye your souls. See here,

1. With what admiration some spake of the external pomp and magnificence of the temple, and they were some of Christ’s own disciples too; and they took notice of it to him, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, v. 5. The outside was built up with goodly stones, and it was justified in saying what it wanted herself, nor for vanity in giving among the rich to the treasury; but commended her liberality, and her willingness to part with what little she had for the glory of God; which proceeded from a belief of, and dependence upon, God’s providence to take care of her. Jesus-val-jure— the Lord will provide.
No, ye must not expect any such thing, for my kingdom is not of this world." When they asked solicitously and eagerly, "Master, when shall these things be?" the first word Christ said, was, "Take heed that ye be not deceived. Note, Those that are most insatiable in the things of God, (though it is very good to be so,) are least discerning, and most beastly possessed upon, and have most need to be upon their guard." (2.) "Go ye not after them, ye know the Messiah is come, and ye are not to look for any other; and therefore do not so much as hearken after them, nor have any thing to do with them." If we are sure that Jesus is the Christ, and his doctrine is the gospel of God, we must be deaf to all insinuations, (and another chapter here.)

2. They must expect to hear of great commotions in the nations, and many terrible judgments inflicted upon the Jews and their neighbours. (1.) There shall be bloody wars; (v. 10.) Nation shall rise against nation; one part of the Jewish nation against another, or rather the whole against the Romans. Encouraged by the false Christ, they shall wickedly endeavour to throw off the Roman yoke, by taking up arms against the Roman powers; when they had rejected the liberty with which Christ would have made them free, they were left to themselves, to grasp at their civil liberty in ways that were sinful, and therefore could not be successful. (2.) There shall be earthquakes, great earthquakes, in divers places, which shall not only frighten people, but cause great destructions of houses, and many in the ruins of them. (3.) There shall be famines and pestilences, the common effects of war, which destroy the fruits of the earth, and, by exposing men to ill weather and reducing them to ill diet, occasion infectious diseases. God has various ways of punishing a provoking people. The four sorts of judgments which the Old-Testament prophets so often speak of, are threatened by the New-Testament prophets too; for though spiritual judgments are more commonly inflicted in gospel-times, yet God makes use of temporal judgments also. (4.) There shall be fearful sights, and great signs from heaven, uncommon appearances in the clouds, comets and blazing stars, which frighten the ordinary sort of beholders, and have always been looked upon as omenings of something bad.

Now as to these, the caution is given them, is, "Be not terrifyed. Others will be frightened at them, but be not ye frightened, v. 2. As to the fearful sights, let them not be fearful to you, who look above the visible heavens to the throne of God's government in the highest heavens. Be not dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them, Jr. 10. 2. And as to the famines and pestilences, you fall into the hands of God, who has promised to those who are his, that in the day of famine they shall be satisfied, and that he will keep them from the nauseous pestilence; trust therefore in him, and be not afraid. Nay, when you hear of wars, when without are fightings and within are fears, yet be not you terrifyed; you know the worst that any of these judgments can do you, and therefore be not afraid of them; for," (1.) "It is your interest to make the best of that which is, for all your fears cannot alter it, these things must first come to pass, there is no remedy, it will be your wisdom to make yourselves easy by accommodating yourselves to them." (2.) "There is worse behind; flatter not yourselves with a fancy that you will get off of the end of these troubles, no, not so soon as you think of, the end is not by and by, not suddenly. Be not terrifyed, for if you begin so quickly to be discouraged, how will you bear up under what is yet before you?"

3. They must expect to be themselves for signs and wonders in Israel; their being persecuted would be a prognostic of the destruction of the city and temple, which he had now foretold. Nay, this should be the first sign of their ruin coming; "before all these, they shall lay their hands on you. The judgment shall begin at the house of God; you must smart first, for warning to them, that if they look not to their condition, they may consider, if this be done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry? See 1 Pet. 4. 17, 18. But that is not all; this must be considered not only as the suffering of the persecuted, but as the sin of the persecutors. Before God's judgments are brought upon them, they shall fill up the measure of their iniquity by laying their hands on you." Note, The ruin of a people is so near, that their corruption is so great; and nothing introduces a surer and surer ruin than the sin of persecution. This is a sign that God's wrath is coming upon a people to the uttermost, when their wrath against the servants of God comes to the uttermost.

Now as to this,

(1.) Christ tells them what hard things they should suffer for his name's sake, much to the same purport with what he had told them when he first called them to follow him, Matth. 10. They should know the wages of it, that they might sit down and count the cost. St. Paul, who was the greatest labourer and sufferer of them all, not being now among them, was told by himself what great things he should suffer for Christ's name's sake, (Acts 9. 16.) so necessary is it that all who will live godly in Christ Jesus must expect to be put to death, and to suffer persecution. The Christians having themselves originally Jews, and still retaining an equal veneration with them for the Old Testament, and all the essentials of their religion, and differing only in ceremony, might expect fair quarter with them; but Christ bids them not expect it; "No, they shall be the most forward to persecute you." (1.) They shall use their own children against you; they shall deliver you up to the magistrates to be scourged, to be stoned, and so forth, and with such severity as they desire to be met with. (2.) They shall incense the magistrates against you; they shall deliver you into prisons, that you may be brought before kings and rulers for your name's sake, and be punished by them. (3.) Your own relations will betray you, (v. 16.) your parents, brethren, and brethren and friends; so that you will not know neither will you have confidence in your relations and friends, to be safe.

(4.) Your religion will be made a capital crime, and you will be called to rest unto blood; some of you shall cause to be put to death; so far must you be from expecting honour and wealth, that you must expect nothing but death in its most frightful shapes, death in all its dreadfully pomp. Nay," (5.) You shall be hated of all men for my name's sake. This is worse than death itself, and was fulfilled when the apostles were not only appointed to death, but made a spectacle to the world, and counted as the fiath of the world, and the scoffing of all things, which every body taunts, 1 Cor. 4. 19, 13. They were hated of all men, that is, of all bad men, who could not bear the light of the gospel, (because it discovered their evil deeds,) and therefore hated those who brought in that light, and flew in their faces, and would have pulled them to pieces. The wicked world, which hated to be reformed, hated Christ the great Reformer, and all that were his, for his sake. The rulers of the Jewish church, knowing very well that, if the gospel obtained among the Jews, their usurped, abused power was at an end, raised all their forces against it, put it to an ill name, filled people's minds with false reports against it, and so made the preachers and professors of it odious to the mob.

that you are good, else you would not have such bad men your enemies; your courage and cheerfulness and constancy under your sufferings will be a testimony for you, that you believe what you preach, and that you are supported by a divine power, and the Spirit of God and glory rests upon you.

[24.] "God will stand by you, and own you, and give you, in a manner, you are his advocates, and you shall be well furnished with instructions, vers. 14, 15. Instead of setting your hearts on work to contrive an answer to informations, intimations, articles, accusations and interrogatories, that will be exhibited against you in the ecclesiastical and civil courts, on the contrary, settle it in your hearts, impress it upon them, take pains with them to persuade them not to molest you; what we shall answer, do not depend upon yours or your advocate’s wisdom, your own prudence and policy, and do not distrust or despair of the immediate and extraordinary aids of the divine grace. Think not to bring yourselves off in the cause of Christ, as you would in a cause of your own, by your own parts and application, with the common assistance of divine providence, but promise yourselves, for I promise you, the special assistance of Christ, who will make them to speak up for you and against you, and the mouth and wisdom of God. This proves Christ to be God, for it is God’s prerogative to give wisdom, and he it is that made man’s mouth. Note, First, A mouth and wisdom together completely fit a man both for services and sufferings: wisdom to know what to say, and a mouth wherewith to say it as it should be said. It is a great happiness to have both matter and words wherewith to honour God and do good; to have in our hands the sword of the spirit to speak against the devil and his servants, and keep possession of our souls. Secondly, Those that plead Christ’s cause, may depend upon him to give them a mouth and wisdom, which way soever they are called to plead it, especially when they are brought before magistrates for his name’s sake. It is not said that he will send an angel from heaven to answer for them, though he could do that, but that he will send them the mouth and wisdom to answer for themselves, which puts a great honour upon them, which requires them to use the gifts and graces Christ furnishes them with, and redounds the more to the glory of God, who stills the enemy and the averger out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. Thirdly, When Christ gives to his witnesses a mouth and wisdom, they are enabled to say that we are a race of kings, and ourselves, which all their adversaries are not able to gainsay or resist; they are silenced and put to confusion. This was remarkably fulfilled presently after the parting out of the Spirit, by whom Christ gave his disciples this mouth and wisdom, when the apostles were brought before the priests and rulers, and answered them so as to make them ashamed, Acts 4, 5, and 6.

[25.] You shall suffer no real damage by all the harm that they shall put upon you; (v. 18.) There shall not be a hair of your head perish; of them lose their heads, and yet not lose a hair! It is a proverbial expression, denoting the greatest indemnity and security imaginable; it is frequently used, both in the Old Testament and New, in that sense. Some think that it refers to the preservation of the lives of all the Christians that were among the Jews, when they were cut off by the Romans; historians tell us that not one christian perished in that desolation. Others reconcile it with the deaths of multitudes in the cause of Christ, and take it figuratively in the same sense that Christ saith, He that believeth his life for his sake, shall find it. "Not a hair of your head shall perish but," First, "I shall take cognizance of it." To this end he had said, (v. 19.) Therefore they that hate you and are numbered; and an account is kept of them, and none of them shall perish but he will miss it. Secondly, "It shall be upon a valuable consideration." We do not reckon that lost or perishing, which is laid out for good purposes, and will turn to a good account. If we drop the body itself for Christ’s name’s sake, it does not perish, but is well bestowed. Thirdly, "It shall be abundantly recompensed;" when you come to balance profit and loss, you shall find that there is nothing perished, but, on the contrary, that you have great gain in present comforts, especially in the joys of a life eternal." So that though we may be losers for Christ, we shall not, we cannot, be losers by him in the end.

[26.] "It is therefore your duty and interest, in the midst of your own sufferings and those of the church, to maintain a holy sincerity and serenity of mind, which will keep you a firm friend and helper for them, and a constant comforter in their distresses; and keep possession of your souls. Some read it as a promise, "You may or shall possess your souls." It comes all to one. Note, First, It is our duty and interest at all times, especially in perilous, trying times, to secure the possession of our own souls; not only that they be not destroyed and lost for ever, but that they be not disencumbered now, nor our possession of them disturbed and contemned. Possess your souls, be your own men, keep up the authority and dominion of reason, and keep under the tumults of passion, that neither grief nor fear may tyrannize over you, or turn you out of the possession and enjoyment of yourselves. In difficult times, when we can keep possession of nothing else, then let us make that sure which will be made sure, and keep possession of our souls. Secondly, It is by patience, Christian patience, that we keep possession of our own souls. In suffering times, set patience upon the guard for the preserving of your souls; by it keep your souls composed and in a good frame, and keep out all these impressions which would ruffle you and put you out of temper.

20. And when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. 21. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them that are in the midst of it depart out; and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto. 22. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled. 23. But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people. 24. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 25. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; 26. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken. 27. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. 28. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh.

Having given them an idea of the times for about thirty-eight years next ensuing, he here comes to show them what all those things would issue in at last, namely, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the utter dispersal of the Jewish nation. For this, 1. He tells them that they should see Jerusalem besieged, as it were, with armies (Rom. 11:26) by the Roman armies; and when they saw that, they might conclude that its desolation was nigh, for in that the siege would infallibly end, though it might be a long siege. Note, As in mercy, so in judgment, when God begins, he will make an end.

II. He warns them, upon this signal given, to shift for their own safety; (v. 21.) "Then let them which are in Judea, quit the country and flee to the mountains;" (of Jerusalem,) "depart out, before the city be closely shut up, and" (as we say now) "before the trenches be opened; and let not them that are in the countries and villages about, enter into the city, thinking to be safe there. Do you abandon a city and country which you see God has abandoned and given up to ruin. Come out of her, my people." 3. He foretells the terrible havoc that should be made among the Jewish nation; (v. 22.) Those are the days of vengeance so often spoken of by the Old Testament prophets, which would complete the ruin of that provoking people; all their predictions must now be fulfilled; and the blood of the Old Testament martyrs must now be required. All things that are written, must be fulfilled at length. After days of patience long abused, there will come days of vengeance; for reprobates are not pardoned. The greater the deceit, the greater the inflicting of it, it is wrath upon this people, the wrath of God, that will kindle this devouring consuming fire. 2. By the particular terror it would be to women with child, and poor mothers that are nurses. Woe to them, not only because they are most subject to frights, and least able to shift for their own safety, but because it will be a very great temptation to them to think their hands and nursed children for the murderers.

3. By the general confusion that should be all the nation over. There shall be great distress in the land, for men will not know what course to take, nor how to help themselves.

IV. He describes the issue of the struggles between the Jews and the Romans, and what they would put to last; in short, 1. Multitudes of them shall fall by the edge of the sword; it is computed that in those wars of the Jews there fell by the sword above eleven hundred thousand. And the siege of Jerusalem was, in effect, a military execution. 2. The rest shall be led away captive, not into one nation, as when they were conquered by the Chaldeans which gave them an opportunity of keeping together; but into all nations, which made it impossible for them to correspond with each other, much less to incorporate. 3. Jerusalem itself was trodden down of the Gentiles. The Romans, when they had made themselves masters of it, laid it quite waste, as a rebellious and bad city, hurtful to kings and provinces, and therefore hateful to them.

He describes the great frights that people should generally be in. Many frightful sights shall be in the evening, and in the morning, and in the lares, and here in this lower world, the sea and the waves roaring, with terrible storms and tempests, such as had not been known, and above the ordinary workings of natural causes. The effect of this shall be universal confusion and consternation upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, v. 25.

Dr. Hammond understands by the nations, the several governments or tetrarchies of the Jewish nation, but this is peculiarly applicable to fear of worse things, and will be brought to the last extremity. Men's hearts shall fail them for fear, (v. 26.) they shall be afraid, exanimated, dispers'd, in-sent, dying away for fear. Thus they are killed all the day long, by whom Christ's apostles were so, (Rom. 8. 36.) that they are, all the day long in fear of being killed; sinking under that which lies upon them, though they be as the mountains in strength, and full of courage, and cut off, these shall be brought to the last extremity. Men's hearts shall fail them for fear, (v. 26.) they shall be afraid, exanimated, dispersed, and dying away for fear. Thus they are killed all the day long, by whom Christ's apostles were so, (Rom. 8. 36.) that they are, all the day long in fear of being killed; sinking under that which lies upon them, though they be as the mountains in strength, and full of courage, and cut off, these shall be brought to the last extremity. Men's hearts shall fail them for fear, (v. 26.) they shall be afraid, exanimated, dispersed, and dying away for fear. Thus they are killed all the day long, by whom Christ's apostles were so, (Rom. 8. 36.) that they are, all the day long in fear of being killed; sinking under that which lies upon them, though they be as the mountains in strength, and full of courage, and cut off, these shall be brought to the last extremity.
Jerusalem is besieged, and every thing is concurring to the destruction of the Jews, then do you look up, when others are looking down, look heavenward, in faith, hope, and prayer, and lift up your heads with cheerful confidence, for your redemption draws nigh. 1. When Christ came to destroy the Jews, he came to redeem the christians that were persecuted and oppressed by them; then had the churches rest. 2. When he comes to judge the world at the last day, he will redeem all that are his from all their grievances. And the foresight of that day is as pleasant to all good christians as it is terrible to the wicked and ungodly. The death itself is so; when they see that day approaching, they can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh, their removal to their Re-deemer.

VIII. Here is one word of prediction, that looks further than the destruction of the Jewish nation, which is not easily understood; we have it, viz. that Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 1. Some understand it of what is past; so Dr. Hammond. The Gentiles, who have conquered Jerusalem, shall keep possession of it, and shall be pure Gentile, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, till a great part of the Gentile world is become christian, and then after Jerusalem is rebuilt by Adrian the emperor, with an exclusion of all the Jews from it, many of the Jews shall turn christians, shall join with the Gentile christians, to set up a church in Jerusalem, which shall flourish there for a long time. 2. Others understand it of what is yet to come; so Dr. Whitby. Jerusalem shall be possessed by the Gentiles, of one sort or other, for the most part, till the time comes when the nations that yet remain infidels shall embrace the christian faith, when the kingdoms of this world shall become Christ’s kingdoms, and then all the Jews shall be converted. Jerusalem shall be inhabited by them, and neither they nor their city any longer trodden down by the Gentiles.

29. And he spake to them a parable: Behold, the fig-tree, and all the trees. 30. When they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. 31. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. 32. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. 33. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my word shall not pass away. 34. And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. 35. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. 36. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man. 37. And in the day-time he was teaching in the temple: and at night he went out, and abode in the mount which is called the mountain of Olives. 38. And all the people came early in the morning to him in the temple, for to hear him. Here, in the close of this discourse, I. Christ appoints his disciples to observe the signs of the times, which they might judge by, if they had an eye to the foregoing directions. He says, it is certain that he would judge of the approach of the summer by the budding forth of the trees, v. 29—31. As in the kingdom of nature there is a chain of causes, so in the kingdom of providence there is a consequence of one event upon another. When we see a nation filling up the measure of their iniquity, we may conclude that their ruin is nigh; when we see the ruin of persecuting powers hastening on, we may from thence infer that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand, that, when the opposition given to it is removed, it shall gain ground. As we may lawfully prognosticate the change of the seasons, when second causes have begun to work, so we may in the disposal of events, expect something uncommon, when God is already raised up out of his holy habitation; (Zech. 2. 13.) then stand still and see his salvation. II. He charges them to look upon those things as neither distant, nor distant, (for then they would not make a due impression on them,) but as sure and very near. The destruction of the Jewish nation, 1. Was near; (v. 32.) This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. There were some now alive, that should see it; some that now heard the prediction of it. 2. It was sure, the sentence was irrecoverable, it was a consummation determined, the decree was gone forth; (v. 33.) “Heaven and earth shall pass away, sooner than one word of mine;” aye, they certainly shall pass away, but my words shall not; whether they take hold or no, they will take effect, and not one of them fall to the ground,” (1 Sam. 3. 19.) III. He cautions them against security and sensuality, by which they would disfet themselves for the trying times that were coming on, and make them to be a great surprise and terror to them; (v. 34.) Take heed to yourselves. This is the special command given to all Christ’s disciples, “Take heed to yourselves, that ye be not overpowered by temptations, nor betrayed by your own corruptions.” Note. We cannot be safe, if we be secure. It concerns us at all times, but especially at some times, to be very cautious. See here, 1. What our danger is—that the day of death and judgment should come upon us unawares, when we do not expect it, nor are forewarned of it; lest, when we are called to meet our Lord, that he be found the farthest thing from our thoughts, which ought always to be laid nearest our hearts, lest it come upon us as a snare; for so it will come upon the most of men, who dwell upon the earth, and mind earthly things only, and have no converse with heaven; to them it will be as a snare; see Eccl. 9. 12. It will be a terror and a destruction to them; it will put them into an insupportable fear, and this will come as a doom yet more frightful. 2. What our duty is, in consideration of this danger: we must take heed lest our hearts be overcharged, lest they be burdened and overladen, and so disfet and disabled to do what must be done in preparation for death and judgment. Two things we must watch against, lest our hearts be overcharged with them. (1.) The indulging of the appetites of the body, and allowing of others the gratification of their passion; so the other; Take heed lest you be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, the improper use of meat and drink, which burden the heart not only with the guilt thereby contracted, but by the ill influence which such disorders of the body have upon the mind; they make men dull and lifeless to their duty, dead and listless in their duty; they sapify the conscience, and make the mind unafflicted with those things that are most affecting. (2.) The inordinate pu-suit of the good things of this world. The heart is overcharged with the cares of this life. The former is the snare of those that are given to their pleasures; this is the snare of the men of business, that will be rich. We have the bread of life on both hands not only left at the time when death comes, but lest at that time, our hearts should be thus overcharged. Our calm against sin, and our care of our own souls, be constant.

I. He counselled them to prepare and get ready for this great day, v. 36. Here see, 1. What should be our aim—that we may be accounted worthy to escape all these things, that, when the judgments of God are abroad, we may be preserved from the calamity of them, that either we may not be involved in the common calamity, or it may not be to us, that it is to others; that in the day of death we may escape the sting of it, which is the wrath of God, and the damnation of hell. Yet we must aim not only to escape that, but to stand before the Son of man; not only to stand acquitted before him as our Judge, (Ps. 1. 5.) to have boldness in the day of Christ, (that is supposed in our escaping these things,) but to stand before him, to attend on him as our Master, to stand continually before his throne, and serve him day and night in his temple.
(Rev. 7. 13.) always to behold his face, as the angels, Matt. 18. 10. The saints are here said to be accounted worthy, as before, ch. 20. 35. God, by them as witnesses of his grace in them, makes them meet for this happiness, and by the good will of his grace toward them, accounts them worthy of it:
but, as Grotius here saith, a great part of our worthiness lies in an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness.

2. What should be our actions in these aims; Watch therefore, and pray always. Watching and praying must go together, Neh. 4. 9. Those that watch not, are always in their beds, and make sure of the joys to come, must watch and pray, and must do it always, must make it the constant busi-ess of their lives, (1.) To keep a guard upon themselves; “Watch against sin, watch to every duty, and to the improvement of every opportunity of doing good. Be awake, and keep awake, in expectation of your Lord’s coming, that you may be in a right spirit toward him, and bid him welcome, and make sure of the joys to come,” must watch and pray, and
must do it always, must make it the constant busi-ess of their lives. (2.) To keep up their communion with God; “Pray always; be always in an habitual disposition to that duty; keep up stated times for it, abound in it; pray upon all occasions.” Those shall be accounted worthy to live a life of praise in the other world, that live a life of prayer in this world.

In the two last verses we have an account how Christ disposed of himself during those three or four days between his riding in triumph into Jerusalem,
and the night in which he was betrayed.

[1.] He was all day teaching in the temple. Christ preached on week-days as well as sabbath-days.
He was an indefatigable Preacher, he preached in the face of opposition, and in the midst of those that he knew sought occasion against him.

[2.] He went out of the temple, and sat him at a friend’s house, in the mount of Olives, about a mile out of town. It is probable that he had some friends in the city, that would gladly have lodged him, but he was willing to retire in the evening; out of the noise of the town, that he might have more time for secret devotion, now that his hour was at hand.

[3.] Early in the morning he was in the temple ast, and was hearkening to his morning-lecture for those that were willing to attend it; and the people were forward to hear one that they saw forward to preach;
(v. 38.) They all came early in the morning, flocking to the temple, like doves to their windows, to hear him, though the chief-priests and scribes did all they could to prejudice them against him. Sometimes the taste and relish which serious, honest, plain people have of good preaching, are more to be valued and judged by than the opinion of the witty and learned; and those in authority.

CHAP. XXII.

All the evangelists, whatever they omit, give us a particular account of the death and resurrection of Christ, because he died for our sins, and rose for our justification: this evangelist, as fully as any, and with many circumstances and passages added, which we had not before. In this chapter we have, 1. The plot to take Jesus, and Judas’s coming into it, v. 1. 6. 2. Christ’s eating of the passover with his disciples, v. 7. 13. 3. His institution of the Lord’s supper, v. 19, 20. 4. Christ’s discourse with his disciples after supper, upon several heads, v. 21. 38.
5. His agony in the garden, v. 39. 46. 6. The appepearance of angels by the assistance of Jesus, ch. 37. 35.
7. Peter’s denying of him, v. 54. 62. 8. The indignities done to Christ by those that had him in custody, and his trial and condemnation in the ecclesiastical court,
v. 63. 71.

1. NOW the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the passover. 2. And the chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill him, for they feared the people. 3. Then entered Satan into Judas surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve. 4. And he went his way, and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them. 5. And they were glad, and covenant did to give him money.
6. And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them in the absence of the multitude.

The year of the redemption is now come, which had been from eternity fixed in the divine counsels, and long looked for by them that waited for the consolation of Israel; after the revolutions of many ages, it is at length come, Isa. 65. 4. And it is observable, it is in the very first month of that year that the redemption is wrought out, so much in haste was the Redeemer to perform his undertaking, so was the Antitype fulfilled till it was accomplished. It was in the same month, and at the same time of the month, (in the beginning of months, Exod. 12. 2.) that God by Moses brought Israel out of Egypt, that the Antitype might answer the type. Christ is here delivered up, when the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, v. 1. About as long before that feast as they began to make preparation for it, here was preparation a making for our Passover’s being efered for us.

I. Here we have his sworn enemies contriving it;
(v. 2.) the chief priests, men of sanctity, and the scribes, men of learning, seeking how they might kill him, either by force or fraud: could they have had their will, it had been soon done, but they dreaded the people, and the more, for what they now saw of their diligent attendance upon his preaching.

3. Now he gave some further intimation that the Antitype did answer the type, (Isa. 53.)
that the Antitype should be a man of sorrows.
He that knew men, knew what was the heart of the chief priests, and what were the moves of the Antitype, and the Antitype had been made to his Lord, and the murder of him was his payment: so it was recorded upon his head, and he was murdered. He could not murder him, nor was he murdered, but he was murdered; and it was only that he should suffer: for the Antitype was a man of sorrows, as the Antitype was a man of sin. He that knew what was in the capacity of the Antitype, should not wonder that the Chief Priest should understand what was in the capacity of his own heart, and wonder at this contrivance of the adverse.
Whoever betrays Christ, or his truths, or ways, it is Satan that puts him upon it. Judas knew how desirous the chief priests were to get Christ into their hands, and that they could not do it safely without the assistance of some that knew his retirements, as he did. He therefore went himself, and made the motion to them, v. 4. Note, It is hard to say whether more mischief is done to Christ's kingdom by the power and policy of its open enemies, or by the treachery and self-seeking of its pretended friends; nay, without the latter its enemies could not gain their point as they do. When you see Judas comming with the chief priests, be sure some mischief is in hatching; it is for no good that they are laying their heads together.

The issue of the treaty between them is, 1. That Judas must betray Christ to them, must bring them to a place where they might seize him without dan-erg of tumult—and this they would be glad of. 2.
They must give him a sum of money for doing it—and that he would be glad of. (v. 5.) They convened to give him money. When the bargain was made, Judas sought opportunity to betray him. Perbably he shyly enquired of Peter and John, who were more intimate with their Master than he was, where he would be at such a time, and whither he would retire after the passover; and they were not sure enough to suspect him. Somewhat or other, in a little time, he gained the advantage he sought, and fixed the time and place where it might be done.
_in the absence of the multitude and without tumults.

7. Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed. 8.
And he sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we can eat. 9. And they said unto him,
Where wilt thou that we prepare? 10.
And he said unto them, Behold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man
meet you, bearing a pitcher of water: follow him into the house where he entereth
in. 11. And ye shall say unto the good man of the house, The Master saith unto thee, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?
12. And he shall shew you a large upper room furnished: there make ready. 13.
And they went, and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover. 14. And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. 15. And he said unto them, With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: 16. For I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. 17.
And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, This is my blood of the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you.

What a hopeful prospect had we of Christ's doing a great deal of good by his preaching in the temple, during the feast of unleavened bread which concluded seven days, when the people were every morning, and early in the morning, so attentive to hear him! But here is a step put in. He must center upon work of another kind: in that, however, he shall do more good than in the other, for both Christ's new church's suffering days are their idle, empty days.

Now here we have,
1. The preparation that was made for Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, upon the very day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed according to the law, v. 7. Christ was made under the law, and observed the ordinances designed for the people, partly that he might be in like manner to observe his gospel-institutions, particularly that of the Lord's supper, and not to neglect them. It is probable that he went to the temple to preach in the morning, when he sent Peter and John another way into the city to prepare the passover. Those who have attendants about them, to do their secular business for them in a great measure, must not think it derogatory to themselves to employ themselves more in spiritual business, or service to the public. He directed those whom he employed, whether they should go; (v. 9, 10.) they must follow a man bearing a pitcher of water, and he must be their guide to the house. Christ could have described the house to them, probably it was a house they knew, and he might have said no more than, Go to such a man's house, or to a house in such a street, with such a sign, &c. But he directed them thus, to teach them to depend upon the conduct of Providence, and to follow that, step by step. They went, not knowing whither they went, but whom they followed.
Being come to the house, they must desire the master of the house to show them a room, (v. 11.)
and he will readily do it, v. 12. Whether it was a friend's house, or a public house, does not appear;
but the disciples found their guide, and the house and the room, just as he had said to them; (v. 13.)
for they need not fear a disappointment, who goupon Christ's word; according to the orders given them, they got every thing in readiness for the passover, v. 11.

11. The solemnizing of the passover, according to the law. When the hour was come that they should go to supper, he sat down, it is likely, at the head of the table, as the chief guest, and the guests of kind Judas not excepted; for it is possible that they whose hearts are filled with Satan, and all manner of wickedness, may yet continue a plausible profession of religion, and be found in the performance of its external services. And while it is in the heart, and does not break out into any thing scandalous, such cannot be denied the external privileges of their external profession. Though Judas had not any need to be suspected for an actual part in it, not being publicly known, Christ admits him to sit down with the rest at the passover. Now observe,
1. How Christ bids this passover welcome, to teach us in like manner to welcome his passover, the Lord's supper, and to come to it with an aptite; (v. 13.) "With desire I have desired, I have most earnestly desired, to eat this passover with you before I suffer." He knew it was to be the preserve to his sufferings, and therefore he desired it, because it was in order to his Father's glory and man's redemption. He delighted to do even this part of the will of God concerning him as Mediator.
Shall we be backward to any service for him who was so forward in the work of our salvation? See the love he had to his disciples; he desired to eat it with them, that he and they might have a little time together; themselves and none besides, for private conversation, which they could not have in Jerusalem, but on this occasion. He was now about to leave them, but was very desirous to eat this passover with them before he suffered, as if the comfort of that would carry him the more cheerfully through his sufferings, and make them the easier to him. Not Our Lord, our Passover, by faith with Jesus Christ, will be an excellent preparation for sufferings, and trials, and death itself.

2. How Christ in it takes his leave of all passovers, thereby signifying his abrogating of all the ordinances of the ceremonial law, of which that of the passover was one of the earliest and one of the most eminent; (Lev. 23. 7.) "I will not any more eat thereof, nor shall it be any more celebrated by my disciples, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." (1.1.) It was fulfilled when Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. 5. 7. And therefore that type and shadow was laid aside, because now in the kingdom of God the substance was come, which superseded them. (2.) It was fulfilled in the Lord's supper, an ordinance of the gospel-kingdom, in which the passover had its accomplishment, and which the disciples, after the pouring out of the Spirit, frequently celebrate, as we find, Acts 2. 42, 46. They ate of it, and Christ might be said to eat with them because of the spiritual communion they had with him in that ordinance. He is said to sup with them, and they with him, Rev. 3. 20. But, (3.) This is the perfect accomplishment of that commemoration of liberty will be made in the kingdom of glory, when all God's spiritual Israel shall be released from that bondage of death and sin, and be put in possession of the land of promise.

What he had said of his eating of the paschal-lamb, he repeats concerning his drinking of the passover-wine; the cup of blessing, or of thanksgiving, in which as the company pledged the Master of the feast, at the close of the passover-supper, this cup, he took, according to the custom, and gave thanks for the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the preservation of their first-born, and then said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves, v. 17. This is not said afterward of the sacramental cup: that being, probably, of much more weight and value, being the New Testament in his blood, he might not set it down in one's hand, to teach them to make a particular application of it in their own souls; but as for the paschal-cup which is to be abolished, it is enough to say, "Take it, and divide it among yourselves, do what you will with it, for we shall have no more occasion for it, v. 18. I will not drink of the fruit of the vine any more; I will not have it any more drunk of, till the kingdom of God shall come, till the Spirit be poured out, and then you shall in the Lord's supper commemorate a much more glorious redemption; of which both the deliverance out of Egypt and the passover-commemoration of it were types and figures. The kingdom of God is now so near being set up, that you will not need to eat or drink any more till it comes." Christ being next day, opened it. As Christ with a great deal of pleasure took leave of all the legal feasts (which fell of course with the passover) for the evangelical ones, both spiritual and sacramental; so many good Christians, when they are called to remove from the church militant to that which is triumphant, cheerfully exchange even their spiritual repasts, much more their sacramental ones, for the eternal feast.

III. The institution of the Lord's supper, v. 19. 20. The passover and the deliverance out of Egypt were typical and prophetic signs of a Christ to come, who should by dying deliver us from sin and death, and the tyranny of Satan; but they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, a much greater deliverance shall eclipse the lustre of that, and therefore the Lord's supper is instituted to be a type of that sign or memorial of a Christ already come, that by dying delivered us; and it is his death that is in a special manner set before us in that ordinance.

1. The breaking of Christ's body, as a sacrifice for us, is here commemorated by the breaking of bread; and the sacrifices under the law were called the bread of life, (Lev. 21. 6, 8, 17.) This is my body which is given for you; and there is a feast upon that sacrifice instituted, in which we do not apply to ourselves, and to take the benefit and comfort of it; this bread that was given for us, is given to us to be food to our souls, for nothing can be more nourishing and satisfying to our souls than the doctrine of Christ's making atonement for sin, and the assurance of our interest in that atonement; this bread that was broken and given for us, to satisfy for the guilt of our sins, is broken and given to us, to satisfy the desire of our souls. And this we do in remembrance of what he did for us, when he died for us, and for a memorial of what we do, in making ourselves partakers of him, and joining ourselves to him in an everlasting covenant; like the stone Joshua set up for a memorial of God's covenant, Josh. 24. 27.

2. The shedding of Christ's blood, by which the atonement was made, (for the blood made atonement for the soul, Lev. 17. 11.) as represented by the wine in the cup; and that cup of wine is a sign and token of the New Testament, or new covenant, made with us. It commemorates the purchase of the blood by the blood of Christ, and confirms the promises of the covenant, which are all Yes and Amen in him. This will be reviving and refreshing to our souls, as wine that makes glad the heart. In all our commemorations of the shedding of Christ's blood, we must have an eye to it as shed for us; we need it, we take hold of it, we hope to have benefit by it; who loved me, and gave himself for me. And in all our regards to the New Testament, we must have an eye to the blood of Christ which gave life and being to it, and seals to us all the promises of it. Had it not been for the blood of Christ, we had never had the New Testament; and had it not been for the New Testament, we had never known the meaning of Christ's blood shed.

21. But, behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. 22. And truly the Son of man goeth as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed! 23. And they began to enquire among themselves, which of them it was that should do this thing. 24. And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest. 25. And he said unto them. The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called Benefactors. 26. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the young; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. 27. For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? Is not he that sitteth at meat, but he that serveth? And ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations: 29. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; 30. That ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. 31. And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat: 32. But I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. 33. And he said unto him, Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison and to death. 34. And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me. 35. And he said unto them, When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye any thing? And they said, Nothing. 36. Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip; and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one. 37. For I say unto you, That this that is written must yet be accomplished in me, And he was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning me have an end. 38. And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is enough.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples after supper, much of which is new here; and in St. John's gospel we shall find more that is new still. We should take example from him, to entertain and edify our family and friends with such discourse at table as is good, and to the use of edifying, which may minister grace to the hearers; but especially after we have been at the Lord's table, by Christian conference to keep one another in a suitable frame. The matters Christ here discoursed of, were of weight, and to the present use.

I. He discoursed with them concerning him that should betray him, who was now present.

1. He signifies to them that the traitor was now among them, and one of them, v. 21. By the placing of this after the institution of the Lord's supper, which in Matthew and Mark is placed before it, it seems plain that Judas did receive the Lord's supper, did eat of that bread, and drink of that cup; for after the solemnity was over. Christ said, Behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me, is with me on the table. There have been those that have eaten bread with Christ, and yet have betrayed him.

2. He foretells that the treason would take effect; (v. 22.) Truth the Son of man goes, as it was determined; goes to the place where he will be betrayed; for he is delivered up by the counsel and foreknowledge of God, else Judas could not have delivered him up. Christ was not driven to his sufferings, but cheerfully went to them. He said, Lo, I come.

3. He threatens the traitor: Woe to that man by whom he is betrayed. Note, Neither the patience of the saints under their sufferings, nor the counsel of God concerning their sufferings, will be any excuse for those that have any hand in their sufferings, or that persecute them. Though God has determined that Christ shall be betrayed, and he himself was cheerfully submitted to it, yet Judas's sin or punishment is not at all the less.

4. He frightens the rest of the disciples into a suspicion of themselves, by saying that it was one of them, and not naming which; (v. 23.) They began to enquire among themselves, to interpolate themselves, to put the question to themselves, who it was that should do this thing, that could be so base to so good a Master. The inquiry was not, Is it you? or Is it such a one? but, Is it I? 11. Concerning the strike that was among them for precedence or supremacy, before the Spirit was poured upon them, were a sad presage of the like strifes for, and affections of, supremacy in the churches, after the Spirit should be provoked to depart from them. How inconsistent is this with that in the one pure heart! Where they were, there among which could be the traitor, and here which should be the prince. Could such an instance of humility, and such an instance of pride and vanity, be found in the same men, so near together? This is like sweet waters and bitter, proceeding at the same place out of the same fountain. What a self-contradiction is the deceitful heart of man!

2. See what Christ said to this dispute. He was not sharp upon them, as might have been expected, (he having so often reproved them, for this very thing,) but mildly showed them the sin and folly of it.

(1.) This was to make themselves like the kings of the Gentiles, that affect worldly pomp, and with worldly power, v. 23. They exercise lordship over their subjects, and are ever and ever striving to exercise lordship too over the !'merers, that God has put them, though as good as themselves, if they think them not so great as themselves. Note, the exercise of lordship better becomes the kings of the Gentiles than the ministers of Christ. But observe, They that exercise authority, and take upon themselves to bear sway, and give law, they are called Benefactors—Euergetes: they call themselves so, and so their flatterers call them, and those that set themselves to serve their interests. It is probable, that they have been benefactors upon an account they should be allowed to have rule; nay, that in exercising authority they are benefactors; however they really serve themselves, they would be thought to serve their country. One of the Ptolemies was summoned Euergetes—The Benefactor. Now our Saviour, by taking notice of this, intimates, [1.] That to do good is much more honourable than to look great; for these princes, that were the terror of the mighty, would not be called so, but rather the benefactors of the needy; so that, by their own confession, a benefactor to his country is much more valued than a ruler of his country.

[2.] That to do good is the surest way to be great, else they that aimed to be rulers would not have had so much solicitation to be called Benefactors: this therefore he would have his disciples believe, that their greatest honour would be to do all the good they could in the world. They would indeed be benefactors to the world, by bringing the gospel to them. Let them value themselves upon that title, which they would indeed be entitled to, and then they need not strive which should be the greatest, for they would all be greater; greater blessings to mankind than the kings of the earth, that exercise lordship over them. If they have that which is confessedly the greater honour of being benefactors, let them despise the lesser, of being rulers.

(2.) It was to make themselves unlike the disciples of Christ, and unlike Christ himself; (v. 26, 27.) "Ye shall not so. It was never intended that ye should rule any other wise than by the power of truth and grace, but that you should serve." When church-rulers affect external pomp and power, and bear upon themselves by secular interests and influence, they debase their office, and it is an instance of degeneracy like that of Israel when they would have a king like the nations that were round about them, whereas the Lord was their King.

See here, [1.] What is the rule Christ gave to his disciples; He that is greater among you, that is servant. From this, then, we may judge, that the lower precedence is due upon the account of his age, let him be as the younger, both in point of lowness of place, (let him condescend to sit with the younger, and be free and familiar with them,) and in point of labour and work. We say, Juniores ad labores, seniores ad honores—Let the younger go to toil, and the aged receive their honours. But let the elder take pains as well as the younger; their age and honour, instead of warming them to take their ease, bind them to double work. And he that is chief, the bishop—the president of the college or assembly, let him be as he that serves, and as the deacon, let him stoop to the meanest and most toilsome services for the public good, if there be occasion.

[2.] What was the example which he himself gave to this rule; Whether is greater, he that sitteth at the head, or he that is attended on? Now Christ was among his disciples, just like one that waited at table; he was so far from taking state, or taking his ease, by commanding their attendance upon him, that he was ready to do any office of kindness and service for them; witness his washing of their feet. Shall they take upon them the form of princes, who call themself fullers of him that took upon him the form of a servant?

(3.) They ought not to strive for worldly honour and grandeur, because he had better honours in reserve for them, of another nature, a kingdom, a feast, a throne, for each of them, wherein they should be all share and share alike, and should have no occasion to strive for precedence, v. 28—30.

Where observe,

[1.] The commendation Christ gives of the disciples for their faithfulness to him; and this was honour enough for them, they needed not to strive for any greater. It is spoken with an air of encomium and applause: Ye are they who have continued with me in my temptations, ye are they who have stood by me, and stuck to me, when others have deserted me, and turned their backs upon me. Christ here approves of the faithfulness he has observed in the conduct of men, reproached and reviled, and endured the contradiction of sinners. But his disciples continued with him, and were afflicted in all his afflictions. It was but little help that they could give him, or service that they could do him; but however, he took it kindly that they continued with him, and he here owns their kindness, though it was by the assistance of his own grace that they did continue. Christ's disciples shall crown them with laurel and laurel. In the last day, every one shall be called according to his works. But he shall find them guilty of many mistakes and weaknesses, they were very dull and very forgetful, and often blundered, yet their Master had passed all by, and forgotten it, does not upbraid them with their infirmities, but gives them this memorable testimonial, Ye are they who have continued with me. This does he praise at parting, to show how willing he is to maintain in them, whose hearts he knows to be upright within them.

[2.] The reason he designed them for their fidelity; I appoint, I consecrate, I bequeath unto you a kingdom. Or thus, I appoint to you, as my Father has appointed a kingdom to me, that ye may eat and drink at my table. Understand it.

First, Of what should be done for them in this world. God gave his Son a kingdom among men, the gospel-church, of which he is the living, quickening, ruling Head; this kingdom he appointed to his apostles and their successors in the ministry of the gospel, that they should enjoy the comforts and privileges of the gospel, help to communicate them to others by gospel-ordinances, sit on thrones as officers of the church, not only declaratively, but as exegetically judging the tribes of Israel, that per sistent in their infidelity, and denouncing the wrath of God, as Zechariah did in the days of the spiritual Israel, by the instituted discipline of the church, administered with gentleness and love. This is the honour reserved for you. Or, Secondly, Of what should be done for them in the other world; which I take to be chiefly meant. Let them go on in their services in this world, their prerogatives shall be in the other world. God will give them the kingdom, in which they shall be superior have, the richest dainties; for they shall eat and drink at Christ's table in his kingdom, of which he had spoken, v. 16, 18. They shall partake of those joys and pleasures which were the recompense of his services and sufferings. They shall have a full satisfaction of soul in the vision and fruition of God; and herein they shall have the best society, as at a feast, in the perfection of love. 2. The highest dignity is reserved for them, the royal throne, the royal table, as Mephibosheth at David's, but you shall be preferred to the royal throne: shall sit down with me on my throne, Rev. 3. 21. In the great day you shall sit on thrones, as assessors with Christ, to approve of and applaud his judgment of the twelve tribes of Israel. If the saints shall judge the world, (1 Cor. 6. 2.) much more the church.

Concerning Peter's denying of him. And in this part of the discourse we may observe,

1. The general notice Christ gives to Peter of the devil's design upon him and the rest of the apostles; v. 51.] The Lord said, Simon, Simon, observe what I say; Satan has desired to have you, to have you all in his hands, that he may sift you as wheat. Peter who used to be the mouth of the rest in speaking to Christ, is here made the ear of the rest: and what is designed for warning to them all, (All you shall be offended because of me,) is directed to Peter, because he was principally concerned, being in a particular manner struck at by the tempter; Satan has desired to have you. Probably, Satan had accused the disciples to God, as mercenary in following Christ, and aiming at nothing else therein but enriching and advancing themselves in this world, and said, 'No,' God doth not know his disciples are honest men, and men of integrity. 'Give me leave to try them,' saith Satan, 'and Peter particularly.' He desired to have them, that he might sift them, that he might show them to be chaff, and not wheat. The troubles that were now coming upon them, were sifting, would try what there was in them; but that was not all, Satan desired to sift them by his temptations, and endeavoured to bring Peter to that act of apostacy of which he had charge to put them into a loss and hurry, as corn when it is sifted to bring the chaff uppermost, or rather to shake out the wheat, and leave nothing but the chaff. Observe, Satan could not sift them unless God gave him leave; he desired to have them, as he begged of God a permission to try and tempt Job. Ezech. 1. 21. He hath challenged you, he has undertaken to prove you effectually. Many of God's children, you, Peter, really, truly, the foremost of you. Some suggest that Satan demanded leave to sift them, as their punishment for striving who should be greatest, in which contest Peter perhaps was very warm; 'Leave them to me, to sift them for,' saith Peter.

2. The particular encouragement he gave to Peter, in reference to this trial; I have prayed for thee; because, though he desires to have them all, ne is permitted to make his strongest onset upon them only, then will be most violently assaulted; but It is for thee, that thy faith fail not, that it may not totally and finally fail. Note. (1.) If faith be kept up in an hour of temptation, though we may fail, yet we shall not be utterly cast down. Faith will quench Satan's fiery darts. (2.) Though there may be many failings in the faith of true believers, yet there shall not be a total and final failure of their faith. It is their seed, their root remaining, and it is owing to the near, mutual and intercession of Jesus Christ that the faith of his disciples, though sometimes sadly shaken, yet is not sunk. If they were left to themselves, they would fail; but they are kept by the power of God, and the prayer of Christ. The intercession of Christ is not only general, for all that believe, but for particular believers, I have prayed for thee, which is an encouragement to us to pray; and an engagement upon us to pray for others too.

3. The charge he gives to Peter to help others as he should himself be helped of God: "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren; when thou art recovered from the bed of sickness, thou hast found thyself kept from harmful falls, labour to confirm the faith of others, and to establish them; that many others may be encouraged by thyself, encourage others to hope that they also shall find mercy." Note. (1.) Those that are fallen into sin, must be converted from it; those that have turned aside, must return; those that have left their first love, must do their first works. (2.) Those that through grace are converted from sin, must do what they can to strengthen their brethren that stand, and to prevent their falling; see Ps. 51. 13. 14.

4. Peter's declared resolution to cleave to Christ, whatever it cost him; (v. 33.) Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison and to death. This was a great word, and yet I believe no more than he thought at this time, and thought he should make good too. Judas never protested thus against denying Christ, though often warned of it; for his heart was never set in him to the evil as Peter's was against it. Note. (1.) There are true and sincere desire and design to follow him, whithersoever he goes, and whithersoever he leads them, though into a prison, though out of the world.

5. Christ's express prediction of his denying him three times; (v. 34.) I tell thee, Peter, (thou dost not know thine own heart, but must be left to thyself a little, that thou mayest know it, and mayest never trust to it again,) denunciation of a strong and severe one; before thou art converted this day, before thou art even deny that thou knowest me. Note. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves, and knows the evil that is in us, and will be done by us, which we ourselves do not suspect. It is well for us that Christ knows where we are weak better than we do, and therefore where to come in with grace sufficient; that he knows how far a temptation will prevail, and therefore when to say, They that say, He that has a sword, let him take it, for he may have occasion for it, and for all the good husbandry he can use. (2.) They must now expect that their enemies would be more fierce upon them than they had been, and they would need magazines as well as stores; He that has a sword where with to defend himself against robbers and assassins, (2 Cor. 11. 26.) will find a great want of it, and will be ready to wish, some time or other, that he had sold his garment, and bought one. This is intended only to show that the times will be very pernicious, so that no man would think himself safe if he had not a sword by his side. But the prophecy is fulfilled in the disciples of Christ must furnish, themselves with. Christ having suffered for us, we must arm ourselves with the same mind, (1 Pet. 4. I.) arm ourselves with an expectation of trouble, that it may not be a surprise to us, and with a holy resignation to the will of God in it, that there may be no contradiction in us to it; and then we are better prepared than if we had sold a coat to buy a sword. The disciples hereupon inquire that the two swords which they had brought them, (v. 38.) of which one was Peter's. The Galileans generally travelled with swords. Christ wore none himself, but he was not against his disciples wearing of them. But how little he would have them depend upon that, he intimates when he saith, vol. v. 4 L
It is enough; which, some think, is spoken ironically; "Two swords among twelve men, you are bravely armed indeed, when our enemies are now coming out against us in great multitudes, and every one with a sword." Yet two swords are ample for those who need none, having God himself to be the Shield of their hand and the Sword of their excellency, Deut. 32. 29.

39. And he came out, and went, as he was wont, to the mount of Olives; and his disciples also followed him. 40. And when he was at the place, he said unto them, Pray that ye enter not into temptation. 41. And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down, and prayed. 42. Saying, Father, if thou wilt, remove this cup from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done. 43. And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him. 44. And being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. 45. And when he rose up from prayer, and was come to his disciples, he found them sleeping for sorrow, 46. And said unto them, Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

We have here the awful story of Christ's agony in the garden, just before he was betrayed, which was largely related by the other evangelists. In it Christ accommodated himself to that part of his undertaking which he was now entering upon—the making of his soul an offering for sin. He afflicted his own soul with grief for the sin he was to satisfy for, and an apprehension of the wrath of God to which man had by sin made himself obnoxious, which he was pleased as a Sacrifice to admit the imputation of sin upon himself, as being the surest token of its acceptance. In it Christ entered the lists with the powers of darkness, gave them all the advantages they could desire, and yet conquered them.

That which we have here in this story, which we had before, is, 1. That, when Christ went out, though it was in the night, and a long walk, yet his disciples followed him, eleven of them, for Judas had given them the slip. Having continued with him hitherto in his temptations, they would not leave him now. 2. That he went to the place where he was wont to be private, which intimates that Christ accustomed himself to retirement, was often alone, to teach us to be so, for freedom of converse with God and our own hearts. Though Christ had no convenience for retirement but a garden, yet he retired, this take a step towards our practice after we have been at the Lord's table; we have then work to do, which requires us to be private. 3. That he exhorted his disciples to pray that though the approaching trial could not be avoided, yet that they might not in it enter into temptation to sin; that when they were in the greatest fright and danger, yet they might not have any inclination to desert Christ, nor take a step towards our practice after we have been at the Lord's table; we have then work to do, which requires us to be private. 4. That he withdrew from them, and prayed himself; they had their errands at the throne of grace, and he had his, and therefore it was fit that they should pray separately, as sometimes, when they had joint errands, they prayed together. He withdrew about a stone's cast further into the garden, which some reckon about fifty or sixty paces, and there he knelted down, (so it is here,) upon the bare ground; but the other evangelists, say, that afterward he fell on his face, and there, among the disciple's, were the will of God, this cup of suffering, this bitter cup the Son is to receive from him. This was the language of that innocent dread of suffering, which, being really and truly Man, he could not but have in his nature. 5. That he, knowing it to be his Father's will that he should suffer and die, and that, as the matter was now settled, it was necessary for our redemption and salvation, presently withdrew that petition, did insist upon it but resigned it to his heavenly Father's will; "Nevertheless not my will be done; not the will of my human nature, but the will of God as it is written concerning me in the volume of the book, which I delight to do, let that be done," Ps. 40. 7, 8. 6. That his disciples were asleep when he was at prayer, and when they should have been themselves praying, v. 43. When he rose from prayer, he found them sleeping, unconcerned in his sorrows; but see what a favourable construction is here put upon it, which we had not in the other evangelists—they were sleeping for sorrow. The great sorrow they were in upon the mournful farewell their Master had been this evening giving them, had exhausted their spirits, and made them very dull and heavy, which (it being now late) disposed them to sleep. This was like the ship-master's being at the children's infirmities, and if there be onecase better than another, charitably impute them to that. 7. That when he awaked them, then he exhorted them to pray; (v. 46.) "Why sleep ye? Why do ye allow yourselves to sleep? Rise and pray. Shake off your drowsiness, that ye may be fit to pray, and pray for grace, that ye may be able to shake off your drowsiness." This was like the ship-master's leaving the children to their usual exercises, when he saw them fallen asleep, and made them be set to work. 8. When he was not delivered from his sufferings, yet he was strengthened and supported under them, and that was equivalent. If God, proportion the shoulders to the burden, we shall have no reason to complain, whatever he is pleased to lay upon us. David owns this a sufficient answer to his prayer, in the day of trouble, that God strengthened him with strength in his soul, and so does the Son of David, Ps. 138. 3. 9. The angels ministered to him, but were not sufficient to sustain him. Lord, why are we so altogether weak? Could he have had legions of them to rescue him; nay, this one could have done it, could have chased and conquered the whole band of men that came to take him; but he made use of his ministration only to strengthen him; and the very visit which this angel made him now in his grief, when his enemies were awake and his friends asleep, was such a seasonable visit to him, as would be very great strengthening to him. Yet this was not all; he, probably, said something to him, to strengthen him; put him in mind that his sufferings were in order to his Father's glory, to his own glory, and to the salvation of those that were given him, represented to him the joy set before him, the seed he should see; with these and the like suggestions he encouraged him to go on cheerfully; and what is comforting, is strengthening. Perhaps he did something to strengthen him, wiped away his sweat and tears, perhaps ministered some cordial to him, as after his temptation, or, it may be, took him by the arm, and helped him off the ground, or bore him up when he was ready to faint away; and in these services of the angel, the holy Spirit was worshipped:—putting strength into him; for so the word signifies. It pleased the Lord to bruise him indeed; yet did he put strength against his great power? No, but he put strength in him, (Job 23. 6.) as he had promised, Ps. 89. 21.

Ist. 49. 8.—50. 7.

II. That, being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, v. 44. As his sorrow and trouble grew upon him, he grew more importunate in prayer; not that there was before any coldness or indifference in his prayers, but there was now a greater elevation of his soul to God in them, which was expressed in his voice and gesture. Note, Prayer, though never out of season, is in a special manner seasonable when we are in an agony; and the stronger our agonies are, the more lively and frequent our prayers should be. Now it was that Christ offered up prayers and supplications with strong earring and tears, and was heard in that he feared, (Heb. 5. 7.) and in his four sweat, as Jacob with his bow, Gen. 3. 19. And therefore when Christ was made Sin and a Curse for us, he underwent a grievous sweat, that in the sweat of his face we might eat bread, and that he might sanctify and sweeten all our trials to us. It is some dispute among the critics, whether this sweat is only compared to drops of blood, being much thicker than drops of sweat commonly are, the pores of the body being more than ordinarily opened; or, that real blood out of the capillary veins mingled with it, so that it was in colour like blood, and might truly be called a bloody sweat; the matter is not great. Some reckon this one of the times when Christ shed his blood for us, for without the shedding of blood there is no remission. Every pore was as it were a bleeding wound, and his blood stained all his raiment. This showed the travail of his soul. He was now abroad in the open air, in a cool season, upon the cold ground, far in the night, which, one would think, had been enough to strike in a sweat; yet now he breaks out into a sweat, which bespeaks the extremity of the agony he was in.

47. And while he yet spake, behold a multitude, and he that was called Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and drew near unto Jesus to kiss him. 48. But Jesus said unto him, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? 49. When they which were about him saw what would follow, they said unto him, Lord, shall we smite with the sword? 50. And one of them smote the servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear. 51. And Jesus answered and said, Suffer ye thus far. And he touched his ear, and healed him. 52. Then Jesus said unto the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and the elders, which were come to him, Be ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and staves? 53. When I was daily with you in the temple ye stretched forth no hands against me: but this is your hour, and the power of darkness. Satan, finding himself baffled in his attempt to terrify our Lord Jesus, and so to put him out of the possession of his own soul, betakes himself (according to his usual method) to force and arms, and brings a party into the field to seize him, and Satan was in them. Here is,

I. The marking of him by Judas. Here a numerous party appears, at Judas at the head of them, for he was guide to them that took Jesus; they knew not where to find him, but he brought them to the place: when they were there, they knew not which was he; but Judas told them that whomever he should kiss, that same was he; so he drew near to him to kiss him, according to the wonted freedom and familiarity which our Lord Jesus admitted his disciples to with him. Luke takes notice of the question Christ asked him, which we have not in the other evangelists; Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? What! Is that the signal? v. 48. Must the Son of man be betrayed, as if any thing could be concealed from him, and a plot carried on against him unknown to him? Must one of his own disciples betray him, as if he had been a hard Master to them; or deserved ill at their hands? Must he be betrayed as a man? or be betrayed by some instrument of treachery? Was ever a love-token so desecrated and abused? Note, Nothing can be a greater affront or grief to the Lord Jesus, than to be betrayed, and betrayed with a kiss, by those that profess relation to him, and an affection for him. These do so, who, under pretence of zeal for his honour, persecute his servants, who, under the cloak of a seeming affection for the honour of free-grace, have blow to the root of holiness and strictness of conversation. Many instances there are of Christ’s being betrayed with a kiss, by those who, under the form of godliness, fight against the power of it. It were well if their own consciences would put this question to them, which Christ here puts to Judas, Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? And will he not resent it? Will he not revenge it?

II. The effect of his disciples made for his protection; v. 50. When they which were about him saw what would follow, that those armed men were come to seize him, they said, Lord, shall we smite with the sword? Thou didst allow us to have two swords, shall we now make use of them? Never was there more occasion; and to what purpose should we have them, if we do not use them? They asked the question, as if they would not have drawn the sword without commission from their Master, but they were in too much haste, and too much heart to stay for an answer. But Peter, aiming at the head of one of the servants of the High Priest, missed his blow, and cut off his right ear. As Christ by throwing them to the ground, that came to take him, showed what he could have done, so Peter, by this exploit, showed what he could have done too in so good a cause if he had had leave. The other evangelists tell us what was the check Christ gave to Peter for it. Luke here tells us, 1. How Christ excused the blow; Suffer ye thus far, v. 51. Dr. Whitby thinks he said this to his enemies who came to take him, to qualify them, that they might not be provoked by it to fall upon the disciples, whom he had undertaken the preservation of; 2. Pass by this injury and affront, it was without warrant from me, and there shall not be another blow struck. Though Christ had the power to have strung them down, and struck them dead, yet he speaks them fair, and as it were, bequeath their pardon for an assault made upon them by one of his followers, to teach us to give good words even to our enemies. 2. How he cured the wound, which was more than amends sufficient for the injury; He touched his ear and healed him; fastened his ear on again, that he might not so much as go away staggered, though he well deserved it. Christ hereby gave them a proof, (1.) Of his power. He that could heal, could destroy if he pleased, which should have obliged them in interest to submit to him. Had they returned the blow upon Peter, he would immediately have healed him; and what could not a small recompence have done? But what was a Surgeon to it, immediately to help the sick and wounded? (2.) Of his mercy and goodness. Christ here gave an illustrous example to his own rule of doing good to them that hate us, as afterward he did of praying for them that despitefully use us. Those who render good for evil, do as Christ did. One would have thought that this generous piece of kindness should have overcome them, that such colds, heaped on their heads, should have melted them, that they could not have bound him as a Malefactor, who had approved himself such a Benefactor; but their hearts were hardened.

III. Christ's expostulation with the officers of the detachment that came to apprehend him, to show what an absurd thing it was for them to make all this of him. (Ps. 3. 57.) He answered them, as said to the multitude; Luke tells us that it was said to the chief priests and captains of the temple, who commanded the several orders of the priests, and therefore are here put between the chief priests and the elders, so that they were all ecclesiastics, retainers to the temple, who were employed in this odious piece of service; and some of the first rank too disfigured themselves so far as to be seen in it.

Now observe here,

1. How Christ reasons with them concerning their proceedings. What occasion was there for them to come out in the dead of the night, and with swords and staves? (1.) They knew that he was one that would not resist, or raise the mob against them, he never had done any thing like that. Why then are we come out against a thief? (2.) They knew he was one that would not assault, for he was daily with them in the temple, in the midst of them, and never sought to conceal himself, nor did they offer to lay hands on him. Before his hour was come, it was folly for them to think to take him; and when his hour was come, it was folly for them to make all this ado to take him.

2. How he reconciles himself to their proceedings. But he did not before: "But this is your hour, and the power of darkness. How hard sever it may seem that I should be thus exposed, I submit, for so it is determined; this is the hour allowed you to have your will against me, there is an hour appointed me to reckon for it. Now the power of darkness, Satan, ruler of the darkness of this world, is permitted to do his worst, to bruise the heel of the seed of the woman, and I resolve to acquiesce; let him come, and he shall find resistance. The Lord shall laugh of him, for he sees that his day, his hour, is coming." Ps. 37. 13. Let this quiet us under the prevalence of the church's enemies; let it quiet us in a dying hour, that, (1.) It is but an hour that is permitted for the triumph of our adversary, a short time, a limited time. (2.) It is their hour, which is appointed them, and in which they are permitted to try their strength, this humble and gentle will may be the more glorified in their fall. (3.) It is the power of darkness that rules, and darkness must give way to light, and the power of darkness be made to truckle to the Prince of light. Christ was willing to wait for his triumphs till his warfare was accomplished, and we must be so too.

54 Then took they him, and led him, and brought him into the high priest's house. And Peter followed afar off. 55 And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them. 56 But a certain maid beheld him as he sat by the fire, and earnestly looked upon him, and said, This man was also with him. 57 And he denied him, saying, Woman, I know him not. 58 And after a little while another saw him, and said, Thou art also of them. And Peter said, Man, I know not. 59 And about the space of one hour after, another confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this fellow also was with him; for he is a Galilean. 60 And Peter said, Man, I know not what thou sayest. And immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew. 61 And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how he had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me three times. 62 And Peter went out, and wept bitterly.

We have here the melancholy story of Peter's denying his Master, at the time when he was arraigned before the High Priest, with those that were of the council, and were ready to receive the prey, and to prepare the evidence of his arraignment, as soon as it was day, before the great Sanhedrim, vi. 66. But notice is not taken here, as was in the other evangelists, of Christ's being now upon his examination before the High Priest, only of his being brought into the High Priest's house, vi. 54. But the manner of expression is observable; they took him, and led him, and brought him, which methinks is like that concerning Saul, (1 Sam. 15. 13.) He is gone about, and passed on, and gone down; and intimates that, even when they had seized their prey, they were in confusion, and, for fear of the people, or, rather, struck with inward terror upon what they had seen and heard, they took him the furthest way about, or, rather, knew not which way they hurried him, such a hurry were they in their own bosoms. Now observe here,

I. Peter's falling. 1. It began in sneaking. He followed Christ when he was led away prisoner, that was well, and showed a concern for his Master; but he followed afar off, that he might be out of danger. He thought to trim the matter; to follow Christ, and so to satisfy his conscience, but to follow afar off, and so to save his reputation, and sleep in a whole skin. 2. It proceeded in keeping his distance in such a manner, as if he did not think Christ, his Lord, to be his Master; and he did not think the servants, when he should have been at his Master's elbow. The servants kindled a fire in the midst of the hall and sat down together, to talk over their night-expedition. Probably, Malchus was among them, and Peter sat down among them, as if he had been one of them, at least would be thought to be so. 3. His fall itself was, disclaiming all acquaintance with Christ, even of the name, and denying him, discovering him because he was now in distress, and near to suffer. He was charged by a sorry, simple maid that belonged to the house, with being a retainer to this Jesus, about whom there was now so much noise. She looked wistfully upon him as he sat by the fire, only because he was a stranger, and one whom she had not seen before, and concluding that at this time of night there were no neutrals there, and knowing him not to be any of the retinue of the High Priest, she concludes him to be one of the retinue of this Jesus, or perhaps she had been some time or other looking about her in the temple, and seen Jesus there, and Peter with him conversing about him, and remembered him; and this man was with him, saith she. And Peter, as he had not the courage to own the charge, so he had not the wit and presence of mind to turn it off, as he might have done many ways, and therefore flat and plain denies it; Woman, I know him not. 4. His fall was repeated a second time; (v. 58.) After a little while, before he had time to recollect himself, and the evil of his fall, he said, "Even thou art one of them, sily as thou seest here among the High Priest's servants." Yet I, saith Peter, Man, I am not. And a third time, about the space of an hour after, (for, saith the tempter, "When he is down, with him; let us follow the bow, till we get him past recovery," 1) another confidently affirms, sternly asserts it, "Of a truth this fellow also was with him, let him deny it if he can, for you may all perceive he is a Galilean." But he that has once told a lie, is strongly tempted to persist in it; the beginning of that sin is in the letting forth of water. Peter now not only denies that he is a disciple of Christ, but that he knows any thing of him; (v. 60.) "Man, I know not what thou sayest; I never heard of this Jesus." 11. Peter's getting up again. See how happily he recovered himself, or, rather, the grace of God removed his breath. Some time was spent: 1. The cock crew, just as he was the third time denying that he knew Christ; and this startled him, and put him upon thinking. Note, Small accidents may have great influences. 2. The Lord turned, and looked upon him. This circumstance we had not in the other evangelists, but it is a very remarkable one. Christ is here called the Lord, or, rather, the great Lord, the Lord of all, of the complete, without a flaw, fulness, power, and grace, appearing in this. Observe, Though Christ had now his back upon Peter, and was upon his trial, (when, one would think, he had something else to mind,) yet he knew all that Peter said. Note, Christ takes more notice of what we say and do than we think he does; when Peter disowned Christ, yet Christ did not disown him, though he might justly have cast him off, and never look at him again, but did not, because he loved his Father. It is well for us that Christ does not deal with us as we deal with him. Christ looked upon Peter, not doubting but that Peter would soon be aware of it, for he knew that, though he had denied him with his lips, yet his eye would still be toward him. Observe, Though Peter had now been guilty of a very great offence, and which was very provoking, yet Christ would not call to him, lest he should shame him or expose him; he only gave him a look which none but Peter would understand the meaning of, and it had a great deal in it. (1.) It was a convincing look. Peter said that he did not know Christ. Christ turned, and looked upon him, as if he should say, "Dost thou not know me, Peter? Look me in the face, and tell me so," (2.) It was a chiding look. We may suppose that he looked upon him, and said, "Here is the mark, or some way signified his displease- sure. Let us think with what an angry countenance Christ justly looks upon us when we have sinned. (3.) It was an exasperating, upbraiding look; "What, Peter, art thou that disownest me now, when thou shouldst come and witness for me? What, thou a disciple? Thou that wast the most forward to confess me to be the Son of God, and didst solemnly promise thou wouldst never disown me?" (4.) It was a passionate look; he looked upon him with tenderness; "Peter Peter, how weak is thine heart! How art thou fallen and undone if I do not help thee!" (5.) It was a directing look. Christ guided him with his eye, gave him a wink to go out from that sorry company, to retire, and bethink himself a little, and then he would soon see what he had to do. (6.) It was a significant look; it signified the conveying of grace to Peter's heart, to enable him to repent; the crowing of the cock would not have brought him to repentance without this look, nor will the external means without special, efficacious grace. Power went along with this look, to change the heart of Peter, and to bring him to himself, to his right mind. 12. Peter remembered the words of the Lord. Note, The grace of God works in and by the word of God, brings that to mind, and sets that home upon the conscience, and so gives the soul the happy turn. Tolle et legge—Take it up and read. 4. Then Peter went out, and wept bitterly. One look from Christ melted him into tears of godly sorrow for sin. The candle was newly put out, and then a little thing lighted it again. Christ looked upon the chief priests, and made no impression upon them as he did on Peter, who had the divine seed remaining in him to work upon. It was not the look from Christ, but the grace of God with it, that recovered Peter, and brought him to rights. 63. And the men that held Jesus mocked him, and smote him. 64. And when they had blindfolded him, they struck him on the face, and asked him, saying, Prophesy, who is it that smote thee? 65. And many other things blasphemously speak they against him. 66. And as soon as it was day, the elders of the people and the chief priests and the scribes came together, and led him into their council, saying, Art thou the Christ? tell us. And he said unto them, If I tell you, ye will not believe: 66. And if I also ask you, ye will not an- swer me, nor let me go. 69. Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God. 70. Then said they all, Art thou then the Son of God? And he said unto them, Ye say that I am. 71. And they said, What need we any further wit- ness? for we ourselves have heard of his own mouth. We are here told, as before in the other gospels, 1. How our Lord Jesus was abused by the servants of the High Priest. The ajects gathered together against him, the rude and barbarous servants. They that held Jesus, that had him in custo- dy till the court sat, they mocked him, and smote him, (v. 63.) they would not allow him to refute himself one minute, though he had had no sleep all night, nor to compose himself though he was hurried to his trial, and no time given him to prepare for it. They made sport with him; this sorrowful night to him shall be a merry night to them; and the blessed Jesus, like Samson, is made the fool in the play. Theyhood-winked him, and then, according to the common play that young people have among them, they struck him on the face, and continued to do so till he named the person that smote him, (v. 64.) intending thereby an affront to his prophetic office, and that knowledge of secret things, which he was said to have. We are not told that he said anything, but here every thing; he was let loose, and he suf- fered it to do its worst. A greater indignity could not be done to the blessed Jesus, yet this was but one instance of many; for, (v. 65.) many other things blasphemously speak they against him. They that condemned him for a Blasphemer, were themselves the vilest blaspheomers that ever were.

II. How he was accused and condemned by the great sanhedrin, consisting of the elders of the people, the chief priests and the scribes, who were all up betimes, and got together as soon as it was day, about five of the clock in the morning, to prosecute this matter. They were working this evil upon their beds, and, as soon as ever the morning was light, proceeded to the trial. They would not have been up so early for any good work.

It is but a short account that we have here of his trial in the ecclesiastical court.

1. They ask him,

Art thou the Christ? He was generally believed by his followers to be the Christ, but they could not prove it upon him that he had ever said so soloem verbis—in so many words, and therefore urge him to own it to them, v. 67. If they had asked him this question with a willingness to admit that he was the Christ, and to receive him accordingly, if he could give sufficient proof of his being so, it had been well, and might have been for ever well with them; but they asked it with a resolution not to believe him, but a design to ensnare him.

2. He justly complained of their unfair and unjust usages to him, v. 71, 72. They all, as Jews, professed to expect the Messiah, and of the expectant Jews at this time; no other appeared, or had appeared, that pretended to be the Messiah, he had no competitor, nor was he likely to have any; he had given amazing proofs of a divine power going along with him, which made his claims very well worthy of a free and impartial inquiry; it had been but just for these leaders of the people, to have taken him into their counsels; and examined him there as a Candidate for the Messiahship, not at the bar as a Criminal; "But," saith he, (1.) "If I tell you that I am the Christ, and give you ever such convincing proofs of it, you are resolved that you will not believe. Why should the cause he brought on before you who have already prejudged it, and are resolved, right or wrong, to run it down, and to condemn it?" (2.) "If I ask you what you have to object against the proofs I produce, you will not answer me." Here he refers to their silence when he put a question to them, which would have led them to own his authority, ch. 20. 5—7. They were neither fair judges, nor fair disputants; but, when they were pinched with an argument, would rather be silent than own their conviction: "You will neither answer me, nor let me go; if I be the Christ, you ought to answer the arguments with which I have charged you, and, if you should, be, you ought to let me go, but you will do neither." He referred them to his second coming, for the full proof of his being the Christ, to their own conviction, since they would not now admit the proof of it, to their conviction; (v. 69.) "Hereafter shall the Son of man sit, and be seen to sit, on the right hand of the power of God, and then you will not need to ask whether I be or not." v. 80.

4. Hence they inferred that he set up himself as the Son of God, and asked him whether he were so or no; (v. 7.) "Art thou then the Son of God? He called himself the Son of man, referring to Daniel's vision of the Son of man that came near the Ancient of days, Dan. 7. 13, 14. But they understood so much as to know that if he was that Son of man, he must be the Son of God. And art thou so? By this it appears to have been the faith of the Jewish church, that the Messiah should be both Son of man, and Son of God.

5. He owns himself to be the Son of God; Ye say that I am; that is, "I am, as ye say." Compare Mark 14. 62: Jesus said, I am. This confirms Christ's testimony concerning himself, that he was the Son of God, that he stood to it, w l n he knew he should suffer for standing to it.

6. Upon this they ground his condemnation; (v. 71.) What need ye any further witness? It was true, they needed not any further witness to prove that he said he was the Son of God, they had it from his own mouth; but did they not need proof that he was not so, before they condemned him as a Blasphemer for saying that he was so? Had they no apprehension that it was possible he might be so, and then what horrid guilt they should bring upon themselves in putting him to death? No, they knew not, neither will they understand. They cannot think it possible that he should be the Messiah, though ever so evidently clothed with divine power and grace, if he appear not, as they expect, in worldly pomp and grandeur. Their eyes being blinded with the admiration of that, they rush on in this dangerous prosecution, as the horse into the battle.

CHAP. XXIII.

This chapter carries on and concludes the history of Christ's sufferings and death. We have here, I. His arraignment before Pilate the Roman governor, v. 1. 5. II. His examination before Herod, who was tetrarch of Galilee, under the Romans likewise, v. 6. 12. III. Pilate's struggle with the people to release Jesus, his repeated testimonies concerning his innocence, but his yielding at length to their importunity, and condemning him to be crucified, v. 13. 20. IV. An account of what passed as they journeyed from Jerusalem to Capernaum, where they went, v. 21. 30. V. An account of what passed at the place of execution, and the indignities done there, v. 32. 35. VI. The confession of the Jews, at the cross, v. 39. 43. VII. The death of Christ, and the prodigies that attended it, v. 44. 49. VIII. His burial, v. 50. 56.

1. And the whole multitude of them arose, and led him unto Pilate. 2. And they began to accuse him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, saying that he himself is Christ a King. 3. And Pilate asked him, saying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And he answered him, and said, Thou sayest it. 4. Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man. 5. And they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place. 6. When Pilate heard of Galilee, he asked whether the man were a Galilean. 7. And as soon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time. 8. And when Herod saw Jesus, he was exceeding glad for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him; and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him. 9. Then he questioned with him in many words; but he answered him nothing. 10. And the chief priests and scribes stood and vehemently accused him. 11. And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate. 12. And the same day Pilate and Herod were made friends together: for before they were at enmity between themselves.
Our Lord Jesus was condemned as a blasphemer in the spiritual court, but it was the most inpunent
maliice that could be that that court was actuated by; for when they had condemned him, they knew they could not put him to death, and therefore took another course
1. To accuse him before Pilate. The whole multitude of them arose, when they saw they could go no further with him in their court, and led him unto Pilate, though it was not a judgment day, no assizes or sessions, and they demand justice against him, not as a blasphemer, (that was no crime that he took cognizance of,) but as one disaffected to the Roman government; which they in their hearts did not hate, but which they used lightly. His conduct and they themselves were much more chargeable with it than he was; only it would serve the turn and anter the purpose of their malice; and it is observa-able, that that which was the pretended crime, for which they employed the Roman powers to destroy Christ, was the real crime, for which the Roman powers not long after destroyed them.

2. Hence the indictment drawn up against him,
(i. 2.) and in which they included a plea for Caesar, only to ingratiate themselves with Pilate, but it was all malice against Christ, and nothing else. They misrepresented him, (1.) As making the people rebel against Caesar. It was true, and Pilate knew it, that there was a general uneasiness in the people under the Roman yoke, and they wanted nothing but an opportunity to shake it off; now they would have Pilate to make a show of religion, in order to cirsume that general discontent, which, if the truth was known, they themselves were the ringleaders and abetters of; We have found him perverting the nation;
as if converting them to God's government were perverting them from the civil government; whereas nothing tends mere to make men good subjects than making them Christ's faithful followers. Christ had particularly taught the Jews to remain as subjects to Caesar, though he knew there were those that would be offended at him for it; and yet he is here falsely accused, as forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar. Inconicity is no fence against calumny.
(2.) As making himself a Rival with Caesar, though the very reason why they rejected him, and would not own him to be the Messiah, was, because he did not appear in worldly pomp and power, and did not set out to gratify that affection with which he was already struck with, that is, to exhibit his Kingdom;
which was denominated kingdom of God, in the sense of society or dominion in the spiritual world, without the characteristic of temporal power.
He himself is Christ a King. He did say that he was Christ, and if so, then a King, but not such a King as was ever likely to give disturbance to Caesar. When his followers would have made him a king, (John 6. 15.) he declined it, though by the many miracles he wrought he made it ap-ppear that if he would have set up in competition with Caesar, he would have been too strong for him.

2. His pleading to the indictment; Pilate asked him, Art thou the King of the Jews? v. 3. To which he answered, Thou sayest it; that is, "It is as thou sayest, that I am entitled to the government of the Jewish nation; but in rivalryship with the scribes and Pharisees, who tyrannize over them in matters of religion, not in rivalryship with Caesar, whose government is worldly. But in the spiritual dominion, it was only the kind of dominion over Caesar's jurisdiction.
Or, Thou sayest it; but canst thou prove it? What evidence hast thou for it?
All that know him, know the contrary, that he never pretended to be the King of the Jews, in opposition to Caesar as supreme, or to the governors that were sent by him, but the contrary.

3. Pilate's declaration of his innocence; (v. 4.) He said to the chief priests, and the people that seemed to join with them in the prosecution, "I found no fault in this man. What breaches of your law he may have been guilty of, I am not concerned to inquire, but I find nothing proved upon him, that makes him obnoxious to our court."

4. The continued fury and outrage of the prosecutors, v. 5. Instead of being moderated by Pilate's declaration of his innocence, and considering, as they ought to do, whether they were not bringing the guilt of innocent blood upon themselves, they were the more exasperated; more exceeding here.
We do not find that they have any particular fact produce, much less any evidence to prove it; but they resolve to carry it with noise and confidence, and say it, though they cannot prove it; Hence... the people to rebel against Cæsar, teaching through-their disciples to keep the commandments of laws and the prophets. He did stir up the people, but it was not to any thing factions or seditious, but to every thing that was virtuous and praise-worthy. He did teach, but they could not change him with teaching any doctrine that tended to disturb the public peace, or make the government uneasy or jealously

5. They accuse him before Herod. Pilate removed him and has cause to Herod's court. The accusers mentioned Galilai, the northern part of Canaan. "Why," saith Pilate, "is he of that country? Is he a Galilaei?" v. 6. "Yes," said they, "that is his head-quarters; there he has spent most of his time."

Let us send him to Herod, then," saith Pilate, "for Herod is now in town, and he it is fit he should have cognizance of his case, since he belongs to Herod's jurisdiction."

Pilate, as was very willing to him. The examining of him; (v. 8.) When he saw Jesus, he was exceding glad, and perhaps the more glad because he saw him a prisoner, saw him in bonds. He had heard many things of him in Galilece, where his miracles had for a great while been all the talk of the county; and he longed to see him, not for any affection he had for him or his doctrine, but purely out of curiosity; and it was only to gratify that, he let him to have the sight of Jesus. He had determined that would serve him to talk of as long as he lived.
In order to this, he questioned him in many things, that at length he might bring him to something in which he might show his power. Perhaps he pump-ished him concerning things secret, or things to come, or concerning his curing of diseases. But Jesus answered him nothing; nor would he gratify him so much as with the repetition of one miracle. The least beggar, that asked a miracle for the relief of his necessity, was never denied; but this proud prince, that asked a miracle merely for the gratifying of his curiosity, is denied; he might have seen Christ and his wondrous works many a time in Galilee, and would not, and therefore it is justly said, Now he would see them, and shall not; they are hid from his eyes, because he knew not the day of his prosperous."

6. The rejection of one miracle. The most bonds, he might command a miracle, but miracles must not be made cheap, nor Omnipotence be at the beck of the greatest potentate.

3. His prosecutors appeared against him before Herod, for they were restless in the prosecution;
They stood and vehemently accused him; (v. 10.)
impatiently and boldly, so the word signifies. They stood and made him to appear as if he had sold Galilee too with his seditious notions. Note, It is no new thing for good men and good ministers, and who are real and useful friends to the civil government, to be falsely accused as factious and seditionists, and enemies to government.

4. Herod was very abusive to him; he, with his men of war, his attendants and officers, and great men, set him at naught. They made nothing of him; so the word is. Horrid wickedness! To make nothing of him who made all things. They laughed at him as a Fool; for they knew he had wrought many miracles to befuddle others, and why would he not work one to befuddle himself? or, they laughed at him as one that had lost his power, and was become weak as other men. Herod, who had lost the knowledge of Christ too, than Pilate had, was more abusive to Christ than Pilate was; for knowledge without grace, does but make men the more ingeniously wicked. Herod arrayed Christ in a gorgeous robe, some gaudy, painted clothes, as a mocking; and so he taught Pilate's soldiers afterwards to do him the same indignity. He was ringleader in that abuse.

5. Herod returned him to Pilate, and it proved an occasion of the making of them friends, they having been for some time before at variance. Herod could not get sight of a miracle, but would not condemn him neither as a malefactor, and therefore sent him again to Pilate, (v. 11.) and so returned Pilate's civility and respect in sending the Prisoner to him; and this mutual obligation, with the messages that passed between them on this occasion, brought them to a better understanding one of another than there had been of late between them, v. 12. They had been at enmity between themselves, probably upon Pilate's killing the Galileans, who were Herod's subjects, (Luke 13. 1.) or some other such matter of controversy as usually occurs among princes and great men. Observe how those that quarrelled with one another, yet could unite against Christ: as Gehaz, and Ammon, and Amalek, though divided among themselves, were confederate against the Israel of God, Ps. 83. 7. Christ is the great Peace-Maker; both Pilate and Herod owned his innocency, and their agreeing in that cured their disagreeing in other things.

13. And Pilate, when he had called together the chief priests and the rulers and the people, 14. Said unto them, Ye have brought this man unto me as one that perverteth the people: and, behold, I, having examined him before you, have found no fault in this man, touching those things whereof ye accuse him: 15. No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him: and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him. 16. I will therefore chastise him, and release him. 17. (For of necessity he must release one unto them at the feast.) 18. And they cried out all at once, saying, Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas: 19. (Who for a certain sedition made in the city, and for murder, was cast into prison.) 20. Pilate, therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them. 21. But they cried, saying, Crucify him, crucify him. 22. And he said unto them the third time, Why, what evil hath he done? I have found no cause of death in him: I will therefore chastise him, and let him go. 23. And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed.

24. And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required. 25. And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desir'd; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

We have here the blessed Jesus run down by the mob, and hurried to the cross in the storm of a popular passion, and torn in pieces by the malice and artifice of the chief priests, as agents for the prince of the power of the air.

I. Pilate solemnly protests that he believes he has done nothing worthy of death or of bonds. And if he did believe so, he ought immediately to have discharged him, and not only so, but to have protected him from the fury of the priests and rabbles, and to have bound his hands to their good behaviour for their insolent conduct. But, being himself a bad man, he had no kindness for Christ; and having made himself otherwise obnoxious, was afraid of displeasing either the emperor or the people: and therefore, for want of integrity, he called together the chief priests, and rulers and people, (whom he should have dispersed, as a rotten and seditionous assembly, and forbid them to come near him,) and will have them to tell him what they had to say, and whom he should have turned a deaf ear, for he plainly saw what spirit actuated them; (v. 14.) "You have brought" (saith he) "this man to me, and because I have a respect for you, I have examined him before you, and have heard all you have to allege against him, and I can make nothing of it, I find no fault in him, you cannot prove the things whereof you accuse him.

2. He appeals to Herod, (whom he spares,) v. 15. "I send you to him, who is supposed to have known more of him than I have done, and he has sent him back, not convicted of any thing, nor under any mark of his displeasure; in his opinion, his crimes are not capital. He has laughed at him as a weak Man, but has not stigmatized him as a dangerous man." He thought Bedlam a fitter place for him than Tyburn.

III. He purposes to release him, if they will but consent to it. He ought not to have done it without asking leave of them, that justitia, rerum calamitatem—Let justice have its course, though the heavens should be desolated. But the fear of man brings many into this snare, that, whereas justice should take place, though heaven and earth come together, they will do an unjust thing, against their consciences, rather than pull an old house about their ears. Pilate declares him innocent, and therefore has a mind to release him, to please the people. 1. He will release him under the notion of a Malefactor, because of necessity he must release one; (v. 17.) so that whereas he ought to have been released by an act of justice, and thanks to nobody, he would have him released by an act of grace, and not be beholden to the people for it. 2. He will chastise him, and release him. If no fault be to be found in him, why should he be punished? or why should he be sold in souring as in crucifying an innocent man? nor would it be justified by pretending that this would satisfy the clamours of the people, and make him the Object of their pity, who was now to be the Object of their envy. We must not do evil that good may come.

IV. The people chose rather to have Barabbas released; a ratcheted fellow, that had nothing to recommend him to their favour but the daringness of his crimes: he was imprisoned for a sedition made in the city, and for murder, (of all crimes among men the least pardonable,) yet this was the criminal that was preferred before Christ; (v. 18, 19.) Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas. And no one wonder that such a man is the favourite and darling of such a mob, he that was really seditionists, rather then he that was really loyal, and falsely accused of sedition.

V. When Pilate urged the second time that Christ should be released, they cried out, Crucify him, cruxify him. (v. 21.) They not only will have him die, but will have him die so great a death; nothing less will serve but he must be crucified; Cruify him, crucify him.

VI. When Pilate the third time reasoned with them, to show them the unreasonable and injustic-tice of it, they were more peremptory and outrageous; (v. 22.) What! What evil hath he done?
Name his crime. I have found no cause of death, and you cannot say what cause of death you have found in him; and therefore if you will but speak the word, I will chastise him, and let him go." But popular fury, the more it is complimented, the more furious it grows; they were instant with loud voices, with great noises or outcry, not requesting, but requiring that he might be crucified; even as if they had as much right, at the least, to demand the crucifying of one that was innocent, as the release of one that was guilty.

VII. Pilate's yielding, at length, to their importtunity. The voice of the people, and of the chief priests prevailed and were too hard for Pilate, and overruled him to go contrary to his convictions and inclinations. He had not courage to go against so strong a stream, but gave sentence that it should be as they required. (v. 24.) Here is judgment turned away backward, and justice standing apart, for fear of popular fury. Truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter, Isa. 59. 14. Judgment was looked for, but behold, oppression; righteousness, but behold, a cry, Isa. 5. 7. This is repeated, v. 25.
with the aggravating circumstance of the release of Barabbas; He released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, who hereby would be hardened in his wickedness, and do the more evil, but will have him die, who they had desired, being alike altogether such a one as themselves, but he delivered Jesus to their will; and he could not deal more barbarously with him than to deliver him to their will, who hated him with a perfect hatred, and whose tender mercies were cruelty.

26. And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus.
27. And there followed him a great company of people, and of women, which also bemawled and lamented him. 28. But Jesus turning unto them, said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children. 29. For, behold, the days are coming, in the which they shall say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which gave never suck. 30. Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall upon us; and to the calls. Cover us. 31. For if they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry?

We have here the blessed Jesus, the Lamb of God, led as a lamb to the slaughter, to the sacrifice.
It is strange with what expedition they went through his trial; how they could do so much work in so little time, though they had so many great men to deal with, attendance on whom is usually a work of time. He was brought before the chief priests at break of day, (ch. 22. 66.) after that to Pilate, then to Herod, then to Pilate again; and there seems to have been a long struggle between Pilate and the people about him. He was scourged, and crowned with thorns, and contumeliously used, and all this was done in four or five hours' time, or six at most,
for he was crucified between the ninth and twelve.
Christ's person, to resolve to lose no time, for fear that his friends at the other end of the town should get notice of what they were doing, and should rise to rescue him. Nevertheless was so chased out of the world as Christ was, but so he himself said, Yet a little while, and ye shall not see me; a very little while indeed.

Now as they led him away to death we find,
1. That one that was a bearer, that carried his cross, Simon by name, a Cyrenian, who probably, was a friend of Christ, and was known to be so, and this was done to put a reproach upon him; they laid Christ's cross upon him, that he might bear it after Jesus, (v. 26.) lest Jesus should faint under it and die away, and so prevent the further instances of malice they designed. It was a pity, but a cruel fate, that gave him this case.

2. Many that were mourners, true mourners, who followed him, bewailing and lamenting him.
These were not only his friends and well-wishers,
but the common people, that were not his enemies,
and were moved with compassion toward him, because they had heard the fame of him, and what an excellent, useful Man he was, and had reason to think he seemed. majestically; this drew a great crowd after him, as usual at executions, especially of those that have been persons of distinction. A great company of people followed him, especially of women; (v. 27.) some led by pity, others by curiosity, but they also (as well as those that were his particular friends and acquaintance) bewailed and lamented him. Though there were many that reproached and reviled him, yet there were some that valued him, and pitied him, and were sorry for him; and were partakers with him in his sufferings. The dying of the Lord Jesus may perhaps meet natural affections in many that are strangers to devout affections; many bewail Christ, that do not believe in him and lament him, that do not love him above all.

Now here we are told what Christ said to these mourners; though one would think he should be wholly taken up with his own concerns, and have not care to take cognizance of their tears. Christ died lamented, and has a bottle for the tears of those who lamented him. He wept to them, though they were strangers to him, and bid them not weep for him, but for themselves; he directs their lamentation into another channel. v. 27.

1. He gives them a general direction concerning their lamentations: Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children. 29. For, behold, the days are coming, in the which they shall say, Blessed are the barren,
and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck. 30. Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall upon us, and to the hills. Cover us. 31. For if they do these things
it was our deliverance, and the purchase of eternal life for us. And therefore weep not for him, but let us weep for our own sins, and the sins of our children, that were the cause of his death; and weep for fear (such were the tears here prescribed) of the miseries we shall bring upon ourselves, if we slight his love, and reject his grace, as the Jewish nation did, which brought upon them the ruin here foretold. When our dear relations and friends die in Christ, we must regard them as being taken to heaven, and have put off the burden of the flesh, are made perfect in holiness, and are entered into perfect rest and joy, but for ourselves and our children, who are left behind in a world of sins, and sorrows, and snares.

2. He gives them a particular reason why they should weep for themselves and for their children: "For behold, sad times are coming upon your city, it will be destroyed, and will be transformed to these common destruction." When Christ's own disciples sorrowed after a godly sort for his leaving them, he wiped away their tears with the promise that he would see them again, and they should rejoice, John 16. 22. But when these daughters of Jerusalem bewailed him only with a worldly sorrow, he turned their tears into another channel, and told them that they should have something given them to cry for. Let them weep, and weep freely, and be moved with sorrow and sighing. 4. 9. He had lately wept over Jerusalem himself, and now he bids them weep over it. Christ's tears should set us a weeping. Let the daughters of Zion, that own Christ for their King, rejoice in him, for he comes to save them; but let the daughters of Jerusalem, that only weep for him, but do not take him for their King, weep and trouble to think of his coming to judge them. Now the destruction of Jerusalem is here foretold by two proverbial sayings, which might then fitly be used, which both bespeak it very terrible, that what people commonly dread they would then desire, to be written childless, and to be buried alive. (1.) They would wish to be written childless. Whereas commonly those that have no children, envy those that have, as Rachel envied Leah, then these that have children, will find them such a burden in adversity, which none can escape, and such a grief when they see them either fasting for famine or falling by the sword, that they will envy those that have none, and say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, that have no children to be given up to the murderer, or to be snatched out of his hands. It would not only gild those who at that time were with child, or giving suck, as Christ had said, (Matth. 23. 17.) but it would be terrible to those, whoever had had children, and sucked them, and had them now alive. See Hos. 9. 11—14. See the vanity of the creature and the uncertainty of its comforts, for such may be the changes of Providence concerning us, that those very things may become the greatest burdens, cares, and griefs to us, which we have delighted in as the greatest blessings. (2.) They would wish to be buried alive. A. B. 59. shall we fall on us, and to the hilles, Cover us. This also refers to a passage in the same prophecy with the former, Hos. 10. 8. They shall wish to be hid in the darkest caves, that they might be out of the noise of these calamities. They will be willing to be sheltered upon any terms, though with the hazard of being crushed to pieces. This would be the language, especially of the great and powerful, who would not flee to Christ for refuge, and put themselves under his protection, will in vain call to hilles and mountains to shelter themselves from his wrath.

3. He shows how natural it was for them to infer that desolation from his sufferings; (ver. 31.) If they hear these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? Some think that this is borrowed from Ezek. 20. 47. The fire shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree. These words may be applied. (1.) Mere particularly to the destruction of Jerusalem, which Christ here foretold, and which the Jews by putting him to death brought upon themselves; "If they (the Jews and the inhabitants of Jerusalem) do these things upon the green tree, if they do thus abuse an innocent and excellent person for his good works, how may they expect God to deal with them for their ill doing, who have made themselves a dry tree, a corrupt tree, and wicked generation, and good for nothing! If this be their sin, what do you think will be their punishment?" Or take it thus: "If they (the Romans, their judges, and their soldiers) abuse me thus, who have given them no provocation, who am to them as a green tree, which you seem to be as much enraged at, what will they do by Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, who will be so very provoking to them, and make themselves as a dry tree, as fuel to the fire of their resentments? If God suffer those things to be done to me, what will he appoint to be done to those barren trees, of whom it hath been often said, that they should be hewn down and cast into the fire?" Math. 3. 10.—7. 19. (2.) They may be applied more generally to all the revelations of God's wrath against all nations, sinners; Matt. 3. 10. and God will deliver me up to such sufferings as these, because I am made a sacrifice for sin, what will he do with sinners themselves? Christ was a green Tree, fruitful and flourishing; now if such things were done to him, we may from thence infer what should have been done to the whole race of mankind, if he had not interposed, and what shall he done to those that continue dry trees, notwithstanding all that is done to make them fruitful. If God did this to the Son of his love, when he found but sin imputed to him, what shall he do to the generation of his wrath, when he finds sin reigning in them? If the Father were pleased in doing these things to the green tree, why should he be loath to do it to the dry? Note, The consideration of the bitter sufferings of our Lord Jesus should engage us to stand in awe of the justice of God, and to tremble before him. The best saints, compared with Christ, are dry trees. If he suffer, why may not they expect to suffer? And what then shall the damnation of sinners be?

32. And there were also two others, malefactors, led with him to be put to death. 33. And when they were come to the place which is called Calvary, there they crucified him, and the malefactors; one on the right hand, and the other on the left. 34. Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do. And they parted his raiment, and cast lots. 35. And the people stood beholding, and the rulers also with them derided him, saying, He saved others; let him save himself, if he be Christ, the chosen of God. 36. And the soldiers also mocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar. 37. And saying, If thou be the King of the Jews, save thyself. 38. And a superscription also was written over him, in letters of Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew, THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS. 39. And one of the malefactors which were hanged railed on him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us. 40. But the other answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? 11. And we indeed justly: for we receive the due reward of our deeds: but this man hath done nothing amiss. 42. And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. 13. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To-day shall thou be with me in paradise.

In these verses, we have,

1. Divers passages which we had before in Matthew and Mark, concerning Christ’s sufferings.

1. That there were two others, malefactors, led with him to the place of execution; who, it is probable, had been for some time men to do so: death was designed to be executed at this day, which was, probably, the pretence for making such haste in the prosecution of Christ, that he and these two malefactors might be executed together, and one solemnity might serve.

2. That he was crucified at a place called Calvary, Greek, the Greek name for Golgotha—the place of a skull: an ignominious place, to add to the reproach of his sufferings: but significant, for the Church is typified after as it was upon his own longhill. He was crucified; his hands and feet were nailed to the cross as it lay upon the ground; and then it was lifted up, and fastened into the earth, or some socket to receive it. This was a painful and shameful death above any other.

3. That he was crucified in the midst between two thieves, as if he had been the worst of the three; thus he was despised of men, and despised himself. He was crucified; his hands and feet were nailed to the cross as it lay upon the ground; and then it was lifted up, and fastened into the earth, or some socket to receive it. It was strange that so much barbarity should be found in the human nature: The people stood beholding, not at all concerned, but rather pleasing themselves with the spectacle; and the rulers, whom from their office one would take to be men of sense and men of honour, they stood among the rabble, and derided him, to set those on that were about him to do so; and they said, He saved others, let him save himself. Thus he was upbraided for the good works he had done, as if it were indeed for these that they crucified him. They triumph over him as if they had conquered him, whereas he was himself then more than a conqueror; they challenge him to save himself from the cross, when he was saving others by the cross: If he be the Christ, the chosen of God, let him save himself. They knew that the Christ is the chosen of God; designed by him, and dear to him. If he, as the Christ, would deliver our nation from the Romans, and they could not form any other idea than that, of the Messiah, let him deliver himself from the Romans that have him now in their hands. Thus the Jewish rulers jeered him as captivated by the Romans, instead of subduing them. The Roman soldiers jeered him as the King of the Jews: he was not able to save himself, a prince, and a prince good enough for such a people. They mocked him, (v. 36, 37.) they made sport with him, and made a jest of his sufferings; and when they were drinking sharp, sour wine themselves, as was generally alled them, they triumphantly asked him if he would plead for them, or deal with them. And thou art to say, If this be the King of the Jews, save himself. It is the Jews that said this to him under the notion of a pretended Messiah, so the Romans under the notion of a pretended King.

6. That the superscription over his head, setting forth his crime, was, This is the King of the Jews. The reason was, He is put to death for pretending to be the King of the Jews: so they meant it; but God intended it to be a declaration of what he really was, not with standing his being the Christ, the King of the Jews, the King of the church, and his cross is the way to his crown. This was written in those that were called the three learned languages, the Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew, for these are best learned, that have learned Christ. It was written in these three languages, that it might be known and read of all men: but God designed it to signify that the gospel was to be preached to the ends of the earth; and in these three languages, beginning at Jerusalem, and he read in all languages. The Gentile philosophy made the Greek tongue famous, the Roman laws and government made the Latin tongue so, and the Hebrew excelled them all for the sake of the Old Testament. In these three languages is Jesus Christ proclaimed King. Young scholars that are taking pains at school to make themselves masters of these three languages, see that this is their end, that they in a short time may increase their acquaintance with Christ.

II. Here are two passages which we had not before, and they are very remarkable ones.

1. Christ’s prayer for his enemies; (v. 54.) Father, forgive them. Seven remarkable words Christ spake after he was nailed to the cross, and before he died, and this is the first. One reason why he died the death of the cross was, that he might have liberty of speech to the last, and so might glorify his Father, and edify those about him. As soon as ever he was fastened to the cross, or while they were maiming him, he prayed this prayer: in which, observe,

(1.) The petition: Father, forgive them. One would think that he should have prayed, “Father, consume them; the Lord look upon it, and requite it.” The sin they were now guilty of, might possibly have been more heinous than their former sins; for, as they were before, so now, at the last, they have been excepted by name out of the act of intensity. No, these are particularly prayed for. Now he made intercession for transgressors, as was foretold, (Isa. 53. 12.) and it is to be added to his prayer, John 17, to complete the specimen he gave of his intercession within the vail: that for saints, this for sinners. Now the sayings of Christ upon the cross as well as his sufferings had a further reach than they seemed to have. This was a meditator word, and expiatory of the intent and meaning of his death: “Father forgive them, not only these, but all that shall repent, and believe the gospel;” and he did not intend that these should be forgiven upon any other terms. “Father, that which I am now suffering and dying for, is in order to this, that poor sinners may be pardoned.” Note, [1.] The note that Christ died to purchase atonement for us, is, the forgiveness of sin. [2.] This is that which Christ intercedes for, all that repent and believe in the virtue of his satisfaction; his blood speaks this, Father, forgive them. [5.] The greatest sinners may, through Christ, upon their repentance, hope to find mercy. Father, forgive them; though they were his persecutors and murderers.

(2.) The plea: For they knew not what they did —if they had known, they would not have crucified him, 1 Cor. 2, 8. There was a veil upon his glory and upon their understandings; and how could they see through two vails? They wished his blood on them and their children; but had they known what they did, they would have unwished it again
Note, [1.] The crucifiers of Christ know not what they do. They that speak ill of religion, speak ill of that which they know not, and it is because they will not know it. [2.] There is a kind of ignorance that does in part excuse sin; ignorance through want of the means of knowledge, or of a capacity to receive instruction, through the infidelities of educators, and the enmity of rulers, which were kept in ignorance by their rulers, and had prejudices against him instilled into them, so that in what they did against Christ and his doctrine they thought they did God service, John 16. 2. Such are to be pitied and prayed for. This prayer of Christ was answered not long after, when many of those that had a hand in his death, were converted by Peter, and Peter by Christ; his power and mercy was in the conversion of a penitent thief, whose case was altogether extraordinary. He never had any offer of Christ, nor day of grace, before now: he was designed to be made a singular instance of the power of Christ's grace, now at a time when he was crucified in weakness.

Christ, having conquered Satan in the destruction of Judas, and the preservation of Peter, sets this and his trophy of his victory over him in the conversion of this malefactor, or as a specimen of what he would do.

We shall see the case to be extraordinary, if we observe,

[1.] The extraordinary operations of God's grace upon him, which appeared in what he said. Here were so many evidences given in a short time of a blessed conversion, that more could not have been in so little a compass.

First, See what he said to the other malefactor, v. 40, 41. 1. He reproved him for railing on Christ, as destitute of the fear of God, and having no sense at all of religion; Dost thou not fear God? This implies that it was the fear of God which restrained him from following the multitude to do this evil. "If thou hast not the fear of God, you therefore may do what thou wilt?" All that have their eyes opened, see this to be at the bottom of the wickedness of the wicked, that they have not the fear of God before their eyes. "If thou hast any humanity in thee, thou wouldst not insult over one that is thy fellow-sufferer; thou art in the same condition; thou art a dying man too, and therefore, whatever these wicked people do, it will become thee to abuse a dying Man." He owns that he deserved what was done to him: We indeed justly. It is probable that they both suffered for one and the same crime, and therefore he spoke with the more assurance, we receive the due reward of our deeds. This magnifies divine grace, as acting in a distinguishing way. These two had been comrades in sin and suffering, and yet one is saved, and the other is left to perish: two that were wicked, and yet neither one taken and the other left. He does not say, Thou indeed justly, but, We, Note, True penitents acknowledge the justice of God in all the punishments of their sin. God has done right, but we have done wickedly. 3. He believes Christ to have suffered wrongfully. Though he was condemned in two courts, and run upon as if he had been the worst of malefactors, yet this poor thief is convinced, by his conduct in his sufferings, that he has done nothing amiss. The chief priest would have him crucified between the malefactors, as one of them; but this thief has more sense than they, and owns lie is none of them, so he was nothing abased, or undergoing his character. Whether he had before heard of Christ and of his wonders, works does not appear, but the Spirit of grace enlightened him with this knowledge, and enabled him to say, This man has done nothing amiss.

Secondly, See what he said to our Lord Jesus; (v. 42.) Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. This is the prayer of a dying sinner to a dying Saviour. It was the honour of Christ to be thus prayed to, though he was put on the cross for the sake of the happiness of the thief thus to pray; perhaps he never prayed before, and yet now was heard, and saved at the last gasp. While there is life, there is hope; and while there is hope, there is room for prayer.
1. Observe his faith in this prayer. In his confession of sin, (v. 4.) he discovered repentance towards God. In this petition he discovered faith towards God; the trust that he would receive the kingdom of heaven to all penitent, obedient believers.

2. Observe his humility in this prayer. All his request is, Lord, remember me. He does not pray, Lord, prefer me, as they did, Matt. 20. 21.) though, having the honour so as none of the disciples had, to drink of Christ's cup, and to be baptized with his baptism either on his right hand or on his left in his sufferings; when his own disciples had deserted him, he might have had some colour to say they had not delivered by his Father to make this profession before those prodigies happened which put honour upon his sufferings, and which started the centurion; yet verily we have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. He believed another life after this, and desired to be happy in that life, not as the other thief, but saved from the cross, but to be well done for when the cross had done its work.

3. There is an air of importunity and fervency in this prayer. He doth, as it were, breathe out his soul in it: "Lord, remember me, and I have enough; I desire no more; into thy hands I commit my case." Note, To be remembered by Christ, now that he is in his kingdom, is what we should earnestly desire and pray for, and it will be enough to secure our welfare, living and dying. Christ is our Advocate, our Intercessor. "Lord, remember me, and intercede for me." He is there, ruling: "Lord, remember me, and rule in me by thy Spirit." He is there, preparing places for those that are his: "Lord, remember me, and prepare a place for me; remember me at death, remember me in the resurrection. See Job 14. 15.

[2.] The extraordinary grants of Christ's favour to him: James said unto him, in answer to his prayer, "Verily I say unto thee, I the Amen, the faithful Witness, I say Amen to this prayer, put my fiat to it; nay, thou shalt have more than thou didst ask, This day shalt thou be with me in paradise," v. 45. Observe, First, To whom this was spoken: to the penitent thief, to him, and not to his companion. Christ upon the cross is like Christ upon the throne: for now is the kingdom of this world, his, and the kingdom of his Father; sit on his right hand and on his left in his kingdom; acquaintance in sufferings hath sometimes gained such a point, Jer. 52. 31, 32. But he is far from the thought of it; all he begs is, Lord, remember me, referring himself to Christ in what way to remember him. It is a request like that of Joseph to the chief butler, Think on me. (Gen. 40.) and it sped better; the chief butler forgot Joseph; Christ remembered this thief.

4. And it was about the sixth hour, and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. 45. And the sun was darkened, and the veil of the temple was rent in the midst. 46. And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said thus, he gave up the ghost. 47. Now when the centurion saw what was done, he glorified God, saying. Certainly this was a righteous man. 48. And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts, and returned. 49. And all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things.

In these verses, we have three things.

1. Christ's dying magnified by the prodigies that attended it: only two are here mentioned, which we had an account of before.

1. The darkening of the sun at noon day. It was a wonder about this, as it is recorded in the computation, twelve o'clock at noon; and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour; the sun was eclipsed, and the air exceedingly clouded at the same time; both which concurring to this thick darkness, which continued three hours, no three days, as that of Egypt did.

2. The rending of the veil of the temple. The former prodigy was in the heavens, this in the templ Bible, for these there are the houses of God, and could not but feel it when the Son of God was thus abused, and thus signify their resentment of it. By this rending of the veil was signified the taking away of the ceremonial law, which was a wall of partition between the children of Israel and other dispersed naties and discouragements in our approach to God,
somewhat we may come boldly to the throne of grace.

II. Christ's dying explained, (v. 46.) by the words with which he breathed out his soul. Jesus had cried with a loud voice, when he said, Why hast thou forresaken me? So we are told in Matthew and Mark, and, it should seem, it was with a loud voice that he said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit. The people might take notice of it; and this he said,
Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit.

1. He borrowed these words from his father Davit; (Ps. 31. 5.) not that he needed to have words put into his mouth, but he chose to make use of Da-vit's words, to show that it was the Spirit of Christ that testified in the Old-Testament prophets, and that he came to fulfill the scripture. Christ died with scripture in his mouth. Thus he directs us to make use of scripture-language in our addresses to God.

2. In this address to God, he calls him Father;
when he complained of being forsaken, he cried, El,
El, My God, my God; but to show that this dreadful agony of his soul was now over, he here calls God Father. For he was giving up his life and soul for us, he did for us call God Father, that we through him might receive the adoption of sons.

3. Christ made use of these words in a sense peculiar to himself as Mediator. He was now to make his soul an offering for our sin, (Isa. 53. 10.) to give his life a ransom for many, (Matt. 20. 28.) by the eternal Savior to offer himself, Heb. 9. 14. He was himself both the Priest and the Sacrifice; our souls were forfeited, and his must go to redeem the fortune. The price must be paid into the hands of God, the Party offended by sin; to him he had undertaken to make full satisfaction. Now by these words he offered up the Sacrifice, did, as it were, lay his hand upon the head of it, and surrender it; with him I deposit it, I pay it down into thy hands. Father, accept of my life and soul instead of the lives and souls of the sinners I die for. The animus offeren-tis—the good will of the Offerer was requisite to the acceptance of the Offering. Now Christ here expresses his cheerful willingness to offer himself, as he had done when it was first proposed to him, (Heb.
10. 9, 10.) Lo, I come to do thy will, by the which will we are sanctified.

4. Christ hereby signifies his dependence upon his Father for his resurrection, by the re-union of his soul and body. He commends his spirit into his Father's hand, to be received into paradise, and returned the third day. By this it appears that our Lord Jesus, as he had a true body, so he had a reasonable soul, which existed in a state of separation from the body, and thus he was made like unto his brethren; this soul he lodged in his Father's hand, committed it to his custody, resting in hope that it should not be left in hades, in its state of separation from the body, nor, not so long as that the body might see corruption.

5. Christ hath hereby left us an example; hath fitted those words of David to the purpose of dying saints, and hath, as it were, sanctified them for their use. In death our great care should be about our souls, and we cannot more effectually provide for that than by ascertaining and committing them into the hands of God as a Father, to be sanctified and governed by his Spirit and grace, and at death by com-mittin them into his hands to be made perfect in holiness and happiness. We must show that we are freely willing to die, that we firmly believe another life after this, and are desirous of it, by saying,
Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit.

III. Christ's dying improved by the impressions
it made upon those that attended him.

1. The centurion that had command of the guard, was much moved at what he saw and heard; see ch. 22. 47. He was a Roman, a Gentile, a stranger to the consolations of Israel; and yet he glorified God. He never saw such amazing instances of divine power, and therefore took occasion from thence to adore God as the Almighty. And he bore a testimony to the patient Sufferer; "Certainly this was a righteous Man, and was unjustly put to death." God's manifestation of his love in the fear of God, is a plain evidence of his innocence. His testimony in Matthew and Mark goes further; Truly this was the Son of God. But in his case this amounts to the same; for if he was a righteous Man, he said very true when he said that he was the Son of God;
and therefore that testimony of his concerning himself must be admitted, for if it were false, he was not a righteous man.

2. The disinterested spectators could not but be concerned. This is taken notice of only here; (v. 48.) All the people that came together to that night, as is usual upon such occasions, beholding the things which were done, could not but go away very serious for the time, whatever they were when they came home; They smote their breasts, and returned.
(1.) They were oppressed with many reflections. They were filled with a wicked thought, to put him to death, and could not but think that some judgment of God would come upon their nation for it.
Probably, those very people were of these that had cried, Crucify him, crucify him, and, when he was nailed to the cross, reviled and blasphemed him;
but now they were so terrified with the darkness and earthquake, and the uncommon manner of his expiring, that they had not only their minds stopped, but their consciences startled, and, in remorse for what they had done, as the publican, they smote upon their breasts, beat upon their own hearts, as those that had indignation at themselves. Some think that this was a happy step toward that good work which was afterward wrought upon them, when they were pricked to the heart, Acts 2. 37.
(2.) The providence of God, to set forth his sufferings, was thus mark'd, that they did not show any further token of respect to Christ, nor inquire more concerning him, but went home; and we have reason to fear that in a little time they quite forgot it. Thus many that see Christ evidently set forth crucified among them in the word and sacraments, are a little affected for the present, but it does not continue; they smite their breasts, and return not. They see Christ's face in the glass of the ordinances and admire him; but they go away, and straightway forget what manner of Man he is, and what reason they have to love him.

3. His own friends and followers were forced to keep their distance; and yet got as near as they could, and durst, to see what was done; (v. 48.) All his acquaintance that knew him, and were known of him, went afar off, for fear lest, if they had been near him, they should have been taken up as favourites of him; this was part of his sufferings, as of Job's, (ch. 19. 13.) He has put my brethren far from me,
and mine acquaintance are very estranged from me, Ps. 88. 18. And the women that followed him together from Galilee, were beholding these things, not knowing what to make of them, nor really as they would, to do that which they were commanded to do for certain preordiiments of his resurrection. Now was Christ set for a Sign that should be spoken against, as Simeon foretold, that the thoughts of many hearts might be retested, ch. 2. 34, 35.
50 And, behold, there was a man named Joseph, a counsellor; and he was a good man, and a just: 51. (The same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them:) he was of Arimathea, a city of the Jews; who also himself waited for the kingdom of God. 52. This man went unto Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. 53. And he took it down, and wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone, wherein never man before was laid. 54. And that day was the preparation, and the sabbath drew on. 55. And the women also, which came with him from Galilee, followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid. 56. And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the sabbath-day, according to the commandment.

We have here an account of Christ's burial. For he must be brought not only to death, but to the dust of death, (Ps. 22. 15.) according to the sentence, (Gen. 3. 19.) To the dust that shalt return. Observ. 1. Who buried him. His acquaintance stood afar off; they had neither money to bear the charge, nor courage to bear the odium of burying him decently: but God raised up one that had both; a man named Joseph, v. 50. His character is, that he was a good man, and a just, a man of unspettled reputation for virtue and piety; not only just to all, but good to all that needed him; (and care to bury the dead, as becomes the hope of the resurrection of the dead, is one instance of goodness and benevolence, which is a person of quality, a counsellor, a senator, a member of the sanhedrim, one of the elders of the Jewish church. Having said this of him, it was necessary to add, that though he was of that body of men who had put Christ to death, yet he had not consented to their counsel and deed; (v. 51.) though it was carried by the majority, yet he entered his protest against it, and followed not the multitude to do evil. Note, That evil counsel and deed shall not be reckoned our act, which we have not consented to. Nay, he not only dissent ed openly from those that were enemies to Christ, but he confessed secretly with those that were his friends; He himself waited for the kingdom of God; he believed the Old-Testament prophecies of the Messiah and his kingdom, and expected the accomplishment of them. This was the man that appears upon this occasion to have had a greater part in the business of burying his dead Lord than any other; and he was at last one of Christ's chief followers after his resurrection. It is good to have friends that are friends of the Lord Jesus. Note, There are many who are hearty in Christ's interests, who, though they do not make any show in their outward profession of it, yet will be more ready to do him a piece of real service, when there is occasion, than others who make a greater figure and noise.

... What did he toward the burying of him. (1.) He went to Pilate, the judge that condemned him, and bought an endless costly linen for it was at his dispos- als; and though he might have raised more than sufficient to have carried off the body by violence, yet he would take the regular course, and do it peaceably. (2.) He took it down, it should seem, with his own hands, and wrapped it in linen. They tell us that it was the manner of the Jews, (and that the word here used signifies so much,) to roll the bodies of the dead as we do little children in their swaddling clothes; so that the piece of fine linen which he bought whole, he cut into many pieces for that purpose. It is said of Lazarus, He was bound hand and foot, John 11. 44. Grave clothes are to the saints as swaddling clothes, which they shall out-grow, and put off, when they come to the perfect man.

3. Where he was buried; in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone, that the prison of the grave might be strong as the church, when she was brought into darkness, had her way included with hewn stone, Lam. 3. 2, 9. But it was a sepulchre in which never man before was laid, for he was buried on such an account as never any one before him was buried, only in order to his rising again the third day by his own power; and he was to triumph over the grave so as never any man did.

4. When he was buried; (v. 55.) on the day of the preparation, when the sabbath drew on. This is given as a reason why they made such haste with the funeral, because the sabbath drew on, which required their attendance to other work, preparing for the sabbath, and going forth to worship. Yet weeping must not hinder seeing. Though they were in tears for the death of Christ, yet they must apply themselves to the sanctifying of the sabbath. And when the sabbath draws on, there must be preparation. Our worldly affairs must be so ordered, that we neither hinder us from our sabbath work; and our holy affections must be so excited, that they may carry us on in it.

5. Who attended the funeral; (v. 55.) not any of the disciples, but only the women that came with him from Galilee, (v. 55.) who were said by him before he bore the cross, so they followed him in all their tears, no doubt, and beheld the sepulchre where it was, which was the way to it, and how his body was laid in it. They were led to this, not by their curiosity, but by their affection to the Lord Jesus, which was strong as death, cruel as the grave, and which many waters could not quench. Here was a silent funeral, and not a solemn one, and yet his rest was glorious.

6. What preparation was made for the embrai ng of his body after he was buried; (v. 55.) They returned, and prepared spices and ointments, which was more an evidence of their love than of their faith; for had they remembered and believed what he had so often told them, that he should rise again the third day, they would have spared their cost and pains herein, as knowing that in a short time there would be a great honour put upon his body by the glory of his resurrection, than they could put upon it with their most precious ointments; but, busy as they were in this preparation, they rested on the sabbath-day, and did none of this service work hereon, not according to the custom of their nation, but according to the commandments of their God, which, though the day be altered, is still in full force; Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy.

CHAP. XXIV.

Our Lord Jesus went gloriously down to death, in spite of the malice of his enemies, who sought to make his death ignominious; but he rose again more gloriously; of which we have an account in this chapter; and the proofs and evidences of Christ's resurrection are more fully related than his sufferings; because the angels refer them to the sabbath; and the account of this resurrection is the foundation both of the history, v. 11. of the third day, and of the ascension, v. 12. III. Christ's conference with the two disciples that were going to Emmaus, and his making of himself known to them, v. 13. 14. 15. And the appearing to the two, the same day at evening, v. 16. 17. 18. 19. The farewell he gave them, his ascension into heaven, and the joy and praise of his disciples whom he left behind, v. 19. 20.
they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them. 2. And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre. 3. And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. 4. And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments: 5. And, as they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead? 6. He is not here, but is risen, as he said. And, behold, they had prepared spices, and anointing materials. And they went and prepared the sepulchre, and were lying at the head of the sepulchre. 7. And when the sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, told these things unto the apostles. 8. And their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. 9. Then arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre; and stooping down, he beheld the linen clothes laid by themselves, and departed, wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.

The manner of the re-announcing of Christ's soul and body in his resurrection, is a mystery, one of the secret things that belong not to us; but the infallible proofs of his resurrection, that he did indeed rise from the dead, and was thereby proved to be the Son of God, are things revealed, which belong to us and to our children; some of them we have here in these verses which relate to the same subject, for substance that we had in Matthew and Mark.

1. We have here the affection and respect which the good women that had followed Christ, showed to him, after he was dead and buried, ver. 1. As soon as ever they could, after the sabbath was over, they came to the sepulchre, to embalm his body, not to take it out of the linen in which Joseph had wrapped it, but to anoint the head and face, and perhaps the wounded hands and feet, and to scatter sweet spices upon and about the body; as it is usual with us to strew flowers about the dead bodies and graves of our friends, only to show our good will toward the taking off the deformity of death, if we could, and to make them somewhat the less loathsome to those that are about them. The zeal of these good women for Christ did conduct; the spices which they had prepared the evening before the sabbath, at a great expense, they did not, upon the second thoughts, when they had slept upon it, dispose of otherwise, suggesting, To what purpose is this waste? But they brought them to the sepulchre on the morning after the sabbath, early, very early. It is a rule of charity, Every man, according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give, 2 Cor. 9. 7. What is prepared for Christ, let it be used for him. Notice is taken of the names of these women, Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary, the mother of James; grave matronly women, r. should seem they were. Notice is also taken of certain others with them, r. 1. and again, r. 10. These that had not joined in preparing the spices, would yet go along with them to the sepulchre; as if the number of Christ's friends increased when he was dead, John 12. 24, 32. The daughters of Jerusalem, when they saw how inquisitive the spouse was after his followers, were desirous to seek him with her; Cant. 6. 1.) so were these other women. The zeal of some provokes others.

II. The surprise they were in, when they found the stone rolled away, and the grave empty; r. 2, 3.) they were much perplexed at that (r. 4.) which they had much reason to rejoice in, that the stone was rolled away from the sepulchre, (by which it appeared that he had a right to his discharge, and leave to come out,) and that they found not the body of the Lord Jesus, by which it appeared that he had made use of his discharge, and was come out. Note, Good christians often perplex themselves about that with which they should comfort and encourage themselves.

III. The plain account which they had of Christ's resurrection, from two angels that appeared to them in shining garments, not only white, but bright, and casting a lustre about them; they first saw one angel without the sepulchre, who presently went in, and sat with another angel in the sepulchre, one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain; so the evangelists may be reconciled.

1. They saw the men, when they saw the angels, were afraid lest they had some ill news for them; but, instead of inquiring of them, they bowed down their faces to the earth, to look for their dear master in the grave. They would rather find him in his grave-clothes, than angels themselves in their shining garments. A dying Jesus has more beauty in the eyes of a believer than angels themselves. These women, like the spouse, when found by the watchmen, (and angels are called watchmen,) enter not into any other conversation with them, than, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? Now here,

1. They upbraied the women with the absurdity of the search they were making; r. 5.) Why seek ye the living among the dead? Witness is hereby given to Christ, that he is living, of him it is witnessed, that he liveth, (Heb. 7. 8.) and it is the object of much wonder how this was brought out. I know that many do not reason of this after the pure strict arguments of the gospel; and we may see the reason why, when we consider how the resurrections of Jesus Christ and of his people are not only one of the greatest mysteries in the world, but, in a manner, one of the most difficult to prove to the point, to prove that there is any life in the grave at all. And in this we have also a reason why, in the extraordinary ways of God, we are led to look for the living among the dead. 2. They assure them that he is risen from the dead; r. 6.) He is not here, but is risen, is risen by his own power; he has quitted his grave, to return no more to it. These angels were competent witnesses, for they had been sent express from heaven with orders for his discharge. And we are sure that their record is true; they durst not tell a lie. 3. They refer them to his own words: Remember what he shaketh you, when he was yet in Galilee. If they had duly believed and observed the prediction of it, they would easily have believed the thing itself when it came to pass; and therefore, that the tidings might not be such a surprise to them as it seemed to be, he repeats to them what Christ had often said, in their hearing, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men; and though it was done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, yet they that did it, were not the less sorrowful for doing it; he told them that he must be crucified, surely they could not forget that which they had so much concern seen fulfilled; and would not that bring to their mind that which always followed. The third day he shall rise again. Observe how angels from heaven bring not any new gospel, but put them in mind, as the angels of the churches do, of the sayings of Christ, and teach them how to improve and apply them.

IV. Their satisfaction in this account, v. 8. The women seemed to acquiesce; they remembered his words, when they were thus put in mind of them, and concluded from thence, that if he were risen, it was not unreasonable, then, now they were ashamed of the preparations they had made to embalm him on the third day, who had often said that he would on the third day rise again. Note, A reasonable remembrance of the words of Christ will help us to a right understanding of his providence.

V. The report they brought of this to the apostles; They returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things to the eleven, and to all the rest of Christ's disciples, v. 9. It does not appear that they were together in a body, they were scattered every one to his own, perhaps scarcely two or three of them together in the same lodgings, but one went to some of them, and another to others of them, so that in a little time, that morning, they got the report of it. But we are told (v. 12.) how the report was received; Their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. They thought it was only the fancy of the women, and imputed it to the power of imagination: for they also had forgotten Christ's words, and wanted to be put in mind of them, not only what he had said to them in Galilee some time ago, but what he had said very lately in the night wherein he was betrayed. Ask a little while, and ye shall see me. I will see you again. One would be amazed at the stupidity of these disciples, who believed Christ to be the Son of God and the true Messiah, had been so often told that he must die, and rise again, and then enter into his glory, had seen him more than once raise the dead, that they should be so backward to believe his saying that it would be so, and so strange to them, (when hereafter this complaint would justly be taken up by them,) to remember that there was a time when it might justly have been taken up against them, Who hath believed our report?

VI. The inquiry which Peter made hereupon, v. 12. It was Mary Magdalene that brought the report to him, as appears, John 20. 1, 2, where this story of his running to the sepulchre, is more particularly related. 1. Peter hastened to the sepulchre, upon the report; perhaps ashamed of himself, to think that Mary Magdalene should have been there before him; and yet, perhaps, he had not been so ready to go thither now, if the woman had not told him, among other things, that the watch was fled. Many that are swift-footed enough when there is danger, are but cow-hearts when there is ease. Peter now ran to the sepulchre, who but the other day ran from his Master. 2. He looked into the sepulchre; and took notice how orderly the linen clothes in which Christ was wrapped, were taken off, and folded up, and laid by themselves, but the body gone. He was very particular in making his observations, as if he would rather credit his own eyes, than the testimony of the angels. He went away, as he thought, not much the wiser, wondering in himself at that which was come to pass. Had he remembered the words of Christ, even this was enough to satisfy him that he was risen from the dead: but, having forgotten them, he is only amazed with the thing, and knows not what to make of it. There is many a thing puzzling and perplexing to us, which would be both plain and profitable, if we did but rightly understand the words of Christ, and had them ready to us.

18. And, behold, two of them went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about threescore furlongs. 19. And they talked together of all these things which had happened. 20. And it came to pass, that while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them. 21. But their eyes were holden that they should not know him. 22. And he said unto them, What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk, and are sad? 23. And the one of them, whose name was Cleopas, answering said unto him, Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things which are come to pass there in these days? 24. And he said unto them, What things? And they said unto him, Concerning Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people: 25. And how the chief priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and have crucified him. 26. But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel: and beside all this, to-day is the third day since these things were done. 27. Yea, and certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre: 28. And when they found not his body, they came, saying, That they had also seen a vision of angels, which said that he was alive. 29. And certain of them which were with us went to the sepulchre, and found it even so as the women had said; but they saw not. 30. Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! 31. Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? 32. And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself. 33. And they drew nigh unto the village whither they went: and he made as though he would have gone further. 34. But they constrained him saying, Abide with us, for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent. And he went in to tarry with them. 35. And it came to pass, as he sat at meat with them, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them.
and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight. 32. And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the scriptures? 33. And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them. 34. Saying, the Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. 35. And they told what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in breaking of bread.

This appearance of Christ to the two disciples going to Emmaus, was mentioned, and but just mentioned before; (Mark 16. 12.) here it is largely related. It happened the same day that Christ rose, the first day of the new world that rose with him. One of these two disciples was Cleopas or Alpheus, said by the ancients to be the brother of Joseph, Christ's supposed father; who the other was, is not certain. Some think it was Peter; it should seem indeed that these did appear particularly to Peter that day, which the eleven spake of among themselves, (v. 34.) and Paul mentions, 1 Cor. 15. 5. But it could not be Peter that was one of the two, for he was one of the eleven to whom the two returned; and besides, we know Peter so well as to think that if he had been one of the two, he would have been the chief speaker, and not Cleopas. It was one of those that were associated with the eleven, mentioned v. 9.

Now in this passage of story we may observe,

I. The walk and talk of those two disciples; They went to a village called Emmaus, which is reckoned to be about two hours' walk from Jerusalem; it is here said to be about six furlongs, seven measured miles, v. 13. Whether they went thither upon business, or to see some friend, does not appear. I suspect that they were going homewards to Galilee, with an intention not to inquire more after this Jesus; that they were meditating a retreat, and stole away from their company without asking leave or taking leave; for the accounts brought them that morning of their Master's resurrection, seemed to them as idle tales; and if so, no wonder that they began to think of making the best of their way home.

But as they travelled they talked together of all these things which had happened, v. 14. They had not courage to confer of these things, and consult what was to be done in the present juncture at Jerusalem, for fear of the Jews; but when they were get-out of the hearing of the Jews, they could talk it over with more freedom. They talked over these things, reasoning with themselves concerning the probabilities of Christ's resurrection, for, according as these appeared, they would either go forward, or return back to Jerusalem. Note, It well becomes the disciples of Christ, when they are together, to talk of his death and resurrection; thus they may improve one another's knowledge, refresh one another's memory, and stir up one another's devout affections.

II. The good company they met with upon the road, when Jesus himself came, and joined himself to them; (v. 15.) They communed together, and reasoned, and perhaps were warm at the argument, one hoping that their Master was risen, and would set up his kingdom, the other despairing. Jesus himself drew near, as a stranger who seeing them travel the same way that he went, told them that he should be glad of their company.

We may observe it for our encouragement to keep up our heart in the exercises of our religion, where both together are well employed in work of that kind, Christ will come to them, and make a third. When they that fear the Lord, speak one to another, the Lord hearkens and hears, and is with them of a truth; so that two thus twisted in faith and love become a threefold cord, not easily broken, Excl. 4. 12. They in their communings and reasonings together were searching for Christ, comparing the things of the scripture which concerning him come to more knowledge of him; and now Christ comes to them. Note, They who seek Christ shall find him: he will manifest himself to those that inquire after him; and give knowledge to those who use the helps for knowledge which they have. When the spouse inquired of the watchmen concerning her Beloved, it was but a little that she pass ed from them, but she passed much, Cant. 3. 4.

But though they had Christ with them, they were not at first aware of it; (v. 16.) Their eyes were held that they should not know him: it should seem, there were both an alteration of the object, (for it is said in Mark, that now he appeared in another form,) and a restraint upon the organ; for here it is said, that their eyes were held by a divine power; as Jesus himself saith, I am still with you, amen: one minute in the air was so disposed, that they could not discern who it was. No matter how it was, but so it was, they did not know him; Christ so ordering it, that they might the more freely discourse with him and be with him; and that it might appear that his word, and the influence of it, did depend upon his bodily presence, which the disciples had too much desired of, and must be weaned from; but he could teach them, and warm their hearts, by others, who should have his spiritual presence with them, and should have his grace going along with them unseen.

III. The conference that was between Christ and them, when he knew them, and they knew not him. Now Christ and his disciples, as is usual when friends meet incognito, or in disguise, are here cross-questioning.

1. Christ's first question to them is concerning their present sadness, which plainly appeared in their countenances; (v. 17.) What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another as ye walk, and are sad? It is a very kind and friendly inquiry. Observe, (1.) They were sad; it appeared to a stranger that they were so. [1.] They had lost their dear Master, and were, in their own apprehensions, quite disappointed in their expectations from him. They had given up the cause and knew not what course to take to retrieve it. Note, Christ's disciples have reason to be sad when he withdraws from them; to fast when the Bridegroom is taken from them. [2.] Though he was risen from the dead, yet they did not see him, and so they were still in sorrow. Note, Christ's disciples are often sad and sorrowful even then when they have reason to rejoice; but through the weakness of their faith they cannot take the comfort that is offered to them. [3.] Being sad, they had communications one with another concerning Christ. Note, First, It becomes christians to talk of Christ. Whereas others talk of him, and of what he has done and suffered for us, as they should be, out of the abundance of the heart the mouth would speak, not only of God and his providence, but of Christ and his grace and love. Secondly, Good company and good converse are an excellent antidote against prevailing melancholy. When Christ's disciples were sad they did not each one get by himself, but joined as he sent them out, two and two; for two are better than one, especially in times of sorrow. Giving vent to the grief, may perhaps give cause to the grieved; and by talking it over we may talk ourselves, or our friends may talk us, into a better frame. Joint-mourners should be mutual comforters; comfort sometimes comes best from such.

(2.) Christ came up to them, and inquired into the matter of their talk, and the cause of their grief; What manner of communications are these? Though Christ was now entered into his glory, yet he did not的教学 of his disciples, and concerned for their comfort. He speaks as one troubled to see their melancholy; Wherefore look ye so sadly to day? Gen. 40. 7. Note, Our Lord Jesus takes notice of the sorrow and sadness of his disciples, and is afflicted in their afflictions. Christ has hereby taught us, [1.] To be conversable. Christ here fell into discourse with two grave, serious persons, through his subject. He would not have any knew him not, and they readily embraced him. It does not become Christians to be morose and shy, but to take pleasure in good society. [2.] We are hereby taught to be compassionate. When we see our friends in sorrow and sadness, we should, like Christ here, take cognizance of their grief, and give them both the counsel and comfort we can; Weep with them that weep. Is not this, they put a question to him concerning his strangeness; (v. 18.) Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things that are come to pass there in these days? Observe,

(1.) Cleopas gave him a civil answer. He does not rudely ask him, As for what we are talking of, what is that to you? and bid him go about his business. Note, We ought to be civil to those who are civil to us, and to conduct ourselves obligingly to all, both in word and deed. It was a dangerous time now with Christ’s disciples; yet he was not jealous of this Stranger, that he had any design upon them, to inform against them, or bring them into trouble. Charity is not forward to think evil, no not of strangers.

(2.) He is full of Christ himself, and of his death and sufferings, and wonders that every body else is not so too; What! art thou such a stranger in Jerusalem not to know what has been done to our Master there? Note, Those are strangers indeed in Jerusalem, that know not of the death and sufferings of Christ. What are they daughters of Jerusalem, and yet so little acquainted with Christ, as to ask, What is thy beloved more than another beloved?

(3.) He is very willing to inform this stranger concerning Christ, and to draw on further discourse with him, concerning the subject. He would not have any one that had the face of a man, to be ignorant of Christ. Note, Those who have themselves the knowledge of Christ crucified, should do what they can to spread that knowledge, and lead others into an acquaintance with him. And it is observable, These disciples that were so forward to instruct the Stranger, were instructed by him; for to him that has heard, more is given.

(4.) It appears, by what Cleopas says, that the death of Christ made a great noise in Jerusalem, so that it could not be imagined that any man should be such a stranger in the city, as not to know of it; it was all the talk of the town, and discussed of in all companies. Thus the matter of fact came to be universally known, which, after the pouring out of the Spirit, was to be explained.

(5.) He seems still much under the concern asked concerning their knowledge; (v. 19.) He said unto them, What things? thus making himself yet more a Stranger. Observe,

(6.) Jesus Christ made light of his own sufferings, in comparison with the joy set before him, which was the recompense of it. Now that he was entering upon his glory, see with what unconnectedness he looks back upon his sufferings; What things? He had reason to know what things; for to him they were bitter things, and heavy things, and yet he asks, What things? The sorrow was forgotten, for joy that the Man-Child of our salvation was born. He took pleasure in infirmities for our sakes, to teach us to do so for his sake.

(2.) Those whom Christ will teach, he will first convince him of. Thus he first told them what things they knew, and then he will tell them what was the meaning of these things, and lead them into the mystery of them.

4. They, hereupon, give him a particular account concerning Christ, and the present posture of his affairs. Observe the story they tell, v. 19, &c.

(1.) Here is a summary of Christ’s life and character. The things they are full of, are concerning (1.) Some of his first appearance, how he was a Stranger, who was a Prophet, a Teacher come from God. He preached a true and excellent doctrine, which had manifestly its rise from heaven, and its tendency toward heaven; he confirmed it, by many glorious miracles, miracles of mercy, so that he was mighty in deed and word before God and all the people; that is, he was both a great Favourite of Heaven and a great Benefactor of men. He was made and appeared to be, greatly beloved of God, and much the darling of his people. He had great acceptance with God, and a great reputation in the country. Many are great before all the people, and are cared by them, who are not so before God, as the Scribes and Pharisees; but Christ was mighty both in his doctrine and in his doings, before God and all the people. Those were strangers in Jerusalem, that did not know this.

(2.) Here is a modest narrative of his sufferings and death, v. 20. Though he was so dear both to God and man, yet the chief priests and our rulers, in contempt of both, delivered him to the Roman power, to be condemned to death, and they have crucified him. It is strange that they did not aggravate the matter more, and lay more hand upon those that had been guilty of crucifying Christ; but perhaps because they spoke to one that was a Stranger, they thought it prudence to avoid all reflections upon the chief priests and their rulers, how just seer.

(3.) Here is an intimation of their disappointment in him, as the reason of their sadness; We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel, v. 21. We are of those who not only looked upon him to be a Prophet, like Moses, but, like him, a Redeemer too; he was depended upon, and great things expected of him by them. He was reckoned to be the redemption, and in it for the consolation of Israel. Now, if hope deferred makes the heart sick, hope disappointed, especially such a hope, kills the heart. But see how they made that the ground of their despair, which, if they had understood it aright, was the surest ground of their hope—and that was the dying of the Lord Jesus; We trusted (say they) that he should have been delivered up as a ransom for Israel.

And is it not he that doth redeem Israel? Nay, is he not by his death paying the price of their redemption? Was it not necessary, in order to his saving Israel from their sins, that he should suffer? So that now that that most difficult part of his undertaking was got over, they had more reason than ever to trust that this is he that shall deliver Israel; yet now they are ready to give up the cause.

(4.) Here is an account of their present arrangement, with reference to his resurrection. [1.] "This is the third day since he was crucified and died, and that was the day, when it was expected, if ever, that he should rise again, and rise in glory and outward pomp, and show himself as publicly in honour as he had been shown three days before in disgrace; but we see no sign of it; nothing appears as..."
we expected, to the conviction and confusion of his prosecutors, and the consolation of his disciples, but all is silent." [2] They own that there was a report among them, that he was risen, but they seem to speak of it very slightly, and as what they gave no credit at all to; (v. 22, 23) "Certain women also of our company made us astonished, (and that was all,) which were the first that saw the Lord." [3] They were so fast to belie, that they could not even believe it; but we are ready to think it was only their fancy, and no real thing, for angels would have been sent to the apostles, not to the women, and women are easily imposed upon." [5] They acknowledge that some of the apostles had made a visit to the sepulchre, and that there had been an open sight of the Lord; (v. 16,) they saw not, and therefore we have reason to fear that he is not risen, for if he were, surely he would have showed himself to them; so that upon the whole matter, we have no great reason to think that he is risen, and therefore have no expectations from him now; our hopes were all nailed to his cross, and buried in his grave.

[2.] But of Jesus, though not known by face to them, makes himself known to them by his word.

[1.] He reproveth them for their incredulity, and the weakness of their faith in the scriptures of the Old Testament; (v. 25.) O fools, and slow of heart to believe, When Christ forbade us to say to our brother, Thou fool, it was intended to restrain us from giving unreasonable reproaches, not from giving just reproofs. Christ called them fools, not as if they were really fools, but as it signifies weak men. He might call them fools, for he knows our foolishness, the foolishness that is hid in our hearts. They are fools, that act against their own interest; so they did, who would not admit the evidence given them that their Master was risen, but put away the comfort of it. That which is condemned in them as their foolishness, is, First, Their slowness in believing the scriptures; Believers are branded as fools by atheists and infidels and free-thinkers, and their most holy faith censured as a fond credulity; but Christ tells us that those are fools, who are slow of heart to believe, and are kept from it by prejudices never impartially examined. Secondly, Their slowness to believe the writings of the prophets. He does not so much blame them for this, as for their slowness to believe the testimony of Believers men and of the angels, but for that which was the cause thereof—their slowness to believe the prophets; for if they had given the prophets of the Old Testament their due weight and consideration, they would have been as sure of Christ's rising from the dead that morning, (being the third day after his death,) as they were of the rising of the sun; for the series and succession of events as settled by prophecy, are not less certain and inviolable than ascertained evidence; were we but more conversant with the scripture, and the divine counsels as far as they are made known in the scripture, we should not be subject to such perplexities as we often entangle ourselves in.

[3.] He shows them that the sufferings of Christ, which were so a stumbling-block to them, and made them unapt to believe his gospel, were really the appointed way to his glory, and he could not go to it any other way; (v. 26.) "Ought not the Christ (the Messiah) to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? Was it not decreed, and was not that decree declared, that the promised Messiah must first suffer, and then reign, that he must go by his cross to his crown?" Had they never read the prophecies, and turned them to the issue, he would have known that the prophets speak so very plainly of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow? 1 Pet. 11. The cross of Christ was it that they could not reconcile themselves to; now he shows them two things, which take off the offence of the cross; First, That the Messiah ought to suffer these things; and therefore his sufferings were not only no objection against his being the Messiah, but really a proof of it, as the afflictions of the saints are an evidence of their sonship; and they show that he must be the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, and that he was in fact the foundation of their hopes. He could not have been a Saviour, if he had not been a Sufferer. Christ's undertaking of our salvation was voluntary; but, having undertaken it, it was necessary that he should suffer and die. Secondly, That, when he had suffered these things, he should enter into his glory; which he did at his resurrection, that he might enter into his eternal glory; because he was duly entitled to it; and it was the glory he had before the world was; he ought to enter into it, for in that, as well as in his sufferings, the scripture must be fulfilled. He ought to suffer first, and then to enter into his glory; and thus the reproach of the cross is for ever rolled away; and we are directed to expect the crown of life, and of glory with Jesus Christ.
the Revelation first; Christ has here taught us to begin at Moore. Thus far the conference between them.

IV. Here is the discovery which Christ at length made of himself to them. One would have given a deal for a copy of the sermon Christ preached to them by the way, of that exposition of the Bible which he gave them; but it is not thought fit that we should have it, we have the substance of it in other scriptures; the disciples are so charmed with it, that they think they are come too soon to their journey's end; but so it is; They drew nigh to the village whether they went (v. 26.) where, it should seem, they determined to take up for that night. And 1. They counted his stay with them; He made as though he would have gone farther; he did not say that he would, but he seemed to them to be going farther, and did not readily turn in to their friends' house, which it would not be decent for a stranger to do unless he were invited; he would have gone farther, if they had not counted his stay; so that here was nothing like dissimulation in the case. If a stranger he says, and one knows, (which perhaps it, he will not thrust himself rude upon your house or company; but if you make it appear that you are freely desirous of him for your Guest or Companion, he knows not but he may accept your invitation; and this was all that Christ did, when he made as though he would have gone farther. Note, Those that would have Christ dwell with them, must invite him, and be importunate with him; though he is ready to take all that seek, he will not thrust himself rude upon your house or company; but if you make it appear that you are freely desirous of him for your Guest or Companion, he knows not but he may accept your invitation. [1.] He opens the scriptures to them, for they are which testify of him to these who search them, and seek for him in them. [2.] He meets them at his table, in the ordinances of the Lord's supper, and commissioned his disciples to perform it in like manner, so to other places: [3.] He made it evident to them in breaking of bread. But, [5.] The work is completed by the opening of the eyes of their mind, and causing the scales to fall off from them, as from Paul's in his conversion. If he that gives the revelation, do not give the understanding, we are in the dark still.

5. He immediately disappeared: He vanished out of their sight, because it was his will;—He withdrew himself from them that they might think of him as of all other things: but to abide with them at night. When the day is far spent, and it is towards evening, we begin to think of retiring for our repose; and then it is proper to have our eye to Christ, and beg of him to abide with us; to manifest himself to us, and to fill our minds with good thoughts of him, and good affections to him. Christ yielded to their importunity; he went in, to tarry with them. Thus ready is he the reconciling Mediator, in gathering the wandering sheep into those who improve what they have received. He has promised that if any man open the door, to bid him welcome, he will come in to him. Rev. 3. 20.

2. He manifested himself to them, v. 30, 31. We may suppose that he continued his discourse with them, which he began upon the road; for thou must talk of the things of God when thou sittest in the house as well as when thou walkest by the way; when the time was come he gave them to understand the substance of it, which perhaps was seen done, the provision was so small and mean, it is probable that he entertained them with such communications as were good, and to the use of edifying; so likewise as they sat at meat, his lips fed them. But still he little thought that it was Jesus himself that was all this while talking with them; till at length he was pleased to throw off his disguise, and rejoin them to withdraw. This he had to suspect it was he when, as they sat down to meat, he undertook the office of the Master of the feast, which he performed so like himself, and like what he used to do among his disciples, that by it they discerned him; He took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them. This he did with his usual air both of authority and affection, with the same gestures and manner, with the same expressions as if in craving a blessing, and in giving the bread to them. This was not a miraculous meal like that of the five loaves, nor a sacramental meal, like that of the eucharist, but a common meal; yet Christ here did the same as he did in those; to teach us to keep up our communion with God through Christ in common providences as well as in special ordinances, and to receive a blessing, and give thanks at every meal, and to secure our daily bread provided for us, and broken to us, by the hand of Jesus Christ, the Master, not only of the great family, but of all our families. Wherever we set down to eat, let us set Christ at the upper end of the table, take our meat as blessed to us by him, and eat and drink to his glory; and receive contentedly and thankfully what he is pleased to carve out to us, and fare with cheerful hearts, and receive it cheerfully. But we can by faith see it coming to us from Christ's hand, and with his blessing.

none but he, no word but his, could make our hearts burn within us as they did; it must be he that has the key of the heart, it could be no other." See here, (1.) What preaching is likely to do—good—such as Christ's was; plain teaching, and which is familiar and level to our capacity—he talked with us by the way; and scriptural preaching—he opened to them the scriptures. Ministers should show people their religion in their Bibles, and that they preach no other doctrine to them than what is there; they must show that they make that the fountain of their knowledge, and the foundation of their faith. Note, The expounding of these scriptures which speak of Christ, has a direct tendency to warm the hearts of his disciples, and to quicken in them a fresh sense of their own behoof. (2.) What hearing is likely to do—good—that which makes the heart burn; when we are much affected with the things of God, especially with the love of Christ in dying for us, and have our hearts thereby drawn out in love to him, and drawn up in holy desires and devotions, then our hearts burn within us; when our hearts are raised and elevated, and are as the sparks which joy outwardly toward God, and when they are kindled and carried out with a holy zeal and indignation against sin, both in others and in ourselves, and we are in some measure refined and purified from it by the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning, then we may say, "Through grace our hearts are thus inflamed."

2. The report they brought of this to their brethren; they ran to the disciples. They rise up at the same hour, transported with joy at the discovery Christ had made of himself to them, that they could not stay to make an end of their supper, but returned with all speed to Jerusalem, though it was towards evening. They had made any thoughts of quitting their relation to Christ, this soon banished all such thoughts out of their mind, and there needed no more to send them back to his glory. However, it should seem, they intended at least to take up their quarters to-night at Emmaus; but now that they had seen Christ, they could not rest till they had brought the good news to the disciples, both for the confirmation of their trembling faith, and for the comfort of their sorrowful spirits, with the same comforts with which they were comforted of God. Note, It is the duty of those to whom Christ hath unsealed himself, to tell others what he has done for their souls. When then art converted, instructed, comforted, strengthen thy brethren. These disciples were full of this matter themselves, and must go to their brethren, to give vent to their own as well as to give them satisfaction that their Master was risen. Observe,

(1.) How they found them, just when they came in among them, speaking on the same subject, and relating another proof of the resurrection of Christ. They found the eleven, and those that were their usual companions, gathered together late in the night, to pray together, it may be, and to consider what was to be done in this juncture; and they found them saying among themselves: (Observe, it is the saying of the eleven, not of the two, as is plain by the original;) and when these two came in they repeated to them with joy and triumph, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon, v. 34. That Peter had a sight of him before the rest of the disciples had, appears 1 Cor. 15. 5, where it is said, He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve. The angel having ordered the women to tell Peter of it particularly (Mark 16. 7;) for his comfort, it is highly probable the Lord Jesus himself, on the same day appear to Peter, though we have no particular narrative of it, to confirm the word of his messengers. This he related to his brethren; but observe, Peter does not here proclaim it, and boast of it himself, (he thought that did not become a penitent,) but the other disciples speak of it with exultation, The Lord is risen indeed, etc.—really; it is now past dispute; no room is left to doubt it, for he has appeared not only to the women, but to Simon.

(2.) How they seconded their evidence with an account of what they had seen; (v. 38.) They told what things were done in the way. The words that were spoken by Christ to them in the way, having a wonderful effect and influence upon them, are here called the things that were done in the way: for the words that Christ speaks, are not an empty sound, but they are spirit, and they are life, and all wonderful things are done by them, done by the word, by the holy preaching of the word of God, which is not empty. They told also how he was at length known to them in the breaking of bread; then when he was carving out blessings to them, God opened their eyes to discern who it was. Note, It would be of great use for the discovery and confirmation of truth, if the disciples of Christ would compare their observations and experiences, and communicate to each other what they know and have felt in themselves.

36. And as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and sitteth unto them. Peace be unto you. 37. But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit. 38. And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? 39. Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. 40. And when he had thus spoken, he shewed them his hands and his feet. 41. And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here any meat? 42. And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of an honeycomb. 43. And he took it, and did eat before them. 44. And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me. 45. Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures. 46. And said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; 47. And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. 48. And ye are witnesses of these things. 49. And, behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you: but tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high.

Five times Christ was seen the same day that he rose: by Mary Magdalene alone in the garden; (John 20. 14.) by the women, as they were going to tell the disciples; (Matth. 28. 9,) by Peter alone; by the two disciples going to Emmaus; and now a night by the eleven; which we have an account of in these verses, as also John 20. 19. Observe,
1. The great surprise which his appearing gave them. He came in among them very seasonably, as they were comparing notes concerning the proofs of his resurrection; as they thus spake, and were ready perhaps to put it to the question, whether the proofs produced amounted to evidence of their Master's resurrection or no, and how they should proceed; Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and put it out of question. Note, Those who make the best use they can of their evidences for their comfort, may expect farther assurances, and that the Spirit of Christ will witness with their spirits, (as Christ hence witnessed with the disciples, and with the apostles,) and give them a sense of the truths of God, and rise in their hearts at any time, are known to the Lord Jesus, even at the first rise of them; and they are dispensing to him. He bid his disciples for such thoughts, to teach us to chide ourselves for them. Why are thou cast down, O my soul? Why art thou troubled? Why do thoughts arise, that are neither true nor good, that have neither foundation nor fruit, but under our joy in God, disturb us for duty, give advantage to Satan, and deprive us of the comforts laid up for us?

2. The proof he gave them of his resurrection, both for the silencing of their fears, by convincing them that he was not a spirit, and for the strengthening of their faith in that doctrine which they were to preach to the world, by giving them full satisfaction concerning his resurrection, which is not true, their faith and preaching were all vain. Two proofs he gives them.

(1.) He shows them his body, particularly his hands and his feet. They saw that he had the shape, and features, and exact resemblance of their Master; but is it not his ghost? "No," said Christ, "Behold my hands and my feet; you see I have hands and feet, and therefore have a true body; you can now see these hands and feet, and therefore have a living body, and you see the marks in my hands and feet, and therefore it is my own body, the same that you saw crucified, and not a borrowed one." He lays down this principle—that a spirit has not flesh and bones, it is not compounded of gross matter, shaped into various members, and consisting of divers heterogeneous parts, as our bodies are. He does not tell us what a spirit is, but is it something, and in the world of spirits, but what it is not; It has not flesh and bones. Now hence he infers, "It is I myself; whom you have been so intimately acquainted with, and have had such familiar conversation with; it is I myself, whom you have reason to rejoice in, and not to be afraid of." Those who know Christ aright, and know him as theirs, will have no reason to be terrified at his appearance, at his approaches. He appeals to their sight, shows them his hands and his feet, which were pierced with the nails. Christ related the marks of them in his glorified body, that they might be proofs that it was he himself; and he was willing that they should be seen, afterward showed them to Thomas, for he is not ashamed of his sufferings for us. A little reason then made we to believe on the word of our Lord for him. As he showed his wounds here to his disciples, for the enforcing of his instructions to them, so he showed them to his Father, for the enforcing of his intercessions with him. He appears in heaven as a Lamb that had been slain; (Rev. 5. 6.) his blood speaks, Heb. 13. 24. He makes intercession in the virtue of his satisfaction: he says to the Father, as to the disciples, I hold my hands and my feet, Zech. 13. 6, 7. He appeals to their touch. Had he not, and see,
He would not let Mary Magdalene touch him at that time, John 20. 17. But the disciples here are entrusted to do it, that they were to preach his resurrection, and to suffer for doing so, might be themselves abundantly satisfied concerning it. He bade them to receive him, that they might be convinced beyond a doubt, that he was not a spirit. If there were really no spirits, nor apparitions of spirits, (as by this and other instances it is plain that the disciples did believe there were,) this had been a proper time for Christ to have undeceived them, by telling them that there were no such things; but he seems to take it for granted that there have been, and may be, apparitions of spirits, whatever need was there to show much pains to prove that he was not one. There were many hereticks in the primitive times, atheists I rather think they were, who said that Christ had never any substantial body, but that it was a mere phantasm, which was neither really born, nor truly suffered; such wild notions as these, we are told, the Valentineans and Manichees had, and the followers of Simon Magus; they were called Echetes and Phisosi. Blessed be God, these heresies are long since buried; and we know and are sure that Jesus Christ was no spirit or apparition, but had a true and real body, even after his resurrection.

(2.) He eats with them, to show that he had a real and true body, and that he was willing to converse freely and familiarly with his disciples, as one friend did to another. St. Peter says a great stress was laid upon this, (Acts 10. 41.) We did eat and drink with him, after he rose from the dead.

[1.] When they saw his hands and his feet, yet they knew not what to say, They believed not for joy, and wondered, v. 41. It was their infirmity, that they believed not, that yet they believed not, in what they saw. They as yet being unbelievers. This very much corroborates their belief of the resurrection, that the disciples were so slow to believe it. Instead of stealing away his body, and saying, He is risen, when he is not, as the chief priests suggested they would do, they are ready to say again and again, He is not risen, when he is. Their being incredulous of it at first, and insisting upon the utmost proofs of it, shows that when afterward they did believe and exult over all upon it, it was not but upon the fullest demonstration of the thing that could be.

But though it was their infirmity, yet it was an excusable one; for it was not from any contempt of the evidence offered them, that they believed not: but, First, They believed not for joy, as Jacob, when he was told that Joseph was alive, they thought it too good news to be true. When the faith and hope are therefore weak, because the love and desires are strong, that weak faith shall be helped, and not rejected. Secondly, They wondered! they thought it not only too good, but too great, to be true, forgetting both the scriptures and the power of God.

[2.] For their further conviction and encouragement, he called for some meat. He sat down to meat, Mark 16. 14. And six of the disciples were at dinner with him. It is not said that he did eat with them; now lest that should be made an objection, he here did actually eat with them and the rest, to show how his body was really and truly returned to life; though he did not eat and drink, and converse constantly with them, as he had done, (as Lazarus did after his resurrection, who not only returned to life, but to his former state of life,) and therefore better because more agreeable to the economy of the state he was risen to.

They gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of a honey-comb, v. 42. The honey-comb, perhaps, was used as a wur a broiled fish, for Canaan was a land flowing with honey. This was mean fare; yet, if it be the fare of the disciples, their Master will fare as they do, because in the kingdom of our Father they shall fare as he does, shall eat and drink with him in his kingdom.

3. The faith he gave them into the word of God, which they had heard and read, by which faith in the resurrection of Christ is wrought in them, and all the mysteries are opened.

(1.) He refers them to the word which they had heard from him, when he was with them, and puts them in mind of that as the angel had done; (v. 44.) These are the words which I said unto you in private, many a time, while I was with you. We should better understand what Christ doth, if we did but better remember what he hath said, and had but the arc of our histories together.

(2.) He refers them to the word they had read in the Old Testament, which the word they had heard from him directed them to; All things must be fulfilled which were written. Christ had given them this general hint for the regulating of their expectations—that, whatever they found written concerning the Messiah, in the Old Testament, must be fulfilled in him; what was written concerning his sufferings, as well as what was written concerning his kingdom; these God had joined together in the prediction, and it could not be thought that they should be put asunder in the event. All things must be fulfilled, even the hardest, even the heaviest, even the vinegar, he could not die till he had that, because he could not till then say, It is finished. The several branches of the Old Testament were all mentioned, as containing each of them things concerning Christ: The love of Moses, that is, the Pentateuch, or the five books written by Moses; the prophets, containing not only the books that are purely prophetical, but these historical books that were written by prophetical men; the Psalms containing the other writings, which they called the Hagiographa. Some in this place would hasten to reveal his will; but all proceeded from one and the same Spirit, who by them gave notice of the coming and kingdom of the Messiah; for to him bare all the prophets witness.

(3.) By an immediate present work upon their minds, which they themselves could not but be sensible of, he gave them to apprehend the true intent and meaning of the Old Testament prophecies of Christ, and to see them all fulfilled in him; (v. 45.) Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures. In his discourse with the two disciples he took the veil from off the text, by opening the scriptures; here he took the veil from off the hearts, by opening the mind. Observe here,

[1.] That Jesus Christ by his Spirit operates on the minds of men, on the minds of all that are in grace, to give them access to our spirits, and can immediately influence them. It is observable, how he did now after his resurrection give a specimen of these two great operations of his Spirit upon the spirits of men; his enlightening of the intellectual faculties with a divine light, when he opened the understandings of his disciples, and his invigoration of the active powers of the soul in thought, and will, and resolution, when he strengthened them with his Spirit, which he gave within them. [2.] Even good men need to have their understandings opened; for though they are not darkness, as they were by nature, yet in many things they are in the dark. David prays, Open mine eyes. Give me understanding. And St. Paul, who knows so much of Christ, sees his need to learn more. [3.] Christ's way of working faith in the hearts of his disciples, and the way of his teaching is, by opening the understanding, to discern the evidence of these things that are to be believed. Thus he comes into the soul by the door, while Satan, as a thief and a robber, climbs up some other way. [4.] The design of opening the understanding is, that we may understand the scriptures; not that we may be able to say what is written, but that we may be able to what...
written, and may be made wise to salvation by it. 17. The Spirit in the water, and the Spirit in the heart of the nation, was inspired by Christ's scheme of salvation, written above their Bibles in this world; but they need to be learning still more and more out of their Bibles, and to grow more ready and mighty in the scriptures. That we may have right thoughts of Christ, and our mistakes concerning him rectified, there needs no more than to be made to understand the scriptures.

3. The instructions he gave them as apostles, who were to be employed in setting up his kingdom in the world. They expected, while their Master was with them, that they should be preferred to posts of honour, which they thought themselves quite disappointed of when he was dead. "No," saith he, "you are now to enter upon them; ye are to be witnesses of these things, (v. 48.) to carry the notice of them to all the world; not to shrink from a sufferer of matter of news, but to assert them as evidences of the truth upon the trial of the great cause that has been so long depending between God and Satan, the issue of which must be, the casting down, and casting out, of the prince of this world. You are fully assured of these things yourselves, you are eye and ear witnesses of them; go and assure the world of them; and the same Spirit that has enlightened you, shall go before you in the enlightening of others."

Now here they are told,

1. What they must preach; they must preach the gospel, must preach the New Testament as the full accomplishment of the Old, as the continuation and conclusion of divine revelation. They must take their Bibles along with them, (especially when they preached to the Jews;) and, Peter, in his first sermon to the Gentiles, told them to consult the prophets, Acts 10. 43.) and must stifle no whisper of the gospel, which was written of old concerning the Messiah, and the glories and graces of his kingdom, and then must tell them how, upon their certain knowledge, all this was fulfilled in the Lord Jesus.

[1.] The great gospel-truth concerning the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, must be published to the children of men; (v. 48.) Thus it was written in the sealed book, that the mighty, the one in the book of Eternity, the volume of that book of the covenant of redemption; and thus it was written in the open book of the Old Testament, among the things revealed; and therefore thus it behoved Christ to suffer, for the divine counsels must be performed, and care taken that no word of God fail to the ground. "Go, and tell the world," First, That Christ suffered, as it was written of him. Go, preach Christ crucified, be not ashamed of his cross; tell them what he suffered, and why he suffered, and how all the scriptures of the Old Testament were fulfilled in his sufferings. Tell them that it behoved him to suffer, that it was necessary to the taking away of the sin of the world, and the deliverance of mankind from death and ruin; that it became him to be perfected through suffering; (Heb. 5. 9.) that he rose from the dead on the third day, by which not only the offence of the cross was rolled away, but he was declared to be the Son of God with power, and in this act the scriptures were fulfilled; (see 1 Cor. 15. 3, 4.) go, tell the world how often you saw him after he rose from the dead, and how intimately you conversed with him. Your eyes see him, (as Joseph said to his brethren, when he discovered of himself to them his great deed;) but you shall see him better in that sense, (that it is in you, and not in us, that the message that speaketh unto you, Gen. 45. 12.) Go, and tell them, that he that was dead, is alive, and lives for evermore, and has the keys of death and the grave.

[5.] The great gospel-privilege of the remission of sins must be professed to all, and assured to all that repent, and believe the gospel. "Go, tell a guilty world, that stands convicted and condemned at God's bar, that an act of indemnity has passed the ajudgment, which all that repent and believe shall have the benefit of, and not only be pardoned, but preferred by. Tell them that there is hope concerning them."

[1.] That they must preach this among all nations. They must preach Christ crucified, the sons of Noah after the flood, some one way and some another, and carry this light along with them wherever they go. The prophets had preached repentance and remission to the Jews, but the apostles must preach them to all the world. None are exempted from the obligations the gospel lays upon men to repent, nor are any excluded from those immeasurable blessings which are included in the remission of sins, and the forgiveness of sins; and there the chief of beneficence and impartiality put a bar in their own door.

[2.] That they must begin at Jerusalem; there they must preach their first gospel-sermon; there the gospel-church must be first formed; there the gospel-day must dawn, and thence that light shall go forth, which must take hold on the ends of the earth. And why must they begin there? First, Because Christ was written, and therefore it behoved them to take this method. The word of the Lord must go forth from Jerusalem, Isa. 2. 5. And see Joel 2. 32.—3. 16.Obad. 21. Zech. 11. 8. Secondly, Because there the matters of fact, on which the gospel was founded, were transacted; and therefore there they were first attested, where if there had been any just cause for it, they might be best contested and disproved. So strong, so bright, is the first shining forth of the glory of the risen Redeemer, that it darts its rays those daring enemies of his, that had put him to an ignominious death, and sets them at defiance. "Begin at Jerusalem, that the chief priests may try their strength to crush the gospel, and may rage to see themselves disappointed." Thirdly, Because he would give us a further example of forgiving enemies. Jerusalem had put the greatest affronts imaginable upon him, (beside many put to death;) and his enemies might justly have been excepted by name out of the act of indemnity; but no, so far from that, the first offer of gospel-grace is made to Jerusalem, and thousands there are in a little time brought to partake of that grace.

[3.] What assistance they should have in preaching. It is a vast undertaking that they are here called to, a very large and difficult province, especially considering the opposition this service would meet with, and the sufferings it would be attended with; if therefore they ask, Who is sufficient for these things? here is an answer ready. (v. 49.) Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you, and we shall be endued with power from on high. He here assures them that in a little time the Spirit should be poured out upon them in greater measure than ever, and they should thereby be furnished with all those gifts and graces which were necessary to their discharge of this great trust: and therefore they must take their departure from Jerusalem, and not enter upon it till this be done. Note, [1.] Those who receive the Holy Ghost, are thereby endowed with a power from on high, a supernatural power; a power above any of their own; it is from on high, and therefore draws the soul upward, and makes it to aim high. [2.] Christ's apostles could never have planted his gospel, and set up his kingdom in the world, as they did, if they had not been endued with such a power, and their admirable achievements prove that there was an excellency of power going along with them. [3.] This power from on high was the promise of the Father, the great promise of the New Testament, as the promise of the coming of Christ was of the Old Testament. And if it be the promise of the Father, we may be sure that the promise is realizable, and the thing promised inwitable. [4.] Christ would not leave his disciples till the time was just at hand for the performing of this promise. It was but ten days after the ascension of Christ that there came the descent of the Spirit. [5.] Christ's ambassadors must stay till they have their powers, and not venture upon their embassy till they have received full instructions and credentials; though, one would suppose, it was now for them the preaching of the gospel, yet the preachers must tarry till they be endued with power from on high, and tarry at Jerusalem, though a place of danger, because there this promise of the Father was to find them, Joel 2. 28.

50. And he led them out as far as to Bethany; and he lifted up his hands, and blessed them. 51. And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven. 52. And they worshipped him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy; 53. And were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God. Amen.

This evangelist omits the solemn meeting between Christ and his disciples in Galilee; but what he said to them there, and at other interviews, he subjoins to what he said to them at the first visit he made them on the evening of the day he rose; and has now nothing more to account for but his ascension into heaven, which we have a very brief narrative of in these verses: in which we are told,

1. How solemnly Christ took leave of his disciples. Christ's design being to reconcile heaven and earth, and continue a Daysman between them, it was necessary that he should lay his hands on them both, and, in order thereunto, that he should pass and repass. He had business to do in both worlds, and accordingly came from heaven to earth in his incarnation, and descended his hands; and being finished which, he returned to heaven, to reside there, and negotiate our affairs with the Father. Observe, 1. From whence he ascended; from Bethany, near Jerusalem, adjoining to the mount of Olives. There he had done eminent services for his Father's glory, and there he entered upon his glory. There was the garden, in which his sufferings began, there he would think, never was such heart as no sorrow of sorrow. Those that would go to heaven, must ascend thither from the house of sufferings and sorrow, must go by agonies to their joys. The mount of Olives was pitched upon long since to be the place of Christ's ascension; (Zech. 14. 4.) His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives. And here it was that a while ago he began his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, ch. 19. 29. 2. Who were the witnesses of his ascension; He led out his disciples to see him; probably, it was very necessary that he ascended, before people were stirring, for he never showed himself openly to all the people after his resurrection, but only to chosen witnesses. The disciples did not see him rise out of the grave, because his resurrection was capable of being proved by their seeing him alive afterward: but they saw him ascend into heaven, because they could not otherwise have an ocular demonstration of his ascension. They were led out on purpose to see him ascend; had their eyes upon him when he ascended, and were not looking another way.

3. What was the farewell he gave them; He lifted up his hands, and blessed them. He did not go away in displeasure, but in love, he left a blessing behind him; he lifted up his hands, as the High-Priest did when he blessed the people; see Lev. 9. 22. He blessed as one having authority, commanded by the blessings which he had purchased; he blessed them as Jacob blessed his sons. The apostles were now as the representatives of the twelve tribes, so that in blessing them he blessed all his spiritual Israel, and put his Father's name upon them. He blessed them as Jacob blessed his sons, and Moses the tribes, at parting, thus having his own which were of the world, he left them unto the Lord. 4. How he left them; While he was blessing them, he was parted from them; not as if he were taken away before he had said all he had to say, but to intimate that his being parted from them did not put an end to his blessing of them, for the intercession which he went to heaven to make for all his, is a continuation of that blessing. He began to bless them on earth, but he went to heaven to go on with it. Christ was now sending his apostles to preach his gospel to the world, and he gives them his blessing, not for themselves only, but to be conferred in his name upon all that should believe on him through their word, for in him all the families of the earth were to be blessed. 5. How his ascension is described. (1.) He was parted from them, was taken from their head, as Elijah from Elisha's. Note, The dearest friends must part. Those that love us, and pray for us, and instruct us, must be parted from us. The bodily presence of Christ himself was not to be expected always in this world; those that knew him after the flesh, must now henceforth know him no more. (2.) He was carried up into heaven; not by force, but by his own act and deed. As he arose, so he ascended, by his own power, yet attended by angels. There needed no chariot of fire, or horses of fire, he knew the way, and, being the Lord from heaven, could go back himself. He ascended in a cloud, as the angel in the smoke of Manahath's sacrifice, Judg. 13. 20. 56. 1. How cheerfully his disciples continued their attendance on him, and on God through him, even now that he was parted from them. 1. They paid their homage to him at his going away, to signify that though he was going into a far country, yet they would continue his loyal subjects that were willing to have him reign over them; They worshipped him, v. 52. Note, Christ expects adoration from those that receive blessings from him. They blessed him in return; in gratitude for which they worshipped him. This fresh display of Christ's glory drew from them fresh acknowledgments and adorations of it. They knew that through he was parted from them, yet he could, and did, take no notice of their adorations of him; the cloud that received him out of their sight, did not put them or their services out of his sight.
2. They returned to Jerusalem with great joy. There they were ordered to continue till the Spirit should be poured out upon them, and thither they went accordingly, though it was into the mouth of danger. Thither they went, and there they staid with great joy. This was a wonderful change, and an effect of the opening of their understandings. When Christ told them that he must leave them, sorrow filled their hearts; yet now that they see him go, they are filled with joy, being convinced at length that it was expedient for them; and for the church that he should go away, to send the Comforter. Note, The glory of Christ is the joy, the exceeding joy, of all true believers, even while they are here in this world; much more will it be so when they go to the new Jerusalem, and find him there in his glory.

3. They abounded in acts of devotion while they were in expectation of the promise of the Father, v. 53. (1.) They attended the temple-service at the hours of prayer; God had not as yet quite forsaken it, and therefore they did not. They were continually in the temple, as their Master was when he was at Jerusalem. The Lord loves the gates of Zion, and so should we. Some think that they had their place of meeting, as disciples, in some of the chambers of the temple which belonged to some Levite that was well affected to them; but others think that it is not likely that either could be concealed from, or would be convicted at by, the chief priests and rulers of the temple. (2.) Temple-songs, which they knew, were superseded by Christ's sacrifice, but the temple-songs they joined in. Note, While we are waiting for God's promises, we must go forth to meet them with our praises. Praising and blessing God is work that is never out of season; and nothing better prepares the mind for the receiving of the Holy Ghost than holy joy and praise. Tears are silenced, sorrows sweetened and allayed, and hopes kept up.

The amen that concludes, seems to be added by the church and every believer to the reading of the gospel; signifying an assent to the truths of the gospel, and a hearty concurrence with all the disciples of Christ in praising and blessing God. Amen. Let him be continually praised and blessed.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,
OF THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. JOHN.

It is not material to enquire when and where this gospel was written; we are sure it was given by inspiration of God to John, the brother of James, one of the twelve apostles, distinguished by the honourable character of that disciple whom Jesus loved; one of the first three of the worthies of the Son of David, whom he took to be the witnesses of his retirements, particularly of his transfiguration and agony. The ancients tell us, that John lived longest of all the twelve apostles, and was the only one of them that died a natural death, all the rest suffering martyrdom; and some of them say that he wrote this gospel at Ephesus, at the request of the ministers of the several churches of Asia, in opposition to the heresy of Cerinthus and the Ebionites, who held that our Lord was a mere Man. It seems most probable that he wrote it before his banishment into the isle of Patmos, for there he wrote his Apocalypse, the close of which seems designed for the closing up of the canon of scripture; and if so, this gospel was not written after. I cannot therefore give credit to those latter fathers, who say that he wrote it in his banishment, or after his return from it, many years after the destruction of Jerusalem; when he was ninety years old, saith one of them; when he was a hundred saith another of them. However, it is clear that he wrote last of the four evangelists, and, comparing his gospel with theirs, we may observe, 1. That he relates what they had omitted; he brings up the rear, and his gospel is as the record of the gathering-host, it cleans up what they had passed by. Thus there was a collection, the collection of Solomon's wise sayings, (Prov. 25. 1.) and yet far short of what he delivered, 1 Kings 4. 22. 2. That he gives us more of the mystery of that which the other evangelists give us only the history of it. It was necessary that the matters of fact should be first settled, which was done in their declarations of those things which Jesus began both to do and teach, Luke 1. 1. Acts 1. 1. But that being done out of the mouth of two or three witnesses, John goes on to perfection, (Heb. 6. 1.) not laying again the foundation, but building upon it; leading us more within the vail. Some of the ancients observe that the other evangelists wrote more of the material— the bodily things of Christ; but John writes of the spiritual things of the gospel, the life and soul of it; therefore some have called this gospel the key of the evangelists. Here it is that a door is opened in heaven, and the first voice we hear, is, Come up higher; come up higher. Some of the ancients, that supposed the four living creatures in John's vision to represent the four evangelists, make John himself to be the flying-eagle, so high doth he soar, and so clearly doth he see into divine and heavenly things.
The scope and design of this chapter is to confirm our faith in Christ as the eternal Son of God, and the true Messiah and Saviour of the world, that we may be brought to receive him, and rely upon him, as our Prophet, Priest, and King, and that we may be saved by him. In order to this, we have here, 1. An account given of him by the inspired penman himself, fairly laying down, in the beginning, what he designed his whole book should be the proof of; v. 1-15. And again, v. 16-18. II. The testimony of John Baptist concerning him, v. 6-9. and again, v. 18. but most truly and particularly, v. 19-37. III. His own manifestation of himself to Andrew, and Peter, v. 38, 42. to Philip and Nathanael, v. 43, 51.

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. 2. The same was in the beginning with God. 3. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made. 4. In him was life; and the life was the light of men. 5. And the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not.

Austin saith (de Civitate Dei, lib. 10. cap. 29.) that his friend Sulpicius told him he had heard a Platonic philosopher say that these first verses of St. John's gospel were very to be written in letters of gold. The learned Francis Junius, in the account he gives of his own life, tells how he was in his youth infected with loose notions in religion, and by the grace of God was wonderfully recovered by reading accidentally these verses in a Bible which his father had designately laid in his way. He says, that he observed such a divinity in the argument, such an authority and majesty in the style, that his flesh trembled, and he was struck into such an amazement, that for a whole day he scarcely knew where he was, or what he did; and from thence he dates the beginning of his being religious. Let us inquire what there is in those strong lines. The evangelist here lays down the great truth he is to prove, that Jesus Christ is God, one with the Father. Observe,

1. Whom he speaks of— the Word. This is an idiom peculiar to John's writings. See 1 John 1. 1. ch. 5. 7. Rev. 19. 13. Yet some think that Christ is meant by the Word, Acts 20. 32. Heb. 4. 12. Luke 1. 2.

The Chaldee paraphrase very frequently calls the Messiah Menra—the Word of Jehovah, and speaks of many things in the Old Testament said to be done by the Lord, as done by the Word of the Lord; even the vulgar Jews were taught that the Word of God was the same with God. The evangelist, in the close of his discourse (v. 18.) plainly tells us why he calls Christ the Word—because he is the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, and has declared him. Word is twofold;

1. Word spoken—sóúo. 2. Word uttered. The word in the soul? Surely then the generations and births of the eternal mind may well be allowed to be great mysteries of godliness, the bottom of which we cannot fathom, while yet we adore the depth.

There is the word thought, the chief and most natural indication of the mind. And thus Christ is the Word, for by him God has in these last days spoken to us, (Heb. 1. 2.) and has directed us to hear him, Matt. 17. 5. He has made known God's mind to us, as a man's word or speech makes known his thoughts, as far as he pleases, and no farther. Christ is called that wonderful speaker, (Dan. 8. 13.) the Speaker of the hidden word. He is the Word speaking from God to us, and to God for us. John Baptist was the voice; but Christ the Word; being the Word, he is the Truth, the Amen, the faithful Witness of the mind of God.

II. What he saith of him, enough to prove beyond contradiction that he is God. He asserts,

1. His existence in the beginning; In the beginning was the Word. This speaks his existence, not only before his incarnation, but before all time. The beginning of Time, in which all creatures were produced and brought into being, found this eternal Word in being. The world was from the beginning, but the Word was in the beginning. Eternity is usually expressed by being before the foundation of the world. The eternity of God is so described, (Psa. 90. 2.) from everlasting to everlasting.

2. His co-existence with the Father; The Word was with God, and the Word was God. Let none say that when we invite them to Christ, we would draw them from God, for Christ is God. And God; it is repeated again, (v. 18.) the same, the very same that we believe in and preach, was in the beginning with God, that is, he was so from eternity.

In the beginning, the world was from God, as it was created by him; but the Word was with God, as ever with him. The Word was with God, (1.) In respect of essence and substance; for the Word was God, a distinct Person from God, was with God. Yet the same in substance, for he was God, Heb. 1. 3. (2.) In respect of complectency and felicity. There was a glory and happiness which Christ had with God before the world was: (ch. 17. 5.) the Son infinitely happy in the enjoyment of his Father's bosom, and no less the Father's Delight, the Son of his love, Prov. 8. 30. (3.) In respect of counsel and design. The mystery of man's redemption by this Word incarnate, was hid in God, before all worlds, Eph. 3. 9. He that undertook to bring us to God, (1 Pet. 3. 18.) was himself from eternity with God; so that this grand affair of man's reconciliation to God was concerted between the Father and Son from Eternity, and they understand one another perfectly well in it, Zech. 13. 11. 14. 17. 22. Then was he by him, (v. 33.) for his himself, Prov. 8. 30. He was with God, and therefore is said to come forth from the Father.

3. His agency in making the world, v. 3. This is here, (1.) Expressly asserted: All things were made by him. He was with God, not only so as to be acquainted with the divine counsels from eternity, but to be active in the divine operations in the beginning; for the first-born of all creation is by him, Prov. 8. 29. God made the world by a word; (Ps. 33. 6.) and Christ was that Word. By him not as a subordinate Instrument, but as a co-ordinate Agent, God made the world; Heb. 1. 2. not as the workman cuts by his axe, but as the body sees by the eye. (2.) The contrary is denied; Without him was not any thing made, that was made, from the highest angel to the nearest worm. God the Father did nothing without him in that work. Now, [1.] This proves that he is God; for he that built all things is God; Heb. 3. 4. The God of Israel often proved himself to be God, with this, that he made all things; (Isa. 40, 14, 28.—41. 4.) and see Jer. 10, 11. 12. [2.] This proves the excellence of the christian religion; the Author and Founder of it is the same that was the Author and Founder of the world. How excellent two worlds he, which derives his institution from him who is the Fountain of all excellence! When we worship Christ, we worship him to whom the patriarchs gave honour as the Creator of the world, and on whom all creatures depend. [3. ] This shows how well qualified he was for the work of our redemption and salvation; help was laid upon one that was mighty indeed, for it now rests upon none but he, which derives its institution from him who is the Fountain of all excellence! When we worship Christ, we worship him to whom the patriarchs gave honour as the Creator of the world, and on whom all creatures depend.

4. The original of life and light that is in him; (v. 4.) In him was life. This further proves that he is God, and every way qualified for his undertaking; for, (1.) He has life in himself; not only the true God, but the living God. God is life, he swears by himself, when he saith, As I live. (2.) All living creatures are made by him, and all the matter of the creation was made by him, but all the life too that is in the creation, is derived from him, and supported by him. It was the word of God that produced the moving creatures that had life, Gen. 1. 20. Acts 17. 25. He is that Word by which man lives, more than by bread, Matth. 4. 4.

(3.) Reasonable creatures have their light from him, that light which is the life of men, comes from him. Life in a man is not the same thing, as when we speak of any living creature, but that is in other creatures, it is rational, and not merely animal; when man became a living soul, his life was light, his capacities such as distinguished him from, and dignified him above, the beasts that perish. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, and it was the eternal Word that lighted this candle. The light of reason, as well as the life of sense, is derived from him, and depends upon him. This proves him fit to be the Saviour of all mankind, for life and light, spiritual and eternal life and light, are the two great things that fallen man, who lies so much under the power of death and darkness, has need of. From whom may we better expect the light of divine revelation than from him who gave us the light of human reason? And if when God gave us natural life, that life was in his Son, why should we receive the gospel-record, that he hath given us eternal life, and that life too in his Son?

5. The manifestation of him to the children of men. It might be objected, If this eternal Word was all in all thus in the creation of the world, whence is it that he has been so little taken notice of and regarded? To this he answers, (v. 5.) The light shines, but the darkness comprehends it not; Observations, (1.) The discovery of the eternal Word to the tuned world; even before he was manifested in the flesh; the light shineth in darkness. Light is self-evidencing, and will make itself known; this Light, from whence the light of men comes, hath shined, and doth shine. [1.] The eternal Word, as God, shines in the darkness of natural conscience. Though men by the fall are become darkness, yet that which was light at one time is manifested in them; see Rom. 1. 19, 20. The light of nature is this light shining in darkness. Something of the power of the divine word, both as creating and as commanding, all mankind have an innate sense of; were it not for that, this earth would be a hell, a place of utter darkness; blessed be God, it is not so yet. [2.] The eternal Word, as Mediator, shone in the darkness of the Old-Testament types and figures, and the prophecies and promises which were of the Messiah from the beginning. He that had commanded the light of this world to shine out of darkness, was himself long a Light shining in darkness; there was a vail upon this light, 2 Cor. 3. 13.

(3.) The disability of the degenerate world to receive this discovery; The darkness comprehended it not; the most of men received the grace of God in these discoveries, in vain. [1.] The world of mankind comprehended not the natural light that was in their understandings, but became vain in their imaginations concerning the eternal God and the eternal Word, Rom. 1. 21, 27. The darkness of error and sin overpowered and quite eclipsed this light. God spake once, sea twice, but man four hundred times. Job 33. 14. [2.] The Jews, who had the light of the Old Testament, yet comprehended not Christ in it. As there was a vail upon Moses's face, so there was upon the people's hearts. In the darkness of the types and the shadows the light shone; but such was the darkness of their understandings, that they could not see it. It was therefore requisite that Christ should come both to rectify the errors of the Gentile world, and to improve the truths of the Jewish church.

6. There was a man sent from God, whose name was John. 7. The same came for a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe. 8. He was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that Light. 9. That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. 10. He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. 11. He came unto his own, and his own received him not. 12. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: 13. Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. 14. And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth.

The evangelist designes to bring in John Baptist bearing an honourable testimony to Jesus Christ. Now in these verses, before he does that,

1. He gives us some account of the witness he is about to produce. His name is John, which signifies gracious; his conversation was austere, but he was not less endued with the gifts of grace and truth.

1. We are told concerning him, in general, that he was a man sent of God. The evangelist had said concerning Jesus Christ, that he was with God, and that he was God; but here concerning John, that he was a man, a mere man; God is pleased to speak to us by men like ourselves. John was a great man; but he was a man, a son of man, he was sent that life might be manifested in him, he was God's messenger, so he is called, Mark. 3. 1. God gave him both his mission and his message, both his credentials and his instructions. John wrought no miracle, nor do we find that he had visions and revelations; but the strictness and purity of his life and doctrine, and the direct tendency of both to reform the world, and to receive the interests of God's kingdom among men, were plain indications that he was sent of God.

2. We are here told what his office and business were (§ 2.) To come to be a witness, an eye-wit ness, a mouth-witness. He came to bear witness—if for a testimony; for a witness, an eye-witness, a mouth-witness. He came, not simply a sight-witness, but for a testimony. The legal institutions had been long a testimony for God in the Jewish church, by them revealed religion was kept up; hence we read of the tabernacle of the testimony, the ark of the testimony, the law and the testimony: but now divine revelation is to be turned into another channel; now the testimony of the law is overlapped by that of the One Christ, who is the true Light of God. (John 1:6-9.) Among the Gentiles, God indeed had not left himself without witness, (Acts 14:17.) but the Redeemer had no testimonies borne him among them. There was a profound silence concerning him, till John Baptist came for a witness to him. Now observe,

(1.) The matter of his testimony: he came to be a witness of the Light. Light is a thing which witnesses for itself, and carries its own evidence along with it; but to those who shut their eyes against the light, it is necessary there should be those that bear witness to it. Christ's light needs not man's testimony, but the world's darkness does. John was like the night watchman that goes round the town, proclaiming the approach of the morning light to those that have closed their eyes, and are not willing themselves to observe it; or like that watchman that was set to tell those who asked what of the night, that the morning comes, and if ye will inquire, inquire ye, Isa. 21:11, 12. He was sent of God to tell the world that the long-looked for Messiah was now come, should be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel; and that dispensation at hand, which would bring life and immortality to light.

(2.) The design of his testimony: that all men through him might believe; not in him, but in Christ, whose way he was sent to prepare. He taught men to look through him, and pass through to Christ; through the doctrine of repentance for sin, to that of faith in Christ. He prepared men for the reception and entertainment of Christ and his gospel, by awakening them to a sight and sense of sin; and that, their eyes being thereby opened, they might be ready to admit those beams of divine light, which, in the person and doctrine of the Messiah, were now ready to shine in their faces. If they would but receive this witness of man, they would soon find that the witness of God was greater. 1 John 5:10-13. Others may say, that all men through him might believe, excluding none from the kind and beneficial influences of his ministry, that did not exclude themselves, as multitudes did, who rejected the counsel of God against themselves, and so received the grace of God in vain.

3. We are here cautioned not to mistake him for the Light, who only came to bear witness to it. (v. 8.) He was not that Light that was expected and promised, but only was sent to bear witness of that great and ruling Light. He was a star, like that which guided the wise men to Christ, a morning-star; but he was not the Sun; not the Bridegroom, but a friend of the Bridegroom; not the Prince, but his heralder. There were those who rested in John's Light, as his body, and looked no further, Acts 19:3. To rectify this mistake, the evangelist here, when he speaks very honourably of him, yet shows that he must veil to Christ. He was great as the prophet of the Highest, but not the Highest himself. Note, We must take heed of under-valuing ministers, as well as of under-valuing them; they are not our lords, nor have they dominion over our faith; but ministers by whom we believe, stewards of our Lord's house. We must not give up ourselves by an implicit faith to their conduct, for they are not that light; but we must attend to, and receive, their testimony; for they are sent to bear witness of that Light; so then let us esteem them in their office, and be set forward. Had John pretended to be that Light, he had not been so much as a faithful witness of that Light. Those who usurp the honour of Christ, forfeit the honour of being the servants of Christ; yet John was very serviceable as a witness to the Light, though he was not that Light. Those may be of great use to us, who yet shine with a borrowed splendour.

II. Before he goes on with John's testimony, he returns to give us a further account of this Jesus to whom John bore record. Having showed, in the beginning of the chapter, the glories of his Godhead, he here comes to show the graces of his incarnation, and his favours to man as Mediator.

1. Christ was the true Light; (v. 9.) not as if John Baptist were a false Light, but in comparison with Christ, he was a very small light. John's Light is great light that deserves to be called so. Other lights are but figuratively and equivocally called so: Christ is the true Light. The Fountain of all knowledge and of all comfort must needs be the true Light. He is the true Light; for of all he does not refer us to the emanations of his glory in the invisible world, which he (enlightens that,) but to those rays of his Light which are darted downwards, and with which this dark world of ours is enlightened. But how doth Christ lighten every man that comes into the world?

(1.) By his creating power he lightens every man with the light of reason; that life which is the light of men, is from him; all the discoveries and directions of reason, all the lusts of men, and all the beauty it puts upon us, are from Christ. (2.) By the publication of his gospel to all nations he does in effect lighten every man. John Baptist was a light, but he enlightened only Jerusalem and Judea, and the region round about Jordan, like a candle that enlightens one room; but Christ is the true Light, for he is a Light to lighten the Gentiles. His everlasting gospel is to be preached to every nation and language, Rev. 14:6. Like the sun which lightens every man that will open his eyes, and receive its light, (Ps. 19:6.) to which the preaching of the gospel is compared, Rom. 10:18. Divine revelation is not now to be concealed, as it had been, to one people, but to be diffused to all people, Matt. 5:15. (3.) By the operation of his Spirit and grace he lightens all those that are enlightened to salvation; and those that are not enlightened by him, perish in darkness. The light of the knowledge of the glory of God is said to be in the face of Jesus Christ, and is compared with that light which was at the beginning commanded to shine out of darkness, and which lightens every man that comes into the world. If any man have this world's good, let him not despise it; if any regard Christ for it, whether it be natural or supernatural. 2. Christ was in the world; (v. 10.) He was in the world, as the essential Word, before his incarnation, upholding all things; but this speaks of his being in the world when he took our nature upon him, and dwelt among us; see ch. 16:28. I am come into the world. The Son of the Highest was here in this lower world, when he was on earth. There was a high, holy thing in this sinful, polluted world. He left a world of bliss and glory, and was here in this melancholy, miserable world. He undertook to reconcile the world to God, and therefore was in the world, to treat about it, and settle that affair; to satisfy God's justice for the world, and discover God's favour to the world. He was in the world, but not of it, and speaks with an air of triumph, when he says, Ver I am no more in it, ch. 15:11. The greatest honour that ever was put upon this world, which is so mean and insconsiderable a part of the universe, was, that the Son of God was once in the world; and as it should engage our affections to think thereat, that the Christ, by which we should reconcile us to our present abode in this world, that once Christ was here. He was in the world for a while, but it is spoken of as a thing past; and so it will be said of us shortly, We were in the world. O that when we are here no more, we may be where Christ is! Now observe here,

(1.) What reason Christ had to expect the most abundant, and most universal conformity to himself become possible into this world; for the world was made by him. Therefore he came to save a lost world, because it was a world of his own making. Why should not he concern himself to revive the light that was of his own kindling, to restore a life of his own infusing, and to renew the image that was originally of his own impressing? The world was made by him, and therefore ought to do him homage.

(2.) What odd entertainment he met with, notwithstanding: The world knew him not. The great Maker, Ruler, and Redeemer of the world was in it, and few or none of the inhabitants of the world were aware of it. The or knew his owner, but the more brutish world did not; they did not own him, did not bid him welcome, because they did not know him; and they did not know him, because he did not pursue his former station, an external glory and majesty. His kingdom came not with observation, because it was to be a kingdom of trial and probation. When he shall come as a Judge, the world shall know him.

3. He came to his own, (v. 11.) not only to the world, which was his own, but to the people of Israel, that were peculiarly his own above all people; of them he came, among them he lived, and to them he was known as his own. Though he came to the world, since a mean, despiseful people, the crown was fallen from their head; yet, in remembrance of the ancient covenant, bad as they were, and poor as they were, Christ was not ashamed to look upon them as his own. To his own things; not to his own, as true believers are called ch. 13. 1. The Jews were his, as a man's house and lands and goods are his, by inheritance by his descent; but believers are his, as a man's wife and children are his own, which he loves and enjoys. He came to his own, to seek and save them, because they were his own. He was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, for it was he whose own the sheep were.

Now observe,

(1.) That the generality rejected him; His own received him not. He had reason to expect that those who were his own, should have hidden him welcome, considering how great the obligations were, which they lay under, and how fair the opportunities were, which they had of coming to the knowledge of him. They had the oracles of God, which told them beforehand when and where to expect him, and of what tribe and family he should arise. He came among them himself, introduced with signs and wonders, and himself the greatest; and therefore what is not said of them, as it was of the world, (v. 16.) that they knew him not; but his own, though they could not but know him, yet they received him not; did not receive his doctrine, did not welcome him as the Messiah, but fortified themselves against him. The chief priests, that were in a particular manner his own, (for the Levites were God's tribe,) were ringleaders in this contempt put upon him. Now this was very unjust, because they were his own, and therefore he might command their respects; and it was very unkind and ungrateful, because he came to them, to seek and save them, and so to court their respect. Note,

Many who in profession are Christ's own, yet do not receive him, because they will not part with their sins, nor have him to reign over them.

(2.) That yet there was a remnant, who owned him, and were faithful to him. Though his own received him not, yet there were those that received him; (v. 12.) But as many as received him. Though Israel were not gathered, yet Christ was glorious. Though the body of that nation persisted and perished in unbelief, yet there were many of them that were wrought upon to submit to Christ, and many more that were not of that fold. The doctrine of Christ was the description and property; and that is, that he receives Christ, and believes on his name; the latter explains the former. Note,

First, To be a Christian indeed, is to believe on Christ's name; it is to assent to the gospel-discovery, and consent to the gospel-proposal, concerning him. His name is the Word of God; the King of kings; the Lord our Righteousness; Jesus the Saviour. Now to believe on his name, is to acknowledge that he is what these great names bespeak him to be, and to acquiesce in it, that he be so to us. Secondly, Believing in Christ's name is receiving him as a Gift from God. We must receive his doctrine as true and good; receive his law as just and holy; receive his offers as kind and advantageous; and we must receive the image of his grace, and impressions of his love, as the governing principle of our affections and actions.

First, The privilege of adoption, which takes them into the number of God's children; To them gave he power to become the sons of God. Hitherto, the adoption pertained only to the Jews only; (Israel is my son, my first born;) but now, by faith in Christ, Gentiles are the children of God; the adoption, in the former sense, is to be given to them; to have power to become God's children; and this power is given to every true believer, as it is to him, without distinction, for no man taketh this power to himself, but who is authorized by the gospel-charter. To them gave he a right; to them gave he this pre-eminence. This power have all the saints.

Note, 1. It is the unspeakable privilege of all good Christians, that they are become the children of God. They were by nature children of wrath; children of this world. If they be the children of God, they have been begotten of God. God's never forsaken; nor cast out; nor cast out, nor left out; nor not cast out. From him, as the Head, they have derived from him, as the Body, the power of becoming the children of God, at the same time, by faith, in the Spirit, by the calling, the adoption, they become the children of God. If a man believe on him, God is his Father, and so are we; and it is a blessing to our consciences, and the union with him, that we stand related to God as a Father. It was in Christ that we were predestinated to the adoption; from him we receive both the character and the Spirit of adoption, and he is the First-born among many brethren. The Son of God became a Son of man, that the sons and daughters of men might become the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

Secondly, The privilege of regeneration; (v. 13.) which were born. Note, All the children of God are born again; all that are adopted, are regenerated. This real change evermore attends that relative one, Wherever God confers the dignity of children, he creates the nature and disposition of children. Men cannot do so, when they adopt. Now here we have an account of the original of this new birth.

1. Negatively, (1.) It is not from any, but from himself; He is the Creator of the body of our parents. It is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of corruptible seed, 1 Pet. 1. 23. Man is called flesh and blood, because hence he has his original; but we do not become the chilandro of God as we become the children of our natural parents. Note, "Grace does not run in the blood, as corruption does. Man polluted beget a son in his own likeness; (Gen. 6. 4.) but grace does not beget a son in that likeness. The Jews gloried much in their parentage, and the noble blood that ran in their veins; We are Abraham's seed, and therefore to them pertained the adoption, because they were born of that blood; but this New Testament adoption is not founded in any such natural relation. (2.) It is not produced by the natural marriage of Christ with the Virgin, but by the incarnation of the Word. This was, (a) that the law of the flesh might be fulfilled; (b) that our sins might be blotted out; (c) that the Father's name might be glorified. (3.) God intended it to have a close relation to the person of Christ for the fulfillment of the promise to Abraham. In bringing in his son into the world, he put himself into the place and condition of other men. The Word might have been made Flesh, and dwelt among the angels; but, having taken a body of the same mould with us, in it he came, and resided in the same world with us. He dwelt among us, as worms of the earth, us that had no need of us; but, being in the likeness of man, we had need of him as we were deprived, and revolted from God. The Lord God came, and dwelt even among the rebellions, Ps. 68. 18. He that had dwelt among angels, those noble and excellent beings, came, and dwelt among us that are a generation of vipers, us sinners, which was worse to him than David's dwelling in Mesec and Kedar, or Ezechiel's dwelling among scorpions, or the church of Pergamos dwelling where Satan's seat is. When we look upon the upper world, the world of spirits, how mean and contemptible does this flesh, this body, appear, which we carry about with us, and this world in which our lot is cast; and how hard is it to a contemplative mind, to be reconciled to them! But that the eternal Word was made Flesh, was clothed with a body as we are, and dwelt thus among us, is the unique thing the Father ever did: from which both, and should make us willing to abide in the flesh while God has any work for us to do, for Christ dwelt in this lower world, bad as it is, till he had finished what he had to do there, ch. 17. 4. He dwelt among the Jews, that the scripture might be fulfilled, He shall dwell in the tents of Shem, Gen. 9. 27. And see Zech. 2. 10. Though the Jews were unkind to him, yet he continued to dwell among them; though (as some of the ancient writers tell us) he was invited to better treatment by Abgarus king of Edessa, yet he removed not to any other nation.

He dwelt among us. He was in the world, not as a wayfaring man that tarries but for a night, but he dwelt among us, made a long residence; the original word is observable, εἵνα τιμήτω—be dwelt among us, he dwelt as in a tabernacle, which intimates, First, That he dwelt here in very mean circumstances, as shepherds that dwelt in tents. He did not dwell among us as in a palace, but as in a tent; for he had not where to lay his head, and was always upon the remove. Secondly, That his state here was a military state; soldiers dwell in tents, he had long since proclaimed war with the seed of the serpent, and now he took the field in person; set up his standard, and pitches his tent, to prosecute this war. Thirdly, That his stay among us was not to be perpetual. He dwelt here as in a tent, not as at home. The patriarchs, by dwelling in tabernacles, confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth, and sought the better country, and so did Christ, leaving us an example. Heb. 13. 15. Fourthly, That in God dwelt in the tabernacle of Moses, he dwelt in the Shechinah between the cherubims, so now he dwells in the human nature of Christ; that is now the true Shechinah, the symbol of God's peculiar presence. And we are to make all our addresses to God through Christ, and from him to receive divine oracles.

(2.) The beams of his divine glory, that darted through this vault of flesh; We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. The sun is still the fountain of light, though eclipsed or clouded; so Christ was still the Brightness of his Father's glory, even then when he dwelt among us in this lower world. And how slightly soever the Jews thought of him, there were those that saw through the veil. Observe,

[1.] Who were the witnesses of this glory? We, his disciples and followers, that conversed most freely and familiarly with him; we among whom he dwelt. Other men discover their weaknesses to those that are most familiar with them, but it was not so with Christ; those that were most intimate with him, saw most of his glory. As it was with his "disciples," the disciples knew the "face of his glory;" while with others, now the "val of peradventures," so it was with his person, they saw the glory of his divinity, while others saw only the veil of his human nature. He manifested himself to them, and not unto the world. These witnesses were a competent number, twelve of them, a whole jury of witnesses; men of blindness and integrity, and far from any thing of design or intrigue.

[2.] What event they had of it: We saw it; They had not their evidence by report, at second hand, but were themselves eye-witnesses of those proofs on which they built their testimony, that he was the Son of the living God; We saw it. The word signifies a fixed, abiding sight, such as gave them an opportunity of making their observations. This apostle himself explains this, What we declare unto you of the word of life, is what we have seen with our eyes, and what we have looked upon. 1 John 1:3.

[3.] What the glory was; the glory as of the Only Begotten of the Father. The glory of the Word made flesh, was such a glory as became the only begotten Son of God, and could not be the glory of any other. Note, First, Jesus Christ is the Only Begotten of the Father. Believers are the children of God by the special favour of adoption, and the special grace of regeneration; they are in a sense "divine," of a like nature, (2 Pet. 1.4.) and have the image of his perfections; but Christ is "divine" — of the same nature, and is the express Image of his person, and the Son of God by an eternal generation. Angels are sons of God, but he never said to any of them, This day have I begotten thee, Heb. 1.5. Secondly, He was evidently declared to be the Only Begotten of the Father, by the which name he was called in his church, when he dwelt among us. Though he was in the form of a servant, in respect of outward circumstances, yet, in respect of grace, his form was as that of the fourth in the fiery furnace, like the Son of God. His divine glory appeared in the holiness and heavenliness of his doctrine; in his miracles, which extorted from many this acknowledgment, that he was the Son of God; it appeared in the purity, goodness, and beneficence, of his whole conversation. God's goodness in his gospel, and he went about doing good: he spake and acted in every thing as an incarnate Deity. Perhaps the evangelist had a particular regard to the glory of his transfiguration, which he was an eye-witness of; see 2 Pet. 1.16-18. God's calling him his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased, intimated that he was the Only Begotten of the Father; but the glory of this was at his resurrection.

[4.] What advantage the disciples did, has from this. He dwelt among them, full of grace and truth. In the old tabernacle wherein God dwelt, was the law, in this was grace; in that were types, in this was truth. The incarnate Word was every way qualified for his undertaking as Mediator, for he was full of grace and truth, the two great things that fallen man stands in need of; and this proved him to be the Son of God, as much as any other grace and power and majesty that appeared in him. First, He has a fulness of grace and truth for himself; he had the Spirit without measure. He was full of grace, fully acceptable to his Father, and therefore qualified to intercede for us; and full of truth, fully apprized of the things he was to reveal, and therefore fit to instruct us. He had a fulness of knowledge and a fulness of compassion. Secondly, He has a fulness of grace and truth for us. He received, that he might give, and God was well pleased in him, that he might be well pleased with us in him; and this was the truth of the legal types.

15. John bare witness of him, and cried, saying, This was he of whom I spake, He that cometh after me is preferred before me; for he was before me. 16. And of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace. 17. For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. 18. No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.

In these verses,

1. The evangelist begins again to give us John Baptist's testimony concerning Christ, ver. 15. He had said, v. 8, that he came for a witness, now here he tells us that he did accordingly, whose testimony is of weight with us.

Here, 1. Observe how he expresses his testimony; he cried, according to the prediction, that he should be the voice of one crying. The Old Testament prophets cried aloud, to show people their sin; this New Testament prophet cried aloud, to show people their Saviour. This intimates, (1.) That it was an open public testimony, proclaimed, that all manner of persons might take notice of it, if they were concerned in it. False teachers, entirely secretly, but wisdom publishes her dictates in the chief places of concourse. (2.) That he was free and hearty in bearing this testimony. He cried as one that was well assured of, and well affected to, the truth he witnessed for. He that had leaped in his mother's womb, for joy of Christ's approach when newly conceived, does now with a like exultation of spirit come his public appearance.

2. What his testimony was. He appeals to what he had said at the beginning of his ministry, when he had directed them to expect one that should come after him, whose forerunner he was, and never intended any other than to lead them to him, and to prepare his way. This he had given them notice of from the first. Note, It is very comfortable to a minister, to have the testimony of his conscience for him, that he sets out in his ministry; and it is most edifying to hear from sincere persons, who have an eye single to the glory and honour of Christ. Now what he had then said, he applies to this Jesus whom he had lately baptized, and who was so remarkably owned from heaven; This was he of whom I spake. John did not tell them that there would shortly appear such a one among them, and then leave them to find him out; but in this he went beyond all the Old Testament prophets, that only in particular specified the person: This was he, the very man I told you of; and to him all I said is to be accommodated. Now what was it he said?

(1.) He had given the preference to this Jesus; He that comes after me, in the time of his birth and public appearance, is preferred before me; he that succeeds me in preaching and making disciples, is a more excellent Person, upon all accounts, than the prince or peer that comes after me. He was before me before he had any existence; and this makes way for us to receive him. Note, Jesus Christ, who was to be called the Son of the Highest, (Luke 1. 32,) was preferred before John Baptist, who was to be called only the prophet of the Highest, Luke 1. 76. John was a minister of the New Testament, but Christ was the Mediator of the New Testament. And obverse, though John was a great man, and had a great name and interest, yet he was forward to give the prefer ence to him to whom it belonged. Note, All the ministers of Christ must prefer him and his interest before themselves and their own interests: they will make an ill account, that seek their own things, not the things of Christ. Phil. 2: 21. He comes after many, and was preferred before. Note, God dis- penses his gifts according to his good pleasure, and many times crosses hands, as Jacob did, preferring the younger before the elder. Paul far outstripped those that were in Christ before him.

(2.) He here gives a good reason for it; for he was before me, ἐπί μεν ἐγώ. He was my first, or first to me; he was my first Cause, my Original. This shows the glory of God, that he is before; and how could he otherwise be before him but by an eternal existence? [1.] In respect of supremacy, for he was my Prince; some princes are called the first; ἐκ μου. "It is he for whose sake and service I am sent: he is my Master, I am his minister and messenger.

11. He presently returns again to speak of Jesus Christ, and says, "God before him."—Joseph, the elder, he is the first to me; and this is the beginning of his testimony till v. 19. The 16th verse has a manifest connexion with v. 14. where the accurate Word was said to be full of grace and truth. Now here he makes this the matter, not only of our adornation, but of our thankfulness, because from that fulness of his we all have received. He received gifts for his coming. (Ps. 68: 18.) that he might give gifts to men, Eph. 4: 8. He was filled, that he might fill all in all, (Eph. 1: 22;) might fill out our treasures, Prov. 8: 21. He is a fountain of fulness overflowing; He all have received. All we apostles; so some. We have received the favour of this apostleship, that is grace; and a fitness for it, that is truth; or rather, All we believers; as many as received him, (v. 16.) received from him. Note. All true believers receive from Christ's fulness; the best and greatest souls; those the weakest may live by him. This excludes proud boasting, that we have nothing but we have received it; and silences perplexing fears, that we want nothing but we may receive it.

Let us see what it is that we have received.

1. We have received grace for grace. Our receivings by Christ are all summed up in this one word, grace; we have received, δικαιοσύνη, πίστις, grace, so great a gift, so rich, so invaluable; we have received no less than grace; that is a gift to be spoken of with an emphasis. It is repeated, grace for grace; for to every stone in this building, as well as to the top-stone, we must cry, Grace, grace. Observe. (1.) The blessing received; it is grace; the good will of God towards us, and the good work of God in us. God's good will works the good work, and then the good work qualifies us for further tokens of his good will. As the cistern receives water from the fulness of the fountain, the branches sap from the fulness of the root, and the air light from the fulness of the sun, so we receive grace from the fulness of Christ.

(2.) The manner of its reception; grace for grace.—ἐπί μεν ἐγώ. The phrase is singular, and interpreters put different senses upon it, each of which will be of use to illustrate the unspeakable riches of the grace of Christ. Grace for grace speaks, (1.) The freeness of this grace. It is grace for grace-sake; so Grotius. We receive grace, not for our sakes, (be it known to us,) but even so, Father, because it seemed good in thy sight. It is a gift according to grace, Rom. 12: 6. It is grace to us for the sake of grace to Jesus Christ. God was well pleased in him, and is therefore well pleased with us in him, Eph. 1: 6.

[2.] The fulness of this grace. Grace for grace is abundance of grace, grace upon grace, (so Cama- rero,) one grace heaped upon another; a skin for skin is skin after skin, even all that a man has, Job 2: 4. It is a blessing poured out, that there shall not be room to receive it, plentiful redemption: one soul, grace and redemption of more people, grace. Joseph, he will add. It is such a fulness as is called the fulness of God, which we are filled with. We are not stinted in the grace of Christ, if we be not stinted in our own bosoms.

[3.] The serviceableness of this grace. Grace for grace is grace for the promoting and advancing of grace. Grace to be exercised by ourselves, gracious habits for gracious acts; grace to be ministered to others, gracious vouchsafements for gracious performances, grace is a talent to be traded with. The apostles received grace, (Rom. 1: 5. Eph. 3: 8.) that they might communicate it, 1 Pet. 4: 10.

[4.] The substitution of New-Testament grace in the room and stead of Old-Testament grace; so Beza. And this sense is confirmed by what follows; (v. 17.) for the Old-Testament had grace in type, the New-Testament had grace in substance. Grace for grace is grace for a grace under the Old Testament, the gospel was preached then; (Gal. 3: 8.) but that grace is superseded, and we have gospel-grace instead of it, a glory which excelleth, 2 Cor. 3: 10. Discoveries of grace are now more clear, distributions of grace far more plentiful; this is grace instead of grace.

(5.) It speaks the augmentation and continuance of grace. Grace for grace is grace for one grace, to improve, confirm, and perfect, another grace. We are changed into the divine image, from glory to glory, from one degree of glorious grace to another, 2 Cor. 3: 18. Those that have true grace, have that for more grace, Jam. 4: 6. When God gives grace, he saith, Take this in part; for he who hath promised, will perform.

(6.) It speaks the agreeableness and conformity of grace. Grace for grace is grace for the saints to the grace that is in Jesus Christ; so Mr. Clark. Grace for grace is grace in us answering to grace in him, as the impression upon the wax answers the seal, line for line. The grace we receive from Christ, changes us into the same image, (2 Cor. 3: 18.) The image of the Son, (Rom. 8: 29.) the image of the heavenly, 1 Cor. 15: 49.

We have received grace and truth, v. 17. He had said, (v. 14.) that Christ was full of grace and truth; now here he saith, that by him grace and truth came to us. From Christ we receive grace; this is a string he delights to harp upon, he cannot go off from it. Two things he further observes in this verse, concerning this grace.

(1.) Its preference above the law of Moses; The law was given by Moses, and it was a glorious discovery, both of God's will concerning man, and his good will to man; but the gospel of Christ is a much clearer discovery both of duty and happiness. That which was given by Moses, was purely terrifying and threatening, and bound with penalties, a law which could not give life, which was given with abundance of terror; (Heb. 12: 18.) but that which is given by Christ, is not so; it is a grace and a truth: it had all the beneficial uses of the law, but left the terror, for it is grace; grace teaching, (Tit. 2: 11.) grace reigning, Rom. 5: 21. It is a law, but a remedial law. The endearments of love are the graces of the gospel, not the affrightments of law and the curse.

In the gospel, we have the discovery of the greatest truths, to be embraced by the understanding, as well as of the richest grace, to be embraced by the will and affections. It is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation; it is grace and truth. The offers of grace are sincere, and what we may venture our souls upon; the promises of grace are certainly kept. It is grace and truth. It is grace and truth, with reference to the law that was given by Moses. For it is, [1.]

The performance of all the Old-Testament promises. In the Old Testament, we often find mercy and truth put together, that is, mercy according to promise; so here, grace and truth denote grace according to promise. See Luke 1. 72. 1 Kings 8. 58. 60. 1 Peter 3. 18. In the Old Testament, types and shadows. Something of grace there was both in the ordinances that were instituted for Israel; and the providences that occurred respecting Israel; but they were only shadows of good things to come, even of that grace that is to be brought to us by the revelation of Jesus Christ. He is the true paschal Lamb, the true scape-goat, the true Messiah. The had grace in the picture, we have grace in the person. [2.]

Grace and truth came; 5, 6 was made; the same word that was used v. 5, concerning Christ’s making all things. The law was only made known by Moses, but the being of this grace and truth, as well as the discovery of it, is owing to Jesus Christ; this was made by him, as the world at first was, and by him this grace and truth do consist.

The great discovery as from Christ, is a clear revelation of God to us; (v. 18.) He hath declared God to us, whom no man hath seen at any time. This was the grace and truth which came by Christ, the knowledge of God and an acquaintance with him, observe.

(1.) The insufficiency of all other discoveries; (v. 2.) No man hath seen God at any time. This intimates,

[1.] That the nature of God being spiritual, he is invisible to bodily eyes; he is a Being whom no man hath seen, or can see, 1 Tim. 6. 16. We have therefore need to live by faith, by which we see him that is invisible, Heb. 11. 27. [2.] That the revelation which God made of himself in the Old Testament was very short and imperfect, in comparison with that which he has made by Christ; No man hath seen God at any time; that is, what was seen and known of God in the Old Testament, was nothing to that which is now seen and known. The apprehensions of God, and immortality are now brought to a much clearer light than they were then. [3.] That none of the Old-Testament prophets were so well qualified to make known the mind and will of God to the children of men as our Lord Jesus was, for none of them had seen God at any time. Moses beheld the glories of the Lord, (Num. 12. 8.) but was told that he could not see his face, Exod. 33. 20. But this recommends Christ’s holy religion to us, that it was founded by one that had seen God, and knew more of his mind than any one else ever did, for he had seen him, which they never did.

How fit he was to make this discovery, and every way qualified for it. He, and he alone, was worthy to take the book, and open the seals, Rev. 5. 9. For, First, He is the only begotten Son; and who so likely to know the Father as the Son; or, in whom is the Father better known than in the Son? Matt. 11. 27. He is of the same nature with the Father, so that he who hath seen him, hath seen the Father, ch. 14. 9. The servant is not supposed to know so well what his Lord does, as the Son, ch. 15.

Moses was faithful as a servant, but Christ as a Son. Second, He is in the bosom of the Father. He had lain in his bosom from eternity; when he was here upon earth, yet still, as God, he was in the bosom of the Father, and thither he returned when he ascended. In the bosom of the Father. 1. In the bosom of his special love, dear to him, in which he was always well pleased, always his delight. All God’s saints are in his hand, but his Son was in his bosom, one in nature and essence, and therefore in the highest degree one in love. 2. In the bosom of his secret counsels. As there was a mutual complacency so there was a mutual consciousness, between the Father and Son; (Matt. 11. 27.) none so fit as he to make known God, for none knew his mind so as he did. Our most secret counsels and purposes are hid in our bosom, (in secret;) Christ was pray to the bosom-counsels of the Father. The prophets sat down at his feet as scholars, Christ lay in his bosom as a Friend. See Eph. 3. 11.

[2.] How free he was in making this discovery; He hath declared; him is not in the original. He has declared that of God, which no man had at any time seen or known; not only that which was hid in God, but that which was hid in God; (Eph. 3. 9.) signifies a plain, clear, and full discovery, not by general and doubtful hints, but by particular explications. He that runs, may now read the will of God and the way of salvation. This is the grace, this the truth, that came by Jesus Christ.

19. And this is the record of John, when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou? 20. And he confessed, and denied not: I am not the Christ. 21. And they asked him, What then? Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Art thou that prophet? And he answered, No. 22. Then said they unto him, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us: what sayest thou of thyself? 23. He said, I am not the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaiah. 24. And they which were sent were of the Pharisees. 25. And they asked him, and said unto him, Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet? 26. John answered them, saying, I baptize with water: but there standeth one among you, whom ye know not; 27. He it is, who, coming after me, is preferred before me, whose shoes’ latchet I am not worthy to unloose. 28. These things were done in Bethabara, beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.

We have here the testimony of John, which he delivered to the messengers which were sent from Jerusalem to examine him. Observe here,

I. Who they were that sent to him, and who they were that were sent.

1. They that sent to him, were the Jews at Jerusalem; the great Sanhedrim or High-commission court, which sat at Jerusalem; and was the representative of the Jewish church, who took cognizance of all matters relating to religion. One would think that they who were the fountain of learning, and the guides of the church, should have, by books, understood the times so well as to know that the Messiah was at hand, and therefore should presently have known him that was his forerunner, and readily embraced him; but, instead of that, they sent messengers to cross question with him. Secular learning, honour, and power, seldom dispose men's minds to the reception of divine light. 2. They that were sent, were, (1.) Priests and Levites. It was through the council, men of learning, gravity, and authority. John Baptist was himself a priest of the seed of Aaron, and therefore it was not fit he should be examined by any but priests. It was prophesied concerning John's ministry, that it should |purify the sons of Levi, (Mal. 3. 1.) and therefore they were jealous of him and his reformation. (2.) They were of the Pharisees, priests, and scribes, that they could not bear to see repentance, and therefore could not bear one that made it his business to preach repentance. II. On what errand they went; it was to enquire concerning John and his baptism. They did not send for John up to them, probably because they feared the people, lest the people where John was, should be provoked to rise, or lest the people where they were, should be brought acquainted with him; they thought it was good keeping him at a distance. They enquire concerning him, 1. To satisfy their curiosity; as the Athenians inquired concerning Paul's doctrine, for the novelty of it, Acts 17. 19, 20. Such a proud conceit they had of themselves, that the doctrine of repentance was to them strange doctrine. 2. It was to show their authority; they thought their word was nighly regarded when they called him to account, whom all men counted as a prophet, and arraigned him at their bar. 3. It was with a design to suppress him and silence him if they could find any colour for it, for they were jealous of his growing interest; and his ministry agreed neither with the Mosaic dispensation, which they had been long under, nor with the notions they had formed of the Messiah's kingdom. III. What was the answer he gave them, and his account, both concerning himself and concerning his baptism, in both which he witnessed to Christ. 1. Concerning himself, and what he professed himself to be. They asked him, What art thou? John's appearance in the world was surprising; he was in the wilderness till the day of his showing unto Israel: his spirit, his doctrine, had something in them which commanded and gained respect; but he did not, as seducers do, give out himself to be some great one. He was more industrious to do good than to appear great; and therefore waved saying any thing of himself till he was legally interrogated. Those speak best for Christ, that say least of themselves, whose own words praise them, not their own lips. He answers the interrogators, (1.) Negatively. He was not that great one whom some took him to be. God's faithful witnesses stand more upon their guard against undue respect than against unjust contempts. Paul writes as warmly against those that overvalued him, and said, I am of Paul, as against those that undervalued him, and said that his bodily presence was weak; and he rent his apparel, as Elijah did, called a fool. (2.) Affirmatively. He did not disown himself to be the Christ; (v. 20.) He said, I am not the Christ, who was now expected and waited for. Note, The ministers of Christ must remember that they are not Christ, and therefore must not usurp his powers and prerogatives, nor assume the praises due to him only. They are not Christ, and therefore must not lord it over God's heritage, nor pretend to a dominion over the faith of christians. They cannot create grace and peace, they cannot enlighten, convert, quicken, comfort, for they are not Christ. Observe how emphatically this is here expressed concerning John: He confessed, and denied not, but confessed; it denotes his vehemence and constancy in making this protestation. Note, Temptations to pride, and assuming that honour to ourselves which doth not belong to us, ought to be resisted with a great deal of vigour and earnestness. When John was taken to be the Messiah, he denied not, but confessed, not that he was the Messiah, but that he was not the Christ, nor the Son of God, but appart. But when our Lord is urged upon us, as he was, and therefore they believed he would not give an evasive, ambiguous answer, but would be fair and above-board, and give a plain answer to a plain question: What saith thou of thyself? And he did so, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Observe,

[1.] He gives his answer in the words of scripture, to show that the scripture was fulfilled in him, and that his office was supported by a divine authority. What the scripture saith of the office of the Messiah should be often thought of by those of that high calling, who must look upon themselves as that, and that only, which the word of God makes them.

[2.] He gives in his answer, in very humble, modest, self-denying expressions: he chooses to apply that scripture to himself, which spoke, not his dignity, but his duty and dependance, which speaks him little; I am the voice, as if he were voice, et praeterea nihil.

[3.] He gives such an account of himself as might be profitable to them, and might excite and awaken them to hearken to him; for he was the voice, (see Isa. 40. 3.) a voice to alarm, an articulate voice to instruct. Ministers are but the voice, the vehicle, by which God is pleased to communicate his mind. What are Paul and Apollos but messengers? Observe,

First, He was a human voice. The people were prepared to receive the law by the voice of thunders, and a trumpet exceeding loud, such as made them tremble; but they were prepared for the gospel by the voice of a man like ourselves, a still small voice, such as that in which God came to Elijah, 1 Kings 19. 20.

Secondly, He was the voice of one crying, which denotes, 1. His earnestness and importunity in calling people to repentance; he cried aloud, and did not spare.' Ministers must preach as those that are in earnest, and are themselves affected with those things which they desire to affect others with. Those words are not likely to thaw the hearers' heart, that freeze between the speaker's lips. 2. His open publication of the doctrine he preached: he was the voice of one crying, that all manner of persons might hear and take notice. Dost thou wisdom cry? Prov. 8. 1.

Thirdly, It was in the wilderness: that this voice was crying, in a place of silence and solitude, out of the noise of the world, and the hurry of its business; the more retired we are from the tumult of secular affairs, the better prepared we are to hear from God.

Fourthly, That which he cried, was, Make straight the way of the Lord; that is, 1. He came to rectify the mistakes of people concerning the ways of God: it is certain that they are right ways; but the Scribes and Pharisees, with their corrupt glosses upon the law, had made them crooked. Now John Baptist calls people to return to the original rule. 2. He came to prepare and dispose people for the reception of the entertainment of Christ and his gospel. It is not probation to the harbingers of a prince or great man, that cry, Make room. Note, When God is coming towards us, we must prepare to meet him, and let the word of the Lord have free course. See Ps. 2: 7.

2. Here is his testimony concerning his baptism.

[1. (The inquiry which the committee made about it; (v. 23.) This baptism is that, if you be not the Christ, nor Elias, nor that prophet,) They readily believed him to be Elias, and used as a sacred rite or ceremony, for the Jewish church had used it with circumcision in the admission of proselytes, to signify the cleansing of them from the pollutions of their former state. That sign was made use of in the christian church, because it might be the more passable. Christ did not affect novelty, nor should his ministers. [2.] They expected it would be used in the days of the Messiah, because it was promised 'th' then should be a fountain opened, (Zech. 13. 1.) and clean water sprinkled, Ezek. 36. 25. It is taken for granted, that Christ and Elias, and that prophet, would baptize, for they came to purify a polluted world. Divine justice drowned the old world in its filth, but divine grace has provided for the cleansing of this new world from its filth. [3.] They would therefore now believe him to be the one who Elias, John baptized. His design of himself to be Elias, or that prophet subjected him to this further question on, Why baptizest thou? Note, It is no new thing for a man's modesty to be turned against him, and improved to his prejudice; but it is better that men should take advantage of our wish to think of ourselves, to trample upon us, that the devil should take advantage of our high thoughts of ourselves, to tempt us to pride, and to draw us into his condemnation.

[2.] The account he gave of it, v. 26. 27.

[1.] He owned himself to be only the minister of the outward sign: I baptize with water, and that is, I am no more, and do no more, than what you see: I have no other title than John the Baptist; I cannot confer the spiritual grace signified by it.* Paul was in care that none should think of him above what the Lord had appointed. (2 Cor. 11. 5.) so was John Baptist. Ministers must not set up for masters.

[2.] He directed them to one that was greater than himself, and would do that for them, if they pleased, which he could not do: I baptize with water, and that is the utmost of my commission; I have nothing to do but this to lead you to that comes after me, and consign you to him. Note, The great business of Christ's ministers is to direct all people to him; we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord. John gave the same account to this committee that he had given to the people, (v. 15.) This was he of whom I speak. John was constant and uniform in his testimony, not as a reed shaken with the wind. The sambucrem were jealous of his interest in the people, but he is not afraid to tell them that there is one at the door, that will go beyond him.

First, He tells them of Christ's presence among them now at this time: *There stands one among you, at this time, whom you know not. Christ stood among the common people, and was as one of them. Note, 1. Much true worth lies hid in this world; obscurity is often the lot of real excellency. Saints are God's hidden ones, therefore the world knows them not. 2. God himself was not made away with: *The Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. They were gazing in expectation of the Messiah: Lo he is here, or he is there, when the kingdom of God was abroad and already among them, Luke 17. 21.

Secondly, He tells them of his preference above himself; he comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. This he had said before; he adds here, Whose shoe-latchet I am not worthy to unloose; If I am not fit to be named the same day with him; it is an honour too great for me to pretend to be in the meanest office about him, 1 Sam. 25. 41. Those to whom Christ is precious, reckon his service, even the most despised instances of it, an honour to them, See Ps. 84. 10. If so great a man as John accounted himself unworthy of the honour of being near Christ, how unworthy then should they be who were near Christ, and said to be chief priests and Pharisees, upon this intimation given concerning the approach of the Messiah, should presently have asked, who, and where, this excellent Person was; and who more likely to tell them than he who had given them this general notice; No, they did not think that was any part of their business or concern; they came to molest John, not to receive any instructions from him: so that their ignorance was wilful; they might have known Christ, and would not.
Lastly. Notice is taken of the place where all this was done, (v. 28.) In Bethabara beyond Jordan. Bethabara signifies the house of passage: some think it was the very place where Israel passed over Jordan into the land of promise under the conduct of Joshua; there was opened the way into the gospel-state by Jesus Christ. It was at a great distance from some places where he was said to have baptized, because whatever he did there, would be least offensive to the government. Amos must go prophesy in the country, not near the court; but it was said that Jerusalem should put so far from her the things that belonged to her peace. He made this confession in the same place where he was baptizing; that all those who attended his baptism, might be witnesses of it, and none might say that they knew not what to make of him.

29. The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. 30. This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me: for he was before me. 31. And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. 32. And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. 33. And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. 34. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God. 35. Again, the next day after, John stood, and two of his disciples; 36. And looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God!

We have in these verses an account of John's testimony concerning Jesus Christ, which he witnessed to his own disciples that followed him. As soon as ever Christ was baptized, he was immediately hurried into the wilderness, to be tempted; there he was forty days; during his absence, John had continued to bear testimony to him, and to tell the people of him; but now at last, he sees Jesus coming to him, returning from the wilderness of temptation. As soon as that conflict was over, Christ presently returned to John, who was preaching and baptizing. Now Christ was tempted for example and encouragement to us; and this teaches us, 1. That the hardships of a tempted state should engage us to keep close to ordinances; to go into the sanctuary of God, Ps. 73. 17. Our combats with Satan should oblige us to keep close to the communion of saints; two are better than one. 2. That the honours of a victorious state must not engross us: our chief baptism, Christ's triumph over Satan, and been attended by angels, and yet, after all, he returns to the place where John was preaching and baptizing. As long as we are on this side heaven, whatever extraordinary visits of divine grace we may have here at any time, we must still keep close to the ordinary means of grace and comfort, and walk with God in them.

Now here are four testimonies borne by John to Christ, but those two agree in one.

1. Here is his testimony to Christ on the first day that he saw him coming from the wilderness; and here are four things are witnessed by him concerning Christ, when he had him before his eyes. 1. That he is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, v. 29. Let us learn here, (1.) That Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God, which speaks him the great Sacrifice, by whom atonement is made for sin, and man reconciled to God. Of all the sacrifices offered to the law, and even those legal sacrifices that were offered, not only because a lamb is an emblem of meekness, and Christ must be led as a lamb to the slaughter, (Isa. 53. 7,) but with a special reference, [1.] To the daily sacrifice, which was offered every morning and evening continually, and that was always a lamb, (Exod. 29. 38,) which was a type of Christ, as the everlasting redemption, whose blood continues to make atonement for sin, [2.] To the sprinkling of the blood of which, being sprinkled upon the door-posts, secured the Israelites from the stroke of the destroying angel. Christ is our Passover, 1 Cor. 5. 7.

He is the Lamb of God; he is appointed by him, (Rom. 3. 25,) he was devoted to him, (ch. 17. 19,) and he was accepted with him; in him he was well pleased. The Lamb which is set on the thing that was offered for a sin-offering, is called the Lord's Passover; (Lev. 16. 8, 9,) so Christ, who was to make atonement for sin, is called the Lamb of God.

(2.) That Jesus Christ, as the Lamb of God, takes away the sin of the world. This was his undertaking; he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, Heb. 9. 26. John Baptist had called him to take people to repentance, and in the name of him. Now here he shows how and by whom that remission was to be expected; what ground of hope have we that our sins shall be pardoned upon our repentance, though our repentance makes no satisfaction for them? This ground of hope we have—Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God.

[1.] He takes away sin. He, being Mediator between God and men, takes away that which is above any thing, offensive to the holiness of God, and destructive to the happiness of man. He came, First, To take away the guilt of sin by the merit of his death, to vacate the judgment, and reverse the attendant, which mankind lay under, by an act of indemnity, which all prudent, obedienciated believers may claim the benefit of. Secondly, To take away the power of sin by the Spirit of his grace, so that we shall not be led astray, as Rom. 14. 13. Christ, as the Lamb of God, washes us from our sins in his own blood; that is, he both justifies and sanctifies us: he takes away sin. He is a sinner—he is taking away the sin of the world, which speaks it not a single but a continued act; it is his constant work and office to take away sin, which is such a work of time, that it will never be completed till time shall be no more. He is always taking away sin, by the continual intercession of his blood in heaven, and the continual influence of his grace on earth.

[2.] He takes away the sin of the world; purchases pardon for all those that repent, and believe the gospel, of what country, nation, or language, soever they be. The legal sacrifices had reference only to the sins of Israel, to make atonement for them; but the Lamb of God was offered to be a Propitiation for the sin of the whole world; see 1 John 2. 12. This is encouraging to our faith; it Christ takes away the sin of the world, then why not my sin? Christ levelled his force at the main body of sin's army, struck at the root, and aimed at the overthrow, of that wickedness which the whole world lay in. God was in him reconciling the world to himself.

Lev. 16. 21. God could have taken away the sin, by taking away the sinner, as he took away the sin of the old world; but he has found out a way of abolishing the sin, and yet sparing the sinner, by making his Son Sin for us.

(3.) That it is our duty, with an eye of faith, to behold the Lamb of God thus taking away the sin of the world. See him taking away sin, and let that increase our hatred of sin, and resolutions against it. Let us not hold that fast, which the Lamb of God came to take away: for Christ will either take our sins away, or take us away. Let it increase our love to Christ, who loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, Rev. 1. 5. Whatever God is pleased to take away from us, if withal he take away our sins, we have reason to be thankful, and have no reason to complain.

2. That this was he of whom he had spoken before; (p. 36, 31.) This is he, this Person whom I now point at, you see where he stands, this is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man. Observe, (1.) This honour John had above all the prophets, that his lot should be with the Messiah; but when he came, he saw him already come. This is he. He sees him now, he sees him nigh, Num. 24. 17. Such a difference there is between present faith and future vision. Now we love one whom we have not seen, then we shall see him whom our souls love; shall see him, and say, This is he of whom I said, my Lord, and my God; and my Friend, and my Brother, Jer. 23. 5. 6. (2.) John calls Christ a Man; after me comes a Man—ing, a strong man; like the Man, the Branch, or the Man of God's right hand. (3.) He refers himself to what he had said of him before; This is he of whom I said. Note, Those who have said the most honourable things of Christ, will never see cause to unsay them; but, the more they know him, the more they are confirmed in their esteem of him. John still thinks as meanly of himself, and as highly of Christ, as ever. Though Christ appeared not in any external pomp or grandeur, yet John is not ashamed to own, This is he I meant, that is preferred before me. And it was necessary that John should thus show them the Person, otherwise they could not have believed that one who made so mean a figure, should be he of whom John had spoken so excellently.

(4.) He protests against any con Federacy or combination with this Jesus; And I knew him not. Though there was some relation between them, (Elizabeth was cousin to the Virgin Mary,) yet there was no acquaintance at all between them; John had no personal knowledge of Jesus till he saw him come to his baptism. Their manner of life had been different; John had spent his time in the wildness, in solitude, and in the contemplation of things, and the knowledge of the world. There was no correspondence, there were no interviews between them; that the matter might appear to be wholly carried on by the direction and disposal of Heaven, and not by any design or concurrence of the persons themselves. And as he hereby disavows all collusion, so also all partiality and sinister regard, in it; he could not be supposed to favour him as a friend, because he was a friend to him. But John exhibited this confession of similarity between them. Nay, as he could not be biassed to speak honourably of him, because he was a stranger to him, so, really being such a stranger to him, he was not able to say any thing of him but what he received from above, to which he appeals, ch. 3. 27. Note, They who are taught, believe and confess one whom they have not seen, and blessed are they that have not believed.

(5.) The great intention of John's ministry and baptism was, to introduce Jesus Christ. That he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. Observe, [1] Though John did not know Jesus by face, yet he knew that he should be made manifest. Note We may know the certainty of that which yet we do not fully know the nature and intention of. We know that the happiness of heaven shall be made manifest to Israel; but we cannot describe it. By this general doctrine John had, that Christ should be made manifest, served to carry him with diligence and resolution through his work, though he was kept in the dark concerning particulars; Therefore I came. Our assurance of the reality of things, though they are unseen, is enough to quicken us to our work. [2.] John reveals himself to his people by degrees. At first he calls him the Lamb of God, then he should be made manifest; and in the end of that, he came baptizing, and now he is favoured with a sight of him. They who, upon God's word, believe what they do not see, shall shortly see what they now believe. [3.] The ministry of the word and sacraments is designed for no other end than to lead people to Christ, and to make him more and more manifest. [4.] Baptism with water made way for the baptism of the Spirit. Jesus is supposed to have taken away corruption and filthiness, and signified our cleansing by him who is the Fountain opened.

3. That this was he upon whom the Spirit descended from heaven like a dove. For the confirming of his testimony concerning Christ, he here invokes the extraordinary appearance of his baptism, in which God himself bore witness to him. This was an undeniable proof of Christ's mission. Now, to assure us of the truth of it, we are bidden, (p. 52, 53.)

(1.) That John Baptist saw it; he bare record; did not relate it as a story, but solemnly attested it, with all the seriousness and solemnity of witness-bearing. He made affidavit of it; I saw the Spirit descending from heaven. John could not see the Spirit, but he saw the dove, which was a sign and representation of the Spirit. The Spirit came now upon Christ, both to make him fit for his work, and to make him known to the world. Christ was notified, not by the descent of a crown upon him, or by a transfiguration, but by the descent of the Spirit as a dove upon him, to qualify him for his undertaking. Thus the first testimony given to the apostles was by the descent of the Spirit upon them. God's children are as新的一s to their instruction, as the children of men are to their instruction. Their seeds are reserved for their future state. Observe, [1.] The Spirit descended from heaven, for every good and perfect gift is from above. [2.] He descended like a dove—an emblem of meekness, and mildness, and gentleness, which makes him fit to teach. The dove brought the olive-branch of peace, Gen. 8. 11. [3.] The Spirit that descended upon Christ, abode upon him, as was foretold, Isa. 11. 2. The Spirit did not move him at times, as Simon, (Judg. 13. 25.) but at all times. The Spirit was given to him without measure; it was his prerogative to have the Spirit always upon him, so that he could at no time he found either unqualified for his work himself, or unfurnished for the supply of these that see to him for his grace.

2.) That he was hidden to expect it, which very much confounded his enemies. It was not John's bare conjecture, that surely he on whom he saw the Spirit descending, was the Son of God; but it was an instituted sign given him before, by which he might know it for certain; (p. 33.) I knew him not. This he insists much upon, that he knew no more of him than other people did, otherwise than by revelation. But he that sent me to baptize, gave me this sign, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descend, the same is he.

was in public, as Paul's was, Acts 20. 20, 21. It is good to have that repeated, which we have heard, Phil. 3. 1. The doctrine of Christ's sacrifice for the taking away of the sin of the world, ought especially to be insisted upon by all good ministers; Christ, the Lamb of God, Christ and him crucified.

3. He intended this especially for his two disciples that stood with him; he was willing to turn them over to Christ, for to this end he bore witness to Christ in their hearing, that they might leave all to follow him, even that they might leave him. He did not reckon that he lost those disciples who went over from him to Christ, any more than the schoolmaster reckoned that scholarlast whom he sends to the university. John gathered disciples not for himself, but for Christ, to prepare them for the Lord, Luke 1. 17. So far was he from being jealous of Christ's growing interest, that there was nothing he was more desirous of. Humble, generous souls will give others their due praise without fear of diminishing themselves by it. What we have of reputation, as well as of other things, will not be the less for our giving every body their own.

37. And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus. 38. Then Jesus turned, and saw them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye? They said unto him, Rabbi, (which is to say, being interpreted, Master,) where dwellest thou? 39. He saith unto them, Come and see. They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day: for it was about the tenth hour. 40. One of the two which heard John speak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. 41. He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messiah, which is, being interpreted, The Christ. 42. And he brought him to Jesus. And when Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Cephas, which is, by interpretation, A stone.

We have here the turning over of two disciples from John to Jesus, and one of them fetching in a third, and these are the first fruits of Christ's disciples; see how small the church was in its beginnings, and what the dawning of the day of its great things was.

1. Andrew and another with him were the two that John Baptist had directed to Christ, v. 37. Who the other was, we are not told; some think that it was Thomas, comparing ch. 21. 2. others, that it was John himself, the penman of this gospel, whose manner it is industriously to conceal his name, ch. 15. 23. and 20. 3.

1. Here is their readiness to go over to Christ; they heard John speak of Christ as the Lamb of God, and they followed Jesus. Probably they had heard John say the same thing the day before, and then it had not the effect upon them which now it had; see the benefit of repetition, and of private personal converse. They heard him speak of Christ as the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world, and made them follow him. Note. The strongest and most prevailing argument with a sensible awakened soul to follow Christ, is, that it is he, and only, that takes away sin.

2. The kind notice Christ took of them, v. 50. They came behind him; but, though he had his back toward them, he was soon aware of them, and turned, and saw them following. Note, Christ takes early cognizance of the first motions of a soul toward him, and the first step taken in the way to heaven; see Isa. 64. 5. Luke 15. 20. He did not stay till they begged leave to speak with him, but spoke first. What communion there is between a soul and Christ, it is he that begins the discourse. He saith unto them, What seek ye? This was not a reprimand for their boldness in intruding into his company; he that came to seek us, never checked any for seeking him; but, on the contrary, it is a kind invitation of them into his acquaintance, whom he saw bashful and modest: Come, what have you to say to me? What would you tell me about me? Note, They whose business it is to instruct people in the affairs of their souls, should be humble, and mild, and easy of access, and should encourage those that apply to them. The question Christ put to them is, what we should all put to ourselves when we begin to follow Christ, and take upon us the profession of his holy religion; "What seek ye? What do you design and desire?" These that follow Christ, and yield him the obedience of their consciences, deal with themselves, What seek we in seeking Christ, do we seek a Teacher, Ruler, and Reconciler? In following Christ, do we seek the favour of God and eternal life? If our eye be single in this, we are full of light. 3. Their modest inquiry concerning the place of his abode: Rabbi, where dwellest thou? (1.) In calling him Rabbi, they intimate that their design in coming to him was, to be taught by him; rabbi signifies master, a teaching master; the Jews called their doctors, or learned men, rabbies. The word comes from rab, maltus, or magus, a rabbi, a great man, and one that, as we say, hath much in him. Never was there such a rabbi as our Lord Jesus; such a great one, in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. These came to Christ, to receive instruction; it is possible some of them that are next to themselves. John had told them that he was the Lamb of God; now this Lamb's worthy to take the book, and open the seals as a rabbi, Rev. 5. 9. And unless we give up ourselves to be ruled and taught by him, we will not take away our sins. (2.) In asking where he dwelt, they intimate a desire to be better acquainted with him. Christ was a Stranger in this country, so that they mean, where was his inn where he lodged, for there they would attend him at some seasonable time when he should appoint, to receive instruction from him; they would not press rudely upon him, when it was not proper. Civility and good manners will become those who follow Christ. And besides, they hoped to have more from him than they could have in a short conference now by the way. They resolved to make a business, not a by-business, of conversing with Christ. Those that have come to Christ for information, let them come with a constant but desire. [1.] A further communion with him; they follow on to know more of him. [2.] A fixed communion with him; where they might sit down at his feet, and abide by his instructions. It is not enough to take a turn with Christ now and then, but we must lodge with him. 4. The courteous invitation Christ gave them to his lodgings; He saith unto them, Come, and see. They were not invited to lodge with him, but to begin a communion with him; he designed to recommend him to the esteem and affection of his followers. Note, That they would come, and see, was, that they come and see what a mean lodging I have, what poor accommodations I take up with, that you may not expect any worldly advantage by following me, as they did who made their court to the scribes and Pharisees, and called them Rabbi. Come, and see what you must commit upon you if you follow me. See Matth. 6. 20. (2.) He invites them to come positively and with a fixed determination. They asked him where he lodged, that they might not wait upon him at a more convenient season; but Christ invites them immediately to come, and see; never in better time than now. Hence learn, (1.) As to others, that it is best taking people when they are in a good mind; strike while the iron is hot. (2.) As to ourselves, that it is wisdom to embrace the present opportunities; Now is the accepted time. 2 Cor. 6. 2. Is. 55. 6. 5. Their cheerful and (nondoubt) thankful acceptance of his invitation: They came, and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day. It had been more modesty and manners than had done them good if they had refused this offer. (1.) They readily went along with him; They came, and saw where he dwelt. Gracious souls cheerfully accept Christ's gracious invitations; as David, Ps. 27. 8. They inquired no farther about him, who was acquainted with him, but would put that to the venture, and make the best of what they found. It is good being where Christ is, wherever it be. (2.) They were so well pleased with what they found, that they abode with him that day; ("Master, it is good to be here") and he bid them welcome. It was about the tenth hour. Some think that John reckons according to the Roman computation, and that it was about three o'clock in the afternoon; others think it was four o'clock in the afternoon, and they abode with him that night and the next day. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that this next day that they spent with Christ, was a Sabbath-day, and, being late, they could not get home before dusk; but it is either that they were too sociable, or too intent on the discovery of a new place, to contrive to spend the Sabbath as much as may be to our spiritual benefit and advantage; so that they are blessed, who, by the lively exercises of faith, love, and devotion, spend their Sabbath days in communion with Christ. These are Lord's days indeed, days of the Son of man. 11. Andrew brought his brother Peter to Christ. If Peter had been the first-born of Christ's disciples, the Papists would have made a puissant show. He indeed afterward came to be more eminent in gifts, but Andrew had the honour first to be acquainted with Christ, and to be the instrument of bringing Peter to him. Observe, 1. The information which Andrew gave to Peter, with an intention to come to Christ. (1.) He found him; He first finds his own brother Simon; his finding implies his seeking of him. Andrew, along with Peter, was called to the ministry and baptism, and Andrew knew where to look for him. Perhaps the other disciple that was with him, went out to seek some friend of his at the same time, but Andrew sped first; He first findeth Simon, who came only to attend on John, but has his expectations out-done, he meets with Jesus. (2.) He told him whom they had found; We have found the Messiah, which was more than had yet been said. John had said, He is the Lamb of God, and the Son of God, which Andrew compares with the scriptures of the Old Testament, and comparing them together, concludes that he is the Messiah promised to the fathers; for it is now that the fulness of time is come. Thus, by making God's testimonies his meditation, he speaks more clearly concerning Christ than ever his teacher had done, Ps. 119. 99.

I. The Lamb of God.

1. He brought to Jesus; would not undertake to instruct him himself, but brought him to the Fountain-head, persuaded him to come to Christ, and introduced him. Now this was, [1.] An instance of true love to his brother, his own brother, so he is called here, because he was very dear to him. Note, We ought with a particular concern and application, to endeavour the spiritual welfare of our own, as David is called to be a partaker of his felicity for the relation of his more dear.

2. It was an effect of his day's conversation with Christ. Note, The best evidence of our profiting by the means of grace, is, the piety and usefulness of our conversation afterward. Hereby it appeared that Andrew had been with Jesus, that he was so full of him, that he had been with his father for his face, and that he knew there was enough in Christ for all; and, having tasted that he is gracious, could not rest till those he loved had tasted it too. Note, True grace hates monopolies, and loves not to eat its morsels alone.

2. The entertainment which Jesus Christ gave to Peter, who was never the less welcome for being influenced by his brother to come, v. 42. Observe, (1.) Christ called him by his name; When Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Jona. It should seem that Peter was utterly a stranger to Christ, and if so, [1.] It was a proof of Christ's omniscience, that, upon the first sight, without any inquiry, he could tell the name both of him and of his father. The Lord knows them that are his, and their whole case. However, [2.] It was an instance of his condescending grace and favour, that he did thus freely and ably call him by his name, though he was of mean extraction, and vir nullius nominis—an obscure man. It was an instance of God's favour to Moses, that he knew him by name, Exod. 33. 17. Some observe the signification of these names, Simon—obedient, Jona—a dove. An obedient, dove-like spirit qualifies us to be the disciples of Christ. (2.) He gave him a new name; Cephas. [1.] His giving of him a name, speaks Christ's favour to him. A new name speaks some great dignity, Rev. 2. 17. Isa. 62. 2. By this Christ not only wiped off the reproach of his mean and obscure parentage, but adopted him into his family as one of his own. [2.] The name which he gave him, speaks his fitness to Christ. Thou shalt be called Cephas, that is Hebrew for a stone; which is by interpretation Peter; so it should be rendered, as Acts 9. 40. Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas; the former Hebrew, the latter Greek, for a young roe. Peter's natural temper was stiff, and hardly, and resolute, which I take to be the principal reason why Christ called him Cephas—a stone. When Christ afterward prayed for him, that his faith might not fail, that so he might have power over his own flesh, and at the same time bid him strengthen his brethren, and lay out himself for the support of others, then he made him what he here called him, Cephas—a stone. Those that come to Christ, must come with a fixed resolution to be firm and constant to him, like a stone, solid and steadfast; and it is by his grace that they are so. His saying, Be thou steady, makes them so. Now this does no more prove that Peter was the singular or only rock upon which this church is built, than the calling of James and John, Boanerges, proves them the only sons of thunder; or the calling of Joses, Barnabas, proves them the only sons of consolation.

43. The day following Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me. 44. Now Philip was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter. 45. Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph. 46. And Nathanael said unto him, Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, Come and see. 47. Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and saith of him, Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile! 48. Nathanael saith unto him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus answered and said unto him, Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee. 49. Nathanael answered and said unto him, Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. 51. And be saith unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man.

We have here the call of Philip and Nathanael. I. Philip was called immediately to Christ himself not as Andrew, who was directed to Christ by John, or Peter, who was invited by his brother. God has various methods of bringing his chosen ones home to himself. But, whatever means he uses, he is not tied to any. 1. Philip was called in a preventing way; Jesus findeth Philip. Christ sought us, and found us, before we made any inquiries after him. The name Philip is of a Greek original, and much used among the Gentiles, which some make an instance of the degeneracy of the Jewish church at this time, and their conformity to the nations; yet Christ changed not his name. 2. He was called the day following. See how closely Christ applied him to his business. When work is to be done for God, we must not lose a day. Yet observe, Christ now called one or two a day; but, after the Spirit was poured out, there were thousands a day effectually called, in which was fulfilled ch. 14. 12. 3. Jesus would go forth into Galilee, to call him. Christ will find out all those that are given to him, wherever they are, and none of them shall be lost. 4. He was brought to be not by the power of Christ going along with that word, Follow me. See the nature of true christianity; it is following Christ, devoting ourselves to his converse and conduct, attending his motions and treading in his steps. See the efficacy of the grace of Christ making the call of his word to prevail; it is the rod of his strength.

4. We are told that Philip was of Bethsaida, and Andrew and Peter were so too, v. 44. These eminent disciples received not their honour from, but reflected honour upon the place of their nativity. Bethsaida signifies the house of nets, because inhabited mostly by fishermen; thence Christ chose disciples, who were to be furnished with extraordinary gifts, and therefore needed not the ordinary advantages of rank. Observe, 2. Bethsaida was a wicked place. (Matt. 11. 21.) yet even there was a remnant, according to the election of grace.

11. Nathanael was invited to Christ by Philip, and much is said concerning him. In which we may observe,

1. What passed between Philip and Nathanael, in which appears an observable mixture of pious zeal with weakness, such as is usually found in beginners that are yet but asking the way to Zion. Here is,

(1.) The joyful news that Philip brought to Nathanael, v. 45. As Andrew before, so Philip here, having got some knowledge of Christ himself, rests not till he has made manifest the savour of that knowledge. Philip, though newly come to an acquaintance with Christ himself, yet steps aside to seek Nathanael. Note, When we have the fairest opportunities of getting good to our own souls, yet even then we must seek opportunities of doing good to the souls of others; remembering the words of Christ, It is more blessed to give than to receive. Acts 20. 35. O, saith Philip, we have found him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. Observe here,

[1.] What a transport of joy Philip was in, upon this new acquaintance with Christ, "We have found him! we have found him." He was so often talked of, so often wished and waited for; at last, he is come, he is come, and we have found him!" [2.] What an advantage it was to him, that he was so well acquainted with the scriptures of the Old Testament, which prepared his mind for the reception of evangelical light, and made the entrance of it much the more easy; him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. What is written entirely and from eternity in the book of the Psalms, is here, as it were, a part, at some times and in divers manners, copied out into the book of the divine revelations. Glorious things were written there concerning the Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham, Shiloh, the Prophet like Moses, the Son of David, Emmanuel, the Man, the Branch, Messiah, the Prince. Philip had studied these things, and was full of them, which made him readily perceive the divine hand in what others did not. It is not, as a woman's iniquity, a woman's folly, or a woman's error. Where is a woman's heart, there is a woman's heart, and that woman's heart is a heart of unbelief. Philip was sufficiently satisfied with the personal knowledge of Christ, he was so right sure of that which he saw and knew; and yet he was ignorant of the matter of fact, that this Jesus was born at Bethlehem; so that the manner Philip made, in calling him Jesus of Nazareth, occasioned this objection. Note, The mistakes of preachers often give rise to the prejudices of hearers.

(2.) The short reply which Philip gave to this objection; Come and see. [1.] It was his weakness, that he could not give a satisfactory answer to it; for it is the common case of young beginners in religion. We may know enough to satisfy ourselves, and yet not be able to say enough to silence the cavils of a subtle adversary. [2.] It was his wisdom and zeal, that, when he could not answer the objection himself, he would have him go to one that could; Come, and see. Let us not stand arguing here, and raising difficulties to ourselves, which we cannot get rid of; let us set our steps with Christ himself, and these difficulties will all vanish presently. (Note, It is folly to spend that time in doubtful disputations, which might be better spent, and to much better purpose, in the exercises of piety and devotion. Come, and see; not, Go, and see, but, "Come, and I will go along with thee?" as Isa. 2. 3. Jer. 50. 5. From this parable between Philip and Nathanael, we may observe, First, That many people are kept from the ways of religion by the unreasonable pre-judices they have conceived against religion, particularly, on the account of some foreign circumstances which do not at all touch the merits of the case. Secondly, The best way to remove the prejudices they have entertained against religion, is, to prove themselves, and make trial of it. Let us not answer this matter before we hear it.

2. What passed between Nathanael and our Lord Jesus. He came, and sought not in vain. (1.) Our Lord Jesus bore a very honourable testimony to Nathanael's integrity; Jesus saw him coming, and met him with favourable encouragement; he said of him to those about him, Nathanael himself being within hearing, Behold an Israelite indeed. Observe,

[1.] That he commended him; not to flatter him, or puff him up with a good conceit of himself, but perhaps because he knew him to be a meek man, not a melancholy man, one that had hard and mean thoughts of himself, was ready to doubt his own sincerity; and Christ by his testimony put the matter out of doubt. Nathanael had, more than any of the candidates, objected against Christ; but Christ hereby showed that he excused it, and was not extreme to mark what he said amiss, because he knew how his heart was upright. He did not retort upon him, Cau and Israelitica pro inculte, as he did to some (Mark 2. 2.) an obscure town in Galilee? But kindly gives him this character, to encourage us to hope for acceptance with Christ, notwithstanding our weakness, and to teach us to speak honourably of those who without cause have spoken slightly of us, and to give them their due praise.

[2.] That he commended him for his integrity, Ye, a man among Israelites indeed. It is Christ's prerogative to know what men are indeed; we can but hope the best. The whole nation were Israelites in name, but all are not Israel that are of Israel; (Rom. 9. 6.) here, however, was an Israelite indeed. 1. A sincere follower of the good example of Israel, whose character it was, that he was a plain man, in opposition to Sani's character of a cunning man. He was a genuine son of honest Jacob, not only of the name, but of the nature. A sincere professor of the faith of Israel; he was true to the religion he professed, and lived up to it; he was really as good as he seemed, and his practice was a piece with his profession. He is the Jew, that is one inwardly. (Rom. 2. 29.) so is he the Christian. Secondly, He is one in whom is no guile—that is the character of an Israelite indeed, a Christian indeed; no guile toward men; a man without trick or design; a man that one may trust; no guile toward God, that is, sincere in his repentance for sin, sin cere in his covenanting with God, in whose spirit is no guile, Ps. 32. 2. He does not say, without guilt, but, without guile. Though in many things he is foolish and forgetful, yet in nothing false, nor wickedly departing from God: there is no allowed, approved guilt in him; not painted, though he have his spots; "Behold this Israel indeed: 1. Take it not unto you, to make a league with the king, 2. to be like him." 2. "Admire him; behold and wonder." The hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees had so leavened the Jewish church and nation, and their religion was so degenerated into formality or state-policy, that an Israelite indeed was a man wondered at: a miracle of divine grace, like Job, ch. 1. 8.

[1.] Here is Nathanael's modesty, in that he was soon put out of countenance at the kind notice Christ was pleased to take of him; "Whence knowest thou me, that art an unworthy of thy cognizance, who am I, O Lord God?" 2 Sam. 7. 18. This was an evidence of his sincerity, that he was not caught out of the oracles of God, as he desired it. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves; we know not what is in a man's heart by looking in his face, but all things are naked and open before Christ, Heb. 4. 13. Doth Christ know us? Let us covet to know him.[2.]

[2.] Here is Christ's further manifestation of himself to him; Before Philip called thee, I saw thee. First, He gives him an instance which shows that he knew him, and so manifests his divinity. It is God's prerogative infallibly to know all persons and all things; by this Christ proved himself to be God upon many occasions. It was prophesied concerning the Messiah that he should be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, that is, in judging the sincerity and degree of the fear of God in others, and that he should not judge after the sight of his eyes, Isa. 11. 2. Here he answers that prediction. See 2 Tim. 2. 19.

Secondly, That before Philip called him, he saw him under the fig-tree; this manifests a particular kindness for him. 1. His eye was toward him before Philip called him, which was the first time that ever Nathanael was acquainted with Christ. Christ has knowledge of us before we have any knowledge of him. Isaiah 4. 4. Gal. 4. 9. 2. His eye was upon him when he was under the fig-tree; this was a private token which nobody understood but Nathanael; "When thou wast retired under the fig-tree in thy garden, and thoughtest that no eye saw thee, I had then mine eye upon thee, and saw that which was very acceptable." It is most probable that Nathanael under the fig-tree was employed, as Isaac in the field, in meditation, and prayer, in communion with God. Perhaps then and there it was that he solemnly joined himself to the Lord in an inviolable covenant. Christ saw in secret, and by this public notice of it did in part reward him openly. Sitting under the fig-tree notes quietness and composedness of spirit, which much befitted communion with God. See Mic. 4. 4. Zech. 3. 10. Nathanael the friend of Israel, and that, like Israel, he was treated with God alone, (Gen. 32. 24.) prayed, not like the hypocrites, in the corners of the streets, but under the fig-tree.

(3.) Nathanael hereby obtained a full assurance of faith in Jesus Christ, expressed in that noble acknowledgment, (v. 49.) Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel: that is, in short, the assurance of faith, The Messiah.

[1.] How firmly he believed with the heart. Though he had lately laboured under some prejudices concerning Christ, they were now all vanished. Now, The grace of God, in working faith, casts down imaginations. Now he asks no more, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? For he believes Jesus of Nazareth to be the Chief Good, and embraceth him accordingly.

[2.] How freely he confessed with the mouth. His confession is made in form of an adoration, directed to our Lord Jesus himself; which is a proper way of acknowledging and reverencing him. As Nathanael confesses Christ's prophesied office, in calling him Rabbi, a title which the Jews commonly gave to their teachers. Christ is the great Rabbi, at whose feet we must all be brought up. Secondly, He confesses his divine nature and mission, in calling him the Son of God; (that Son of God spoken of Ps. 2. 7.) though he had but a human form and aspect, yet, having a divine knowledge, the kindred of the heart, and of things distant and secret, from thence he concludes him to be the Son of God. Thirdly, He confesses, Thou art the King of Israel; that King of Israel whom we have been long waiting for. It he be the Son of God, he is King of the Israel of God. Nathanael hereby proves himself an Israelite indeed, that he so readily owns and submissively conforms to the title of the Lord Jesus.

(4.) Christ hereupon raises the hopes and expectations of Nathanael to something further and greater than all this, v. 50. 51. Christ is very tender of young converts, and will encourage good beginnings, though weak, Matth. 12. 20.

[1.] He here signifieth his acceptance, and (it should seem) his admiration, of the ready faith of Nathanael, and promises to him further manifestation of himself, especially to be a witness for him. Note, 1. To him that hath, and maketh good use of what he hath, more shall be given. 2. Those who truly believe the gospel, will find its evidences grow upon them, and will see more and more cause to believe it. 3. Whatever discoveries Christ is pleased to make of himself to his people while they are here in this world, he hath still greater things than these to make known to them; a glory yet further to be revealed.

Secondly, In particular; Not thou only, but we, all ye my disciples, whose faith this is intended for the confirmation of, ye shall see heaven opened; that is more than telling Nathanael of his being under the fig-tree. This is introduced with a solemn preface, Verily, verily I say unto you. This command both a fixed attention to what is said as being very weighty, and a full assent to it, as undoubtedly true; I say it, whose word you may rely upon, amen, amen. None used this word at the beginning of a sentence but Christ, though the Jews often used it at the close of a prayer, and sometimes doubled it. It is a solemn asseveration. Christ is called the Amen, (Rev. 3. 14.) and so some take it here, I the Amen, the Amen, say unto you. I the faithful Witness. Note, The assurances we have of the glory to be revealed, are built upon the word of Christ. Note, What it is that Christ assures them of: Peace, even as within a house, or long, or from henceforth, ye shall see heaven opened.

1. It is a mean title that Christ here takes to himself; the Son of man; a title frequently applied to him in the gospel, but always by himself. Nathanachad called him the Son of God, and King of Israel: he calls himself Son of man. 1. To express his humility in the midst of the honours done him. 2. To teach his humility, which is to be believed as well as his divinity. 3. To intimate his present state of humiliation, that Nathanael might not expect this King of Israel to appear in external pomp. 4. to show that he was of those who were mediators; ye shall see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man. 1. Some understand it literally, as pointing at some particular event. Father, 1. There was some vision of Christ's glory, in which this was exactly fulfilled, which Nathanael was an eye witness of, as Peter and James and John were of his transfiguration. There were many things which were not written, and these in the presence of his disciples, which were not written; ch. 20. 30. and why not that? Or, 2. It was fulfilled in the many ministrations of the angels to our Lord Jesus, especially that at his ascension, when heaven was opened to receive him, and the angels ascended and descended, to attend him, and to do him honour, and this in the sight of the disciples. Christ's ascension was the great proof of his mission, and much confirmed the faith of his disciples, ch. 6. 6. 7. Or, 2. It may refer to Christ's second coming, to judge the world, when the heavens shall be open, and every eye shall see him, and the angels of God shall ascend and descend about him as attendants on him, everyone employed; and a busy day it will be. See 2 Thess. 1. 10. 2. Others take it figuratively, as speaking of a state or series of things to commence from his ascension onward; and so we may understand it. (1.) Christ's miracles. Nathanael believed, because Christ, as the prophets of old, could tell him things secret; but what is this? Christ is now beginning a dispensation of miracles, much more great and strange than this, as if heaven were opened; and such a power shall be exerted by the Son of man, as if the angels, which excel in strength, were continually attending his orders. Immediately after this, Christ began to work miracles, ch. 2. 11. Of his mediators, and that blessed intercourse which he hath settled between heaven and earth, which his disciples should by degrees be led into the mystery of. 1. By Christ, as Mediator, they shall see heaven opened, that we may enter into the holiest by his blood; (Heb. 10. 19. 20.) heaven opened, that by faith we may look in, and at length may go in; a man may now behold the glory of our Lord and himself ascend to heaven as his, the Church's, and God's, Lord. And, 2. They shall see angels ascending and descending upon the Son of man. Through Christ we have communion with, and benefit by, the holy angels, and things in heaven and things on earth are reconciled and gathered together. Christ is to us as Jacob's ladder, (Gen. 28. 12.) by whom angels continually ascend and descend for the good of the saints.

CHAP. III.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, we had an account of the first disciples whom Jesus called, Andrew and Peter, Philip and Nathanael, these were the first fruits to God and to the Lamb, Rev. 14. 4. Now in this chapter, we have, 1. The account of the first miracle which Jesus wrought—turning water into wine, at Cana of Galilee, (v. 1-11.) and his appearing at Capernaum, v. 12-17. 2. The account of the first passover he kept at Jerusalem after he began his public ministry; his driving of the buyers and sellers out of the temple; (v. 13. 14.) and the sign he gave to them, and the miracles he did after, v. 22. 23. an account of some almost believers, that followed him, thereupon, for some time, (v. 23. 25.) but he knew them too well to put any confidence in them.

1. And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jesus was there. 2. And both Jesus was called, and his disciples, to the marriage. 3. And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, They have no wine. 4. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come. 5. His mother saith unto the servants, Whatever he saith unto you, do it. 6. And there were set there six water-pots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece. 7. Jesus saith unto them, Fill the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim. 8. And he saith unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it. 9. When the master of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was, (but the servants which drew the water knew,) the governor of the feast called the bridegroom. 10. And saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now. 11. This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory; and his disciples believed on him.

We have here the story of Christ's miraculous converting of water into wine, at a marriage in Cana of Galilee. There were some few so well disposed as to believe in Christ, and to follow him, when he did this miracle; yet it was not likely that many should be wrought upon till he had something wherewith to answer those that asked, What sign showest thou? He could have wrought miracles before, could have made them the common actions of his life, and the common entertainments of his friends; but miracles being designed for the sacred and solemn seals of his doctrine, he began not to work any till he began to preach his doctrine. Now observe, 1. The occasions of this miracle. Maimonides observes it to be to the honour of Moses, that all the signs he did in the wilderness, he did upon necessity; we needed food, he brought us manna, and so did Christ. Observe, 2. The time; the third day after he came into Galilee. The evangelist keeps a journal of occurrences, for no day passed without something extraordinary occurring. This was on the third day, and it turned up in his time better than his servants do, and never lay down at night complaining, as the Roman emperor did, that he had lost a day. 2. The place; it was at Cana in Galilee, in the tribe of Asher, (Jos. 19. 28.) of which, before, it was said that he shall yield royal dainties, Gen. 49. 20. Christ began to work miracles in an obscure corner of the country, remote from Jerusalem, which was the public scene of action, to show that he sought not honour from men, (ch. 5. 41.) but would put honour upon the lowly. His doctrine and miracles would not be so much opposed by the plain honest Galileans as they would be by the proud and prejudiced rabbins, politicians, and grandees, at Jerusalem. 3. The occasion itself was a marriage; probably, one or both of the parties were a-kim to our Lord Jesus. The mother of Jesus is said to be there, and not to be called, as Jesus and his disciples were, which intimates that she was there as one at home. Observe the honour which Christ hereby put upon the ordinance of marriage, that he graced the solemnity of it, not only with his presence, but with his first miracle; because it was instituted and blessed in innocency, because by it he would still seek a godly seed, because it resembles the mystical union between him and his church, and because he foresaw that in the papal kingdom, while the marriage-ceremony would be unduly dignified, and advanced into a sacrament, the marriage state would be unduly vilified, as inconsistent with any sacred function. There was a marriage—spons, a marriage-feast, to grace the solemnity. Marriages were usually celebrated with festivities, (Gen. 29. 22. Judg. 14. 10.) in token of joy and friendly respect, and for the confirming of love.

4. Christ and his mother and disciples were principal guests at this entertainment; The mother of Jesus (that was her most honourable title) was there; no mention being made of Joseph, we conclude he was dead before this. Jesus was called, and he came, accepted the invitation, and feasted with them. He taught us to be respectful to our relations, and sociable with them, though they be mean. Christ was to come in a way different from that of John Baptist, who came neither eating nor drinking, Mat. 11. 18, 19. It is the wisdom of the prudent to study how to improve conversation rather than how to decline it.

There was a marriage, and Jesus was called.

Note, (1.) It is very desirable, when there is a marriage to have Jesus Christ present at it; to have his spiritual, gracious presence, to have the marriage owned and blessed by him, the marriage is then honourable indeed; and they that marry in the Lord, (1 Cor. 7. 39.) do not marry without him. (2.) They that would have Christ with them at their marriage, must invite him by prayer; that is the messenger that must be sent to heaven for him; and he will come; Thou shalt call, and I will answer. And he will turn the water into wine.

The disciples also were invited, those five whom he had called, ch. 1. for as yet he had no more; they were his family, and were invited with him. They had thrown themselves upon his care, and they soon find, though he had no wealth, he had good friends. Note, (1.) Those that follow Christ, shall feast with him; they shall feed among bears, and lions, shall walk as if they were not there, and yet shall there be a servant of them. (2.) Love to Christ is testified by a love to those that are his, for his sake; our goodness extendeth not to him, but to the saints. Calvin observes how generous the maker of the feast was, though he seems to be but of small substance, to invite four or five strangers more than he thought of, because they were followers of Christ, who see our sufficiency in Christ, in his grace and liberality, and true friendship, in the conversation of some meaner persons than among many of higher rank.

II. The miracle itself. In which observe, 1. They wanted wine, v. 3. (1.) There was want at a feast; though much was provided, yet all was spent. While we are in this world we sometimes find ourselves in straits, even then when we think ourselves well provided; though the alms of our sufferings are always spending, perhaps all is spent ere we are aware. (2.) There was want at a marriage-feast.

Note, They who, being married, are come to care for things of the world, must expect trouble in the flesh, and count upon disappointment. (3.) It should seem, the occasion of this want, was, Christ and his disciples, because there was more company than they expected when the provision was made; but they who straiten themselves for Christ, shall not lose by him.

2. The mother of Jesus solicited him to assist her friends in this strait. We are told (v. 5.) what passed between Christ and his mother upon this occasion.

(1.) She acquaints him with the plunge they were at. (v. 3.) She saith unto him, They have no wine. Some think that she did not so much as intone the miraculous supply, (he having as yet wrought no miracle,) but that she would have him make some decent excuse to the company, and make the best of it to save the bridegroom's reputation, and keep him in countenance; or (as Calvin suggests) would have him make up the want of wine with some holy, profitable discourse. But, most probably, she looked for a miracle: for she knew he was appearing as the great Prophet, like unto Moses, who so often seasonably supplied the wants of Israel; and though this was his first public miracle, perhaps he had sometimes relieved her and her husband in their low estate. The bridegroom might have sent out for more wine, but she was for going to the Fountain-head.

Note, (1.) We ought to be concerned for our wants and straits, and seek our own this way only. (2.) In our own and our friends' straits it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to Christ by prayer. (3.) In our addresses to Christ, we must not prescribe to him, but humbly spread our case before him, and then refer ourselves to him to do as he pleases.

(2.) He gave her a reprimand for it, for he saw more amiss in it than we do, else he had not treated it so.

Here is, (1.) The rebuke itself; Woman, have I to do with thee? As many as Christ loves, he rebukes and chastens. He calls her Woman, not Mother. When we begin to be assuming, we should be minded what we are, men and women, frail, foolish, and corrupt. The question, πιστεύεις σοι, might be read, What is that to me and thee? What is it to us, if they do want? But it is always used as we render it, What have I to do with thee? as Judges 11. 12. 2 Sam. 16. 10. Ezra. 4. 3. Matth. 8. 29. It therefore bespeaks a resentment, yet not at all inconsistent with the reverence and submission which he paid to his mother, according to the fifth commandment; (Luke 2. 51.) for there was a time when it was Levi's praise, that he said to his father, I have not known him, Dent. 33. 2. Now this was blessedly true of Levi, and those who are interested in a matter which was the act of his Godhead, which had no dependence on her, and which she was not the mother of. Though, as Man, he was David's Son, and hers; yet, as God, he was David's Lord, and hers, and he would have her know it. The greatest advancements must not make us forget ourselves and our place, nor the familiarity which the covenant of grace admits us to, bring us under a kind or degree of presumption. Secondly, It was an instruction to others of his relations, (many of whom were present here,) that they must never expect him to have any regard to his kindred according to the flesh, in his working of miracles, or that therein he should gratify them, who in this matter were no more to him than other people. In the things of God we must not know others by the kind of their eminent or great acts, but by the kind of their function, and the kind of their merit, and the kind of their degree of presumption.

ST. JOHN, II.
...show that thou art his mother. Jesus matris impetu salvatoris—Lay thy maternal commands on the Son. Does he not here expressly say, when a miracle was to be wrought, even in the days of his humiliation, and his mother did but tacitly hint an intercession, Woman, what have I to do with thee? This was plainly designed either to prevent or aggravate the Saviour. Such an intercession in behalf of her Son was not in accord with the dignity of the Deity. The Son of God is appointed our Advocate with the Father; but the mother of our Lord was never designed to be our advocate with the Son.

[2.] The reason of this reproof: Mine hour is not yet come. For every thing Christ did, and that was done to him, he did his hour, the fixed time and the fittest time, which was punctually observed. For this is the great work to be wrought: "Mine hour is not yet come." Yet afterward he wrought this, before, because he foresaw it would confirm the faith of his infant-disciples, (v. 11.) which was the end of all his miracles; so that this was an earnest of the many miracles he would work when his hour was come. Secondly, "Mine hour of working miracles openly is not yet come; therefore do not talk of it now." He saith as to himself, "Mine hour of working miracles openly is not yet come; take away this exemption from thine authority yet come, now that I have begun to act as a Prophet!" So Gregory Nyssen. Fourthly, "Mine hour for working this miracle is not yet come." His mother moved him to help them when the wine began to fail; (so it may be read, v. 3.) but his hour was not yet come till it was quite spent, and there was a total want; not only to prevent any suspicion of mixing of some of the wine, but to argue with them, that man's extremity is God's opportunity to appear for the help and relief of his people. Then his hour is come, when we are reduced to the utmost strait, and know not what to do. This encouraged those that waited for him, to believe that though his hour was not yet come, it would come. Note, The delays of mercy are not to be construed the denials of prayer. At the end it shall speak. (5.) Notwithstanding this, she encouraged herself with expectation that he would help her friends in this strait, for she bid the servants observe his orders, v. 5.

[1.] She took the reproof very submissively, and did not reply to it. It is best not to deserve reproof from Christ, but next best to be meek and quiet under it, and to be it a kindness. Ps. 143. 5. God kept her heart in Christ's mercy, that he would yet grant her desire. When we come to God in Christ for any mercy, two things discourage us. First, Sense of our own follies and infirmities; "Surely such imperfect prayers as ours cannot speed." Secondly, Sense of our Lord's frowns and rebukes. Afflictions are continued, deliveries delayed, and God seems angry at our prayers; this was the case of the mother of our Lord here; and yet she encourages herself with hope that he will at length give in an answer of peace; to teach us to wrestle with God by faith and fervency in prayer, even then when he seems in his providence to walk contrary to us. We must against hope believe in hope, Rom. 4. 18.

[5.] She directed the servants to have an eye to his immediately, and not to make their applications to him, till it is probable, they had done. She quite all pretensions to an influence upon him, or intercession with him; let their souls wait only on him, Ps. 62. 5.

[4.] She directed them punctually to observe his orders, without disputing, or asking questions. Being conscious to herself of a fault in preserving to him, she cautions the servants to take heed of the same fault, and to attend both his time and his way for supply: "Whatever he saith unto you, do it, though you may think it ever so improper. If he saith, Give the guests water, when they call for wine, do it. If he saith, Pour out from the bottoms of the vessels that are spent, do it. He can make a few drops of wine multiply to so many draughts." Note, These that expect Christ's favours, must with an implicit obedience observe his orders. The way of duty is the way to mercy; and Christ's methods must not be questioned. (4.) Christ did at length miraculously supply them; for he is often better than his word, but never worse.

[1.] The miracle itself was, turning water into wine; the substance of water acquiring a new form, and having all the accidents and qualities of wine. Such a transformation is a miracle; but the papish tenet of substantiation, the substance changed, the accidents remaining the same, is a monster. By this Christ showed himself to be the God of nature, who maketh the earth to bring forth wine, Ps. 104. 14. 15. The extracting of the blood of the grape every year from the moisture of the earth, is a less work of power, though, being according to the common law of nature, it is not such a work of wonder, as transforming water into wine. The first water into wine was, turning water into blood; (Exod. 4. 9, ch. 7. 20.) the beginning of Christ's miracles, was, turning water into wine; which intimates the difference between the law of Moses and the Gospel of Christ. The curse of the law turns water into blood, common comforts into bitterness and terror; the blessing of the gospel turns water into wine. Christ hereby showed that his command into the world was to lighten the burden of sinners, to turn them into waters of life, and make them comforts indeed. Shiloh is said to wash his garments in wine, (Gen. 19. 11.) the water for washing being turned into wine. And the gospel call is, Come ye to the waters, and buy wine, Isa. 55. 1.

First, It was done in water-pots; (v. 6.) There were set there six water-pots of stone, observe 1. For what use these water-pots were intended—for their legal purifications from ceremonial pollutions, enjoined by the law of God, and many more by the tradition of the elders. The Jews eat not; except they wash often, (Mark 7. 3.) and they used much water in their washing, for which reason there were six large water-pots provided. It was a saying among the Jews, When the Messiah shall come, quidniminum consequerit in hoc mundo divinitas—He who uses much water in washing, will gain much wealth in this world. 2. To what use Christ put them, quite different from what they were intended; to be the receptacles of the miraculous wine. Thus Christ came to bring in the grace of the gospel, which is in wine, that cheereth God and man, (Judg. 9. 13.) instead of the shadows of the law, which were water, weak and beggarly elements. These were water-pots that had never been used to have wine in them; and of stone, which is not apt to retain the scent of former liquors, if ever they had had wine in them. They contained two or three firkins apiece; two or three measures, bathis, or ephahs; the quantity is uncertain, but very considerable. We may be sure that it was not intended to be all drunk at once, but for a further kindness to the newly married couple, as the multiplied oil was to the poor widow, out of which she might pay her debt, and live of the rest, 2 Kings 4. 7. Christ gives himself; gives abundantly, according to his riches in glory. It is the penman's language to say, They contained two or three firkins, for the Holy Spirit could have ascertained just how much; thus ch. 6. 19. to teach us to speak cautiously, and not confidently, of those things whereof we have not good assurance.
Secondly, the water-pots were filled up to the brim by the servants at Christ's word, v. 7. As Moses, the servant of the Lord, when God bid him, went to the rock, to draw water; so these servants, when Christ bid them, went to the water, to fetch wine. Note, Since no difficulties can be opposed to the arm of God's power, no improbabilities are to be objected against the word of his command.

Thirdly, the miracle was wrought suddenly, and in such a manner as greatly miracles. As soon as he had filled the water-pots, presently he said, Draw out now; v. 8. and it was done.

1. Without any ceremony, in the eyes of the spectators. One would have thought, as Naman, he should have come out, and stood, and called on the name of God, 2 Kings 5. 11. No, he sits still in his place, says not a word, but with the thing, and so works it. Note, Christ does great things, and manifestly works changes in a hidden way. Sometimes Christ in working miracles, used words and signs, but it was for their sakes that stood by, ch. 11. 47.

2. Without any hesitation or uncertainty in his own breast. He did not say, Draw out now, and let me taste it, questioning whether the thing were done as he willed it or no; but, with the greatest assurancé he would do, and accordingly, he recommends it to the master of the feast first. As he knew what he would do, so he knew what he could do, and made no essay in his work; but as was good, very good, even in the beginning.

Our Lord Jesus directed the servants,

1. To draw it out; not to let it alone in the vessel, to be admired, but to draw it out, to be drank. Note, [1.] Christ's works are all for use; he gives no man a talent to be buried, but to be traded with. Has he turned thy water into wine, given thee knowledge and grace? It is to profit withal; and therefore, draw out now. [2.] Those that would know Christ, must make trial of him, must attend upon him in the use of ordinary means, and then may expect extraordinary influences. That which is laid up for all that fear God, is wrought for them that trust in him, (Ps. 31. 19.) that by the exercise of faith draw out what is laid up.

2. To present it to the governor of the feast. Some think that this governor of the feast was only the chief guest, that sat at the upper end of the table; but if so, surely our Lord Jesus should have had that place, for he was, upon all accounts, the principal Guest; but it seems another had the upper place, and he recommended it to the governor of the feast. (Matth. 23. 6.) and chose it, Luke 14. 7. And Christ, according to his own rule, sat down in the lowest room; but, though he was not treated as the Master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a Friend to the feast, and if not its Founder, yet its best Benefactor. Others think that this governor was the inspector and monitor of the feast; the same with Phutarch's Symfiosiarcha, chief of officers that waited it. (Matth. 23. 6.) and chose it, Luke 14. 7. And Christ, according to his own rule, sat down in the lowest room; but, though he was not treated as the Master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a Friend to the feast, and if not its Founder, yet its best Benefactor. Others think that this governor was the inspector and monitor of the feast; the same with Phutarch's Symfiosiarcha, chief of officers that waited it. (Matth. 23. 6.) and chose it, Luke 14. 7. And Christ, according to his own rule, sat down in the lowest room; but, though he was not treated as the Master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a Friend to the feast, and if not its Founder, yet its best Benefactor.

Others think that this governor was the inspector and monitor of the feast; the same with Phutarch's Symfiosiarcha, chief of officers that waited it. (Matth. 23. 6.) and chose it, Luke 14. 7. And Christ, according to his own rule, sat down in the lowest room; but, though he was not treated as the Master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a Friend to the feast, and if not its Founder, yet its best Benefactor.

Fourthly, The wine which was thus miraculously provided, was of the best and richest wine, which was acknowledged by the governor of the feast; and that it was really so, and not his fancy, is certain, because he knew not whence it was, v. 9, 10.

It was certain that this was wine. The governor knew that when he drank it, though he knew not whence it was; the servants knew whence it was, but had not yet tasted it. If the taster had seen the drawing of it, or the drawers had had the tasting of it, something might have been imputed to fancy; but now no room is left for suspicion. 2. That it was the best wine. Note, Christ's works commend themselves to those that know not their Author. The products of nature are always best in their kind. This wine had a stronger body and better flavour, than ordinary. This the governor of the feast takes notice of to the bridegroom, with an air of pleasantness, as uncommon. (1.) The common method was otherwise. Good wine is brought out to the best advantage at the beginning of a feast, when the guests have their heads clear, and their appetites fresh, and can relish it, and will commend it; but when they have well drank, when their heads are confused, and their appetites pall'd, good wine is but thrown away upon them, worse will serve them. See the vanities of all the pleasures of sense; they soon surfeit, but never satisfy; the longer they are enjoyed, the less pleasant they grow. (2.) This bridegroom obliged his friends with a request of the best wine for the last part of the feast. If they kept the good wine until now, not knowing whom they were indebted to for this good wine, he returns the thanks of the table to the bridegroom. She did not know that I gave her corn and wine, Hos. 2. 8.

Now, (1.) Christ in providing thus plentifully for the guests, though he hereby allows a sober, cheerful, use of wine, especially in times of rejoicing, (Ch. 2. 9.) yet he does not invalidate his own caution nor invasion in it, in the least, which is, that our hearts be not at any time, no not at a marriage feast, overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke 21. 34. When Christ provided so much good wine for them that had well drank, he intended to try their sobriety, and to teach them how to abound, as well as how to want. Temperance for her force, is a thankless virtue; but if Divine Providence gives us abundance of the delights of sense, and Divine Grace enables us to use them moderately, this is self-denial that is praise-worthy. He also intended that some should be left for the confirmation of the truth of the miracle, to the faith of others. And we have reason to think that the guests at this table were so well taught, or, at least, were now so well awed by the presence of Christ, that none of them abused this provision.

These tokens, drawn from this story, may be sufficient at any time to fortify us against temptations to intemperance. First, That our meat and drink are the gifts of God's bounty to us, and we owe our liberty to use them, and our comfort in the use of them, to the mediation of Christ: it is therefore ungrateful and impious to abuse them. Secondly, That, wherever we are, Christ has his eye upon us; we should eat bread and drink water, &c. and bless God for it; for the extraordinary tokens of Christ's presence and power were not to supersede, or justly oust, the ordinary rules and methods of piety and devotion.

In the conclusion of this story, v. 11. we are told, First, That this was the beginning of miracles which Jesus did. Many miracles had been wrought concerning him at his birth and baptism, and he himself was the greatest miracle of all; but this was the first that was wrought by him. He could have wrought miracles when he disputed with the dev-ters, but his hour was not come. He had power, but there was a time of the hiding of his power.

Secondly, That herein he manifested his glory; hereby he proved himself to be the Son of God, and his glory to be that of the only-begotten of the Father. He also discovered the nature and end of his office; the power of a God, and the grace of a Saviour, appearing in all his miracles, and particularly in this, he manifested the glory of the long expected Messiah.

Thirdly, That his disciples believed on him. These whom he had called, (ch. 1.) who had seen no miracle, and yet followed him, now saw this, shared in it, and had their faith strengthened by it. Note, 1. Even the faith that is true, at first is but weak. The strongest men were once babes; were the strongest Christians. 2. The manifesting of the glory of Christ is the great confirmation of the faith of Christians.

12. After this he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples; and they continued there not many days. 13. And the Jews' passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. 14. And found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting; 15. And when he had made a scourge of small cords, he drove them all out of the temple, and the sheep, and the oxen; and poured out the changers' money, and overthrew the tables: 16. And said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence: make not my Father's house a house of merchandise. 17. And his disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. 18. Then answered the Jews and said unto him, What sign shewest thou unto us, seeing that thou doest these things? 19. Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. 20. Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days? 21. But he spake of the temple of his body. 22. When therefore he was raised from the dead, his disciples remembered that he had said this unto them; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said.

Here we have,

1. The short visit Christ made to Capernaum, ch. 2. It was a large and populous city, about a day's journey from Cana; it is called his own city, (Matth. 9. 1.) because he made it his head-quarters in Galilee, and what little rest he had, was there. It was a place of concourse, and therefore Christ chose it, that the fame of his doctrine and miracles might from thence spread the farther. Observe, 1. The company that attended him thither; his mother, his brethren, and his disciples. Wherever Christ went, (1.) He would not go alone, but would take those with him, who had put themselves under his conduct, that he might instruct them, and they might attest his miracles. (2.) He could not go alone, but they would follow him, because they liked the sweetness either of his doctrine or of his wine, ch. 6. 26. His mother, though he had lately given her to understand that in the works of his ministry he should pay no more respect to her than to any other person, yet followed him; not to interfere with him, but to learn of him. His brethren also and relatives, and these more particularly, were wrought upon by the miracle there, and his disciples, who attended him wherever he went. It should seem, people were more affected with Christ's miracles at first than they were afterward, when custom made them seem less strange.

2. This continuance there, which was at this time not many days, designing now only to begin the acquaintance he would afterward improve there. Christ was still upon the training up of those, who were to be his ministers, and the fulness of his usefulness to one place, because many needed him. And he would teach his followers to lock upon themselves but as sojourners in this world; and his ministers to follow their opportunities, and so where their work led them. We do not now find Christ in the synagogues, but he privately instructed his friends, and thus entered upon his work by degrees. It is good for young ministers, to acquire themselves to their work, edifying discourse in private, that they may with the better preparation, and greater ease, approach their public work. He did not stay long at Capernaum, because the passover was at hand, and he must attend it at Jerusalem; for every thing is beautiful in its season. The less good must give way to the greater, and all the dwellings of Jacob must yield to the gates of Zion.

II. The passover he kept at Jerusalem, it is the last after his baptism, and the regal piece takes notice of all the passovers he kept henceforward, which were four in all, the fourth, that at which he suffered, (three years after this,) and half a year was now past since his baptism. Christ, being made under the law, observed the passover at Jerusalem; see Exod. 23. 17. Thus he taught us by his example a strict observance of divine institutions, and a diligent attendance on religious assemblies. He went up to Jerusalem when the passover was at hand, that he might be there with the first. It is called the Jews' passover, because it was peculiar to them; (Christ is our Passover,) now shortly God will no longer own it for his. Christ kept the passover at Jerusalem yearly, ever since he was twelve years old, in obedience to the law; but now that he is entered upon his public ministry, we may expect something more from him than before; and two things we dare here tell he did there.

1. He purged the temple, v. 14–17. Observe here,

(1.) The first place we find him at Jerusalem, was, the temple, and it should seem, he did not make any public appearance till he came thither; for his presence and preaching there, were that glory of the latter house, which was to exceed the glory of the former, Hag. 2. 9. now was forsook. (Mal. 3. 1.) I will send my servant, John Baptist; he never preached in the temple, but the Lord, whom we seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, suddenly after the appearing of John Baptist; so that this was the time, and the temple the place, when, and where, the Messiah was to be expected.

(2.) The first work we find him at in the temple, was, the purging of it; for so it was foretold there, (Mal. 3. 2, 3.) I will send my servant, John Baptist; he shall purge the sons of Levi. Now shall come the time of reformation. Christ came to be the great Reformer; and, according to the method of the reforming kings of Judah, he first purged out what was aniss, (and that used to be passover-work too, as in Hezekiah's time,) 2 Chron. 30. 14, 15. and Josiah, 2 Kings 23. 4, &c. and then taught them to do well. First purge out the old leaven, and then keep the feast.
Christ's design in coming into the world, was, to reform the world; and he expects that all who come to him, should reform their hearts and lives, Gen. 3:5. And this he has taught us by purging the temple.

See here, [1.] What were the corruptions that were to be purged out. He found a market in one of the courts of the temple, that was called the court of the Gentiles, within the mountain of that house. There, First, They sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, for sacrifice; we will suppose, not for certified use, but for the convenience of the casual adventurer. They came out of the country, and could not bring their sacrifices in specie along with them; see Deut. 14. 21–26. This market perhaps had been kept by the pool of Bethesda, (Ch. 5. 2.) but was admitted into the temple by the chief priests, for filthy lucre; for, no doubt, the rents for standing there, and fees for searching the beasts sold there, and certifying that they were without blemish, would be a considerable revenue to them. Great corruptions in the church owe their rise to the love of money, 1 Tim. 6. 5, 10. Secondly, They changed money, for the convenience of those that were to pay a half-shekel in specie every year by way of poll, for the service of the tabernacle; (Exod. 30. 12.) and, no doubt, they got it by it. (2.) Whereof course our Lord took to purge out those corruptions. He had seen these in the temple formerly, when he was in a private station; but never went about to drive them out till now, when he had taken upon him the public character of a Prophet. He did not complain to the chief priests, for he knew they countenanced those corruptions both of themselves.

First, Drive out the sheep and the oxen, and those that sold them, out of the temple. He never used force to drive any into the temple, but only to drive those out that profaned it. He did not seize the sheep and oxen for himself, did not restrain and impound them, though he found them damage faisant — actual trespassers upon his Father's ground; he only drove them out, and their owners with them. He made a scourge of small cords, which, probably, they had led their sheep and oxen with, and thrown them away upon the ground, hence Christ gathered them. Sinners prepare the scours with which they themselves will be driven out from the temple of the Lord. He did not make a scourge to chastise the offenders, (his punishments are of another nature,) but only to drive out the cattle; he aimed no further than at reformation, See Rom. 13. 3, 4. 2 Cor. 10. 8. Secondly, He poured out the changers' money, τιμήματα— the small money— the Nummorum Eunomus. In pouring out the money, he showed his contempt of it; he threw it to the ground, to the earth, as it was. In overthrowing the tables, he showed his displeasure against those that make religion a matter of worldly gain. Money-changers in the temple are the design of this story. Note, In reformation, it is good to make thorough work; he does not throw them all out and not only threw out the money, but, in overturning the tables, threw out the trade too.

Thirdly, He said to them that sold doves, (sacrifices for the poor.) Take these things hence. The doves, though they took up less room, and were a less nuisance than the oxen and sheep, yet must not be left in the temple. The sparrows and swallows were welcome, that were left to God, (Psa. 84. 3.) but not the doves, that were appropriated to man's profit. God's temple must not be made a pigeon-house. But see Christ's prudence in his zeal. When he drove out the sheep and oxen, the owners might follow them; when he poured out the money, they might gather it up again; but if he had turned the doves flying, perhaps they could not have been retrieved; therefore to them that sold doves, he said, Take these things hence. Note, Discretion must always guide and govern our zeal, that we do nothing unseasonable, or unseasonably.
thoughts, which taught them to reconcile this action both with the meekness of the Lamb of God, and with the severity of his Deity. The King of Kings, for instance, speaking of the Messiah, takes notice of his zeal for God's house, as so great, that it even ate him up; it made him forget himself, Ps. 69. 9. Observe,

(1.) The disciples came to understand the meaning of what Christ did, by remembering the scriptures; they remembered now that it was written. Note, The word of God and the works of God do mutually explain and illustrate each other. Once scriptures are expanded by their accomplishment in providence, and difficult providences are made easy by comparing them with the scriptures. See of what great use it is to the disciples of Christ, to be ready and mighty in the scriptures, and to have their memories well stored with scripture-truths, by which they will be furnish'd for every good work.

(2.) The scripture they remembered was very appropriate: The zeal of those who hate us eateth us up. Ps. 132. 2. 3. What he did for it, was with all his might; see 1 Chron. 29. 2. The latter part of that verse, (Ps. 69. 9,) is applied to Christ, (Rom. 15. 5,) as the former part of it here. All the graces that were to be found among the Old-Testament saints, were eminently in Christ, and particularly this of zeal for the house of God, and in the like measure this was also typical of different types of him. Observe, [1.] Jesus Christ was zealously affected to the house of God his church, loved it, and was always jealous for its honour and welfare. [2.] This zeal did eat even him up; it made him humble himself, and spend himself, and expose himself. My zeal has consumed me, Ps. 119. 35. Zeal for the house of God forbids us to consult our own credit, ease, and safety, when they come in competition with our religious services, and sometimes carries in our souls in our duty so far and so fast, that our bodies cannot keep pace with them, and makes us as deaf as our Master was to those who suggested, Spare thyself. The grievances here redressed might seem but small, and such as should have been convivial at; but such was Christ's zeal, that he could not bear even them that sold and bought in the temple.

(1.) Their demand of a sign; then answered the Jews, that is, the multitude of the people, with their leaders. Being Jews, they rather have stood by him, and assisted him to indicate the honour of their temple; but, instead of that, they objected against it. Note, They who apply themselves in good earnest to the work of reformation, must expect to meet with opposition. And when they could object nothing against the thing itself, they questioned his authority to do it; What sign shewest thou unto us, to prove thyself authorized and commissioned to do these things? It was indeed a good work to purge the temple; but what had lie to do to undertake it, who was in no office there? They looked upon it as an act of jurisdiction, and that he must prove himself a prophet, a prophet, more than a prophet. But was not the thing itself sign enough? His ability to drive so many from their posts, without opposition, was a proof of his authority: he that was armed with such a divine power, was surely armed with a divine commission. What aided these buyers and sellers, that they fled, that they were driven back? Surely it was at the presence of the Lord, Ps. 114. 5, 7; no less a presence.

(2.) Christ's answer to this demand, v. 19. He did not immediately work a miracle to convince them, but gives them a sign in something to come; the death of the old temple, and its appearance by the event, according to Deut. 18. 21.

Now, [1.] The sign that he gives them is, his own death and resurrection. He refers them to that which would be, first, His last sign. It they would not be convinced by what they saw and heard, let them wait. Secondly, The great sign to prove him to be the Messiah; for, concerning him it was foretold that he should be bruised, (Isa. 53. 5,) cut off; (Deut. 4. 19,) and that he should raise himself again; Ps. 16. 10. These things were fulfilled in the blessed Jesus, and therefore, truly he was the Son of God, and had authority in the temple, his Father's house.

[2.] He foretells his death and resurrection, not in plain terms, as he often did to his disciples, but in figurative expressions; as afterward, when he gave this for a sign, he called it the sign of the prophet Jesus, so here, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. This spake he to them who were willingly ignorant in parables, that they might not perceive, Matt. 13. 13, 14. They that will not see, shall not see. Nay, this figurative speech used here, proved such a stumbling-block to them, that it was produced in evidence against him, at his trial, to prove him a blasphemer, Matt. 26. 61. Had they humbly asked him the meaning of what he spoke, and told him it was a COVENANT, they had it been a saucer of life unto life to them; they were resolved to cavil, and it proved a saucer of death unto death. They that would not be convinced, were hardened, and the manner of the expression of this prediction occasioned the accomplishment of the prediction itself.

First, He foretells his death by the Jews' malice, in these words, Destroy ye this temple; that is, 'Ye have profan'd the temple, and will destroy it.' Note, Christ, even at the beginning of his ministry, had a clear foresight of all his sufferings at the end of it, and yet went on cheerfully in it. It is good, at setting out, to expect the worst. Secondly, He foretells his resurrection by his own power; in three days I will raise it up. There were others that were raised, but Christ raised himself resumed his own life. Now he utters these words to express this by destroying and re-edifying the temple. 1. Because he was now to justify himself in purging the temple, which they had profan'd; as if he had said, You that defile one temple, will destroy another; and I will prove my authority to purge what you have defiled, by raising what you will destroy.' The profaning of the temple is the destroying of it, and its reformation its resurrection. 2. Because the death of Christ was indeed the destruction of the Jewish temple, the procuring cause of it; and his resurrection was the raising up of another temple, the gospel-church, Zech. 6. 12. The ruins of their place and nation (ch. 11. 48,) were the riches of the world. See Acts 9. 11, Acts 15. 16.

(3.) Their cavil at this answer; (v. 20.) Forty and six years was this temple in building. Temple-work was always slow work, and canst thou make such quick work of it? Now here, [3.] They show some knowledge; they could tell how long the temple was in building. Dr. Lightfoot computes that it was just 46 years from the foundling of Zerubbabel's temple, in the second year of Cyrus, to the complete settlement of the temple-service, in the 32d year of Artaxerxes; and also, that from Herod's beginning to build this temple, in the 15th year of his reign, to this very time, when the Jews said that this was just 46 years; Forty and six years, said he; -both this temple been built. [2.] They show more ignorance. First, Of the meaning of Christ's words. Note, Men often run into gross mistakes by under-
Though my Jerusalem, that the Temple of Christ's answer from their civil. The difficulty is soon solved by explaining the terms: He spake of the temple of his body, v. 21. Though Christ had discovered a great respect for the temple, in purging it, yet he will have us know that the holiness of it, which he was so jealous for, was but typical, and leads us to the consideration of another temple, which that was but a shadow of the substance of living Christ, Heb. 9: 9. Col. 2: 17. Some think, when he said, Destroy this temple, he pointed to his own body, or laid his hand upon it; however, it is certain that he spake of the temple of his body. Note, The body of Christ is the true temple, of which that at Jerusalem was a type.

1. Like the temple, it was built by immediate divine direction; "A body hast thou prepared me," 1 Chron. 29: 19. 2. Like the temple, it was a holy habitation: therefore he spake of his temple, like the temple, the habitation of God's glory; there the eternal Word dwelt, the true Shechinah. He is Emmanuel—God with us. 3. The temple was the place and medium of intercourse between God and Israel; there God revealed himself to them, there they presented themselves and their services to him. Thus by Christ God speaks to us, and we speak to him. Worshipers looked toward that house, 1 Kings 8: 50, 53. So we must worship God with an eye to Christ.

A reflection which the disciples made upon this, long after, inserted here, to illustrate the story; (v. 22.) When he was risen from the dead, some years after, his disciples remembered that he had said this. We found them, v. 17, remembering what had been written before him, and here remembering what they had heard from him. Note. The memories of Christ's disciples should be like the treasure of the good householder, furnished with things both new and old, Matth. 13: 52. Now observe,

1. When they remembered that saying; when he was risen from the dead. It seems, they did not at this time fully understand Christ's meaning, for they were as yet but babes in knowledge; but they laid it in their hearts, and afterward it became both intelligible and useful. Note. It is good to hear for time to come, Isa. 42: 23. The juniors in years and profession should treasure up those truths which at present they do not well understand either the meaning or use of, for they will be serviceable to them hereafter, when they come to greater proficiency. It was said of the scholars of Pythagoras, that his precepts seemed to freeze in them till they were sixty, and then began to thaw and to shine, so this saying of Christ revived in the memories of his disciples, when he was risen from the dead; and why then? First, Because then the Spirit was poured out to bring things to their remembrance, which Christ had said to them, and to make them both easy and ready to them, ch. 14: 26. That very day that Christ rose from the dead, he opened their understandings, Luke 24: 45. Secondly, Because then the temple of Christ was fulfilled, when the temple of his body had been destroyed, and was raised again, and that upon the third day, then they remembered this among other words which Christ had said to this purport. Note. It contributes much to the understanding of the scripture, to observe the fulfilling of the scripture. The event will expound the prophecy

[2.] What use they made of it? They believed the scripture, and the word that Jesus had said; their belief of these was confirmed, and received fresh support and vigour. They were slow of heart to believe, (Luke 24: 25.) but they were sure. The scripture and the word of Christ are here put together, not because they concur and exactly agree together, but because they mutually illustrate and strengthen each other. When the disciples saw both they had what they read in the Old Testament, and they had heard from Christ's own mouth, fulfilled in his death and resurrection, they were the more confirmed in their belief of both.

23. Now when he was in Jerusalem at the passover, in the feast-day, many believed in his name, when they saw the miracles which he did. 24. But Jesus did not commit himself unto them, because he knew all men: 25. And needed not that any should testify of man: for he knew what was in man.

We have here an account of the success, the poor success, of Christ's preaching and miracles at Jerusalem, while he kept the passover there. Observe,

1. That Christ was, in Jerusalem, the holy city, whence the word of the Lord was to go forth; his residence was mostly in Galilee, and therefore, when he was in Jerusalem, he was very busy. The time was holy time, the feast day, time appointed for the service of God; at the passover the Levites taught the good knowledge of the Lord, (2 Chron. 5: 22.) and Christ took that opportunity of preaching, when the congregation of people was great, and thus he would own and honour the divine institution of the passover.

2. That hereby many were brought to believe in his name, to acknowledge him a Teacher come from God, as Nicodemus did, (ch. 3: 2.) a great Prophet; and probably, some of those who looked for redemption in Jerusalem, believed him to be the Messiah promised, so ready were they to welcome the first appearance of that bright and morning Star.

3. That yet Jesus did not commit himself unto them; (v. 24.) οὐχ ἐξελέησαν εἰς αὐτὸν.—He did not trust himself with them. It is the same word which is used for believing in him. So that to believe in Christ, is to commit ourselves to him and to his guidance. Christ did not see cause to repose any confidence in these new converts at Jerusalem, where he had many enemies that sought to destroy him; either, 1. Because they were false, at least, some of them, and would betray him, if they had an opportunity; or, 2. Because they were very few; he had more disciples that he could trust among the Galileans, than among the dwellers at Jerusalem. In dangerous times and places, it is wisdom to take heed whom you confide in: πάντας οἰκτηράς—learn to distrust. Or, 2. Because they were weak, and I would hope that this was the worst of it; not that they were treacherous, and designed him a mischief; but, 1. They were timorous, and wanted assistance, and might perhaps be frightened to do a wrong thing. In times of difficulty and danger, cowards are not fit to be trusted. Or, 2. They were tumultuous, and wanted discretion and conduct. These in Jerusalem perhaps had their expectations more raised than others of the temporal reign of the Messiah, and, in that expectation, would be ready to give some bold strokes at the government, if Christ would have committed himself to them, and put himself at the head of them: but he would not, for his kingdom is not of this world. We should be shy of turbulent, unquiet persons, for our Master here was, though they profess to believe in Christ as these did.

IV. That the reason why he did not commit himself to them, was, because he knew them, (v. 25.)

knew the wickedness of some and the weakness of others. The evangelist takes this occasion to assert Christ's omniscience.

1. He knew all men, not only their names and faces, but it is possible for us to know many, but their nature, dispositions, affections, designs, so as we do not know any man, scarcely ourselves. He knows all men, for his powerful hand made them all, his piercing eye sees them all, sees into them. He knows his subtle enemies, and all their secret projects; his false friends, and their true characters; what they really are, whatever they pretend to be.

2. He knew what was in man; in particular persons, in the nature and race of man. We know what is done by men; Christ knows what is in them, the heart and the reins. This is the prerogative of that essential, eternal Word, Heb. 4. 12, 13. We invade his prerogative, if we presume to judge men's hearts. How fit is Christ to be the Saviour of men, very fit to be the Physician, who has such a perfect knowledge of the patient's state and case, temper and distemper; knows what is in him? How fit also to be the Judge of all? For the judgment of him who knows all men, all in men, must needs be according to truth.

Now this is all the success of Christ's preaching and miracles at Jerusalem, in this journey. The Lord comes to his temple, and none come to him, but a parcel of weak, simple people, that he can neither have credit from, nor put confidence in; yet he shall at length see of the travail of his soul.

CHAP. III.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's discourse with Nicodemus, a Pharisee, concerning the great mysteries of the gospel, which he here privately let him into, v. 1. to 21. II. John Baptist's discourse with his disciples concerning Christ, upon occasion of his coming into the neighbourhood where he was. (v. 22.) to 27.) III. In which he fairly and faithfully resigns all his honour and interest to him. 1. THERE was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews: 2. The same came to Jesus by night, and said unto him, Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou dost, except God be with him. 3. Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. 4. Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? 5. Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee. Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. 6. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. 7.Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again. 8. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is everyone that is born of the Spirit. 9. Nicodemus answered, and said unto him, How can these things be? 10. Jesus answered, and said unto him, Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things? 11. Verily, verily, I say unto thee. I speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness. 12. If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things? 13. And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man, which is in heaven. 14. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: 15. That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. 16. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. 17. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. 18. He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God. 19. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. 20. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved: 21. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God.

We found, in the close of the foregoing chapter, that few were brought to Christ at Jerusalem: yet here was one, a considerable one; it is worth while to go a great way for the salvation through one soul. Observe,

I. Who this Nicodemus was. Not many mighty and noble are called; yet some are, and here was one. Not many of the rulers, or of the Pharisees; yet 1. This was a man of the Pharisees, bred to learning, a scholar. Let it not be said that all Christ's followers are unlearned and ignorant men. The principles of the Pharisees and the peculiar ties of their sect, were directly contrary to the spirit of Christianity; yet there were some in whom even these high thoughts were cast down, and brought into obedience to Christ. The grace of Christ is able to subdue the greatest opposition. 2. He was a ruler of the Jews, a member of the great sanhedrim, a senator, a privy-councillor, a man of authority in Jerusalem. Bad as things were, there were some rulers will inclined, who yet could do little good, because the stream was so strong against them; they were ruled by the majority, and yoked with those that were corrupt, so that the good which God would do, they could not do; yet Nicodemus continued in this place, and did what he could, when he could not do what he would.

II. His solemn address to our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 2. See here,
1. When he came; He came to Jesus by night. Observe,
(1.) He made a private and particular address to Christ, and did not think it enough to hear his public discourses. He resolved to talk with him by himself, where he might be free with him. Personal converse with skilful, faithful ministers about the affairs of our souls, would be of great use to us, Mat. 2. 7.
(2.) He made his address by night, which may be considered, either. [1.] As an act of prudence and discretion. Christ was engaged all day in public work, and he would not interrupt him then, nor expect his attendance then, but observed Christ's hour, and waited on him when he was at leisure. Note, Private advantages to ourselves and our own families, must give way to those that are public and of more general use. The greater good must be preferred before the less. Christ had many enemies, who, on every occasion, would have brought him into temptation; but he knew, lest if the chief priests had known it, they should have been more engaged against Christ.
[2.] As an act of zeal and forwardness. Nicodemus was a man of business, and could not spare time all day to make Christ a visit, and therefore he would rather take time from the diversions of the evening, or the rest of the night, than not converse with Christ. When others were sleeping, he was getting knowledge, as David by meditation, Ps. 1. 2. He came by night, not from any design to avoid the observation of the Jews, for he could not have done that, but that he was stirred up by the Spirit, to go contrary to his interest, and the stream of those of his own rank who were prejudiced against Christ.

2. He was afraid, or ashamed, to be seen with Christ, and therefore came in the night. When religion is out of fashion, there are many Nicodemites, especially among the rulers, who have a better affection to Christ than several of the people, but are afraid to show it. He knew not how soon Christ might leave the town, nor what might happen betwixt that and another feast, and therefore would lose no time. In the night, his converse with Christ would be more free, and less liable to disturbance. See Notes, Christian.,—Christian nights; much more instructive than the Notes Attive, Attic nights.

Or, [3.] As an act of fear and cowardice. He was afraid, or ashamed, to be seen with Christ, and therefore came in the night. When religion is out of fashion, there are many Nicodemites, especially among the rulers, who have a better affection to Christ than several of the people, but are afraid to show it. He knew not how soon Christ might leave the town, nor what might happen betwixt that and another feast, and therefore would lose no time. In the night, his converse with Christ would be more free, and less liable to disturbance. See Notes, Christian.,—Christian nights; much more instructive than the Notes Attive, Attic nights.

3. He came by night, yet afterward, when there was occasion, he owned Christ publicly, ch. 7. 50. — 39. The grace which is at first but a grain of mustard-seed, may grow to be a great tree.

2. What he said. He did not come to talk with Christ about politics and state-affairs, (though he was a ruler,) but about the concern of his own soul and its salvation, and, without circumlocutions, comes presently to the business; he calls Christ Rabbi, which signifies a great Man; see Isa. 19. 23. He shall send them a Teacher, and a Saviour and a Rabbi; so the word is. There are hopes of those who have a respect for Christ, and think and speak honourably of him. He tells Christ how far he had attained; we know that thou art a Teacher. Observe,
(1.) His assertion concerning Christ; Thou art a Teacher so educated or ordained by men, as other teachers, but thou art with divine inspiration and divine authority. He that was to be the sovereign Ruler, came first to be a Teacher; for he would rule with reason, not with rigour, by the power of truth, not of the sword. The world lay in ignorance and mistake; the Jewish teachers were corrupt, and caused them to err; it is time for the Lord to work. He came a Teacher from God, as the Father of mercies, in pity to a dark, deceived world; from God as the Father of lights, and Fountain of truth; all the light and truth which we may venture our souls upon.

(2.) His assurance of it; We know, not only I, but others; so he took it for granted, the thing being so plain and self-evident. Perhaps he knew that there were divers of the Pharisees and rulers with whom he conversed, who were of the party of Christ, but might be suspected of being vatious, but had not the grace to own it. Or, we may suppose that he speaks in the plural number, ( We know,) because he brought with him one or more of his friends and pupils, to receive instructions from Christ, knowing them to be of common concern. "Master," saith he, "we come with a desire to be taught to thy scholars, for we are fully satisfied that they are honest teachers, and ignorant of the same.

(3.) The ground of this assurance; No man can do these miracles that thou dost, except God be with him.

Here, [1.] We are assured of the truth of Christ's miracles, and that they were not counterfeit. Here was Nicodemus, a judicious, sensible, inquisitive man, one that had all the reason and opportunity imaginable to examine them, so fully satisfied that they were real miracles, that he was wrought upon by them to go contrary to his interest, and the stream of those of his own rank who were prejudiced against Christ.

[2.] We are directed what inference to draw from Christ's miracles; Therefore we are to receive him as a Teacher come from God. His miracles were his credentials. The course of nature could not be altered but by the power of the God of nature, who, we are sure, is the God of truth and goodness, and would never set his seal to a lie or a cheat.

[3.] The discourse between Christ and Nicodemus hitherupon, or, rather, the sermon Christ preached to him; the contents of it, and that perhaps an abstract of Christ's public preaching; see v. 11, 13.

Four things our Saviour here discourses of,
1. Concerning the necessity and nature of regeneration and the new birth, v. 3—8.

Now we must consider this, 1. As pertinently answered to Nicodemus's address. Jesus answered, v. 3. This answer was either, (1.) A rebuke of what he saw defective in the address of Nicodemus. It was not enough for him to admire Christ's miracles, and acknowledge his mission, but he must, in the next place, consider, It is plain that he expected the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of the Messiah, now shortly to appear; he is hitherto aware of the dawning of that day; and, according to the common notion of the Jews, he expects it to appear in external pomp and power; he doubts not but this Jesus who works these miracles, is either the Messiah, or his Prophet, and therefore makes his court to aim, compliments him, and so hopes to secure a share to himself of the advantages of that kingdom. But Christ tells him that he can have no benefit by that change of the state, unless there be a change of the Spirit, of the principles and dispositions, equivalent to a new birth. Nicodemus came by night; "But this will not do," said Christ. His religion must be owned before men; » Dr. Hamond. Or, (2.) A reply to what he saw designed in his address. When Nicodemus owned Christ a Teacher come from God, one intrusted with an extraordinary revelation from heaven, he plainly intimated a desire to know what it was, and a readiness to receive it; and Christ gives it him.

2. We may consider this as positively and unequivocally taught by our Lord Jesus: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, I, the Amen, the Amen, say it; so it may be read: "I the faithful and true Witness." The matter is settled irreversibly, that except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. "I say it to thee, though a Pharisee, though a master in Israel." Observe,

(1.) What it is that is required; to be born again; that is, [1.] We must live a new life. Birth is the beginning of a new state of things, as those that have hitherto lived either much amiss, or to little purpose. We must not think to patch up the old building, but begin from the foundation. [2.] We must have a new nature, new principles, new affections, new aims. We must be born anew, which signifies both denue—again, and deuter—from above. First, We must be born anew; so the word is taken, Gal. 4. 9, and ab initio—from the beginning. Luke 1. 3. By our first birth we were corrupted, shaped in sin and iniquity; we must therefore undergo a second birth, our souls must be fashioned and enlivened anew. Secondly, We must be born from above, (so the word is used by the evangelist, ch. 3. 31.—19. 11.) and I take it to be especially intended here, not excluding the other; for to be born from above, supposes being born again. But this new birth has its rise from heaven, (ch. 1. 15.) and its tendency to heaven; it is to be born to a divine and heavenly life, a life of communion with God and the upper world, and, in order to this, it is to partake of a divine nature, and bear the image of the heavenly.

(2.) The indispensable necessity of this; "Except a man (any one that partakes of the human nature, and, consequently, of the corruptions of that, except he be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God; the kingdom of the Messiah begin in grace, and perfected in glory." Except we be born from above, we cannot see this. That is, [1.] We cannot understand the nature of it. Such is the nature of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, (in which Nicodemus desired to be instructed,) that the soul must be new-modelled and moulded; this is the finis, the end of the education of the human soul, before he is capable of receiving and understanding them, 1 Cor. 2. 14. [2. ] We cannot receive the comfort of it; cannot expect any benefit by Christ and his gospel, absolutely necessary to our happiness here and hereafter. Considering what we are by nature, how corrupt and sinful; what God is, in whom alone we can be happy, and what heaven is, to which the perfection of our happiness is reserved; it is a necessary condition of our reception into that, that we must be born again; because it is impossible that we should be happy, if we be not holy; see 2 Cor. 6. 11, 12.

This great truth of the necessity of regeneration being thus solemnly laid down,

First, It is objected against Nicodemus, (v. 4.) How can a man be born when he is old, old as I am; ? but—being an old man? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? He even appears, 1. His weakness in knowledge; what Christ spake spiritually, he seems to have understood after a corporal and carnal manner; as if there were no other way of regenerating and new-moulding an immortal soul, than by new-framing the body, and bringing that back to the rock out of which it was hewn; as if there were such a connection between the soul and the body, that there could be no fashioning the heart anew but by forming the bones anew. Nicodemus, as the other Jews, valued himself, no doubt, very much on his first birth, and the dignities and privileges of that; the place of it, the holy land, perhaps the holy city; his parentage, such as that which Paul could have gloried in, Phil. 3. 5. And therefore it is a great surprise to him to hear an old man, or one that is said to be such, should be born again. 2. His willingness to be taught. He does not turn his back upon Christ because of this hard saying, but ingenuously acknowledges his ignorance, which implies a desire to be better informed; and so I take this, rather than that he had such gross notions of the new birth Christ spake of; "Lord, make me to understand this, for it is a riddle to me; I am such a sinner, as to know no other way for a man to be born than of his mother." When we meet with that in the things of God, which is dark, and hard to be understood, we must with humility and industry continue our attendance upon the means of knowledge, till God shall reveal even that unto us.

Secondly, It is opened and further explained by our Lord Jesus, v. 5—8. From the objection he takes occasion.

1. To repeat and confirm what he had said: (v. 5.) "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, the very same that I said before." Note, The word of Christ is not yea and nay, but yea and amen; what he hath said he will abide by, whoever saith against it, nor will he retract any of his sayings for the ignorance and mistakes of men. Though Nicodemus understood not the mystery of regeneration, yet Christ asserts the necessity of it as positively as before. It is truly so. Could he be better persuaded to the observance of evangelical precepts, by pleading that they are unintelligible, Rom. 3. 3. 4.

2. To expound and clear what he had said concerning regeneration; for the explication of which he further shows,

(1.) The Author of this blessed change, and who it is that works it. To be born again is to be born of the Spirit; (v. 6.) (2. Cor. 5. 17.) and a new birth is the work of the Holy Ghost, Tit. 3. 5. The word he works by, is his inspiration, and the heart to be wrought on, he has access to.

(2.) The nature of this change, and what that is which is wrought: it is spiri, a new thing, which is a new birth, of some spiritual, and refined from the dross and dregs of sensuality. The dictates and interests of the rational and immortal soul have retrieved the dominion they ought to have over the flesh. The Pharisees placed their religion in external purity, and external performances; and it would be a mighty change indeed with them, no less than a new birth, to become spiritual.

Christ here shows that it is necessary in the nature of the thing, for we are not fit to enter into the kingdom of God till we are born again; (v. 6.) That which is born of the flesh, is flesh. Here is our malady, and the causes of it, which are such as speak plainly that there is no remedy but we must be born again.

First. We are here told what we are; we are flesh, not only corporeal, but corrupt, Gen. 6. 3. The soul is still a spiritual substance, but so wedded to the flesh, so captivated by the will of the flesh, so in love with the delights of the flesh, so employed in making provision for the flesh, that it is justly called flesh; it is carnal. And what communion can there be between God, who is a Spirit, and a soul in this condition?

Secondly. How we came to be so; by being born in the bone with us, and therefore we cannot have a new nature, but we must be born again. The corrupt nature, which is flesh, takes rise from our first birth; and therefore the new nature, which is Spirit, must take rise from a second birth. Nicodemus spake of entering again into his mother's womb, and being born; but, if he could do so, to what purpose? If he were born of his mother a hundred times, that would not mend the matter, for still that which is born of the flesh, is flesh; a clean thing cannot be made unclean; for the things which are born of the flesh, are corrupt. Even the new creature must be born of the Spirit, or he cannot become spiritual. The case is, in short, this; though man is made to consist of body and soul, yet his spiritual part had then so much the dominion over his corporeal part that he was denominated a living soul; (Gen. 2. 7.) but by indulging the appetite of the flesh, in eating forbidden fruit, he prostituted the dominion of the soul to the tyranny of sensual lust, and became no longer a man, but a beast; and Dust thou art. The living soul became dead and inactive; thus in the day he sinned, he surely died, and so he became earthly. In this degenerate state, he begat a son in his own likeness, he transmitted the human nature, which had been entirely deposited in his hands, thus corrupted and deformed; and in the same plight it is still propagated. Corruption has been woven into the nature of man, so that he is what he was shapen in unrighteousness, which makes it necessary that the nature be changed. It is not enough to put on a new coat, or a new face, but we must put on the new man, we must be new creatures.

Secondly. That the Spirit, in regeneration, works arbitrarily, and as a free Agent. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and we know not where it goeth, or whither it carrieth. God directs it, he fulfils his word, Ps. 148. 8. The Spirit dispenses his influences where, and when, on whom, and in what measure and degree, he pleases; dividing to every man severally as he will, 1 Cor. 12. 11.

Thirdly. That he works powerfully, and with evident effects; Thou hast the sound thereof, though its causes are hidden, its effects are manifest. When the soul is brought to mourn for sin, to groan under the burden of corruption, to breathe after Christ, to cry Abba—Father, then we hear the sound of the Spirit; we find he is at work, as Acts 9. 11. Behold, he prayeth.

Fourthly. That he works mysteriously, and in secret, hidden ways; Thou canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth. Hence Nicodemus, when he said unto thee that which are all concerned in, Ye must, ye all, one as well as another, we must be born again; not only the common people, but the rulers, the masters in Israel. Secondly, We are not to marvel at it; for, when we consider the holiness of the God with whom we have to do, the great design of our redemption, the depravity of our nature, and the condition of the happiness which we enjoy, we shall not think it strange that so much stress is laid upon this as the one thing needful, that we must be born again. (4.) This change is illustrated by two comparisons.

[1.] The regenerating work of the Spirit is compared to water; v. 5. To be born again is to be born of water, and of the Spirit, that is, of the Spirit working like water; (as Matth. 3. 11.) with the Holy Ghost and with fire, means, with the Holy Ghost as with fire.

First. That which is primarily intended here, is to show that the Spirit, in sanctifying a soul, 1. Cleanses and purifies it as water; takes away its filth, by which it was unfit for the kingdom of God. It is the washing of regeneration, Tit. 3. 5. Ye are washed, 1 Cor. 6. 11. See Ezek. 36. 25. 2. Cools and refreshes it, as water doth the heated hart and the weary traveller. The Spirit is compared to water, Isa. 54. 7. ch. 7. 38. 39. In the first creation, the fruits of the human birth of man, (Gen. 3. 20.) in allusion to which, perhaps, they that are born from above, are born of water.

Secondly, It is probable that Christ had an eye to the ordinance of baptism, which John had used and he himself had began to use. You must be born again of the Spirit, which regeneration by the Spirit should be signified by washing with water, as the visible sign of that spiritual grace; not that all they, and they only, that are baptized, are saved; but without that new birth which is wrought by the Spirit, and signified by baptism, none shall be looked upon as the protected, privileged subjects of the kingdom of heaven. The Jews cannot partake of the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom they had so long been promised; though they may be being justified by the works of the law, and submit to the baptism of repentance, the great gospel-duty, for the remission of sins, the great gospel-privilege.

[2.] It is compared to wind; (v. 8.) The wind bloweth where it listeth, so is every man that is born of the Spirit. The same word (ρύ吹) signifies both the wind and the Spirit. The Spirit came upon the Baptist, signifying a man of wonder. Acts 2. 2. His strong influence on the hearts of sinners are compared to the breathing of the wind, (Ezek. 37. 9.) and his sweet influences on the souls of saints, to the north and south wind, Cant. 4. 16. This comparison is here used to show.
his teachings, when they did not agree with the notious he had imbibed. Thus many profess to admit the doctrine of Christ in general, and yet will neither believe the truths of Christianity, nor submit to the laws of it, further than they please. Christ shall be their Teacher, provided they may choose their lesson. Now here,

(1.) Nicodemus owned himself ignorant of Christ's meaning, after all; "How can these things be? They are things I do not understand, my capacity will not reach them." Thus the things of the Spirit of God are foolishness to the natural man. He is not only strangulated from them, and therefore they are foolishness; but prejudiced against them, and therefore they are foolishness to him.

(2.) The reproach which Christ gave him for his du-ign and religion, "Wilt thou be a master in Israel? A teacher, or a tutor, one who sits in Moses chair, and yet not only unacquainted with the doctrine of regeneration, but incapable of understanding it. This word is a reproof; (1.) To those that undertake to teach others, and yet are ignorant and unskilful in the word of righteousness themselves.
(2.) To those that spend their time in learning and teaching notions and ceremonies in religion, nicties
and niceties, which are not absolutely necessary, which is practical, and tends to reform the heart and life. Two words in the reproof are very em-phatical. [1.] The place where his lot was cast; in Israel, where there was such great plenty of the means of knowledge, where divine revelation was.
He might have learned this out of the Old Testament. [2.] The things he was thus ignorant in; these necessary things, these great things, these divine things; had he never read Ps. 50, 5, 10. Ezek. 18, 13—36. 25, 26.

3. Christ's discourse, hereupon, of the certainty and sublimity of gospel-truths; (v. 11—15.) to show
the folly of those who make strange of these things, and to recommend them to our search. Observe here,

(1.) That the truths Christ taught were very certain, and what we may venture upon; (v. 11.) We speak that we do know, we, whom does he mean beside himself? Some understand it of those that bore witness to him, and with him, on earth, the prophets and John Baptist; they spake what they knew, and had seen, and were themselves abundantly satisfied in; divine revelation carries its own proof along with it. Others, that these bore witness from heaven, the only invisible and Holy Ghost; the Father was with him, the Spirit of the Lord was upon him; therefore he speaks in the plural number, as ch. 14. 23. We will come unto him. Observe, [1.] That the truths of Christ are of undoubted certainty. We have all the reason in the world to be assured, that the sayings of Christ are faithful sayings, and such as we may venture our souls upon. They are not God's word, the only infallible Witness, who would not go about to deceive us, but sends tent Witnesses, who could not himself be deceived;
We testify that we have seen. He spake not upon hearsay, but upon the clearest evidence, and therefore with the greatest assurance. What he spake of God, of the invisible world, of heaven and hell, of the divine will concerning us, and the counsels of peace, was what he knew and had seen, for he was by him, as one brought up with him, Prov. 8, 30.
Whatever Christ spake, he spake of his own knowledge. [2.] That the unbelief of sinners is greatly aggravated by the infallible certainty of the truths of Christ. The things are thus sure, this clear, and yet we receive not our witness. Multitudes be unbelievers of that, which yet (sorcans are the motives of credibility) they cannot disbelieve!

(2.) The truths Christ taught, though communicated in language and expression borrowed from common and popular notions, were so far from being mere empty words; as things were most sublime and heavenly; this is intimated, v. 12. 'If I have told thee earthly things, thou hast known them. Thou hadst not believed me. If thou hast affirmed me unto thy' several capacities, and brought to thy will, thou couldst not have believed. What wilt thou do if I should accumulate myself to the nature of the things, and speak with the tongue of angels, that language which morals cannot utter? If such familiar expressions be stand-alone-blocks, what would abstract ideas be, and spiritual things, painted properly'?' Now we may learn hence, [1.] To admire the height and depth of Christ. He is a master in Israel. He is not only a witness to us of the things, but he doth it in such a manner, that the words of the gospel are heavenly things, out of the reach of the inquiries of human reason, and much more out of the reach of its discovers. [2.] To acknowledge with thankfulness the condensation of Christ, that he is pleased to suit the manner of the gospel-revelation to our capacities; to speak as we do to children. He considers our frame, that we are of the earth, and our place, that we are rational beings; and therefore he uses earthly things, and makes things sensible the vehicle of things spiritual, to make the more easy and familiar to us. Thus he has done both in parables and in sacraments. [3.] To lament the curvature of our nature, and our great unaptness to receive and entertain the truths of Christ. Earthly things are despised because they are vulgar, and heavenly things because they are abstract; and so, whatever method is taken, still some fault or other is found with it; (Matth. 11, 17.) but Wisdom is,
and will be, justified of her children, notwithstanding.

(3.) Our Lord Jesus, and he alone, was fit to reveal us a doctrine thus certain, thus sublime; (v. 13.) No man besides hath ascended unto heaven.

(1.) None but Jesus Christ was able to reveal to us the will of God for our salvation. Nicodemus addressed Christ as a Prophet; but he must know that he is greater than all the Old Testament prophets, for none of them had ascended into heaven.
They wrote by divine inspiration, but we, of their own knowledge; see ch. 1. 18. Moses ascended into the mount, but not into heaven. No man hath attained to the certain knowledge of God and heavenny things so as Christ has; see Matth. 11, 17. It is not for us to send to heaven for instructions, we must wait to receive what instructions Heaven will send to us; see Prov. 30. 4. Deut. 30, 12.

(2.) Jesus Christ is able, and fit, and every way qualified, to reveal the will of God to us; for it is that came down from heaven, and is in heaven. He had said, (v. 12.) How shall we believe, if I tell man of heavenly things? and now he addeth an instance of those heavenly things which he could tell them of, when he tells them of one that came down from heaven, and yet is the Son of Man; is the Son of man, and yet is in heaven. If the regeneration of the soul of man was such a mystery, what then is the incarnation of the Son of God? These are divine and heavenly things their mildness nature in one person; his divine nature, in that he is the Son of man; and that union of these two in that, while he is the Son of man, yet he is in heaven. Secondly. He gives them a proof of his ability to speak to them heavenly things, and to lead them into the arcana of the kingdom of heaven, by telling them,

1. That he came down from heaven. The intercourse between God and man, begun above, the communication towards it did not arise from this earth, but came down from heaven. We love him, and send to him, because he first loved us, and sent to us. Now this speaks, (1.) Christ's divine nature. He that came down from heaven, is certainly more than a mere Man; he is the Lord from heaven, 1 Cor. 13. 47. (2.) His intimate acquaintance with the divine counsels; for, coming from the court of heaven, he spake with an eternity conversant with them. (3.) It speaks God manifest. Under the Old Testament God's favours to his people are expressed by his hearing from heaven, (2 Chron. 7. 14.) looking from heaven, (Ps. 80. 14.) speaking from heaven, (Neh. 9. 13.) sending from heaven, Ps. 57. 3. But the New Testament shows us God coming down from heaven, to teach and save us. That he thus descended from heaven by God, could not change places, nor did he bring his body from heaven; but that he thus condescended for our redemption, is a more admirable mercy; herein he commanded his love.

2. That he is the Son of man, that Son of man spoken of by Daniel, (7. 13.) by which the Jews always understand to be meant the Messiah. Christ, in calling himself the Son of man, shows that he is the man manifest, in whom God became. And of all the Old Testament titles of the Messiah he chose to make use of this, because it was most expressive of his humility, and most agreeable to his present state of humiliation. 3. That he is in heaven. Now at this time, when he is talking with Nicodemus on earth, yet as God, he is in heaven; the Son of man, as such, was not in heaven till his ascension, but that the Son of man by his divine nature, was now every where present, and particularly in heaven. Thus the Lord of glory, as such, could not be crucified, nor could God as such shed his blood; yet that person who was the Lord of glory, was crucified, (1 Cor. 2. 8.) and God purchased the church with his own blood, Acts 20. 28. So close is the union of the two natures in one person, that there is a communication of glory, as well as of suffering, from heaven to earth, but at the same time, God is the same—he that was in heaven is the habitation of his holiness.

III. Christ here discourses of the great design of his own coming into the world, and the happiness of those that believe in him, v. 14-18. Here we have the very narrow and quintessence of the whole gospel; that faithful saying, (1 Tim. 1. 15.) that Jesus Christ came to seek and save that which was lost. But the children of men are his own, to recover them to life. Now sinners are dead men, upon a two-fold account, 1. As one that is mortally wounded, or sick of an incurable disease, is said to be a dead man, for he is dying: and so Christ came to save us, by healing us, as the brazen serpent healed the Israelites, v. 14. 2. As one that is justly condemned to die for an unpardonable crime, is a dead man; he is dead in law; and yet he is dead, and yet not so, but that Christ came to save a Prince or Judge, publishing an act of indemnity, or general pardon, under certain provisos; this saving here is opposed to condemning, v. 16-18.

(1.) Jesus Christ came to save us by healing us, as the children of Israel that were stung with fiery serpents, were cured and lived by looking up to the brazen serpent: we have the story of it, Num. 21. 6-9. It was the last miracle that passed through the hand of Moses before his death.

Now in this type of Christ we may observe,

[1.] The deadly and destructive nature of sin, that is implied here. The guilt of sin is like the pain of the biting of a fiery serpent; the power of corruption is like the venom diffused thereby. The devil is the old serpent, subtle at first, (Gen. 3. 1.) ever since fiery, and his temptations fiery darts; his assaults terrifying, his temptations alluring; if God awakened consciences, as dammed sinners, and they will tell you, how charming soever the allurements of sin are, at the last it bites like a serpent, Prov. 23. 30—32. God's wrath against us for sin is a those fiery serpents which God sent among the people, to punish them for their murmuring. The serpents which Moses saw are as fiery serpents, so are all the tokens of divine wrath and the sorrows of the soul.

[2.] The powerful remedy provided against this fatal malady. The case of poor sinners is deplorable; but is it desperate? Thanks be to God, it is not; there is balm in Gilead. The Son of man is lifted up, as the serpent of brass was by Moses, which cured the stung Israelites. First, it was a serpent of brass, that cured them. Brass is bright; read Christ's name, John 12. 39. Second, it was set up erect, like a serpent, Gen. 3. 1. It is durable, Christ is the same. It was made in the shape of a fiery serpent, and yet had no poison, no sting; fifty representing Christ, who was made Sin for us, and yet knew no sin; was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, and yet sinfull; as harmless as a serpent of brass. The serpent was a cursed creature, Christ was made a Curse. That which Moses said of the brazen serpent, was fulfilled of Christ, John 19. It is durable, Christ is the same. It was made in the shape of a fiery serpent, and yet had no poison, no sting; fifty representing Christ, who was made Sin for us, and yet knew no sin; was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, and yet not sinful; as harmless as a serpent of brass.

[3.] The way of applying this remedy, and that is by believing; which plainly alludes to the Israelites looking up to the brazen serpent, in order to their recovery. The Israelites did, John 3. 13. As he is so little sensible of his pain and peril, or had so little confidence in the word of Moses, as not to look up to the brazen serpent, justly did he die of his wound; but every one that looked up to it, did well. Num. 21. 9. If any so far slight either their disease by sin, or the method of cure by Christ, as not to embrace Christ upon his own terms, their blood is upon their own head. He bath said, Look, and be saved, (Isa. 43. 22.) look, and live. We are to be reconciled in Christ, and give consent to, the methods which Infinite Wisdom has taken of saving a guilty world, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, as the great Sacrifice and Intercessor.

[4.] The great encouragements given us by faith to look up to him. First. It was for this end that he was lifted up, that his followers might be saved; and he will pursue his end. Secondly. The offer that is made of salvation by him, is general, that whatever believers in him, without exception, might have benefit by him. Thirdly. The salvation offered is complete. 1. That perish, yet he will not destroy, nor cast them away whom he saved, though they be ever so frighted, ignobly shall not be their ruin. But that is not all. 2. They shall have eternal life. They shall not only not die of their wounds in the wilderness, but they shall reach Canaan, (which they were then just ready to enter into,) they shall enjoy the promised rest.

(2.) Jesus Christ came to save us by pardoning us, that we might not die by the sentence of the law, p. 16, 17. Here is gospel indeed, good news, the best that ever came from heaven to earth. Here is much, here is all in a little; the word of reconciliation in miniature.

[1.] Here is God's love, in giving his Son for the world, (p. 16,) where we have three things: First. The great gospel-mystery revealed: God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son. Secondly. The offer of salvation, richly offered: to the world, to offer the life and salvation by the Spirit, and our reconciliation by the lifting up of the Son. Note, 1. Jesus Christ is the only-begotten Son of God. This magnifies his love in giving him to us, in giving him to us; now know we that he loves us, when he has given his only-begotten Son for us, which speaks not only his dignity in himself, but his dearness to his Father; he was always his delight. 2. In order to the redemption and salvation of man, it pleased God to give his only-begotten Son. He not only gave him, sent him into the world with full and ample power to negotiate a peace between heaven and earth, but he gave him, he gave him up to suffer and die for us, as the great Propitiation of expiatory Sacrifice. It comes in here as a reason why he must be lifted up; for so it was determined and designed by the Father, who gave him for this purpose, and prepared him a body in order to his sending him, if his Father had not given him. Though he was not yet crucified, yet in the determinate counsel of God he was given up, Acts 2. 23, 24. Further, God has given him, that is, he has made an offer of him, to all, and given him, to all true believers, to all the intents and purposes of the new covenant. He has given him to be our Prophet, a Witness to the people; the High-Priest of our profession; to be our Peace; to be the Head of the church; Head over all things to the church; to be to us all we need. 3. Herein God has commanded his love to the world; God so loved the world; so really, so richly. Now his creatures shall see that he loves them, and wishes them well. He so loved the world of fallen man, as he did not love that of fallen angels; see Rom. 5. 8. 1 John 4. 10. Behold, and wonder, that the great God should love such a wretched world with a love of good will, when he could not look upon it with any complacency! This was a time of love indeed, Ezek. 16. 6, 8. The Jews vainly conceived that the Messiah should be sent only in love to their nation, and to advance that upon the ruins of their neighbours; but Christ tells them that he came in love to the whole world. Gentiles as well as Jews, 1 John 2. 2. Though many of the Jews rejected him, none of his neighbours; his only-begotten Son was an instance of his love to the whole world, because through him there is a general offer of life and salvation made to all. It is love to the revolting, rebellious province, to issue out a proclamation of pardon and indemnity to all that will come in, plead it upon their knees, and return to their allegiance. So far God loved the apostate, perjured world, that he sent his Son with this fair proposal, that whosoever believes in him, one or other, shall not perish. Salvation has been of the Jews, but now Christ is known as Salvation to the ends of the earth, a common Salvation.

Secondly. Here is the great gospel-duty, and that is to believe in Jesus Christ, whom God hath thus given, and given, given, given, and offered, and opened, and made a favourit, and treated as one whom the King of kings delights to honour. Out of persons he condescends to reign, Excl. 4. 14. If believers, then children; and if children, then heirs.

[2.] Here is God's design in sending his Son into the world; it was, that the world through him might be saved. He came into the world with salvation in his purposes, that he might authorize it by the word, and thereby ensure it, and therefore the aforementioned offer of life and salvation is sincere, and shall be made good to all that by faith accept it; (p. 17,) God sent his Son into the world, this guilty, rebellious, apostate world; sent him as his Agent or Ambassador; not as sometimes he had sent angels into the world, as visitors, but as resident. Ever since man sinned, he has dreaded the approach and appearance of any special messenger from heaven, as having come as a judge, and seeking to condemn him to the utmost degree of guilt, and looking for judgment to be executed. God's Son was sent, is sent, must be sent, and shall be sent, to save his people; if therefore the Son of God himself come, we are concerned to enquire on what errand he comes; Is it Peace? Or, as they asked Samuel trembling, Canst thou please me? And this scripture returns the answer, Peaceably. First. He did not come to condemn the world. We had reason enough to expect that he should, for it is a guilty world; it is condemned, and what can be shown when such a condemned society is not condemned, and execution awarded, according to law? That one blood of which all nations of men are made, (Acts 17. 26,) is not only tainted with a hereditary disease, like Gehazi's leprosy, but it is tainted with a hereditary guilt, like that of the Amalekites, with whom God had war from generation to generation; and partly may such a world as this be condemned; and if God would have sent to condemn him, he had his angels at command, to pour out the vials of his wrath; a cherubim with a flaming sword, ready to do execution. If the Lord had been pleased to kill us, he would not have sent his Son among us. He came with full powers indeed to execute judgment, (ch. 5. 22, 27,) but did not begin with a judgment of condemnation, but did not proceed upon the outlawry, nor take advantage against us for the breach of the covenant of nature; and if such a thing were, but puts us upon a new trial before a throne of grace.

Secondly. He came that the world through him might be saved; that a door of salvation might be opened to the world, and whoever would might enter.
God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and so saving it. An act of indemnity is personal, not general through Christ a remedial law made; and the world of mankind dealt with, not according to the rigours of the first covenant, but according to the riches of the second; that the world through him might be saved, for it could never be saved but through him; there is no salvation in any other. This is good news to a convinced conscience, healing to broken bones and bleeding wounds, that Christ is the righteous one not to condemn, but to save. (3.) From all this is inferred the happiness of true believers; (v. 18.) He that believeth on him, is not condemned. Though he has been a sinner, a great sinner, and stands convicted, (Hab 2. 4. by his own confession,) yet, upon his believing, process is stayed, judgment is arrested, and he is not condemned. This speaks more than a retrieve; he is not condemned, that is, he is exonerated; he stands upon his deliverance, (as we say,) and if he be not condemned, he is discharged; κατατέλειψαν he is not judged, not dealt with in strict justice, according to the desert of his sins. He is acquiesced, and he cannot plead not guilty to the indictment, but he can plead in bar, can plead a null prosequita upon the indictment, as blessed Paul does, (Rom. 8. 3.) when that condemnation which is in world is affixed, chastened of God, persecuted by the world; but he is not condemned. The cross perhaps lies heavy upon him, but he is saved from the curse: condemned by the world, it may be, but not condemned with the world, Rom. 8. 1 Cor. 11. 32.

IV. Christ, in the close, discourses concerning the deplorable condition of those that persist in unbelieving and sinful ignorance. v. 18—21.

1. Read here the doom of those that will not believe in Christ; they are condemned already. Observe, (1.) How great the sin of unbelievers is; it is aggravated from the dignity of the Person they slight; they believe not in the name of the only-begotten Son of God, who is infinitely true, and desires to be believed; infinitely good, and deserves to be embraced. God sent one to save us, that was dearest to himself; and shall not he be dearest to us? Shall we not believe on his name, who has a name above every name? (2.) How great the misery of unbelievers is; they are condemned already; which speaks, [1.] A certain condemnation. They are as sure to be condemned in the judgment of the great day as if they were condemned already. [2.] A present condemnation. The curse has already taken hold of them, and is an effect of their affinity to them. They are condemned already, for their own hearts condemn them. [3.] A condemnation grounded upon their former guilt; he is condemned already, for he lies open to the law for all his sins; the obligation of the law is in full force, power, and virtue, against him, because he is not by faith interested in the gospel-defence; he is condemned already, because he is not a party to the covenant called the great damming sin, because it leaves us under the guilt of all our other sins; it is a sin against the remedy, against our appeal.

2. Read also the doom of those that would not so much as know him, v. 19. Many inquisitive people had knowledge of Christ and his doctrine and miracles, but they were prejudiced against him, and would not believe in him, which was a sin, and a hellish one, and would not know him. And this is the condemnation, the sin that ruined them, that light is come into the world, and they loved darkness rather. Now here observe, (1.) That the gospel is light, and, when the gospel came, light came into the world. Light is self-evidencing; so is the gospel, it proves its divine original. Light is discovering, and truly the light is sweet, and rejoices the heart. It is a light shining in a dark place, and a dark place indeed the world would be without it. It is come into all the world, (Col. 1. 6.) and not confined to one corner of it. Back the testament light was. (2.) It is the unsearchable folly of the most of men, that they loved darkness rather than light, rather than this light. The Jews loved the dark shadows of their law, and the instructions of their blind guides, rather than the doctrine of Christ. The Gentiles loved their superstitious serpentine of idols, and that ignorance worshipped, rather than the reasonable serpentine the gospel enjoins. Sinners that were wedded to their lusts, loved their ignorance and mistakes, which supported them in their sins, rather than the truths of Christ, who would have parted them from their sins. Man's apostacy began in an affectation of forbidden knowledge, but is kept up by an affectation of forbidden ignorance. Wretched man is in love with his sickness, in love with his slavery, and will not be made free, will not be made whole. (3.) The true reason why men love darkness rather than light is, because their deeds are evil. They love darkness because they think it is an excuse for their evil deeds, and they hate the light, because it robs them of the good opinion they had of themselves, by showing them their sinfulness and misery. Their sinfulness is such that it is thought that if they will not mend it, they are resolved that they will not see it. (4.) Willful ignorance is so far from excusing sin, that it will be found, at the great day, to aggravate the condemnation; this is the condemnation, this is it that ruins souls, that they shut their eyes against the light, and will not so much as admit a parley with Christ and his gospel; they set God so far at variance, that they desire not the knowledge of his ways, Job 21. 14. We must account in the judgment, not only for the knowledge we had, and used not, but for the knowledge we might have had, and would not; not only for the knowledge we sinned against, but for the knowledge we sinned away.

For the further illustration of this, he shows, (v. 30, 31.) that according as men's hearts and lives are good or bad, accordingly they stand affected to the light. Christ has brought into the world.

[1.] It is not strange, if these that do evil, and resolve to persist in it, hate the light of Christ's gospel; for it is a common observation, that every one that doeth evil, hateth the light, v. 20. Evil-doers seek concealment, out of sense of shame, and fear of punishment; see Job 24. 13, &c. Sinful works are works of darkness, they hide them, such is the habit of them, Job 31. 33. The light shines on the wicked. Job 38. 12, 13. Thus the gospel is a terror to the wicked world; They come not to this light, but keep as far off as they can, lest their deeds should be reproved. Note, First, The light of the gospel is sent into the world, to reprove the evil deeds of sinners; to make them manifest, (Eph. 5. 13.) to show people their transgressions, to show them they are not so bad as they thought they were, and to show them the evil of their transgressions, that sin by the new commandment might appear exceeding sinful. The gospel has its convictions, to make way for its consolations. Secondly, It is for this reason that evil-doers hate the light of the gospel. There were those who had done evil, and were sorry for it, who bade this light welcome, as the publicans and harlots, Matt. 11. 19. But those that would rather live in darkness and resolution to go on in it, hate the light, cannot bear to be told of his faults. All that opposition which the gospel of Christ has met with in the world, comes from the wicked heart, influenced by the wicked one. Christ is hated because sin is loved. Thirdly, They who do not come to the light, thereby evince a secret hatred of the light. If they had not an antipathy to saving knowledge, they would not sit down so contentedly in damning ignorance.
[2.] On the other hand, upright hearts, that approve themselves to God in their integrity, bid this light welcome; (v. 21.) He that doeth truth, cometh to the light. It seems, then, though the gospel had many enemies, it had some friends. It is a common observation, that truth seeks no enemies. They who mean and act honestly, dread not a scrutiny, but desire it rather; now this is applicable to the gospel-light; as it convences and terrifies evil-doers, so it confirms and comforts those that walk in their integrity. Observe here,

1. The character of a good man. 1. He is one that doeth truth; that is, he acteth truly and sincerely in all he doth. Though sometimes he comes short of doing good, the good he would do, yet, he doeth truth; he aims honestly, he has his infirmities, but holds fast his integrity; as Gains, that did faithfully; (5 John 5.) as Paul, (2 Cor. 1. 12.) as Nathanael, (ch. 1. 47.) as Asa, 1 Kings 15. 14.
2. He is one that cometh to the light. He is ready to receive and entertain divine revelation, as far as it appears to him to be so, what unassay soever it may create him. He that doeth truth, is willing to know the truth by himself, and to have his deeds made manifest. A good man is much in trying himself, and desires that God would try him, Ps. 26. 2. He is solicitous to know what the will of God is, and resolves to do it, though ever so contrary to his own will and interest.

Secondly, Here is the character of a good work; it is wrought in God, in union with him by a consecration of faith, and in communion with him by devout affections. Our works are then good, and will bear the test, when the will of God is the rule of them, and the glory of God the end of them; when they are done in his strength, and for his sake, to him, and not to men; and if by the light of the gospel it be manifest to us that our works are thus wrought, then shall we have rejoicing, Gal. 6. 4. 2 Cor. 1. 9.

Thus far we have Christ's discourse with Nicodemus; it is probable that much more passed between them, and it had a good effect, for we find, ch. 19. 39. that Nicodemus, though he was puzzled at first, yet afterward became a faithful disciple of Christ.

22. After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judea; and there he tarried with them, and baptized. 23. And John also was baptizing in Enon, near to Salim, because there was much water there; and they came, and were baptized: 24. For John was yet cast into prison. 25. Then there arose a question between some of John's disciples and the Jews, about purifying. 26. And they came unto John, and said unto him, Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou bearest witness, behold, the same baptizeth, and all men come to him. 27. John answered and said, A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven. 28. Ye yourselves bear me witness, that I said, I am not the Christ, but that I am sent before him, 29. He that hath the bride, is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice. This my joy therefore is fulfilled. 30. He must increase, but I must decrease. 31. He that cometh from above is above all: he that of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth: he that cometh from heaven is above all. 32. And what he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth; and no man receiveth his testimony. 33. He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true. 34. For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him. 35. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. 36. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.

In these verses, we have,

I. Christ's removal into the land of Judea; (v. 22.) and there he tarried with his disciples. Observe, 1. Our Lord Jesus, after he entered upon his public work, travelled much, and removed often, as the patriarchs in their sojournings. As it was a good part of his humiliation, that he had no certain dwelling-place, but was, as Paul, in journeyings often, so it was an instance of his unwearied industry in the work he was sent to do. For he was continually about in prosecution of it; many a weary step he took to do good to souls. The Son of righteousness took a large circuit to diffuse his light and heat, Ps. 19. 6.

2. He was not wont to stay long at Jerusalem, though he went frequently thither; yet he soon returned into the country; as here; after these things, he removed from thence, and came into the land of Judea; not so much for greater privacy, (though mean and obscure places best suited the humble Jesus in his humble state,) but for greater usefulness; his preaching and miracles, perhaps, made most noise at Jerusalem, the fountain-head of news, but did least good there, where the most considerable men of the Jewish church had so much the ascendancy.

When he came into the land of Judea, his disciples came with him; for these were they that continued with him in his temptations. Many that flocked to him at Jerusalem, would not follow his notions into the country, they had no business there, but his disciples attended him. If the ark remove, it is better to remove and go after it (as they did, Josh. 3. 3.) than sit still without it, though it be in Jerusalem itself.

3. There he tarried with them, i.e. He conversed with them, discoursed with them. He did not retire into the country for his ease and pleasure, but for more free conversation with his disciples and followers. See Cant. 7. 11. 12. Not, Those that are ready to go with Christ, shall find him as ready to stay with them. It is supposed that he now stayed five or six months in this country.

4. There he tarried with them, He baptized with them, discoursed with them. He did not retire into the country for his ease and pleasure, but for more free conversation with his disciples and followers.
1. That John was baptizing. Christ's baptism was, for substance, the same with John's, for he bore witness to Christ, and therefore they did not at all clash. But (1.) Christ began to preach and baptize before John did it. That he might be ready to receive John's disciples when he should be taken off, and so the wheels might be kept going. It is a comfort to useful men, when they are going off the stage, to see those rising up, who are likely to fill up their room. (2.) John declining to preach and baptize, though Christ had taken it up, he would still, according to the measure given to him, advance in the interests of God's kingdom. There was still work for John to do. For Christ was not yet generally known, nor the minds of people thoroughly prepared for him by repentance. From heaven John had received his command, and he would go on in his work till thence he went, his countermand, and would have his dismissal from the same hand that gave him his commission. He does not come in to Christ, lest what had formerly passed, should look like a combination between them; but he goes on with his work, till Providence lays him aside. The greater gifts of some do not render the labours of others, that there is work short of them needless and useless; there is work enough for all hands. They are sullen, that will sit down for nothing, when they see themselves cut-shone. Though he, having the same talent, we must account for that; and when we see ourselves going off, must yet go on to the last.

2. That he baptized in Enon near Salim, places we find no where else mentioned; and therefore the learned are altogether at a loss where to find them; when ever it was, it seems that John removed from place to place; he did not think that there was any virtue in Jordan, because Jesus was baptized there, which should engage him to stay there; but, as he saw cause, removed to other waters. Ministers must follow their opportunities; and he chose a place where there was much water; were sink, many waters, that is, many streams of water; so that wherever he met with any that were willing to submit to his baptism, water was at hand to baptize them with; shallop, perhaps, as is usual where there are many brooks, but such as would serve his purpose. And in that country, plenty of water was a valuable thing.

3. That thither people came to him, and were baptized. Though they did not come in such vast crowds, as they did when he first appeared, yet now had they come without encouragement, but there were still those that attended and owned him. Some refer this both to John and to Jesus; They came, and were baptized; that is, some came to John, were baptized by him, some to Jesus, and were baptized by him, and, as their baptism was one, so were their hearts.

4. It is noted, (v. 24.) that John was not yet cast into prison; to clear the order of the story; and to show that these passages related here, (ch. 2. and 3. in the harmonies,) come before the coming of Christ. Matth. 4. 12. John never desisted from his work as long as he had his liberty; nay, he seems to have been more industrious, because he foresaw his time was short; he was not yet cast into prison, but he expected it ere long, ch. 9. 4.

11. A contest between John's disciples and the Jews, about fasting, v. 23. See how the gospel of Christ came out to send feces upon earth, but division. Observe,

1. Who were the disputants; some of John's disciples, and the Jews who had not submitted to his baptism of repentance. Penitents and impatient divide this sinful world. In this contest, it should seem John's disciples were the aggressors, and gave the challenge; and it is a sign that they were no vices, who had more zeal than discretion. The truths of God have often suffered by the rashness of some that have undertaken to defend them before they were able to do it.

2. What was the matter in dispute; about purifying, or religious washing. (1.) We may suppose that John's disciples cried up his baptism, his purifying, as instar consisting to all others, and gave the preference to that as perfecting and superseding all the purifications of the Jews; and they were in the right; but young convicts are too apt to boast of their attainments, whereas he that has found the treasure, should hide it till he is sure that he has it, and not talk of it too much at first. (2.) No doubt both the Jews with as much assurance applauded the purifying which they used among them, both those that were instituted by the law of Moses, and those that were imposed by the tradition of the elders; for the former they had a divine warrant, and for the latter the usage of the church. Now it is very likely that the Jews in this dispute, when they could not deny the excellent nature and design of John's baptism, raised an objection against it from Christ's baptism, and thus occasion for the complaint that follows here; (v. 26.) "Here is John baptizing in one place," (say they,) "and Jesus at the same time baptizing in another place; and therefore John's baptism, which his disciples so much applaud, is either," [1.] "Dangerous, and of ill consequence to the peace of the church and state, inasmuch as it opens a door to endless parties. Now that John has begun, we shall have every little teacher set up for a Baptist, and many of their own kind."

"At the best, it is defective and imperfect. If John's baptism, which you cry up thus, have any good in it, under the baptism of Jesus goes beyond it, so that for your parts you are shaded already by a greater light, and your baptism is soon gone out of fashion. Thus objections are made against the gospel, from the advancement and improvement of gospel-light, as if childhood and naivete were contrary to each other, and the superstructure were against the foundation. There was no reason to object Christ's baptism against John's, for they consisted very well together.

IV. A complaint which John's disciples made to their master concerning Christ and his baptizing, v. 27. The word being non-plussed by the fore-mentioned objection, and put into a heat by it, come to their master, as he was "Rabbi, he that was with thee, and was baptized of thee, is now set up for himself; he baptizeth, and all men come to him; and wilt thou suffer it?" Their itch for disputing occasioned this. It is common for men, when they find themselves run around in the heat of disputations, to fall full upon those that do no harm. If those disciples of John had not undertaken to dispute about purifying, they might have answered the objection without being put into a passion. In their complaint, they speak respectfully to their own master, Rabbi; but speak very slightly of our Saviour, though they do not name him.

1. They suggest that Christ's setting up a baptism of his own was a piece of presumption, very unaccountable; as if John having before the rite of baptizing he must have the monopoly of it, and as, it were, a patent for the invention; "He that was with thee beyond Jordan, as a disciple of thine, beheld, and wonder, the same, the very same, baptizes, and takes the work out of thy hand," thus the voluntary encroachments of the Lord Jesus, as that of John's baptizing by John, are often unjustly and very unkindly taken.
character John gave of him, and yet had very unwillingly improved it to the prejudice of John. But Christ needed not John's testimony, ch. 3. 36. He reflected more honour upon John than he received from him; yet thus it is incident to us to think that others are more indebted to us than really is the case. And besides, Christ's baptism was not in the least an impeachment, but indeed the greatest improvement, of John's baptism; which was but to lead the way to Christ's. John was just to Christ, in bearing witness to him; and Christ's answering of his testimony did rather enrich than impoverish John's ministry.

They conclude that it would be a total eclipse to John's baptism; "All men come to him; they that used to follow after us, now flock after him, it is therefore time for us to look about us." It was not indeed strange that all men came to him. As far as Christ is manifested, he will be magnified; but why should John's disciples grieve at that? Note, Aiming at the monopoly of honour and respect, has been in all ages the bane of the church, and the shame of its members and ministers; as also seeking of interests, and a jealousy of rivalship and competition. We mistake if we think that the excelling gifts and graces, and labours and usefulness of one, are a diminution and disparagement to another that has obtained mercy to be faithful; for the Spirit is a free Agent, dispensing to every one severally as he will. Paul rejected in the usefulness even of that of which he was himself the first receiver; he humbled himself, and glorified God, to choose, employ, and honour his own instruments as he pleaseth, and not covet to be placed alone.

V. Here is John's answer to this complaint which 1 s. disciples made, v. 25, &c. His disciples expected that he should have resented this matter as they did; but Christ's manifestation to Israel wasunsurprizing, since he did not make himself known to the world, at first, but only to those who to him were given. He therefore checked the complaint, as Moses, Enviest thou for my sake? And took this occasion to confirm the testimonies he had formerly borne to Christ as superior to him, cheerfully confessing and turning over to him all the interest he had in Israel. In this discourse here, the first minister of the gospel (so John was) is an excellent pattern to all ministers, to humble themselves and to exalt the Lord Jesus. He shows us how to answer and relate in Christ's cause, ch. 27-30. The more others magnify us, the more we must humble ourselves, and fortify ourselves against the temptation of flattery and applause, and the jealousy of our friends for our honour, by remembering our place, and what we are, 1 Cor. 3. 6.

(1.) John acquiesces in the divine disposal, and satisfies himself with that (v. 27.) A man may receive no more except it be given him from heaven, where every good gift comes; (James 1. 17.) a general truth very applicable in this case. Different employments are according to the direction of Divine Providence; different endowments according to the distribution of the Divine Grace. No man can take any true honour to himself, Heb. 5. 4. We have as necessary and constant a dependence upon the grace of God in all our transactions and performances in the spiritual life, as we have upon the providence of God in all the motions and actions of the natural life: now this comes in here as a reason, [1.] Why we should not envy those that have a larger share of gifts than we have, or move in a larger sphere of usefulness. John reminds his disciples that Jesus had not thus excelled him, except he had received it from heaven, for Man and Mediator, he received it not of himself, but what he was bound to give, of God give him; but what he was bound to receive of God give him; his measure, (v. 54.) shall they grudge it at? The same reason will hold as to others. If God is pleased to give to others more ability and success than to us, shall we be displeased at it, and reflect upon him as unjust, unwise, and partial? see Matth. 26. 15. [2.] Why we should not be discontented, though we be inferior to others in gifts and usefulness, and be eclipsed by their excellencies. John was ready to own that it was the gift, the favour, he had received from heaven, that had made him a preacher, a prophet, a baptist; it was God that gave him the interest the he had in the love and esteem of the people, and if now his interest decline, God's will be done. He that gives, may take, What we receive from heaven we must take as it is given. Now John never received a commission for a standing, perpetual office, but only for a temporary one, under a ministry, as a prophet, and to go before, when he has fulfilled his ministry, he can contentedly see it go out of date. Some give quite another sense of these words; John had taken pains with his disciples, to teach them the reference which his baptism had to Christ, who should come after him, and yet he preferred before him, and doth: for them, which he could not do; and yet, after all, they do it upon John, and grudge this preference of Christ above him; Well, saith John, I see a man can receive, that is, perceive, nothing, except it be given him from heaven. The labour of ministers is all lost labour, unless the grace of God make it effectual. Men do not understand that which is made most plain, nor believe that which is made most evident, unless it be given them from heaven to understand and believe it.

(2.) John replies to the testimony he had formerly given concerning Christ: (v. 18.) You can hear me witness, that I said again and again, I am not the Christ, but I am sent before him. See how steady and constant John was in his testimony to Christ, and not as a reed shaken with the wind; neither the frowns of the chief priests, nor the flatteries of his own disciples, could make him change his note, and speak a false and flattering word concerning him. As several witnesses, so various disciples, of the unmeritoriousness of their complaint. They had spoken of the witness which their master bore to Jesus; (v. 26.) "Now," saith John, "do you not remember what the testimony was that I did hear? Call that to mind, and you will see your own cavil answered. Did I not say, I am not the Christ? Why then do you set me up as a rival with him that is? Did I not say, I am sent before him? Why then do you say, where is he? He is come! Where then do you give way to him? [2.] It is a comfort to himself, that he had never given his disciples any occasion thus to set him up in competition with Christ: but, on the contrary, had particularly cautioned them against this mistake, though he might have made a hand of it for himself. It is a satisfaction to faithful ministers, if they have done what they could in their places to prevent any extravagances that their people ran into. John had not only not encouraged them to hope that he was the Messiah, but had plainly told them the contrary; which was now a satisfaction to him. It is a common excuse for those who have undue honour paid them, St. Paulus vult decipi, decipiat—If the people will be deceived, let them; but that is an ill maxim for them to go by whose business it is to undeceive people. The life of Christ, had a great influence upon the affairs of John.

(3.) John professes the great satisfaction he had in the advancement of Christ and his interest. He was so far from regretting it, as his disciples did, that he rejoiced in it. This he expresses (v. 29.) by an elegant similitude. [1.] He compares our Savour to the bridegroom; "He that has the bride, is the bridegroom? Do all men come to him?" It is well, whither else should they go? Has he set the kingdom in amongst them? Who shall be able to take it? It is his right: to whom shall the bride be brought but to the bridegroom? Christ was prophesied of in the Old Testament as a Bridegroom, Ps.
The word was made Flesh, that the disparity of nature might not be a bar to the match. Provision is made for the purification of the church, that the defilement of sin might be no bar. Christ espones his church to himself; he has the bride, his body, his own promise; the church is subject to Christ. As far as particular souls are devoted to him in faith and love, so far the Bridegroom has the bride. He compares himself to the friend of the Bridegroom, who attends upon him, to do him honour and service, assists him in prosecuting the match, speaks a good word for him, uses his interest on his behalf. He has the Bridegroom's son, and one of the three rules of all of whom the point is gained, and he has the bride. All that John had done in preaching and baptizing, was to introduce him; and now that he was come, he had what he wished for; The friend of the Bridegroom stands, and hears him: stands expecting him, and waiting for him; rejoices with joy because of the Bridegroom's voice, because he is come to the marriage after he had been long expected. Note, First, Faithful ministers are friends of the Bridegroom, to recommend him to the affections and choice of the children of men; to bring letters and messages from him, for he courts by proxy; and herein they must be faithful to him. Secondly, The friends of the Bridegroom must stand, and hear the Bridegroom's voice; must receive instructions and attend his orders; must desires to have proofs of Christ's speaking in them, and with them; (2 Cor. 13. 8.) that is the Bridegroom's voice. Thirdly, The espousing of souls to Jesus Christ in faith and love, is the fulfilling of the joy of every good minister. If the day of Christ's espousals be the day of the gladness of his heart, (Cant. 3. 11.) it cannot but be theirs too, who love him, cherish him, and attend his orders; much more, as he sees to have they have not a greater joy. (4.) He owns it highly fit and necessary that the reputation and interest of Christ should be advanced, and his own diminished; (v. 30.) He must increase and I must decrease. If they grieve at the growing greatness of the Lord Jesus, they will have more and more occasion to grieve, as they have, that indulge themselves in envy and emulation. John speaks of Christ's increase and of his own decrease, not only as necessary and unavoidable, which could not be helped, and therefore must be borne, but as highly just and agreeable, and is entirely satisfied in it. [1.] He was well pleased to see the kingdom of Christ getting ground; He must increase. You think he has gained a deal, but it is nothing to what he will gain. Note, The kingdom of Christ is, and will be, a growing kingdom, like the light of the morning, like the grain of mustard-seed. [2.] He was not at all displeased that the effect of this was, the diminishing of his own interest; I must decrease. Created excellences are under this law, they must decrease, I have seen an end of all perfection. Note, First, The shining forth of the glory of Christ eclipses the lustre of all other glory. The glory that stands in the darkness, is light compared to that of the world and the flesh, decree sex and loses ground, in the soul, as the knowledge and love of Christ increase, and get ground; but it is here spoken of that which is subservient to him. As the light of the morning increases, that of the morning-star decreases. Secondly, If your diminution and abatement may but in the least contribute to the advancement of Christ's name, you may cheerfully submit to it, and be content to be anything, to be nothing, so that Christ may be all. [3.] John Baptist here advances Christ, and instructs his disciples concerning him, that they might be so far from grieving that so many come to him, that they might come to him themselves. [1.] He instructs them concerning the dignity of Christ's person; (v. 31.) He that cometh from above, that cometh from heaven, is above all. Here, [1.] He suppresses his divine original, that he came from above, from heaven, which speaks not only his divine, but the extra-divine nature. He had a being before his conception, a heavenly being before he was; but he that came from heaven, was fit to show as the will of heaven, or the way to heaven. When God would save man, he sent from above. [2.] Hence he infers his sovereign authority; he is above all, above all things and all persons, God over all, blessed for evermore. It is a startling presumption to dispute precedence with him. When we come to speak of the honours of the Lord Jesus, we find they transcend all conception and expression, and we can say but this, He is above all. It was said of John Baptist, There is not a greater among them that are born of women. But the descent of Christ from heaven put such a dignity upon him as he was not divested of by his being made Flesh; still he was above all. This he further illustrates by the meanness of those who stood in competition with him; He that is of the earth is earthly, (5.) is the son of man, (6.) is the son of man—He that is of the earth, is of the earth; he that has his original of the earth, has his food out of the earth, has his converse with earthly things, and whose concern is for them. Note, First, Man has his rise out of the earth, and all is not of the earth that is of the earth, but we also are still formed out of the clay, Job 33. 6. Look to the rock whence we were hewn. Secondly, Man's constitution is therefore earthly; not only his body frail and mortal, but his soul corrupt and carnal, and its bent and bias strong towards earthly things. The prophets and apostles were of the same mould with other men; they were but earthen vessels, the earth had a rich treasure, and the earth could still be formed out of the earth. Let the professors strive with the professors of the earth; but let them not cope with him, that came from heaven. [2.] Concerning the excellency and certainty of his doctrine. His disciples were displeased that Christ's preaching was admired and attended upon, more than his; but he tells them that there was reason enough for it. First, [1.] He, for his part, spake of the earth, and so do all those that are of the earth. The prophets were men, and spake like men; of themselves they could not speak but of the earth, 2 Cor. 5. 3. The preaching of the prophets and of John was but low and flat compared with Christ's preaching; as heaven is high above the earth, so were his thoughts above theirs. By them God spake on earth, but in Christ he speakeketh from heaven. [2.] But he that cometh from heaven, is not only in his person, but in his doctrine, above all the prophets that ever lived on earth; none teacheth like him. The doctrine of Christ is here recommended to us, Reformed. As infallibly sure and certain, and to be entertained accordingly; (v. 22.) What he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth. See here, 1. Christ's divine knowledge; he testifieth nothing but what he had seen and heard, what he was perfectly apprized of, and thoroughly acquainted with. What he discovered of the divine nature and of the invisible world, was what he had seen; what he revealed of the mind of God, was what he had heard. All this he detailled from the mouth of God, and not at second hand. The prophets testified what was made known to them in dreams and visions by the mediation of angels, but not what they had seen and heard. John was the chier's voice, that said, Make room for the witness, and keep silence while the charge is given, but then leaves it to the witness to give in his testimony himself, and the judge to give the charge himself. The gospel of Christ is not a doubtful opinion, like a hypothesis, or new notion in philosophy, which every one is at liberty to believe or not; but it is a revelation of the mind of God, which is of eternal truth in itself, and of finite concern to us. 2. He did not speak with sound and assurance, but he had seen and heard, because he knew it nearly concerned us, he was pleased to make known to us. What Paul had seen and heard in the third heavens, he could not testify; (2 Cor. 12. 4.) but Christ knew how to utter what he had seen and heard. Christ's preaching is here called his testifying, to denote, (1.) The convincing evidence of it; it was not reported as news by hearsay, but it was testified as evidence given. (2.) The affectionate earnestness of the delivery of it; it was testified with concern and importunity, as Acts 18. 5.

From the certainty of Christ's doctrine, John takes occasion, [1.] To lament the infidelity of the most of men; though he testifies what is infallibly true, yet no man receiveth his testimony, that is, very few, next to none, none in comparison with those that receive it. Men receiveth it not, they will not hear it, they do not heed it, or give credit to it. This he speaks of, not only as matter of wonder, that such a testimony should not be received; (Who hath believed our report? How stupid and foolish are the greatest part of mankind, what enemies to themselves!) but as matter of grief; John's disciples grieved that all men came to Christ, (v. 20.) they thought his followers too many. But John grieves that no man came to him, he thought them too few. Note, The unbelief of sinners is the grief of saints. It was for this that St. Paul had great heaviness, Rom. 9. 2. [2.] He takes occasion to commend the faith of the chosen remnant; (v. 33.) He that hath received his testimony, (and some such there were, though very few,) hath set to his seal that God is true. God is true, though we do not set our seal to it; he is true. But Christ's truth needs not our faith to support it, but by faith we do ourselves the honour and justice to subscribe to his truth, and hereby God reckons himself honoured. God's promises are all yeu and amen, by faith we put our amen to them, as Rev. 22. 20. Observe, He that receives the testimony of Christ, subscribes not only to the truth of Christ, but to the truth of God, for his name is the word of God; the communion of the saints with God, that they are put together, Rev. 12. 17. By believing in Christ we set to our seal, First, That God is true to all the promises which he has made concerning Christ, that which he spake by the mouth of all his holy prophets; what he saith to our fathers, is all accomplished, and not one iota or tittle of it fallen to the ground, Luke 1. 70, &c. Acts 13. 32, 33. Secondly, That he is true to all the promises which he has made concerning himself, making himself the surety of those great covenant and assurance, being satisfied that he is true; we are willing to deal with him upon trust, and to quit all in this world for a happiness in reversion and out of sight. By this we greatly honour God's faithfulness. Whom we give credit to, we give honour to. Secondly, It is recommended to us as a divine doctrine; not his own, but his that sent him; (v. 34.) For John did not speak of his own, but spoke as spake, and intended to speak, for God gave him not the Spirit by measure into him. The prophets were as messengers that brought letters from heaven; but Christ came under the character of an Ambassador, and treats with us as such; for, 1. He spake the words of God, and nothing he said, savoured of human infirmity; both substance and language were divine. He proved himself sent of God, (ch. 3. 2.) and therefore his words are to be received as the words of God. By this rule we may try the spirits; those that speak as the oracles of God, and prophecy according to the proportion of faith, are to be received as sent of God. 1. He spake so as no other prophet did; for God gave not the Spirit by measure to him. Note, Every one can speak the words of God, without the Spirit, 1 Cor. 2. 14, 16. The Old Testament prophets had the Spirit, and in different degrees. 2. He spake God's words, without the Spirit, 1 Cor. 2. 14, 16. But whereas God gave them the Spirit by measure, (1 Cor. 12. 4.) he gave him to Christ without measure; all fullness dwelt in him, the fullness of the Godhead, an unmeasurable fulness. The Spirit was not in Christ as in a vessel, but as in a fountain, as in a bottomless ocean. There are those in a limited manner, only with respect to some particular revelation, sometimes speak of themselves; but he that had the Spirit always residing in him without stint, always spake the words of God. See Dr. Whitby,

[3.] Concerning the power and authority he is invested with, which gives him the pre-eminence above all others, and a more excellent name than they. [1.] He is the beloved Son of the Father; (v. 35.) The Father loveth the Son. The prophets were faithful as servants, but Christ as a Son; they were employed as servants, but Christ beloved as a Son, always his Delight, Prov. 8. 30. The Father was well pleased in him; not only he did love him, but he doth love him; he continued his love to him even in his estate of humiliation, loved him next to less for his poverty and sufferings.

[2.] He is Lord of all. The Father, as an evidence of his love to him, hath given all things into his hand. Love is generous. The Father took such a complacency and had such a confidence in him, that he constituted him the great reason in trust for mankind. Having given him the Spirit without measure, he gave him all things; for he was thereby qualified to be Master and Manager of all. Note, All those honours of Christ, and the unspeakable comfort of all christians, that the Father hath given all things into the hands of the Mediator. First, All power; so it is explained, Matt. 28. 18. All the works of creation being put under his feet, all the affairs of redemption are put into his hand; he is Lord of all. Angels are his servants, devils are his captives. He has power over all flesh, and he is given for his inheritance. The kingdom of God is either a kingdom of dominion and authority, or a kingdom of grace and peace, or both. He has power to settle the terms of the covenant of peace as the great Pneumotypos, to govern his church as the great Lawgiver, to dispense divine favours as the great Aimoner, and to call all to account as the great Judge. Both the golden sceptre and the iron rod are given into his hand. Secondly, All grace is given into his hand as the channel of convenue: all things, all those good things which are distributed to the children of men; eternal life, and all its preliminaries. We are unworthy that the Father should give those things into our hands, for we have made ourselves the children of his wrath; he hath therefore appointed the Son of his love to be Trustee for us, and the things he intended for us he gives into his hands, who is worthy, and has merited both honours for himself, and for us, and is set apart for us as the Messiah, and for him to be given into ours. This is a great encouragement to faith, that the riches of the new covenant are deposited in so sure, so kind, so good a hand, the hand of him that purchased them for us, and us for himself; who is able to keep all that which both God and believers have agreed to commit to him.

[5.] He is the Object of that faith which made the great condition of eternal happiness, and herein he has the pre-eminence above all others; (v. 56.)
He that believeth on the Son, hath life. We have here a repetition of what he had said concerning Christ and his doctrine; and it is the conclusion of the whole matter. If God has put his honour upon the Son, we must by faith give honour to him. As God offers and conveys good things to us by the testimony of Jesus Christ, whose word is the vehicle of divine favours, so we receive and partake of those favours, by believing the testimony, and entertaining the reports of him, and from this way of receiving fady answers that way of giving. We have here the sum of that gospel, which is to be preached to every creature, Mark 16: 16. Here is,

First, The blessed state of all true Christians; He that believes on the Son, hath everlasting life. Note. 1. It is the character of every true christian, that he believes on the Son of God; not only believes him, but that he believes in him, confesses to him, and confides in him. The benefit of true christianity is no less than everlasting life; that is it which Christ came to purchase for us, and confer upon us; it can be no less than the happiness of an immortal soul in an immortal God. 2. True believers, even now, have everlasting life; not only they shall have it hereafter, but they shall have it now. (1.) They have very good security for it. The deed by which it passeth, is sealed, and delivered to them, and so they have it, though the use be not yet transferred into possession. They have the Son of God, and in him they have life; and the Spirit of God the Earnest of this life. (2.) They have the comfortable foretastes of it, in present communion with God and the tokens of his love. Grace is here begun.

Secondly, The wretched and miserable condition of unbelievers; He that believeth not the Son, is undone, ver. 3. The word includes both incredulity and disobedience. An unbeliever is one that gives not credit to the doctrine of Christ, nor is in subjection to the government of Christ. Now those that will neither be taught nor ruled by Christ, 1. They cannot be happy in this world, or that to come; He shall not see life, that life which Christ came to bestow. He shall not enjoy it, he shall not have any comfortable prospect of it, shall never come within ken of it, except to aggravate his loss of it. 2. They cannot be miserable; The wrath of God abides upon an unbeliever. He is not only under the wrath of God, which is as surely the soul's death, as his favour is its life; but it abides upon him, as long as he lives. The last shall be first, and the first last, by the violation of the law, if not removed by the grace of the gospel, is bound upon him. God's wrath for his daily actual transgressions, lights and lies upon him. Old scores lie undischarged, and new ones are added: something is done every day, to fill the measure, and nothing to empty it. Thus the wrath of God abides, as it is measured up against the day of wrath.

CHAP. IV.

It was, more than any thing else, the glory of the land of Israel, that it was Emmanuel's land; (Isa. 8. 8.) not only the place of his birth, but the scene of his preaching and miracles. This land, in our Savior's time, was divided into three parts; Judea in the south, Galilee in the north, and Samaria lying between them. Now, in this chapter, we have Christ in each of these three parts of that land.

1. Departing from Samaria, after passing through Galilee, which, though a visit in transitus, here takes up most room. 1. His coming into Samaria, v. 4. 2. His discourse with the Samaritan woman at a well, v. 7. 26. 3. His becoming acquainted with her, and delivering to her the evidence of his divinity, v. 27. 30. 4. Christ's talk with his disciples in the mean time, v. 31. 38. 5. The good effect of this among the Samaritans, v. 39. 42. III. We find him residing for some time in Galilee, (v. 43. 46.) and his curing of a nobleman's son there that was at death's door, v. 46. 54.

1. WHEN therefore the Lord knew how the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciple than John, 2. (Though Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples,) 3. He left Judea, and departed again into Galilee.

We read of Christ's coming into Judea, (ch. 3. 22.) after he had kept the feasts at Jerusalem; and now he left Judea four months before harvest, as is said here; (v. 35.) so that it is computed that he stayed in Judea about six months, to build up the foundation John had laid there. We have no particular account of his sermons and miracles there, only in general, v. 1. 1. That he made disciples; he prevailed with many to believe on his name, and to follow him as a Teacher come from God. His ministry was successful, notwithstanding the opposition it met with; (Ps. 110. 2, 3.) αμαθείας τοιούτοις; it signifies the same with μαθησιαν to disciple. Compare Gen. 12. 5. The souls which they had gotten; which they had made, (so the word is,) which they had made professors. Note. It is Christ's prerogative to make disciples of all nations; and he has chosen, through his Spirit, to bring the form and fashion them to his will. Fiat non nascitur, christianus—The christian is made such, not born such. Tertullian.

2. That he baptized those whom he made disciples; admitted them by washing them with water; not himself, but by the ministry of his disciples, v. 2. 1. Because he would put a difference between his baptism and that of John, who baptized all himself, for he baptized as a servant, Christ as a Master. 2. He would apply himself more to preaching-work, which was the more excellent, 1 Cor. 1. 17. 3. He would put honour upon his disciples, by empowering and employing them to do it; and so train them up to further services. 4. If he had baptized some himself, they would have been apt to value themselves upon that, and despise others, which he would prevent, as Paul, 1 Cor. 1. 13. 14. 3. He would reserve himself for the honour of baptizing with the Holy Ghost, Acts 1. 5. 6. He would teach us that the efficacy of sacraments depends not on any virtue in the hand that administers them; as also, that what is done by his ministers according to his direction, he owns as done by himself.

3. That he made and baptized more disciples than John; and, as many more than John did at this time, but more than he had done at any time. Christ's converse was more winning than John's. His miracles were convincing, and the cure he wrought gratis, very inviting.

4. That the Pharisees were informed of this; they heard what multitudes he baptized, for they had, from his first appearing, a jealous eye upon him, and wanted not spies to give them notice concerning him. Observe, 1. When the Pharisees thought they had got rid of John, (for he was by this time clapped up,) and were pleasing themselves with that, Jesus appears, who was a greater vexation to them than ever John had been. The witnesses will rise again. 2. That which grieved them, was, that Christ made so many disciples. The success of the gospel excipates its enemies, and it is a good sign that it is getting ground, when the powers of darkness are enraged against it.

V. That our Lord Jesus knew very well what informations were given in against him to the Pharisees. It is likely that the informers were willing to have their names concealed, and the Pharisees hath to have their designs known; but none can do so deep as to hide their counsels from the 1 ord. (v. 29. 15.) and Christ is here called the Lord. He knew what was told the Pharisees, and how much it is likely, it exceeded the truth; for it is not likely that Jesus had yet baptized more than John; but so the thing was represented, to make him appear the more formidable; see 2 Kings 6. 12.

VI. That, hereupon, our Lord Jesus left Judea, and departed again, to go to Galilee.

1. He left Judea, because he was likely to be persecuted there even to the death; such was the rage of the Pharisees against him, and such their impious politics to devour the Man-child in his infancy. To escape their designs, Christ quitted the country, and went whither, where what he did would be less provoking than just under their eye. For, (1.) His hour was not yet come, (ch. 7. 30.) the time fixed in the counsels of God, and the Old Testament prophecies, for Messiah's being cut off. He had not finished his testament, and therefore would not surrender or expose himself. (2.) The disciples he had gathered in Judea, were not able to bear hardships, and therefore he would not expose them. (3.) Hereby he gave an example to his own rule; When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. We are not called to suffer, while we may avoid it without sin; and therefore, though we may not, for our own preservation, change our residence, yet we may change our place. Christ secured himself, not by marachfe, but in a way common to men, for the direction and encouragement of his suffering people.

2. He departed into Galilee, because he had work to do there, and many friends and fewer enemies. He went to Galilee now, (1.) Because John's ministry had now made way for him there; for Galilee, which was under Herod's jurisdiction, was the last scene of John's baptism. (2.) Because John's imprisonment had now made room for him there. That light being now put under a bushel, the minds of people would not be divided between him and Christ. Thus both the liberties and restraints of good ministers are for the furtherance of the gospel, Phil. 1. 12. But to what purpose does he go into Galilee for safety? Herod, the persecutor of John, will never be the protector of Jesus. Chemists here notes, Pu haec vea quas fugient habent; ad quas vero fugiunt ut in tuto sint, non habent, nisi ad Deos; qui salvet fugiunt nostrum esse.—The pious have those, in this life, to whom they can fly; but they have none to fly to, who can afford them refuge, except thee, O God.

4. And he must needs go through Samaria, which is called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph. 6. Now Jacob's well was there. Jesus therefore, being weary with his journey, sat thus on the well; and it was about the sixth hour. 7. There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water. Jesus saith unto her, Go and drink. 8. For his disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat.) 9. Then saith the woman of Samaria unto him, How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. 10. Jesus answered and said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water. 11. The woman saith unto him, Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water? 12. Art thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle? 13. Jesus answered and said unto her, Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: 14. But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst, but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. 15. The woman saith unto him, Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come hither to draw. 16. Jesus saith unto her, Go, call thy husband, and come hither. 17. The woman answered and said, I have no husband. Jesus said unto her, Thou hast well said, I have no husband: 15. For thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that saidst thou truly.

19. The woman saith unto him, Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet. 20. Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship. 21. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. 22. Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews. 23. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. 24. God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. 25. The woman saith unto him, I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ: when he is come, will he tell us all things.

We have here an account of the good Christ did in Samaria, when he passed through that country, in his way to Galilee. The Samaritans, both in blood and religion, weremonged Jews; the posterity of those colonies which the king of Assyria planted there after the captivity of the ten tribes, with whom the poor of the land that were left behind, and many other Jews afterward, incorporated themselves. They worshipped the God of Israel only, to whom they erected a temple on mount Gerizim, in competition with that at Jerusalem. There was a great enmity between them and the Jews; the Samaritans would not admit Christ, when they saw he was going to Jerusalem, Luke 9. 53. The Jews thought they could not give him a worse name than to say, He is a Samaritan. When the Jews were in prosperity, the Samaritans claimed kindred to them, (Ezra 4. 2.) but when they were in distress, they were Medes and Persians; see Joseph. Antiq. lib. 11. cap. 8. lib. 12. cap. 7. Now observe, 1. Christ's coming into Samaria. He chose the disciples not to enter into any city of the Samaritans, (Matt. 10, 5) not to preach the gospel, or work miracles; nor did he here preach publicly, or work any miracle, his eye being to the last sheets of the house of Israel. What kindness he here did them, was accidental; it was only a crumb of the children's bread that casually fell from the master's table.

1. His road from Judea to Galilee lay through the country of Samaria; (v. 4.) He must needs go thither, because there were in Samaria he would have fetched a compass on the other side Jordan, a great way about. The wicked and profane are at present so intermixed with God's Israel, that, unless we will go out of the world, we cannot avoid going through the company of such, 1 Cor. 5. 10. We have therefore need of the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, that we may stand against the wiles of the devil, Eph. 6. 13.

It was happy for Samaria, that it lay in Christ's way, which gave him an opportunity of calling on them. When I passed by them, I said unto them, Live, Ezek. 16. 6.

2. His bating place happened to be at a city of Samaria. Now observe,

(1.) The place described. It was called Sychar; a very likely place to have been with Sichem, or Shechem, a place which we read much of in the Old Testament. Thus are the names of places commonly corrupted by tract of time. Shechem yielded the first process to that ever came into the church of Israel, (Gen. 33. 19.) and now it is the first place where the gospel is preached out of the commonwealth of Israel; so Dr. Lightfoot observes; as also that the valley of Jehor, which was given for a door of hope, to hope to the poor Gentiles, ran along by this city, Hos. 2. 15. Abimelech was made king there; it was Jeroboam's royal seat; but the evangelist, when he would give us the antiquities of the place, takes notice of Jacob's interest there, which was more its honour than its crowned heads. [1.] Here lay Jacob's ground, the parent of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph, which bears were buried in it, Gen. 49. 22. Josh. 24. 3. Probably an oracle is mentioned, to intimate that Christ, when he reposed himself hard by here, took occasion from the ground which Jacob gave Joseph, to meditate on the good report which the elders by faith obtained. Jerome chose to live in the land of Canaan, that the sight of the places might affect him the more with scripture-stories. [2.] Here was Jacob's well which he debated, or at least thought of, Gen. 22. 10. In his journey to the south, we find no mention of this well in the Old Testament; but the tradition was, that it was Jacob's well.

(2.) The posture of our Lord Jesus at this place. Being weary with his journey, he sat thus on the well. We have here our Lord Jesus,

[1.] Labouring under the common fatigue of travellers. He was weary with his journey. Though used to hunt and his former run, he had perished but half his day's journey, yet he was weary; or, because it was the sixth hour, the time of the heat of the day, therefore he was weary. Here we see, First, That he was a true Man, and subject to the common infirmities of the human nature. Toil came in with sin, (Gen. 3. 19.) and therefore Christ, having made himself a Curse for us, submitted to it. Secondly, That he was a poor Man, else he might have travelled on horseback, or in a chariot. To this instance of meanness and mortification he humbled himself for us, that he went all his journeys on foot. When servants were on horses, princes walked as servants on the earth, Eccl. 10. 7. When we are carried easily let us think on the weariness of our Master. Thirdly, It should seem, he was but a tender Man, and not of a robust constitution; it should seem, his disciples were not tired, for they went into the town without any difficulty, when their Master sat down, and could not go a step further. Here we see the gospels are more sensible of fatigue, and can worst bear it.

[2.] We have here him betaking himself to the common relief of travellers; Being weary, he sat thus on the well. First, He sat on the well, an easy place, cold and hard; he had no couch, no easy chair to repose himself in, but took to that which was next hand, to teach us we may be nice and curious in the way we live, we may be so careful in this life, as not to be guilty of some mean things. Secondly, He sat thus, in an earnest posture; sat carelessly—incurrens et neglectiv; or, he sat so as people that are weary with travelling, are accustomed to sit.

II. His discourse with a Samaritan woman, which is here recorded at large, while Christ's dispute with the doctors, and his discourse with Moses and Elias on the mount of transfiguration, were recorded in silence. This discourse is reducible to four heads:

First, There comes a woman of Samaria to draw water. This intimates her poverty, she had no servant to be a drawer of water; and her industry, she would have it here, which is a great matter, because God owns and approves of honest, humble diligence in our places. Christ was made known to the shepherds when they were keeping their flock. 2. How the Divine Providence brings about glorious purposes by events which seem to us fortuitous and accidental. This woman's meeting with Christ at the well, may remind us of the stories of Rebekah, Rachel, and Jeho-thann's daughter, who all met with husbands, good husbands, no worse than Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, when they came to the wells for water. 3. How the preventing grace of God sometimes brings people unexpectedly under the means of conversion and salvation. He is found of them that sought him not.

Secondly, His disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat. Hence learn a lesson, 1. Of justice and honesty. The poor ought to have their work and wages paid for, Col. 3. 24. 25. Of daily dependence upon Providence; Take no thought for the meat. Christ did not go into the city to eat, but sent his disciples to fetch his meat thither; not because he scrupled eating in a Samaritan city, but, (1.) Because he had a good work to do at that well, which might be done while they were eating. It is wiser, to fill up our vacant minutes with that which is useful, that the fragments of time may not be lost. Peter, while his dinner was getting ready, fell into a trance, Acts 10. 10. (2.) Because it was more private and retired, more cheap and homely, to have his dinner brought him thither, than to go into the town for it. Perhaps his purse was low, and he would teach us good husbandry; to spend according to what we have, and not go beyond it. Here was an example of the sanctification of the meat, of which is said, that the fragments of time may not be lost. Peter, while his dinner was getting ready, fell into a trance, Acts 10. 10. (2.) Because it was more private and retired, more cheap and homely, to have his dinner brought him thither, than to go into the town for it. rous achievement it is, to help to save, though but one soul, from death.

Let us observe the particulars of this discourse.

1. Jesus begins with a modest request for a draught of water; \textit{Give me to drink.} He that for our sakes became poor, here becomes a Beggar, that they who are in want, and cannot die, may not be able to drink. He did not expect to have water sent to him, but he knew what he needed, and helped him, to come at it, but because he would draw on further discourse with her, and teach us to be willing to be beheld to the meanest when there is occasion. Christ is still begging in his poor members, and a cup of cold water, like this here, given to them in his name, shall be the praise of his reward.

2. Though she does not deny his request, yet quarrles with him because he did not carry on the carries of his own nation; (v. 9.) \textit{Who is he?}

Observe, First, What a mortal feud there was between the Jews and the Samaritans; \textit{The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.} The Samaritans were the adversaries of Judah, (Exra 4, 1.) were upon the Jews, and exacted a tribute from them. The Jews were extremely malicious against them, "looked upon them as having no part in the resurrection; excommunicated and cursed them by the sacred name of God, by the glorious writing of the tables, and by the curse of the upper and lower house of judgment; with this law, That no Israelite eat of anything that is a Samaritans, for it is as if he eat a strange flesh." So Dr. Lightfoot, out of \\textit{Robb, Tanchum.} Note, Quarrels about religion are usually the most impicable of all others. Men were made to have dealings one with another; but if men, because one worships at one temple, and another at another, will deny the offices of humanity, and charity, and common civility, will be more and unnatural, scornful and censorious, and this under colour of zeal for religion, they plainly show that however their religion may be true, they are not true religious; but, pretending to stickle for religion, subvert the design of it.

Secondly, How ready the woman was to upbraid Christ with the haughtiness and ill nature of the Jewish nation; \textit{How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me?} Be his dress or dialect, or both, she knew him to be a Jew, and thinks it strange that a Jew should ask for it, not but she would have known something more concerning him than did yet appear. Note, (1.) Christ is the \textit{Gift of God}, the richest \textit{Gift} of God's love to us, and the richest Treasure of all good to us: a Gift, not a Debt which we could demand from God: not a Loan, which we shall demand from us again, but a Gift, a free Gift, ch. 3, 16. (2.) It is an unspoken privilege to have this gift of God, which we may not pretend to: nor offered to us, to this cannot be told the privilege of embracing it; "He who is the Gift of God is now set before thee, and addresses himself to thee; it is he that saith, \textit{Give me to drink:} this Gift comes a begging to thee." (3.) Though Christ is set before us, and sues to us in and by his gospel, yet there are multitudes that know him not. They know not what it is that speaks to them in the gospel, that says, \textit{Give me to drink:} they perceive not that it is the Lord that calls them.

2. His hopes concerning her, what she would have done if she had known him; to be sure, she would not have given him such a rude and uncivil answer; nay, she would have been so far from advancing him, that she would have made her addresses to him; \textit{There wouldst have asked.} Note, (1.) Those that would have any benefit by Christ, must not only love him, but love Christ for him. (2.) Those that have a right knowledge of Christ, will seek to him, and if we do not seek unto him, it is a sign that we do not know him, Ps. 9, 10. (3.) Christ knows what they that want the means of knowledge, would have done, if they had had them, Matth. 11, 21.

3. He assures her what he would have done for her if she had applied herself to him; \textit{He would have given thee and have not upbraided thee, as thou dost me, living water.} By this living water is meant the \textit{Spirit}, who is not like the water in the bottom of the well, which he asked for some of, but like living or running water, which was much more valuable. Note, (1.) The Spirit of grace is as living water, see ch. 7, 38. Under this similitude the blessings of the Messias had been promised in the Old Testament, Isa. 12, 3, 35. 7, 14, 3, 55. 1. Zech. 14, 8. The graces of the Spirit, and his comforts, satisfy the thirsting soul, that knows its own nature and necessity. (2.) Jesus Christ can and will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him; for he received, that he might give. (4.) The woman objects against, and cavils at the gracious intimation which Christ gave her; (v. 11.) \textit{Thou hast nothing, and yet givest me living water?} He of whom she speaks figuratively, she took literally: Nicodemus did so too. See what confused notions they have of divine things; (v. 10.) \textit{If thou knowest the gift of God, then wouldst have asked.} Observe, This, He waives her objection of the feud between the Jews and Samaritans, and takes no notice of it. Some differences are best healed by being sighted, and by avoiding all occasions of entering into dispute about them. Christ will convert this woman, by using nothing but contemptible things, to the wisest and most salutary, (though really it was so,) but by showing her own ignorance and imperfections, and her need of a Saviour. Secondly, He possesses her with an apprehension that she had now an opportunity (a fairer opportunity than she was aware of) of gaining that which would be of unspeakable advantage to her: she had not the helps that the Jews could give that would before Christ tells her expressively, she had now a season of grace; this was the \textit{day of her salvation.}

1. He hints to her what she should know, but was ignorant of: \textit{If thou knowest the gift of God, that is, as the next words explain it, who it is that saith, Give me to drink.} If thou knowest why I am. She saw him to be a Jew, a poor weary Traveller; but she would have known something more concerning him than did yet appear. Note, (1.) Christ is the Gift of God, the richest \textit{Gift} of God's love to us, and the richest Treasure of all good to us: a Gift, not a Debt which we could demand from God: not a Loan, which we shall demand from us again, but a Gift, a free Gift, ch. 3, 16. (2.) It is an unspoken privilege to have this gift of God, which we may not pretend to: nor offered to us, to this cannot be told the privilege of embracing it; "He who is the Gift of God is now set before thee, and addresses himself to thee; it is he that saith, \textit{Give me to drink:} this Gift comes a begging to thee." (3.) Though Christ is set before us, and sues to us in and by his gospel, yet there are multitudes that know him not. They know not what it is that speaks to them in the gospel, that says, \textit{Give me to drink:} they perceive not that it is the Lord that calls them.
spiritual things, who are wholly taken up with the things that are sensible. Some respect she pays to his person, in calling him Sir, or Lord; but little respect to what he said, which she does but banter. She does not think him capable of having her with any water, no, not in the well that is just at hand: Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep. This she said, not knowing the power of Christ; for he who causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth, needs nothing to draw. But there are those who will trust Christ no further than they can see him, and will not believe his promise, unless the means of the performance of it be visible; as if he were tied to our methods, and could not draw water without our buckets. She asks scornfully, "Whence hast thou this living water? I see not whence thou canst have it." Note, The springs of that living water which Christ has for those that come to him, are secret and undiscovered. The fountain of life is hid with Christ. Christ has enough for us, though we see not whence he has it.

Secondly, She does not think it possible that he could furnish her with any better water than this which she could come at, but he could not; Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well? (1.) We will suppose the tradition true, that Jacob himself, and his children, and cattle, did drink of this well, and we may observe of it, (1.) The power and providence of God in the continuance of the fountains of water from generation to generation, by the constant circulation of the rivers, like the blood in the body, (Eccl. 1. 7.) to which circulation perhaps the flux and reflux of the sea, like the pulses of the heart, contribute. (2.) The plainness of the patriarch Jacob; his drink was water, and he and his children drank of the same well with his cattle.

2. Yet, allowing that to be true, she was out in several things; as, (1.) In calling Jacob father. What authority had the Samaritans to reckon themselves of the seed of Jacob? They were descended from that mixt multitude which the king of Assyria had placed in the cities of Samaria; what have they to do then with Jacob? Because they were the invaders of Israel's rights, and the unjust possessors of Israel's lands, were they therefore the inheritors of Israel's blood and honor? How absurd were those pretensions! (2.) She is out in claiming this well as Jacob's gift, whereas he did no more give it than Moses gave the manna, ch. 6. 32. But thus we are apt to call all the messengers of God's gifts the donors. She had not to thank, but they pass through, as to forget the hand they come from. Jacob gave it to his sons, not to them. Yet thus the church's enemies not only usurp, but monopolize, the church's privileges. (3.) She was out in speaking of Christ as not worthy to be compared with our father Jacob. An over-fond veneration for antiquity makes God's graces, in the good people of God, pass by like water.

[5.] Christ answers this cavil, and makes it out that the living water he had to give, was far better than that of Jacob's well, v. 13, 14. Though she spoke perversely, Christ did not cast her off, but instructed and encouraged her. He shows her, First, That the water of Jacob's well yielded but a short supply; and supplied, (2.) The drunk of this water shall thirst again. It is no business of the water, nor the drinking of it, who shall be thirsty, or shall thirst not. He who drinks, shall, in a measure, be satisfied; but he who drinks not, shall thirst again. Life is a fire, a lamp, which will soon go out, without continual supplies of fuel and oil. The natural heat presys upon itself, (3.) The imperfections of all our comforts in this world, they are not lasting, nor our satisfaction in them remaining. Whatever waters of comfort we drink of, we shall thirst again. Yesterday's meat and drink will not do to-day's want.

Secondly, That the living waters he would give, should yield a lasting satisfaction and bliss, v. 15. Christ's gifts appear most valuable, when they come to be compared with the things of this world; for there will appear no comparison between them. Whoever partakes of the Spirit of grace, and the comforts of the everlasting gospel, (1.) He shall never thirst again, that is, he shall abundantly satisfy his soul's desires; they are not only wanting, but not languishing. A desiring thirst he has, nothing more than God, still more and more of God; but not a despoiling thirst. (2.) Therefore he shall never thirst, because this water that Christ gives, shall be in him a well of water. He can never be reduced to extremity, that has in himself a fountain of supply and satisfaction. (1.) Ever ready, for it shall be in him. The principle of grace planted in him, is the spring of his comfort; see ch. 7. 38. A good man is satisfied from himself, for Christ dwells in his heart. The anointing abides in him; he needs not speak to the world for comfort; the work, and the witness of the Spirit in the heart furnish him with a firm foundation of hope, and an abiding pleasure in his soul. And of this he speaks, it shall be in him a well of water. He that has at hand but a bucket of water, needs not thirst as long as that lasts, but that will soon be exhausted; believers have in them a well of water, overflowing, ever flowing. The principles and affections which Christ's holy religion forms in the souls of those that are captivated to the power of it, are this well of everlasting life; (2.) It is springing up, ever in motion, which speaks the acts of grace strong and vigorous. If good truths stagnate in our souls, like standing water, they do not answer the end of our receiving them. If there be a good treasure in the heart, we must thence bring forth good things. It is springing up unto everlasting life; which speaks, First, the arms of gracious actings. A sanctified soul has its eye upon heaven; means that, designs that, does all for that, will take up with nothing short of that. Spiritual life springs up towards its own perfection in eternal life. Secondly, The constancy of those actings; it will continue springing up till it come to perfection. Thirdly, the crown of them, eternal life at last. The living water rises from heaven, and therefore rises towards heaven; see Eccl. 5. 1; nor is this water better than that of Jacob's well. (6.) The woman (whether in jest or earnest is hard to say) begs of him to give her some of this water; (v. 15.) Give me this water, that I thirst not.

First, Some think that she speaks tauntingly, and ridicules what Christ had said as mere stuff; and, in derision of it, not desires but challenges him to give her some of this water which can make her greater. If so, it would make me save me a great deal of pain if I thirst not, and a deal of pains if I never come hither to draw." But Secondly, Others think that it was a well-meant, but weak and ignorant desire. She apprehended that he meant something very good and useful, and therefore said Amen, at a venture. Whatever it be, let me have it; which is a poor overhasty wish, is a valuable good to poor labouring people. Note, Even those that are weak and ignorant may yet have some faint and fluctuating desires towards Christ and his gifts, and some good wishes of grace and glory. 2. Carnal hearts, in their best wishes, look no higher than carnal ends. Give it me," said she, "not that I may have everlasting life," (which Christ proposed,) "but that I come not hither to draw;[...]."
(2.) The next subject of discourse with this woman, is concerning her husband, v. 16—18. It was not to let fail the discourse of the water of life, that Christ started this, as many who will bring in any imperfection in conversation, that they may disguise or turn a serious subject; but was with a gracious design that Christ mentioned it. What he had said concerning his grace and eternal life, he found, had made little impression upon her, because she had not been convinced of sin; therefore, waving the discourse about the living water, he sets himself to awaken her conscience, to open the wound of guilt, and then she would more easily apprehend the remedy by grace. And here is the method of dealing with souls; they must first he made weary and heavy-laden under the burden of sin, and then brought to Christ for rest; first pricked to the heart, and then healed. This is the course of spiritual physic; and if we proceed not in this order, we begin at the wrong end.

Observe, First, How discreetly and decently Christ introduces this discourse; (v. 15.) Go, call thy husband, and come hither. Now, 1. The order Christ gave her, had a very good colour; "Call the husband, that he may teach thee, and help thee to understand these things, which thou art so ignorant of." The wise that will learn, must ask their husbands, (1 Cor. 14. 33.) who must dwell with them, as men of knowledge, 1 Pet. 3. 7. "Call thy husband, that he in a man with thee; that then ye may be heirs together of the grace of life." Call thy husband, that he may be witness to what passes between us." Christ would thus teach us to provide things honest in the sight of all men, and to study that which is of good report. 2. As it had a good colour, so it had a good design; for from hence he would take occasion to call her sin to remembrance. There is need of art and prudence in giving reproofs; to fetch a compass, as the woman of Tekoa, 2 Sam. 14. 20.

Secondly, How industriously the woman seeks to evade the conviction, and yet insensibly compels herself, and, ere she is aware, owns her fault; she said, I have no husband. Her saying this intimated no more than that she did not care to have her husband spoken of nor that matter mentioned any more. She would not have her husband come thither, lest, in further discourse, the truth of the matter should come out, to her detriment. She sees the method of sinning, on her not saying anything else. I have no husband;" she would be thought a maid or a widow, whereas, though she had no husband, she was neither. The carnal mind is very ingenuous to shift off convictions, and to keep them from fastening; careful to cover the sin.

Thirdly, How closely our Lord Jesus brings home the conviction to her conscience. It is probable that he said more than this; for he that should be called that ever she did, (v. 29.) but that which is here recorded, is concerning her husbands. Here is, 1. A surprising narrative of her past conversation; Thou hast five husbands. Doubtless, it was not her affection, (the burying of so many husbands,) but her sin, that Christ intended to upbraid her with; either she had eloped, (as the law speaks,) had run away, from her husbands, and married others; or, if not so, a deceitful, unclean act, by which she had provoked them to divorce her, or by indirect means had, contrary to law, divorced her. Those who make light of such scandalous practices as these, as no more but nine days wonder, and as if the guilt were over as soon as the talk is over, should remember that Christ keeps account of all. 2. A severe reproof of her present state of life; He whom thou hast, is not thy husband. Either she was never married to him at all, or he had some other wife; or, which is most probable, her former husband or husbands were living; so that, in short, she lived in adultery. Yet observe how mildly Christ tells her of it; he doth not call her a strumpet, but tells her, He with whom thou livest, is not thy husband. Thus he avoids the very thing he is come to say the rest. Note, Reproofs are ordinarily most profitable when they are least provoking. 3. Yet in this he puts a better construction than it would well bear, upon what she said by way of shuffle and evasion; Thou hast well said, I have no husband; and again, In that saidst thou truly. What she intended as a denial of the fact, (that she had none with whom she lived as a husband,) he favourably interpreted, or at least turned upon her as a confession of the fault. Note, Those who would win souls, should make the best of them, whereby they may hope to work upon their good-nature; for if they make the worst of them, they certainly aggravate their ill-nature.

(3.) The next subject of discourse with this woman, is concerning the place of worship, (v. 19—24.) where we may observe,

First, A case of conscience proposed to Christ by the woman, concerning the place of worship, v. 19, 20. And there.

1. The inducement she had to put this case: Sir, I perceive that thou art a Prophet. She does not deny the truth of what he had charged her with, but by her silence owns the justice of the reproof; nor is she put into a passion by it, as many are when they are touched in a sore place; does not impute it to him, as others do. She doth not at first suspect that the place of worship is the temple in Jerusalem, nor that she was a Samaritan; but (which is a rare thing) can hear to be told of a fault. But that is not all, she uses further, (1.) She speaks respectfully to him, calls him Sir. Thus should we honour those that deal faithfully with us. This was the effect of Christ's meekness in reproving her; he gave her no ill language, and then she gave him none. (2.) She acknowledges herself, to be a woman, (as she was,) that had a correspondence with Heaven. Note, The power of the word of Christ in searching the heart, and convincing the conscience of secret sins, is a great proof of its divine authority. 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. (3.) She desires some further instruction from him. Many that are not angry at their reprovers, nor fly in their faces, yet are afraid of them, and keep out of their way; but this woman was willing to have some more discourse with him to unfold her of her faults. 2. The case itself that she propounded concerning the place of religious worship in public. She think that she started this, to shift off further discourse concerning her sin. Controversies in religion often prove great prejudices to serious godliness; but, it should seem, she proposed it with a good design: she knew she must worship God, and desired to do it aright; and therefore, meeting with a Prophet, begs his direction. Note, It is our wisdom to beware all such things; of entertaining our knowledge in the things of God. When we are in company with those that are fit to teach, let us be forward to learn; and have a good question ready to put to those who are able to give a good answer.

It was agreed between the Jews and the Samaritans, that God is to be worshipped; (even those who were such fools as to worship false gods, were not such brutts as to worship nothing:) and that religious worship is a property of great importance, and not to be contended about, if it were not about concernment about. But the matter in variance was, where they should worship God. Observe how she states the case:

(1.) As for the Samaritans; Our fathers worshiped in this mountain, near adjoining to this city, and this well; there the Samaritan temple was built by Sambatiah; in favour of which she intimated. [1.] That, whatever the temple was, the place was holy;
it was mount Gerizim, the mount on which the blessings were pronounced; and, some think, the same on which Abraham built his altar, (Gen. 12, 6, 7.) and Jacob his, Gen. 33. 18. (2.) That it might plead prescription; Our fathers worshipped here. She thinks they have antiquity, tradition, and succession, on their side. A vain conversation often supports itself with this, that it was received by tradition. But she had little reason to boast of their fathers; for, when Antiochus persecuted the Jews, the Samaritans, for fear of sharing with them in their sufferings, not only renounced all relation to the Jews, but surrendered their temple to Antiochus, with a request that it might be dedicated to Jupiter Olympus, and called by his name. Joseph. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 7. (2.) As to the Jews: Ye say, that in Jerusalem is the temple of God, (2 Kings 17. 32.) but they were sunk into gross ignorance, is wasteful of him; but, 1. That worship God ignorantly, offer the blind for sacrifice, and it is the sacrifice of fools. (2.) That the Jews were certainly in the right. For, First, "We know what we worship. We go upon sure grounds in our worship, for our people are catechised and trained up in the knowledge of God, as he has revealed himself in the scripture." Note, Those who by the scriptures have obtained some knowledge of God, (a certain though not a perfect knowledge,) may worship him comfortably to themselves, and acceptably to him, for they know what they worship. Christ elsewhere corrects the corruptions of the Jews' worship, (Matt. 13. 9.) and yet here defends the worship itself; the worship may be true where yet it is not pure and entire. Observe, Our Lord Jesus was pleased to reckon himself among the worshippers of God; We worship. Though he were a Son, (and then are the children free,) yet learned he this obedience, in the days of his humiliation. Let not the greatest of men think the worship of God below them, when the Son of God himself did not.

Secondly, Salvation is of the Jews; and therefore they know what they worship, and what ground they go upon in their worship. Not that all the Jews were saved, or that it was not possible but that many of the Gentiles and Samaritans might be saved, for in every nation he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him; but, 1. The author of eternal salvation comes of the Jews, appears among them, (Rom. 9. 8.) and is sent first to bless them. 2. The means of eternal salvation are afforded to them. The word of Salvation (Acts 13. 28.) was of the Jews. It was delivered to them, and was through them derived to other nations. This was a sure guide to them in their devotions, and was a faithful monitor, and therefore knew what were worshipped. To them were committed the oracles of God, (Rom. 9. 4.) and the service of God, Rom. 8. 4. The Jews therefore being thus privileged and advanced, it was presumption for the Samaritans to vie with them.

(2.) He describes the evangelical worship, which alone God would accept of, and be well pleased with; having showed that the place is indifferent, he comes to show that the form is also indifferent—what is it that we worship God in spirit and in truth, v. 23, 24. The stress is not to be laid upon the f.ace where we worship God, but with what mind we worship him. Note, The most effectual way to take up differences in the lesser matters of religion, is to be more zealous in the greater. They who daily make it the matter of their care to worship in the Spirit, cve would him—should not make it the matter of their strife, whether he should be worshipped here or there. Christ had justly preferred the Jewish worship before the Samaritan, yet here he intimates the ineffacability of that. The worship was ceremonial, and therefore could not be united with the gospel—a carnal and many strangers to the inward part of divine worship. Note, It is possible that we may be better than our neighbours, and yet not as good as we should be. It concerns us to be right, not only in the object of our worship, but in the manner of it; and that is it which Christ here instructs us in.

Observe, 1. The great and glorious revolution which should produce this change: The hour cometh, and now is, the fixed, stated time, concerning which it was of old determined when it should come, and how long it should last. The time of its appearance is fixed to an hour, so punctual and exact are the divine counsels; the time of its continuance is limited to an hour, so close and pressing is the opportunity of divine grace, 2 Cor. 6. 2. This hour cometh, it is coming in its full strength, hostre, and perfection; it must be in the embryo and infancy. The perfect day is coming, and now it draws. [2.] The blessed change itself. In gospel-times the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth. As creatures, we worship the Father of all; as Christians, we worship the Father of our Lord Jesus. Now the change shall be,

First, In the nature of the worship. Christians shall worship God, not in the ceremonial observances of the Mosaic institution, but in spiritual worship, consisting less in bodily exercise, and animated and invigorated more with divine power and energy. The way of worship which Christ has instituted, is rational and intellectual, and refined from those external rites and ceremonies with which the Old-Testament worship was both clouded and clogged. This is called true worship, in opposition to that which was typical. The legal services were figures of the true, Heb. 9. 9, 24. They that revolted from Judaism to Christianity, are said to begin in the spirit, and end in the flesh, Gal. 3. 3. Such was the difference between Old-Testament and New-Testament institutions.

Secondly, In the temper and disposition of the worshippers; and so the true worshippers are good Christians, distinguished from hypocrites; all should, and they will, worship God in spirit and in truth, Matt. 28. 19. But so often spoked of, (v. 24.) as their character, and, (v. 24.) as their command. Note, It is required of all that worship God, that they worship him in spirit and in truth. 1. We must worship God in spirit, Phil. 3. 3. We must depend upon God's Spirit for strength and assistance, laying our souls under his influences and operations; we must devote our own spirits to, and employ them in, the service of God; (Rom. 1. 9.) must worship him with fixedness of thought, and a flame of affection, with all that is infused into the soul in the inspiration of grace, in opposition to the flesh, which is the corrupt nature; and so to worship God with our spirit, is to worship him with our graces, Heb. 12. 28. 2. In truth, that is, in sincerity; God requires not only the inward part in our worship, but truth in the inward parts, Ps. 31. 6. We must mind the power more than the form; must aim at God's glory, and not to be seen of men; draw near with a true heart, Ps. 50. 10, 14.

(3.) The reason why God must be thus worshipped.

[1.] Because in gospel-times they, and they only, are accounted the true worshippers. The gospel erects a spiritual way of worship, so that the professors of the gospel are not true in their professions, do not live up to gospel-light and laws, if they do no worship God in spirit and in truth. Vol. v. 1 U

[2.] Because the Father seeketh such worshippers of him. This intimates, First, That such worshippers are very rare, and sold in met with, Jer. 30. 21. The gate of spiritual worshipping is strait. Secondly, That such worship is necessary, and that the Father of all can not triumph, when God's cause is neglected. Who would do inquirers for worshippers, the question will be, "Who worshipped at Jerusalem?" but, "Who worshipped in spirit?" That will be the touchstone. Thirdly, That God is greatly well pleased with, and graciously accepts of such worship and such worshippers. I have desired it, Ps. 145. 13, 14. Cant. 2. 14. Fourthly, That there has been, and will be to the end, a remnant of such worshippers; his seed is not extinct, and the works of them such. God is in all ages gathering in to himself a generation of spiritual worshippers.

[3.] Because God is a Spirit. Christ came to declare God to us, ch. 1. 18. And he has declared concerning him, he declared it to this poor Samaritan woman, for the meanest are concerned to know God; and with this design, to rectify her mistakes concerning religious worship, to which nothing would contribute more than the right knowledge of God. Note, First, God is a Spirit, for he is an infinite and eternal Mind; an intelligent Being, incorporeal, immaterial, invisible, and incorruptible. It is easier to say what God is not, than what he is; a spirit has not flesh and bone, but who knows the way of a spirit? If God were not a Spirit, he could not be perfect, nor infinite, nor eternal, nor independent, nor the Father of spirits. Secondly, The spirituality of the divine nature is a very good reason for the spirituality of divine worship. If we do not worship God, who is a Spirit, in the spirit, we neither give him the glory due to his name, and so do not perform the act of worship; nor can we hope to obtain his favour and acceptance, and so we miss of the end of worship, Matth. 15. 8, 9.

(4.) The last subject of discourse with this woman, is, concerning the Messias, v. 25, 26. Observe here this. First, The faith of the woman, by which she expected the Messias; I know that Messias cometh—and he will tell us all things. She had nothing to object against what Christ had said; his discourse was, for aught she knew, what might become the Messias then expected; but from him she should receive it, and in the mean time she thinks it best to suspend her belief. Thus many have no heart to see the prize of their faith; one comes and offers them the thought, they think they have a better in their eye, and deceive themselves with a promise that they will learn that hereafter, which they neglect now. Observe here,

1. Whom she expects; I know that Messias cometh. The Jews and Samaritans, though so much at variance, agreed in the expectation of the Messias and his kingdom. The Samaritans received the writings of Moses, and were no strangers to the prophets, nor to the hopes of the Jewish nation; those who knew least, knew this, that Messias was to come; so general and uncontested was the expectation of him, and at this time more raised than ever; (for the sceptre was departed from Judah, Daniel's weeks were near expiring;) so that she concludes not only, He will come, but igrit—"He comes, he is just at hand." Messias is called Christ, the Hebrew word Messias, (which the woman used in honour to the holy language, and to the Jewish church, that used it familiarly,) yet, writing for the use of the Gentiles, he takes care to render it by a Greek word of the same signification, which is called Christ—Anointed; giving an example to the apostle's rule, that, whatever is spoken in one, less vulgar tongue, should be interpreted, 1 Cor. 14. 27, 28.
2. What she expects from him: "He will tell us all things relating to the kingdom of God which we need to know, yea, he will tell us which will supply our defects, rectify our mistakes, and put an end to all our disputes. He will tell us the mind of God fully and clearly, and keep back nothing." Now this implies an acknowledgment, (1.) Of the deficiency and imperfection of the discovery they now had of the divine will, and the rule they had of the divine worship: it could not make the camera tenebrae perfect and therefore they expected some great advance and improvement in matters of religion, a time of reformation. (2.) Of the sufficiency of the Messiah to make this change; "He will tell us all things which we want to know, and about which we wrangle in the dark. He will introduce peace, by leading us into all truth, and dispelling the mists of error." It seems this was the comfort of good people in those dark times, that light would arise; if they found themselves at a loss, and run a-ground, it was a satisfaction to them to say, When Messiah comes, he will tell us all things; as it may be to us now with reference to his second coming; now we see through a glass, but then face to face.

Secondly, The favour of our Lord Jesus in making himself known to them, (v. 26.) And that speak to them, and Christ did never make himself known so express ly to any as he did here to this poor Samaritan, and to the blind man; (ch. 9. 37.) no, not to John Baptist, when he sent to him; Matth. 11. 4, 5.) no, not to the Jews, when they challenged him to tell them whether he was the Christ, ch. 10. 24. But, 1. Christ would thus put an honour upon such as were poor and despised, Isa. 2. 6. 2. He knew, we know, had never had an opportunity of seeing Christ's miracles, which were then the ordinary method of conviction. Note, To those who have not the advantage of the external means of knowledge and grace, God hath secret ways of making up the want of them; we must therefore judge charitably concerning such; God can make the light of grace shine into the heart, even where he doth not make the light of the gospel shine in the face. 3. This woman was better prepared to receive such a discovery than others were; she was big with expectation of the Messiah, and ready to receive instruction from him. Christ will manifest himself to those who with an honest, humble heart desire to be acquainted with him; I that speak to thee, am he. See here, (1.) How near Jesus Christ was to her, when she knew not who he was, Gen. 38. 16. Many are lamenting Christ's absence, and longing for his presence, when at the same time he is speaking to them. (2.) How Christ makes himself known to us by speaking to us; I that speak unto thee so closely, so convincingly, with such assurance, with such authority, I am he.

27. And upon this came his disciples, and marvelled that he talked with the woman; yet no man said, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her? 28. The woman then left her water-pot, and went her way into the city, and saith to the men, 29. Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did: Is not this the Christ? 30. Then they went out of the city, and came unto him. 31. In the mean while his disciples prayed him, saying, Master, eat. 32. But he said unto them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of. 33. Therefore said the disciples one to another, Hath any man brought him aught to eat? 34. Jesus saith unto them, My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work. 35. Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? Behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest. 36. And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal; that both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together. 37. And herein is that saying true, One soweth and another reapeth. 38. I sent you to reap that whereon ye bestowed no labour; other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours. 39. And many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman, which testified. He told me all that ever I did. 40. So when the Samaritans were come unto him, they besought him that he would tarry with them: and he abode there two days. 41. And many more believed because of his own word; 42. And said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying; for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world.

We have here the remainder of this story of what happened when Christ was in Samaria, after the long conference he had with the woman.

I. The interruption given to this discourse by the disciples coming. It is probable that much more was said than is recorded; but just when the discourse was brought to a head, when Christ had made himself known to her as the true Messiah, then came the disciples. The daughters of Jerusalem shall not stir up, nor awake my love till she please. 1. They wondered at Christ's converse with this woman; marvelled that he talked thus earnestly (as perhaps they observed at a distance) with a woman, a strange woman, alone, he used to be more reserved; especially with a Samaritan woman, that was not of the prize sheath, and whose house Christ was, Gen. 31. 19. Master, should be as shy of the Samaritans as the other Jews were, at least, that he should not preach the gospel to them. They wondered he should condescend to talk with such a poor, contemptible woman, forgetting what despicable men they themselves were when Christ first called them into fellowship with himself. 2. Yet they acquiesced in it; they knew it was for some good reason, and some good end, which he was not bound to give them an account of, and therefore none of them asked, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her? Thus when particular difficulties occur in the word and providence of God, it is good to satisfy ourselves with this in general, that all is well which Jesus Christ saith and doeth. Perhaps there was something amiss in the order here, that Christ spake with the woman, and that it was something like the Pharisees being offended at his eating with publicans and sinners. But, whatever they thought, they said nothing; If thou hast thought evil, at any time, lay thy hand upon thy mouth, to keep that evil thought from turning into an evil word, Prov. 30. 32. Ps. 39. 17.

II. The notice which the woman gave to her neighbours, of the extraordinary person she had happened meet with, v. 28, 29. Observe here.

1. How she forgot her errand to the well, v. 28.
Therefore the disciples were come, and broke up the discourse, and perhaps she observed them not at first; but she went near: She withdrew, in civility to Christ, that he might have leisure to eat his dinner. She delighted in his discourse, but would not be rude; every thing is beautiful in its season. She supposed that Jesus when he had dined, would go forward in his journey, and therefore hastened to tell her neighbours, that they might come quickly; Yet a little while is the light in a vessel which is made to hold oil; and every good work was done, she applied herself to another. When opportunities of getting good cease, or are interrupted, we should seek opportunities of doing good; when we have done hearing the word, then is a time to be speaking of it.

Notice is taken of her leaving her water-pot, or pail. (1.) She left it in kindness to Christ, that he might have to drink with his dinner; and her water was his drink; he turned water into wine for others, but not for himself. Compare this with Rebecca's civility to Abraham's servant, (Gen. 24. 18.) and see that promise, Matt. 10. 42. (2.) She left it, that she might make the more haste into the city, to carry thither these good tidings. Those whose business it is to publish the name of Christ, must not encumber or entangle themselves with any thing that might hinder them. When the disciples were to be made fishers of men, they must forsake all. (3.) She left her water-pot, as one careless of it, being wholly taken up with better things. Note, Those who are brought to the knowledge of Christ, will show it by a holy contempt of this world, and the things of it. And those who are newly acquainted with the things of God, must be content, at first, they should take up with that not so wonderful to which they are brought; that the things of this world seem to be for a time wholly neglected. Mr. Hildersham, in one of his sermons on this verse, from this instance, largely justifies those who leave their worldly business on week days to go to hear sermons.

How she minded her errand to the town, for her heart was upon it; she went into the city, and said to the men, probably the attendants, the men in authority, whom, it may be, she found met together upon some public business; or to the men, that is, to every man she met in the streets; she proclaimed it in the chief places of concourse, Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did. Is not this the Christ? Observe,

(2.) How fair and ingenious she was in the notices she gave them concerning the stranger she had met with. (2.) She tells them plainly what induced her to admire him: He has told me all things that ever I did. No more is recorded than what he told her of her husbands; but it is not improbable that he had told her of more of her faults. Or, his telling her of that which she knew he could not by any ordinary means come to the knowledge of, convinced her that he could have told her of all that ever she did. If he could be a divine messenger, a prophet, and give her a knowledge of his own conscience. He told her that which none knew but God, and her own conscience. Two things affected her, First, The extent of his knowledge. We ourselves cannot tell all things that ever we did; (many things pass unheeded, and more pass away and are forgotten;) but Jesus Christ knows all the thoughts, words, and actions, of all the children of men; see Heb. 4. 13. He hath said, Compare thy work with Seraphim, The power of his word. This made a great impression upon her, that he had told her her secret sins with such an unaccountable power and energy, that, being told of them, she is convinced of all, and judged of all. She does not say, "Come, see a man that has told me strange things concerning religious worship, and the laws of it, that has decided the controversy between this mountain and Jerusalem, a man that calls himself the Messiah;" but, "Come, and see this woman's sins." She fastens upon that part of Christ's discourse, which one would think she should have been most shy of repeating; but experimental proofs of the power of Christ's word and Spirit are of all others the most cogent and convincing; and that knowledge of Christ into which we are led by the conviction of sin and humiliation, is most likely to be sound and sapient.

(2.) She invites them to come, and see him whom she had conceived so high an opinion of. Not barely, "Come, and look upon him," (she does not invite them to him as a show;) but, "Come, and converse with him; come, and hear his wisdom, as I have done, and you will be of my mind." She would not undertake to manage the arguments which had convinced her, in such a manner as to convince others; all that see the evidence of truth themselves are not able to make others see it; but, "Come, and talk with him, and you will find such a power in his word as far exceeds all other evidence." Note. Those who can do little else toward the conviction and conversion of others, may and should bring them to those means of grace which they themselves have found effectual. Jesus was now at the town's end; Now come see him. When opportunities of getting the knowledge of God are brought to our doors, we are inexcusable if we neglect them; shall we not go over the threshold to see him, whose day prophets and kings desired to see?

(3.) She resolves to appeal to themselves, and their own sentiments upon the trial: Is not this the Christ? She does not peremptorily say, "He is the Messiah," how clear soever she was in her own mind, and how often she had heard him call himself the Messiah, they otherwise they would not have thought of, and then refers it to themselves; she will not impose her faith upon them, but only propose it to them. By such fair, but forcible appeals as these, men's judgments and consciences are sometimes taken hold of ere they are aware.

(3.) What success she had in this invitation; (v. 3.) They went out of the city, and came to him. Though it might seem very improbable that a woman of so small a figure, and so ill a character, should have the honour of the first discovery of the Messiah among the Samaritans, yet it pleased God to incline their hearts to take notice of her report, and not to slight it as an idle tale. Time was, when he were the first that brought tidings to Samaria.
III. Christ's discourse with his disciples, while the woman was absent, p. 31-34. See how industrious our Lord Jesus was to redeem time, to husband every minute of it, and to fill up the vacancies of it. When the disciples were gone into the town, he dined with a Pharisee, and suited to her case; when she was gone into the town, his discourse with them was no less edifying, and suited to their case; it was well if we could thus gather up the fragments of time, that none of it may be lost.

Two things are observable in this discourse:

1. How Christ expresses the delight which he himself had in his work. His work was to seek and save that which was lost, to go about doing good. Now this work we here find him wholly taken up with.

For, (1.) He neglected his meat and drink for his work. When he sat down upon the well, he was swear, and needed refreshment; but this opportunity of saving souls made him forget his weariness and hunger. And he minded his food so little, that, [p. 32] (r. 33.) Has any man brought him ought to eat? He had so little appetite to his dinner, that they were ready to think he had dined already. They that make religion their business, when any of its affairs are to be attended, will prefer them before their food; as Abraham's servant, that would not eat till he had told his errand, (Gen. 24. 33.) and Samuel, who would not sit down till David was appointed. 1 Sam. 16. 11.

(2.) He made his word his meat and drink. The work he had done in instructing the woman; the work he had to do among the Samaritans; the prospect he now had of doing good to many, this was meat and drink to him; it was the greatest pleasure and satisfaction imaginable. Never did a hungry man, or an epicure, expect a plentiful feast with so much desire, nor feed upon its dainties with so much delight, as our Lord Jesus expected and improved an opportunity of doing good to souls. Concerning this he saith, [1.] That it was such meat as the disciples knew not of. They did not imagine that he had any design or prospect of planting his gospel among the Samaritans: this was a piece of unerringness they never thought of. Note, Christ by his gospel works does more to the souls of men than his own disciples knew of or expect. This may be said of good Christians too, who live by faith, that they have meat to eat which others know not of; joy which a stranger does not intermeddle with.

Now this word made them ask, Has any man brought him ought to eat? So apt were even his own disciples to understand him after a corporal and carnal manner, when he spake to them in the highest spirits. But when he said, I have meat to eat which you know not of; joy which a stranger does not intermeddle with. Now this word made them ask, Has any man brought him ought to eat? So apt were even his own disciples to understand him after a corporal and carnal manner, when he spake to them in the highest spirits. But when he said, I have meat to eat which you know not of; joy which a stranger does not intermeddle with. Now this word made them ask, Has any man brought him ought to eat? So apt were even his own disciples to understand him after a corporal and carnal manner, when he spake to them in the highest spirits. But when he said, I have meat to eat which you know not of; joy which a stranger does not intermeddle with.
First. Here in this place, where they now were, there was harvest-work for him to do. They would have him to eat, v. 31. "Eat!" said he, "I have other work to do, that is more needful: look what crowds of Samaritans are coming out of the town over the fields, that are ready to receive the gospel," probably, there were many now in view. People's forwardness to hear the word, is a great encouragement to ministers' diligence and liveliness in preaching it.

Secondly. In other places, all the country over, there was harvest-work enough for them all to do. "Consider the seasons: think of the state of the country, and you will find there are multitudes as ready to receive the gospel as a field of corn that is fully ripe, is ready to be reaped." The fields were now made white to the harvest, v. 36. 1. By the deliverance of God recalled in the prophecies of the Old Testament. Now was the gathering of the people to be led to Christ, (Gen. 44. 16,) when great ascensions should be made to the church, and the bounds of it should be enlarged, and therefore it was time for them to be busy. It is a great encouragement to us to engage in any work for God, if we understand by the signs of the times that this is the proper season for that work, for then it will prosper. 2. At present, while the people are really a people prepared for the Lord, Luke 1. 17. Since he began to preach the kingdom of God, every man was pressed into it, Luke 16. 16. This therefore was a time for the preachers of the gospel to apply themselves to their work with the utmost vigour; to thrust in their sickle, when the harvest was ripe, Rev. 14. 13. It was necessary to work now; pity that such a season should be let slip. If the corn that is ready shall be left, he shall be lost: and if the fowl shall pick it up. If seeds that are under convictions, and have some good inclinations, be not helped now, their hopeful beginnings will come to nothing, and they will be a prey to pretenders. It was also easy to work now; when the people's hearts are prepared, the work will be done suddenly, 2 Chron. 29. 5. It cannot but quicken ministers to take pains in preaching the word, when they observe that people take it with pleasure and benefit. (3.) That it was profitable and advantageous work, which they themselves would be gainers by: (v. 36.) "He that reapeth receiveth wages, and so shall you." Christ has undertaken to pay those well whom he employs in his work; for he will never do as Jehoiachin did, who sold his neighbours' service without wages, (Jer. 22. 13,) or those who by fraud kept back the hire of those particularly who reaped down their own fields, (v. 14.) Christ's people, though they cry to him day and night, shall never have cause to cry against him, nor to say that they served a hard Master. He that reapeth not only shall receive wages, but shall receive it. There is a present reward in the service of Christ, and his work is his own wages.

[1.] Christ's reapers have few; He gathereth fruit unto life eternal, that is, he shall both save himself and those that hear him. I find, (v. 36.) that the faithful reaper save his own soul, that is fruit abounding to his account, it is fruit gathered to life eternal. And if, over and above this, he be instrumental to save the souls of others too, there is fruit gathered; souls gathered to Christ are fruit, good fruit, the fruit that Christ seeks for; (Rom. 1. 13.) it is gathered for Christ, (Cant. 8. 11, 12,) it is gathered to life eternal. This is the comfort of faithful labourers, that their labour has a tendency to the eternal salvation of precious souls.

[2.] They have joy; that he that sows, and they that reap, may rejoice together. The minister who is the happy instrument of beginning a good work, is he that sows, as John Baptist was; he that is employed to carry it on and perfect it, is he that reaps; and both shall rejoice together.

Note. First, Though God is to have all the glory of the success of the gospel, yet faithful ministers may themselves take the comfort of it. The reapers share in the joy of harvest, though the profits belong to the master, 1 Thess. 2. 19, 20. Those ministers who are variously gifted and employed, should be so far from envying one another that they should rather mutually rejoice in each other's success. Those who are not Christ's ministers are not like serviceable, nor alike successful, yet, if they have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, they shall all enter together into the joy of their Lord at last.

(3.) That it was easy work, and work that was half done to their hands by those that were gone before them; (v. 37, 38.) Our service, and another reaped. This sometimes speaks a great judgment upon him that sows, (v. 36.) yet he will reap, but not alone, as 1 Thess. 2. 17. They shall sow, and another shall reap; as Deut. 6. 11. Houses full of all good things which their fathers never.

So here, Moses and the prophets and John Baptist had paved the way to the gospel, had sown the good seed which the New-Testament ministers did in effect but gather the fruit of. Send you to reap that where you have heaped, in comparison, no labourer, but Christ. (v. 38.)

[1.] This speaks two things concerning the Old-Testament ministry. First, That it was very much short of the New-Testament ministry. Moses and the prophets sowed, but they could not be said to reap, so little did they see of the fruit of their labour. Their writings have done much more good since they left us than ever their preaching did. Secondly, That it was very much serviceable to the present ministry. If the prophets foresaw the New Testament, and wrote the writings of the prophets, which were read in the synagogues every sabbath-day, raised people's expectations of the Messiah, and so prepared them to bid him welcome. Had it not been for the seed sown by the prophets, this Samaritan woman could not have said, (v. 29.) We know that the Messias cometh. The writings of the Old-Testament are in some respects more useful now than they could be to those whom they wrote, as it may be better understood by the accomplishment of them. See 1 Pet. 1. 12. Heb. 4. 2. Rom. 16. 25, 26.

[2.] This also speaks two things concerning the ministry of the apostles of Christ. First, That it was a fruitful ministry; they were reapers that gathered in a great harvest of souls to Jesus Christ, and did more in seven years towards the setting up of the kingdom of God among men, than the prophets of the Old-Testament had done in twice as many ages. Secondly, That it was much facilitated, especially among the Jews, to whom they were first sent, by the writings of the prophets. The prophets sowed in tears, crying out, We have laboured in vain; the apostles reaped in joy, saying, Thanks be to God who always causeth us to triumph. Note. From the labours of ministers that are dead and gone, much good fruit may be gathered, and those that succeed them, and the ministers that preceded them. John Baptist, and those that assisted him had laboured, and the disciples of Christ entered into their labours, built upon their foundation, and reaped the fruit of what they sowed. See what we have to do; to bless God for those that are gone before us; for their preaching and their writing; for what they did and suffered in their day, for we are entered upon their labours, and the studies and labours that they have made our work the easier. And when the ancient and modern labourers, those that came in to the vineyard at the third hour, and those that came in at the eleventh, meet in the day of account, they will be so far from envying one another the honour of their respective services, that both they that sowed and they that reaped shall rejoice together; and the great Lord of the harvest shall bless those who have...

IV. The good effect which this visit Christ made to the Samaritans (en passant) had upon them, and the fruit which was now presently gathered among them, v. 39—42. See what impressions were made on them.

1. By the woman's testimony concerning Christ, though a single testimony, and of one of no good impediments, we may no more than this, 'He told me all that ever I did;' yet it had a good influence upon many. One would have thought that his telling the woman of her secret sins, should have made them afraid of coming to him, lest he should tell them also of their faults; but they will venture that, rather than not be acquainted with one that they had reason to think was a prophet. And two things they were brought to.

(1.) To credit Christ's word; v. 39.) Many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman. So far they believed on him, that they took him for a Prophet, and were desirous to know the mind of God from him; this is favourably interpreted a believing on him. Now observe,

[1.] Who they were that believed; many of the Samaritans, were not of the house of Israel. Their faith was not only an aggravation of the unbelief of the Jews, from whom better might have been expected, but an earnest of the faith of the Gentiles, who would welcome that which the Jews rejected.

[2.] Upon what induction they believed for the saying of the woman. See here, First, How God is sometimes pleased to use very weak and unlikely instruments for the beginning and carrying on of a good work. A little maid directed a great prince to Elisha, 2 Kings 5. 2. Secondly, How great a matter a little fire kindles. Our Saviour, by instructing one poor woman, spread instruction to a whole town. Let not ministers be either careless in their preaching, or discouraged in it, because their hearers are few and mean; for, by doing good to them, good may be conveyed to more, and those that are more considerable. If they teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, a great number may learn at second hand. Philip preached the gospel to a single gentleman in his chariot upon the road, and he not only received it himself, but carried it into his country, and propagated it there. The Saviour taught by his Spirit to speak extraordinarily of Christ and the things of God. This woman could say little of Christ, but what she did say she spake feelingly; 'He told me all that ever I did.' Those are most likely to do good, that can tell what God has done for their souls, Ps. 66. 16.

(2.) They were brought to court his stay among them; (v. 46.) When they were come to him, they beseeched him that he would tarry with them. Upon the woman's report, they believed him to be a Prophet, and came to him; and when they saw him, the meanness of his appearance, and the manifest poverty of his outward condition, did not lessen their esteem of him, and expectations from him, but still they respected him as a Prophet. Note, There are hopes of those who are got over the vulgar prejudices that he would tarry with them. Upon the first sight. So far were they from being offended in him, that they begged he would tarry with them; [1.] That they might testify their respect to him, and treat him with the honour and kindness due to his character. God's prophets and ministers are welcome guests to all those who sincerely embrace the gospel as to Lydia, Acts 16. 15. [3.] That they might receive instruction from him. Those that are taught of God, are truly desirous to learn more, and to be better acquainted with Christ. Many would have bocked to one that would tell them his name, but few to one that would tell them their faults; tell them of their duty. The historian seems to lay an emphasis upon their being Samaritans; as Luke 10. 33.—17. 16.

The Samaritans had not that reputation for religion that the Jews had; yet the Jews, who saw Christ's miracles, drove him from them, while the Samaritans, who saw not his miracles, nor shared in his favours, yielded to him such extraordinary respect; and this gospel's success is not always according to the probability, nor what is experienced according to what is expected either way. The Samaritans were taught by the custom of their country to be shy of conversation with the Jews. There were Samaritans that refused to let Christ go through their town, (Luke 9. 53.) yet these begged him to tarry with them. Note, It does much to the praise of our love to Christ and his word, if it conquers the prejudices of education and custom, and sets light by the censures of men.

Now we are told that Christ granted their request. First, He abode there. Though it was a city of the Samaritans near adjoining to their temple, yet, when he was invited he tarried there; though he was upon another journey, yet, when he had an opportunity of doing good, he abode there. That is no real hindrance, which will further our account. Yet he abode there but two days, because he had other places to visit and other work to do, and those two days were as many as came to the share of this city, out of the few days of our Saviour's sojourn in Galilee.

Secondly, We are told what impressions were made upon them by Christ's own word, and his personal converse with them; (v. 41, 42.) what he said and did there, is not related, whether he healed their sick or no; but it is intimated, in the effect, that he said and did that which convinced them that he was the Christ; and the labours of a minister are best told by the good fruit of them. Their hearing of him had a good effect, but now their eyes see him; and the effect of that was,

1. That their number grew; (v. 41.) Many more believed; many that would not be persuaded to go out of the town to him, were yet wrought upon when he came among them, to believe in him. Note, It is comfortable to see the number of believers; and sometimes the zeal and forwardness of some may be a most effectual means of drawing others to Christ, and to stir them up to a holy emulation, Rom. 11. 14.

2. That their faith grew. Those who had been brought upon by the report of the woman, now saw cause to say, Now we believe, not for thy saying, v. 42. Here are three things in which their faith grew.

(1.) In the matter of it, or that which they did believe. Upon the testimony of the woman, they believed he was a Prophet. Now they believed him to be the Christ, the Anointed One, the very same that was promised to the fathers, and expected by them; and that being the Christ, he is the Saviour of the world; for that was the work to which he was anointed, to save his people from their sins. They believed him to be the Christ, or one clothed with the garments of royalty, and lying in the manger of the world, which they hoped would take them in, though Samaritans, for it was promised that he should be Salvation to the ends of the earth, Isa. 49. 6.

(2.) In the certainty of it; their faith now grew up to a full assurance; We know that this is indeed the Christ; 2x. 36—37;—not a pretended Christ, but a real one; not a typesh Saviour, as many under the Old Testament, but truly one. Such an assurance as this of divine truths is what we should labour after; not only, We think it probable, and are wil
ing to suppose that Jesus may be the Christ, but,
We know that he is indeed the Christ.
(3.) In the ground of it, which was a kind of spiritual sensation and experience: Now we believe,
not because of this saying, for we have heard him overseas. They had before believed for her saying, and it was well, it was a good step, but now the
and further, and much firmer footing for their faith;
"Now we believe, because we have heard him ourselves, and have heard such excellent and divine truths, accompanied with such commanding power and evidence, that we are abundantly satisfied and asured that this is the Christ." This is like what the queen of Sheba said of Solomon; (1 Kings 10. 6, 5.) The one half was not told me. The Samaritans, who believed for the woman's saying, now gathered further light; for by that law shall be given; he that is faithful in a little shall be trusted with more.
In this instance we may see how faith comes by hearing. (1.) Faith comes to the birth by hearing the report of men. These Samaritans for the sake of the woman's saying, believed so far as to come and hear, to come and make trial. Thus the instructions of parents and preachers, and the testimony of the church and scripture, are received and required the dextrine of Christ to our acquaintance,
and incline us to entertain it as highly probable, Bp. (2.) Faith comes to its growth, strength, and maturity, by hearing the testimony of Christ himself: and this goes further, and recommends his doctrine to our acceptance, and obliges us to believe it as undoubtedly certain. We were induced to look into the scripture, by the saying of those who tell us that in them they had found eternal life; but when we ourselves have found it in them too, have experienced the enlightening, convincing, regenerating, sanctifying, comforting power of the word, now we believe, not for their saying, but because we have searched them ourselves: and our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God,
1 Cor. 2. 5. Luke 17. 11.
Thus was the seed of the gospel sown in Samaria;
what effect there was of this afterward, does not ap-ppear, but we find that four or five years after, when Philip preached the gospel in Samaria, he found such blessed remains of this good work now wrought, that the people with one accord gave heed to those things which Philip spake, Acts 8. 5, 6, 8. But as some were pliable to good, so were others to evil,
when Simon Magus bewitched with his sorceries, Acts 8. 9, 10.
43. Now after two days he departed thence, and went into Galilee. (41.) For Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country. (43.) Then, when he was come into Galilee, the Galileans received him, having seen all the thingsthat he did at Jerusalem at the feast;
for they also went unto the feast.
(46.) So Jesus came again into Caana of Galilee, where he made the water wine.
And there was a certain nobleman, whose son was sick at Capernaum. (47.) When he heard that Jesus was come out of Judæa into Gailee, he went unto him, and besought him that he would come down and heal his son: for he was at the point of death.
(48.) Then said Jesus unto him, Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe.
(49.) The nobleman saith unto him, Sir, come down ere my child die.
(50.) Jesus saith unto him, Go thy way: thy son liveth.
And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way.
(51.) And as he was now going down, his-servants met him, and told him, saying, Thy son liveth. (52.) Then inquired he of them the hour when he began to amend. And they said unto him, Yesterday at the sev-
(53.) So the father knew that it was at the same hour in the which Jesus said unto him, Thy son liveth: and himself believed, and his whole house.
(54.) This is again the second maracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judæa into Galilee.

In these verses, we have,
1. Christ's coming into Galilee, v. 43. Though he was as welcome among the Samaritans as he could be anywhere, and had better success, yet af-fterwards dealt with them more as strangers, they were Samaritans, and he would not confirm those in their prejudices against him, who said, He is a Samaritan, (ch. 8. 48.) but because he must preach to other cities, Luke 4. 43. He went into Galilee, for there he spent much of his time. Now see here,
1. Whither Christ went into Galilee, into the country of Galilee, but not to Nazareth, which was strictly his own country; he went among the villages, and dealt going to Nazareth, the brow very, for a reason here given, which Jesus himself testified, who knew the temper of his countrymen, the hearts of all men, and the experiences of all prophets, and it is this, That a prophet has no honour in his own country. Note, (1.) Prophets ought to have no honour, because God has put honour upon them, and we do or may receive benefit by them. (2.) The honour due to the Lord's prophets has very often been denied them, and contumely put upon them.
(3.) This due honour is most frequently denied them in their own country; see Luke 4. 24. 44.

Matth. 13. 57. Not that it is universally true, (no rule but has some exceptions,) but it holds for the most part. Joseph, when he began to be a prophet, was most hated by his brethren; David was dissembled by his brother;
(1 Sam. 17. 28.) Jeremiah was maligning by the men that were his masters; (2 Kings 2. 6.) and by his clients in the Jews; and Christ's near kinsman spake most shilly of him, ch. 7. 3. Men's pride and envy made those seem to be instructed by those who once were their school-fellows and play-fellows, Desire of novelty, and of that which is far-fetched, and dear-bought, and seems to drop out of the sky to them, makes them despise those persons and things which they have been long used to, and know the beginning there of, ch. 44. 34. (4.) It was a great encouragement to go among a people that have no value for him or his labours. Christ would not go to Nazareth, because he knew how little respect he should have there. (5.) It is just with God to deny his gospel to those that despise the ministers of it.
They that mock the messengers, forfeit the benefit of the message.
Matth. 21. 33, 41.

What encouragement did he meet with among The Galileans in the country? (v. 43.) They received him, bade him welcome, and cheerfully attended on his doctrine. Christ and his gospel are not sent in vain; if they had not honour with some, they should have with others. Now the reason given why these Galileans were so ready to receive Christ is, because they had seen the miracles he did at Jerusalem, v. 43.
Observe, (1.) They went up to Jerusalem at the feast, the feast of the passover. The Galileans

ST. JOHN, IV.
very remote from Jerusalem, and their way thither lay through the country of the Samaritans, which was troublesome for a Jew to pass through, worse than Baca's valley of old; yet, in obedience to God's command, they went up through the feast, and there they became acquainted with Christ. Note, They that are diligent and constant in attending on public ordinances, some time or other meet with more spiritual benefit than they expect. (2.) At Jerusalem they saw Christ's miracles, which recommended him and his doctrine very much to their faith and affections. The miracles were wrought for the benefit of those that were wonderfully affected; still they were accidentally there, got more advantage by them than they did for whom they were chiefly designed. Thus the word preached to a mixed multitude may perhaps edify occasional hearers more than the constant auditory.

3. What city he went to; when he would go to a city, he chose to go to Cana of Galilee, where he had made the water wine; (v. 46.) this he went to, to see if there were any good fruits of that miracle remaining; and, if there were, to confirm their faith, and to water what he had planted. The evangelist mentions this miracle here, to teach us to keep in remembrance what we have seen of the works of Christ.

II. His curing of the nobleman's son that was sick of a fever. This story is not recorded by any other of the Evangelists.

Observe, (1.) Who the petitioner was, and who the patient; the petitioner was a nobleman, the patient was his son: There was a certain nobleman, Regulus, (so the Latin,) a little king; so called, either for the largeness of his estate, or for the extent of his power, or the royalties that belonged to his manor. Some understand it as bespeaking his preferment, he was a courtier, in some office about the king; others, as bespeaking his party, he was a Herodian, a royalist, a prerogative-man, one that espoused the interest of the Herods, father and son; perhaps it was Chuza, Herod's steward, (Luke 8. 3.) or Munen, Herod's foster-brother, Acts 13. 1. There were saints in Caesar's household. The father a nobleman, and yet the son sick; for dignities and titles of honour will be no security to persons and families against sickness and death. It was a strange case.

It was fifteen miles from Capernaum where this nobleman lived to Cana, where Christ now was; yet this affliction in his family sent him so far to Christ. 2. How the petitioner made his application to the Physician. Having heard that Jesus was come out of Judea to Galilee, and finding that he did not come toward Capernaum, but turned out toward the other side of the country, he went to him himself, and besought him to come and heal his son, v. 47. See here, (1.) His tender affection to his son, that when he was sick he would spare no pains to get help for him. (2.) His great respect to our Lord Jesus; that he would come himself to wait upon him, when he might have sent a servant; and that he besought him, when, as a man in authority, some would think he might have ordered his attendance. The greatest men, when they come to God, must be beggars, and have forms of pangs as pangs.

As to the cure he came upon, we may observe a mixture in his faith. [1.] There was sincerity in it; he did believe that Christ could heal his son, though his disease was dangerous. It is probable that he had physicians to him, who had given him over; but he believed that Christ could cure him when the case seemed deplorable. [2.] Yet there was doubt and affection about it; he could not persuade himself that Christ could heal his son, but as it should seem, he thought he could not heal him at a distance, and therefore he besought him that he would come down and heal him, expecting, as Naaman did, that he would come and strike his hand over the patient, as if he could not cure him but by a physical contact. Thus are we apt to limit the Holy One of Israel, and to stint him to our forms. The centurion, a Gentile, a soldier, was so strong in faith, as to say, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof, Matt. 8. 8. This nobleman, a Jew, must have Christ to come down, though it was a good day's journey, and despaired of a cure unless he come down, as if he must teach Christ how to work. We are encouraged to pray, but we are not allowed to prescribe; Lord, heal me; but whether with a word or a touch, we must leave to him.

3. The gentle rebuke he met with in this address; (v. 48.) Jesus said to him, *"I see how it is; except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe," as the Samaritans did, though they saw no signs and wonders, and therefore I must work miracles among you." Though he was a nobleman, and now in great about his son, and had showed great respect to Christ in coming so far to him, yet Christ gives him a reproof; men's dignity in the world shall not exempt them from the rebukes of the word or providence; for Christ reproves not after the hearing of his ears, but with equity, Isa. 11. 5. Observe, Christ first shows him his sin and weakness, to prepare him for mercy, and then grants him his request. Christ humbles those first with his favours, whom he intends to honour with his favours. The Conqueror first provokes them to their utmost courage, and then worketh his wonders among them. The nobleman had some miracle, (Luke 23. 8.) and this courrier was of the same mind, and the generality of the people too.

Now that which is blamed, is, (1.) That whereas they had heard by credible and incontestable report of the miracles he had wrought in other places, they would not believe except they saw them with their own eyes, Luke 4. 23. They must be honoured, and they must be humoured; or they will not be convinced. Their country must be graced, and their curiosity gratified, with signs and wonders, or else, though the doctrine of Christ be sufficiently proved by miracles wrought elsewhere, they will not believe; like Thomas, they will yield no method of conviction but what they shall prescribe. (2.) That, whereas they had seen divers miracles, which they (though they may not examine the evidence of,) were yet sufficiently proved Christ a Teacher come from God, and should now have applied themselves to him for instruction in his doctrine, which by its native excellence would have gently led them on, in believing to a spiritual perfection; instead of this, they would go no further in believing than they were driven by signs and wonders. The spiritual power of the word did not affect them, did not attract them, but only the sensible power of miracles, which were for them who believed not, while prospherying was for them that believe, 1 Cor. 14. 22. Those that admire miracles only, and despise prophesying, rank themselves with unbelievers.

4. His continued importunity in his address; (v. 49.) Sir, come down ere my child die. *"Lord," so it should be rendered. In this reply of his, we have,

my unbelief, he will cure his fever. This is the method Christ takes, first to work upon us, and then to work for us; and there is hope, if we find him entering upon this method, that we may be healed. (2.) Here is something that was blame-worthy: that was his infirmity; for, [1.] He seems to take no notice of the reproach Christ gave him, says nothing to it, by way either of confession or of excuse, for he is so wholly taken up with concern about his child, that he can mind nothing else. Note, The sorrow of the world is a great prejudice to our profiting by the word of Christ. Inordinate care and grief for them that choke the word, see Exod. 6. 2. [2.] He still discovered the weakness of his faith in the power of Christ. First, He must have Christ to come down, thinking that else he could do the child no kindness. It is hard to persuade ourselves that distance of time and place are no obstructions to the knowledge and power of our Lord Jesus; yet so it is, he sees afar off, for his eyes run to and fro; and he acts afar off, for his word, the word of his power, runs very swiftly. Secondly, He believes that Christ could heal a sick child, but not that he could raise a dead child, and therefore, O come down, ere my child die; as if then it would be too late; whereas Christ has the same power over death that he has over bodily diseases. He forgot that Elijah and Elisha had raised dead children; and is Christ’s power inferior to theirs? Thirdly, O come down, my child is sick; as if there were danger of Christ’s slipping his time. He that believeth, doth not make haste, but refers himself to Christ: ‘Sir, Lord, what and when and how thou pleasest.’ 5. The answer of peace which Christ gave to his request at last: (v. 50.) Go thy way, thy son liveth. Christ here gives us an instance, (1.) Christ was not only wise, but also full of pity; he not only could heal, but could heal with so much ease, without the trouble of a visit. Here is nothing said, nothing done, nothing ordered to be done, and yet the cure wrought: Thy son liveth. The healing beams of the Sun of righteousness dispense benign influences from one end of heaven to another, and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof. Though Christ is now in heaven, and his church on earth, he can send from heaven a healing beam, and it shall come down and heal his son. Christ will heal his son, and not come down. And thus the cure is the sooner wrought, the nobleman’s mistake rectified and his faith confirmed; so that the thing was better done in Christ’s way. When he denies what we ask, he gives what is much more to our advantage; we ask for ease, he gives patience. Observe, His power was exerted by his word. In saying, Thy son liveth, he showed that he has life in himself, and power to quicken whom he will. Christ’s saying, Thy son liveth, makes it alive. (2.) Of his pity; he observed the nobleman to be in pain about his son, and his natural affection discovered itself in that word, Ere my child, my dear child, die; and therefore Christ dropped the reproach, and gave him assurance of the recovery of his child; for he knows how a father feels his children.

6. The nobleman’s belief of the word of Christ; he believed, and went away. Though Christ did not gratify him so far as to go down with him, he is satisfied with the method Christ took, and reckons he has gained his point. How quickly, how easily, is that which is lacking in our faith, perfected by the word and power of Christ. Now he sees no wonder, and yet, he is ready the wonder done. (1.) Christ said, Thy son liveth, and the man believed him; not only believed the omniscience of Christ, that he knew the child recovered, but the omnipotence of Christ, that the cure was effected by his word. He left him dying; yet, when Christ said, he lived, like the father of the faith, against hope he believed on hope, and staggered not through unbelief. (2.) Christ said, Go thy way; and, as an evidence of the sincerity of his faith, he went his way, and gave neither Christ nor himself any further disturbance. He did not press Christ to come down, did not say, ‘If he do recover, yet a visit will be acceptable;’ no, he seems to suffer further sickness, but, like Hannibal, he goes with his works. He was entirely satisfied, he made no great haste home; did not hurry home that night, but returned leisurely, as one that was perfectly easy in his own mind. 7. The further confirmation of his faith, by comparing notes with his servants at his return. (1.) His servants met him with the agreeable news of the child’s recovery, v. 34. They met him not far off, but at home, and, knowing what their master’s cares were, they were willing as soon as they could to make him easy. David’s servants were loth to tell him when the child was dead. Christ said, Thy son liveth; and now the servants say the same. Good news will meet those that hope in God’s word. (2.) He inquired what hour the child began to recover; (v. 52.) not as if he doubted the influence of his blessing, but because his child’s recovery, but he was desirous to have his faith confirmed, that he might be able to satisfy any whom he should relate it to; for it was a material circumstance. Note, [1.] It is good to furnish ourselves with all the corroborating proofs and evidences that may be, to strengthen our faith in the word of Christ, that it may grow up to a full assurance. Show me a token for good. [2.] The like marks of a new discovery, and a fresh belief, will be of great use to us for the confirming of our faith. That was the course this nobleman took: He inquired of the servants the hour when he began to amend; and they told him, Yesterday at the seventh hour, (at one o’clock in the afternoon, or, as some think thirteen o’clock, at seven o’clock at night,) the fever left him; not only he began to amend, but he was perfectly well on a sudden, and returned to his house. Note, It was at the seventh hour, when Jesus said to him, Thy son liveth. As the word of God, well studied, will help us to understand his providences; so the providence of God, well observed, will help us to understand his word, for God is every day fulfilling his scripture. Two things would help to confirm his faith. First, That the child’s recovery was sudden, and not gradual. They name the precise time to him, and he remembered, not only, but at the seventh hour, the fever left him; not it abated, or began to decrease, but it left him in an instant. The word of Christ did not work like physic, which must have time to operate, and produce the effect, and perhaps cure by expectation only; no, with Christ it was instant—factum—he spake, and it was done: not, He spake, and it was set a doing. Secondly, That it was just at the same time that Christ spake to him, at that hour. The mechanisms and coincidences of events add very much to the beauty and harmony of Providence. Observe the time, and the thing itself will be more illustrious, for every thing is beautiful in its time; at the very time when it is promised, as Israel’s deliverance, (Exod. 12. 41.) at the very time when it is prayed for, as Peter’s deliverance, Acts 12. 12. In men’s works, distance of place is the delay of time, and the extension of business; but it is not so in the works of Christ. The pardon and peace, and comfort, and spiritual healing, which he speaks in heaven, is, if he pleases, at the same time effected, and wrought in the souls of believers; and when these two come to compera in the great day, Christ will be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe. 8. The subject and issue of this. The bringing of the cure to the family brought salvation to it. (1.) The nobleman himself believed. He had before believed the word of Christ, with reference to this particular occasion; but now he believed in Christ as the Messiah promised, and became one of his disciples. Thus the particular experience of the power and efficacy of one word of Christ, may be an introduction and means of the whole authority of Christ's dominion in the soul. Christ has many ways of gaining the heart, and by the grant of a temporal mercy may make way for better things. (2.) His whole house believed likewise. [1.] Because of the interest they all had in the miracle, which preserved the blossom and hopes of the family; this affected them all, and endeared Christ to them, and recommended him to their best thoughts. [2.] Because of the influence the master of the family had upon them all. A master of a family cannot give faith to those under his charge, nor force them to believe, but he may be instrumental to remove external prejudices which obstruct the operation of the evidence, and then the work is more sure. After this, Jeshua, was known for this, (Gen. 18. 19.) and Joshua, ch. 24. 13. This was a nobleman, and, probably, he had a great household; but when he comes into Christ's school, he brings them all along with him. What a blessed change was here in this house, occasioned by the sickness of the child! This should reconcile us to afflictions, we know not what good may follow from them. Probably, the conversion of this nobleman and his family at Capernaum might invite Christ to come afterward, and settle at Capernaum, as his head-quarters in Galilee. When great men receive the gospel, they may be instrumental to bring it to the places where they live. Lastly, Here is the evangelist's remark upon this cure; (v. 54.) This is the second miracle: referring to ch. 2. 11. where the turning water into wine is said to be the first; that was soon after his first return out of Judea, this soon after his second. In Judea he had wrought many miracles, ch. 3. 2. 4. 45. They had the first offer; but, being driven thence, he wrought miracles in Galilee. Somewhere or other Christ will find a welcome. People may, if they please, shut the sun out of their own house, but they cannot shut it out of the world. This is noted to be the second miracle. 1. To remind us of the first, wrought in the same place some months before. Fresh mercies should revive the remembrance of former mercies, as former mercies should encourage our hopes of further mercies. Christ keeps account of his favours, whether we do or no. 2. To let us know that this cure was before those many cures which the other evangelists mention to be wrought in Galilee, Matth. 4. 23. Mark 1. 4. Luke 4. 40. Probably, this cure (the patient being a person of quality) was the more talked of for that reason, and sent him crowds of patients; when this nobleman applied himself to Christ, multitudes followed. What abundance of good may great men do, if they be good men!

CHAP. V.

We have in the gospels a faithful record of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach, Acts 1. 1. These two are intertwined, because what he taught, explained what he did, and what he did confirmed what he taught. Accordingly, we have here his cure for a miracle, and a sermon. 1. The miracle was the cure of an impotent man, that had to diseased thirty-eight years, with the circumstances of that cure, v. 1. 16. 11. The sermon was Christ's vindication of himself before the Sanhedrin, when he was prosecuted as a criminal for healing the man on the Sabbath-day; in which, 1. He asserts his authority as Messiah, and Mediator between God and man, v. 17. 25. He proves it by the testimony of his Father, of John Baptist, of his miracles, and of the scriptures of the Old Testament, and condemns the Jews for their unbelief, v. 30. 47.

1. AFTERT this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. 2. Now there is at Jerusalem, by the sheep-market, a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches. 3. In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water. 4. For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first, after the troubling of the water, stepped in, was made whole of whatsoever disease he had. 5. And a certain man was there which had an infirmity thirty and eight years. 6. When Jesus saw him lie, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, Wilt thou be made whole? 7. The impotent man answered him, Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me. 8. Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk. 9. And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the same day was the Sabbath. 10. The Jews therefore said unto him that was cured, It is the sabbath-day; it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed. 11. He answered them, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk. 12. Then asked they him, What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk? 13. And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place. 14. Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and saith unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon thee. 15. The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus which had made him whole. 16. And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the Sabbath-day.

This miraculous cure is not recorded by any other of the evangelists, who confine themselves mostly to the miracles wrought in Galilee, but John relates those wrought at Jerusalem. Concerning this observe, 1. The time when this cure was wrought; it was at a feast of the Jews, that is, the passover, for that was the most celebrated feast. Christ, though residing in Galilee, yet went up to Jerusalem at the feast. 1. Because it was an ordinance of God, which, as a subject, he would observe, being made under the law; though, as a Son, he might have pleaded exemption. Thus he would teach us to attend religious assemblies, Heb. 10. 25.

2. Because it was an opportunity of good; for, (1.) There were great numbers gathered together there that time; it was a general rendezvous, at least, of all serious, thinking people from all parts of the country, beside travellers from other nations; and wisdom must be very in the places of concourse, Prov. 3. 21. (2.) It was to be hoped that they were in a good frame, for they came together to worship God and to spend their time in religious exercises. Now a mind, inclined to devotion, and zealous itself to the exercises of piety, is very often to the further discoveries of divine light and love, and to it Christ will be acceptable.

11. The place where this cure was wrought; at the house of Bethesda, which had a miraculous healing virtue in it, and is here particularly described, ver. 2-4.

1. Where it was situated; at Jerusalem, by the sheep-market; in τή σιταρεινή; it might as well be rendered, the sheep-cote, where the sheep were kept; or the sheep-gate, which we read of, Neh. 3. 1. through which the sheep were brought, as the sheep-market, where they were sold some time it had, and so, it yielded a more melancholy, but profitable, spectacle to those that went up to the temple to pray.

2. How it was called; it was a pool. (a pond, or bath,) which is called in Hebrew, Bethsaida—The house of mercy; for therein appeareth much of the mercy of God to the sick and diseased. In a world so much misery as this is, it is well that there are some Bethsadas—Houses of mercy, (remedies against these maladies,) that the scene is not all melancholy. An alms-house, so Dr. Hammond. Dr. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that this was the upper pool, (Isa. 7. 3.) and the old pool, Isa. 22. 11. That it had been used for washing from ceremonial pollutions, for convenience of which, the porches were built to dress and undress in, but it was lately become medicinal.

3. How it was fitted up; it had five porches, cloisters, piazzas, or roofed walks, in which the sick lay. Thus the charity of men conurred with the mercy of God for the relief of the distressed. Nature has provided remedies, but men must provide hospitals.

4. How it was frequented with sick and cripples; (v. 3.) In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk. How many are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! How full of complaints are all places, and what multitudes of impotent folk! It may do us good to visit the hospitals sometimes, that we may take occasion, from the calamities of others, to thank God for our comforts. The evangelist specifies three sorts of diseased people that lay here, blind, halt, and withered; or swine-shrunk, either in one particular part, as the man with the withered hand, Matt. 9. 6.

These are mentioned, because, being least able to help themselves into the water, they lay longest waiting in the porches. Those that were sick of those bodily diseases, took the pains to come far, and had the patience to wait long, for a cure; any of us would have done the same, and we ought to do so; but that men were as wise for their souls, and as solicitous to get their spiritual diseases healed. We are all by nature impotent folk in spiritual things, blind, halt, and withered; but effectual provision is made for our cure, if we will but observe orders.

5. What virtue it had for the cure of these impotent folk; (v. 4.) In angel went down, and troubled the water; and whose first stepped in was made whole. That this strange virtue in the pool was natural, or artificial rather, and was the effect of the washing of the sacrifices, which impregnated the water with I know not what healing virtue even for blind people; and that this angel was a messenger, a common person, sent down to stir the water, is altogether groundless; there was a room in the temple on purpose to wash the sacrifice in. Expositors generally agree, that the virtue this pool had, was supernatural. It is true, the Jewish writers, who are not sparing in recounting the praises of Jerusalem, do none of them make the least mention of this healing pool; of which silence in this matter, perhaps this was the reason, that it was taken for a passage of the near approach of the Messiah, and therefore, they who denied him to be come, industriously concealed such an indication of his coming; so that this is all the account we have of it. Observe, (1.) The first person of the medicine by an angel, who went down into the pool, and stirred the water. Angels are God's servants, and friends to mankind, and perhaps are more active in the removing of diseases, (as evil angels in the inflicting of them,) than we are aware of. Raphael, the apocryphal name of an angel, signifies medicus Dei—God's physic, or physician rather. See what mean offices the holy angels confersed to, for the good of mankind. Christ's birth; and others, at his birth the angels do it, we must think nothing below us but sin. The troubled of the water was the signal given of the descent of the angel; as the going up the hill of the mulberry tree was to David, and then they must bestow themselves. The waters of the sanctuary are then healing, when they are put in motion. Ministers must stir up the gift that is in them. When they are cold and dull in their ministrations, the waters settle, and are not apt to heal. The same descends, to stir the water, not daily, perhaps not frequently, but at a certain season; some think, at the three solemn feasts, to grace those solemnities; or, now and then; as infinite Wisdom saw fit. God is a free Agent in dispensing his favours.

(2.) The operation of the medicine; Whoever first stepped in, was made whole. Here is, [1.] A miraculously extent of the virtue, as to the diseases cured; what disease soever it was, this water cured it. Natural and artificial baths are as hurtful in some cases as they are useful in others, but this was a remedy for every malady, even for those that came from contrary causes. The power of miracles succeeds, where the power of nature succumbs. [2.] A miraculous limitation of the virtue, as to the persons cured; he that first stepped in, had the benefit; and that latterly, as Peter, that next came, was not cured, not those that lingered and came in after. This teaches us to observe and improve our opportunities, and to look about us, that we slip not a season which may never return. The angel stirred the waters, but left the diseased to themselves to get in. God has put virtue into the scriptures and ordinances, for he would have healed us; but if we do not make the discovery of them, it is our own fault, we would not be healed.

Now this is all the account we have of standing miracles; it is uncertain when it began, and when it ceased. Some conjecture it began when Elias laid the High-Priest began the building of the wall about Jerusalem, and sanctified it with prayer; and that God testified his acceptance, by putting this virtue into the adjoining pool. Some think it began new about the day of Pentecost, by the descent of the Comforter. Dr. Lightfoot, finding in Josephus, Antiq. B. 15. cap. 7, mention of a great earthquake in the seventh year of Herod, thirty years before Christ's birth, supposed, since there used to be earthquakes at the descent of angels, that then the angel first descended to stir this water. Some think it ceased with this miracle, others at Christ's death; however, it is certain that it had a gracious signification,
First, It was a token of God's good will to that people, and an indication, that, though they had been long without prophets and miracles, yet God had not abandoned them, though they were now an oppressed despised people, and many were ready to say, Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of; God did hereby let them know that he had still a kindness for the city of their solemnities.

We may from hence take occasion to acknowledge with thankfulness God's power and goodness in the manifold waters, that contribute so much to the health of mankind, for God made the fountains of water, Rev. 14. 7.

Secondly, It was a type of the Messiah, who is the Fountain opened; and was intended to raise people's expectations of him, who is the Sun of righteousness, that arises with healing under his wings. Those waters had formerly been used for purifying now for healing, to signify both the cleansing and curing virtue of the blood of Christ, that incomparable bath, which heals all our diseases. The waters of Siloam, which filled this pool, signified the kingdom of David, and of Christ the Son of David; (Isa. 6. 5.) fitly therefore have they now this sovereign virtue put into them. The laver of regeneration is so as Bethesda's pool healing our spiritual diseases; but at certain seasons, but at all times. Whosoever will, let him come. III. The patient on whom this cure was wrought; (v. 5.) one that had been infirm thirty-eight years. 1. His disease was grievous; he had an infirmity, a weakness; he had lost the use of his limbs, at least, on one side, as is usual in palsies. It is sad to have the body so disabled, that, instead of being the soul's instrument, it is become, even in the affairs of this life, its burden. What reason have we to thank God for bodily strength, to use it for him, and to pity those who are his prisoners? 2. The duration of it was tedious; thirty-eight years: he was lame longer than most live. Many are so long disabled for the offices of life, that, as the pensmen complain, they seem to be made in vain; for suffering, not for service; born to be always dving. Shall we complain of one wearisome night, or one ill fit, who perhaps for many years have scarcely known what it has been to be a day sick, when many others, better than we, have scarcely known what it has been to be a day well? Mr. Baxter's note on this passage is very affecting; "How great a mercy was it, when that wretched servant, thirty-eight years under God's sufferings, "and those "in his discipline, Oh my God," saith he, "I thank thee for the like discipline of fifty-eight years; how safe a life this, "in comparison of full prosperity and pleasure!"

IV. The cure and the circumstances of it briefly related, v. 6-9. 1. Jesus saw him lie. Observe, When Christ came up to Jerusalem, he visited not the palaces, but the hospitals, which is an instance of his humanity, and condescension and tender compassion; and an indication of his great design in coming into the world, which was to seek and save the sick and wounded. There was a great multitude of poor cripples here at Bethesda, but Christ fastened his eye upon this one, and singled him out from the rest, because he was senior of the house, and in a more eminent degree of his right; and that Christ delights to help the helpless; and hath mercy on whom he will have mercy. Perhaps his companions in tribulation insulted over him, because he had been often disappointed of a cure, therefore Christ took him for his patient: it is his honour to side with the weakest, and bear up those whom he sees run down. 2. He knew, and considered how long he had lain in this condition. Those that have been long in affliction, may comfort themselves with this, that God keeps account how long, and knows our frame and gifts. 3. He asked him. Why thou be made whole? A strange question to be asked one that had been so long ill. Some indeed would not be made whole, because their sores serve them to beg by, and serve them for an excuse for idleness; but this poor man was as unable to go a begging as to work, yet Christ put it to him. (1.) To express his own pity and compassion for him, that had so long been currying the desires of those that are in affliction, and is willing to know what is their petition; "What shall I do for you?" (2.) To try him whether he would be beholden to him for a cure, whom the great people were so prejudiced against, and sought to prejudice others. (3.) To teach him to value the mercy, and to excite in him desires after it. In spiritual cases, people are not willing to be cured of their sins, are loath to part with them. If this point therefore were but gained, if people were willing to be made whole, the work were half done, for Christ is willing to heal, if we be but willing to be healed, Matth. 8. 3.

4. The poor impotent man takes this opportunity to renew his complaint, and set forth the very instance of his case, which makes his case the more instructive; (v. 7.) Sir, I have no man to put me into the pool. He seems to take Christ's question as an imputation of carelessness and neglect; "If thou hast had a mind to be healed, thou wouldst have looked better to thy hits, and have got into the healing waters long before now." No, Master," saith the poor man, "it is not for want of a good will, but a good friend, that I am unhealed; I have done what I could to help myself, but in vain, for no one else will help me." (1.) He does not think of any other way of being cured than by these waters, and desires no other friendship than to be helped into them; therefore, when Christ cured him, his imagination or expectation could not contribute to it, for he thought of no such thing.

(2.) He complains for want of friends to help him in; "I have no man, no friend, to do me that kindness." One would think that some of those who had been themselves healed, should have lent him a hand; but it is common for the poor to be destitute of friends; no man careth for thy soul. To the sick and impotent, it is as true a piece of charity to work for them, as to the rich and well. (3.) He thanks God for being charitable to one another, and ought to be so, though we seldom find that they are so; I speak it to their shame.

(3.) He bewails his infidelity, that very often when he was coming, another stepped in before him. But a step between him and a cure, and yet he continues impotent. None had the charity to say, "Your case is so flourishing, you go in now, and I will stay till the next time;" for there is no getting over the old maxim, Everyone for himself. Having been so often disappointed, he begins to despair, and now is Christ's time to come in to his relief; he delights to help in desperate cases. Observe, How mildly this man speaks of the unkindness of those about him, without any peevish reflections. As it is to be thankful for the least kindness, so we should be patient under the greatest contumels; and, let our resentment be ever so just, yet our expressions should ever be calm. And observe further, to his praise, that though he had waited so long in vain, yet still he continued lying by the pool-side, hoping that some time or other help would come, Hab. 2. 3.

Our Lord Jesus hereupon cures him with a word speaking, though he neither asked it, nor thought of it.
Here is, (1.) The word he said, (v. 8.) Rise, take up thy bed.

1. He is bidden to rise and walk; a strange command to be given to an impotent man, that had been long disabled; but this divine word was to be the vehicle of a divine power; it was a command to the disease to be gone, to nature to be strong, but it is expressed as a command to him to bester himself. He must have exerted himself to do what he was bid; he is put in the essay he should receive strength to do it. The conversion of a sinner is the cure of a chronic disease; this is ordinarily done by the word, a word of command; Arise, and walk; turn and live; make ye a new heart; which no more supposes a power in us to do it, without the grace of God, distinguishing grace, than this supposed a power in the impotent man. But if he had not attempted to help himself, he had not been cured, and he must have borne the blame; yet it does not therefore follow, that, when he did rise and walk, it was by his own strength; no, it was by the power of Christ, and he must have all the glory. Observe, Christ did not bid him rise, and go into the waters, but rise and walk. Christ did that for us, which the law could not do; yet he giveth (v. 17.) all things to his faithful and chosen.

2. He is bidden to take up his bed. First, To make it to appear that it was a perfect cure, and purely miraculous; for he did not recover strength by degrees, but from the extremity of weakness and impotency he suddenly stepped into the highest degree of bodily strength; so that he was able to carry as great a load as any porter that had been as long used to it as he had been disabled. He, who this minute was able to carry his bed, the man sick of the palsy (Matth. 9. 6.) was bidden to go to his house, but probably this man had no house to go to, the hospital was his home; therefore he is bidden to rise, and walk. Secondly, It was to proclaim the cure, and make it public; for, being the sabbath-day, whoever carried a burden through the streets, made himself very remarkable, and every one would inquire what was the meaning of it; thereby the notice of the miracle would spread, to the honour of God. Thirdly, Christ would thus witness against the tradition of the elders, which had stretched the law of the sabbath beyond its intention; and would likewise show that he was Lord of the sabbath, and had power to make what alterations he pleased about it, and to create the law. Jesus, and the hospi tal, and the hospital bed, were not made as long as the sabbath-day, when God commanded them; so did this man carry his bed, in obedience to a command. The case may be such, that it may become a work of necessity, or mercy, to carry a bed on the sabbath-day; but here it was more, it was a work of piety, being designed purely for the glory of God. Fourthly, He would hereby try the faith and obedience of his patient. By carrying his bed publicly, it exposed himself to the censure of the ecclesiastical court, and was liable, at least, to be segregated in the synagogue. Now, will he run the venture of that, in obedience to Christ? Yes, he will. Those that have been healed by Christ's word, should be ruled by his word, whatever it cost them.

(2.) The efficacy of this word; (v. 9.) a divine power went along with it, and immediately he was made whole; to the joy of all the world. He felt the power of Christ's word healing him; Immediately he was made whole. What a joyful surprise was this to the poor cripple, to find himself all of a sudden so easy, so strong, so able to help himself; what a new world was he in, in an instant! Nothing is too hard for Christ to do. He obeyed the power of Christ's word commanding him. He took up his bed, and walked, and did not care who blamed him, or threatened him, for it. The proof of our spiritual cure, is our rising and walking. * Hath Christ healed our spiritual diseases? Let us go wheresoever he sends us, and take up whatever he is pleased to lay upon us; and walk before him.*

V. What came of the poor man after he was cured. We are here told,

1. What passed between him and the Jews, who saw him carry his bed on the sabbath-day. For the day his cure was wrought, and it was the sabbath that fell within the passover-week, and therefore a high day, ch. 12. 31. Christ's work was such, that he needed not make any difference between sabbath-days and other days, for he was always about his Father's business; but he wrought many remarkable cures on that day, perhaps, to encourage his church to expect those spiritual favours from him, in their observance of the christian sabbath, which were typified by his miraculous cures. Now here,

(1.) The Jews quarrelled with the man for carrying his bed on the sabbath-day, telling him that it was not lawful, v. 10. It does not appear whether they were magistrates, who had power to punish him, or common people, who could only inform against him; but it was thought a smaller commission to inform, than to do what they knew not by what authority he did it, they were jealous for the honour of the sabbath, and could not unconcernedly see it profaned; like Nehemiah, ch. 13. 17.

(2. The man justifies himself in what he did, by a warrant that would bear him out, v. 11. "I do not do it in contempt of the law and the sabbath, but in obedience to mine, who, by colloquying me with an among them, had taught me that he is greater than either. He that could work such a miracle as to make me whole, do not doubt might give me such a command as to carry my bed; he that could create the powers of nature, no doubt might overrule a positive law, especially in an instance not of the essence of the law. He that was so kind as to make me whole, would not be so unkind as to bid me do what is sinful." Christ, by curing another paralytic, proved his power to forgive sin, here to give help; if his pardons are valid, his edicts are so, and his miracles prove both.

(3.) The Jews inquire further, who it was that gave him this warrant; (v. 12.) What man is that? Observe, How industriously they overlooked that which might be a ground of their faith in Christ. They inquire not, no, not for curiosity, "Who is he that made me whole?" While they industriously catch at that which might be a ground of reflection upon Christ; (What man is that who said unto thee, Take up thy bed?) they would fain subfusis the patient to be witness against the Physician, and to be his betrayer. In their question, observe,

1. They resolve to look upon Christ as a mere man; What man is that? For though he gave us ever such convincing proofs of they were resolved that they would never own him to be the Son of God.

2. They resolve to look upon him as a bad man, and take it for granted that he who bid this man carry his bed, whatever divine commission he might produce, was certainly a delinquent, and as such they resolve to prosecute him. What man is that who durst give such orders?

(4.) The poor man was not able to give them any account of his federal Christ. He went not who he was.

[1.] Christ was unknown to him, when he healed him. Probably, he had heard of the name of Jesus, but had never seen him, and therefore could not tell that this was he. Note, Christ doeth many a good turn for these that know him not, Isa. 45. 4, 5. He enlightens, strengthens, quickens, comforts us, and we went not who he is; nor are aware how much we receive daily by his mediation. This man, being unacquainted with Christ, could not actually believe in him for a cure; but Christ knew the dispositions of his soul, and suited his favours to them, as to the blind man that received from him, ch. 9. 36. Our covenant and communion with God take rise, not so much from our knowledge of him, as from his knowledge of us. We know God, or, rather, are known of him, Gal. 4. 9.

[2.] For the present, he kept himself unknown; for as soon as he had wrought the cure, he conveyed himself secretly away; (so some read it;) a multitude being in that place. This is mentioned, to show, either, First, How Christ conveyed himself away—by retiring into the crowd, so as not to be distinguished from a common person. He that was the chief of ten thousand, often made himself one of the throng. It is sometimes the lot of those who have by their services signalized themselves to God, to be hid in the multitude, and overlooked. Or, Secondly, Why he conveyed himself away; because there was a multitude there, and he industriously avoided both the applause of those who would admire the miracle, and cry that see, and the censure of those who would censure him as a Sabbath-breaker, and run him down. Those that are active for God in their generation, must expect to pass. When Christ's glory shone, it was with so much of the multitude, and overlooked, as much as may be, to keep out of the hearing of both; lest by the one we be excelled, and by the other depressed, above measure. Christ left the miracle to commend itself, and the man on whom it was wrought to justify it.

2. What passed between him and our Lord Jesus at their next interview; v. 14. Observe here,

[1.] Where Christ found him; in the temple, the place of worship, public worship; in our attendance on public worship we may expect to meet with Christ, and improve our acquaintance with him. Observe, [1.] Christ went to the temple; though he had many enemies, yet he appeared in public, because there he bore his testimony to divine institutions, and had opportunity of doing good. [2.] The man that was cured, went to the temple; there Christ found him the same day, as it should seem, that he was healed; thither he straightway went. First, Because he had, by his infirmity, been so long detained there; perhaps he had not been there for thirty-eight years, and therefore as soon as ever the embargo is taken off, his first visit shall be to the temple, as Zechariah intimates his shall be; (Isa. 38. 22.) What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord? Secondly, Because he had, by his recovery, a good errand thither; he went up to the temple, to return thanks to God for his recovery. When God has at any time restored us our health, we ought to attend him with solemn praises; (Ps. 116. 18, 19,) and the sooner the better, while the sense of the mercy is fresh. Thirdly, Because he had, by carrying his bed, seemed to put a contempt upon the sabbath; he would thus show that he had an honour for it, and made conscience of sabbath-sanctification, in that on which the chief stress of it is laid, which is the public worship of God. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed; but, when they are over, we must go to the temple.

[2.] What he said to him. When Christ has cured us, he has not done with us, he now applies him to the healing of sin by this by the word too.

[1.] He gives him a memorandum of his cure; Behold, thou art made whole. He found himself made whole, yet Christ calls his attention to it. Behold, consider it seriously, how sudden, how strange, how cheap, how easy the cure was; admire it; behold, and wonder at the number of the cure, and never be lost, Isa. 58. 9.

[2.] He gives him a caution against sin; in consideration hereof, Being made whole, sin no more. This implies that his disease was the punishment of sin; whether of some remarkably flagrant sin, or only of sin in general, we cannot tell; but we know that sin is the procuring cause of sickness, Ps. 107. 17, 18. Some observe that Christ did not make mention of sin to any of his patients, but only to this impotent man, and to one other who was in like manner diseased, Mark 2. 5. While those chronic diseases lasted, they prevented the outward acts of sin from being very frequent, therefore, now that these dispositions were removed, they had the more need to be watchful. Christ intimates to him, that those who are made whole, who are eased of the present sensible punishment of sin, are in danger of returning to sin, when the terror and restraint are over, unless divine grace dry up the fountain. When the trouble which only dammed up the current is over, the waters will return to their old course; and therefore there is need of great watchfulness, lest after healing mercy we return again to folly. The misery we were made whole from, warns us to sin no more, having felt the smart of sin; the mercy we were made whole by, is an engagement upon us not to offend him who healed us. This is the voice of every providence, Go, and sin no more. Therefore, now that those dispositions were very hopefully in the temple, yet Christ saw it necessary to give him this caution; for it is common for people, when they are sick, to promise much, when newly recovered, to perform something, but after a while to forget all.

[3.] He gives him warning of his danger, in case he should return to his former sinful course; Let a good thing come to thee. Christ, who knows all his heart's intents, knew that he has one of those that must be frightened from sin. Thirty-eight years' lameness, one would think, was a thing bad enough; yet there is something worse that will come to him if he relapse into sin after God has given him such a deliverance as this, Ex. 9. 13, 14. The hospital where he lay, was a melancholy place, but hell much more so: the doom of apostates is a worse thing than thirty-eight years' lameness.

Now, after this interview between Christ and his patient, observe in the two following verses,

First, The notice which the poor simple man gave to the Jews concerning Christ, v. 15. He told them it was Jesus that had made him whole. We have reason to think he intended this for the honour of Christ, and the benefit of the Jews, little thinking but he who had so great a power, and so great goodness, would have any enemies; but those who wish well to Christ's kingdom, must have the wisdom of the servant, lest they do more hurt than good with their zeal, and not cast pearls before swine.

Secondly, The rage and enmity of the Jews against him; Therefore did the rulers of the Jews persecute Jesus, Sect. 1. How absurd and unreasonable their enmity to Christ was. Therefore because he had made a poor sick man well, and so eased the public charge, upon which, it is likely, he had subsisted; therefore they persecuted him, because he did good in Israel. 2. How bloody and cruel it was; They sought to slay him; nothing less than his blood, his life, would satisfy them. 3. How it was fiasted over with a colour of zeal for the honour of the sabbath; for his keeping the public sabbath; because he had done those things on the sabbath-day; as if that circumstance were enough to vitiate the best and most divine actions, and to render him obnoxious whose deeds were otherwise most meritorious. Thus hypocrites often cover their real enmity against the power of godliness, with a pretended zeal for the form of it.

17. But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. 18
Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God. 19. Then answered Jesus and said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: for what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise.

20. For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth all things that himself doeth: and he will shew him greater works than these, that ye may marvel. 21. For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. 22. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: 23. That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which hath sent him. 24. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life. 25. Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. 26. For as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; 27. And hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man. 28. Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, 29. And shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. 30. I can of mine own self do nothing: as I hear I judge; and my judgment is just; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of my Father which hath sent me.

We have here Christ's discourse upon occasion of his being accused as a Sabbath-Breaker; and it seems to be his vindication of himself before the Sanhedrin, when he was arraigned before them; whether on the same day, or two or three days after, does not appear; probably, the same day. Observe,

1. The doctrine laid down, by which he justified what he did on the sabbath-day; (v. 17.) He answered them. This supposes that he had something laid to his charge; or what they suggested one to another, when they sought to slay him; (v. 16.) he knew, and gave this reply too, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work. At other times, in answer to the like charge, he had pleaded the example of David's eating of the shew-bread, of the priest's slaying of the sacrifices, and of the people's watering of their cattle, on the sabbath-day; but here he goes higher, and alleges the example of his Father and his divine authority; waving all other pleas, he insists upon that which was suppositio equivalent to the whole, and abides by it, which he had mentioned, Matt. 12. 8. The Son of man is Lord even of the Sabbath-day; but he here enlarges on it.

1. He pleads that he was the Son of God, plainly manifested in his calling God his Father; and it so, his holiness was unquestionable, and his sovereignty incontrovertible, and he might make what alterations he pleased of the divine law. Surely they will reverence the Son, the Heir of all things.

2. That he was a Worker together with God.

(1.) My Father worketh hitherto. The example of God's resting on the seventh day from all his works, is, in his usage, the ground of our observing it as a sabbath, or day of rest. Now God rested only from such work as he had done the six days before; otherwise he worketh hitherto, he is every day working, sabbath-days and week-days; upholding and governing all the creatures, and concursing by his common providence to all the motions and operations of nature, to his own glory; therefore, when we are appointed to rest on the sabbath-day, yet we are not restrained from doing that which has a direct tendency to the glory of God; as the man's carrying of his bed had.

(2.) I work; not only therefore I may work, like him, in doing good on sabbath-days as well as other days, but I also work with him. As God created all things by Christ, so he supports and governs all by him, Heb. 1. 3. This sets what he doeth all exception: he that is so great a Worker, that he must needs be an uncontrollable Governor; he that does all, is Lord of all, and therefore Lord of the sabbath; that particular branch of his authority he would now assert, because he was shortly to show it further, in the change of the day from the seventh to the first.

II. The offence that was taken at his doctrine; (v. 18.) The Jews sought the more to kill him. His mission was made his offence, as it by justifying himself he had made bad worse. Note, Those that will not be enlightened by the word of Christ, will be enlightened and exasperated by it; and nothing more vexes the enemies of Christ than his asserting of his authority: see Ps. 2. 3—5. They sought to kill him,

1. Because he had broken the sabbath; for let his say what he would, in his own justification, they are resolved, right or wrong, to find him guilty of sabbath-breaking. When malicious and envy sit upon the bench, reason and justice may even be silent at the bar, for whatever they can say, will undoubtedly be overruled.

2. Not only so, but he had said also, That God was his Father. Now they pretend a jealousy for God's honor, as before for the sabbath-day, and charge Christ with it as a heinous crime, that he made himself equal with God; and a heinous crime it had been, if he had not really been so. It was the sin of Lucifer, I will be like the Most High.

(1.) This was justly inferred from what he said; that he was the Son of God, and that God was his Father, so his as he was no one's else. He had said that he worked with his Father, by the same authority and power, and hereby he made himself equal with God. Ever, intelligent Judæi, quod non intelligite Ariani—heh, the Jews understand what the Arians do not.

(2.) Yet it was unjustly imputed to him as an offence, that he equalled himself with God; for he was, and is, God equal with God. And therefore, Christ, in answer to this charge, does not except against the imputo as strained or forced, but makes out his claim, and proves that he is equal with God in power and glory.
III. Christ's discourse upon this occasion, which continues without interruption to the end of the chapter; in these verses he explains, and afterward confirms, his commission, as Mediator, and Plenipotentiary in the treaty between God and man. And as the honours he is hereby entitled to, are such as it is not fit for any creature to receive, so the work he is hereby entrusted with, is such as it is not possible for any created spirit to bear upon his own burden, and therefore he is God equal with the Father.

1. In general. He is one with the Father in all he does as Mediator, and there was a perfect good understanding between them in the whole matter. It is ushered in with a solemn preface, (v. 19.) For, verily, I say unto you; I the Amen, the Amen, say it. This speaks what is said to be, (1.) Very awful and great, and such as demands the most serious attention. (2.) Very sure, and such as commands an unfeigned assent. (3.) It intimates that they are matters purely of divine revelation; things which Christ has told us, and which we could not otherwise have come to the knowledge of. Two things he saith in general, concerning the Son's oneness with the Father in working.

2. Secondly, He is observant of his Father's counsels; he can, he will, do nothing but what he sees the Father do, for these things does the Son. The Lord Jesus, as Mediator, is, First, obedient to his Father's will; so entirely obedient, that he can do nothing of himself, in the same sense as it is said, God cannot lie, cannot deny himself, which speaks the perfection of his truth, not any imperfection in his strength. In short, he is Mediator, not in the least sense, of his Father's will, that it was impossible for him in any thing to act separately. Secondly, He is observant of his Father's counsels; he can, he will, do nothing but what he sees the Father do. No man can find out the work of God, but the only-begotten Son, who lays in his bosom, sees what he does, and is intimately acquainted with his purposes, and has the plan of them ever before him. What he did as Mediator, throughout his whole undertaking, was the exact transcript or counterpart of what the Father did; that is, what he designed, when he formed the plan of our redemption in his eternal counsels, and settled those measures in every thing which never could be broken, nor ever needed to be altered; it was the copy of that great original; it was Christ's faithfulness, as it was Moses's, that he did all according to the pattern he saw in the mount. This is expressed in the present tense, what he sees the Father do, for the same reason, that, when he was here upon earth, it was said, He is in heaven, (ch. 3. 13.) and is in the bosom of the Father; (ch. 1. 18.) as he was even then by his divine nature present in heaven, so the things done in heaven were present to his knowledge. What the Father did in his counsels, the Son had every eye upon it, and when he had his eye upon it, as David in spirit spoke of him, I have set the Lord always before me, Ps. 16. 8. Thirdly, Yet he is equal with the Father in working, for what things swever the Father does, these also does the Son likewise; he did the same things, nor such things, but ως ουκ, the same things; and he did them in the same manner, ως ουκ, likewise, with the same power and energy; equal in measure, and the same energy and efficacy. Does the Father exact, repeal, and alter, positive laws? Does he overrule the course of nature, know men's hearts? So does the Son. The power of the Mediator is a divine power.

[2.] That the Father can vanquish to the Son, v. 20. Observe, First, The vanquish to it; The Father's power is not such as the Son's, he vanquished the Son. He had not only a good will to the undertaking, but an infinite complacency in the Undertaker. Christ was now hated of men, one whom the nation abhorred; (Isa. 49. 7.) but he comforted himself with this, that his Father loved him. Secondly, The instances of it. He shows it, 1. In what he does communicate to him; He sheweth him all things that himself doth. The Father's measures in making and ruling the world are showed to the Son, that he may take the same measures in framing and governing the church, which were wrought out in the world, under the ministry of the Spirit. And therefore is therefore called the world to come. He shows him all things what he doth, that is, which the Son does, so it might be constructed; all that the Son does, is by direction from the Father; he shows him.

2. In what he will communicate; he will show him that is, will appoint and direct him to do, greater works than these. (1.) Works of greater power than the curing of the impotent man, for he should raise the dead, and should himself rise from the dead. By the power of nature, with the use of means, a disease may possibly in time be cured; but nature can never, by the use of any means, in any time raise the dead. (2.) Works of greater authority than warranting of the man to carry his bed on his shoulders, for he will make the Father's name to be performed in him, though partly by the Father himself; and yet what was that to his abrogating of the whole ceremonial law, and instituting of new ordinances, which he would shortly do; that ye may marvel. Now they looked upon his works with contempt and indignation, but he will shortly do that which they will look upon with amazement, Luke 17. 18. Many are brought to marvel at Christ's works, but he will deal more for the honour of them, who are not brought to believe, by which they would have the benefit of them.

2. In particular. He proves his equality with the Father, by specifying some of these works which he does, that are the peculiar works of God. This is enlarged upon, v. 21—50. (1.) He does, and shall do, that which is the peculiar work of God's almighty power—the raise of the dead, and giving life; v. 21, 25, 26, 28. (2.) He does, and shall do, that which is the peculiar work of God's sovereign dominion and jurisdiction—judging, and executing judgement, v. 22—24, 27. These two are interwoven, as being nearly connected; and what is said once, is repeated and inculcated; put both together, and they will prove that Christ said not amiss, when he said himself equal to the Father.

[1.] Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's power to raise the dead, and give life. See, First, His authority to do it; (v. 21.) As the Father raiseth up the dead, so the Son quickeneth whom he will. 1. It is God's prerogative to raise the dead, and give life, even his who first breathed into man the breath of life. A man made his image said; re-gressus—Existence, when once extinguished, cannot be rekindled. It was there fore ridiculed at Athens as an absurd thing, Acts 17. 32. It is purely the work of a divine power, and the knowledge of it purely by divine revelation. This the Jews would own. 2. The Mediator is invested with this preroga- tive; He quickeneth whom he will; raises whom he will, and when he will. He does not en- liven things by natural necessity, as the sun does whose beams revive of course; but he acts as a free Agent, has the dispensing of his power in his own hand, and is neither constrained, or restrained, in the use of it. As he has the power, so he has the wisdom and sovereignty of God; has the keys of the great and of death (Rev. xxi. 13.) to impart, to open, and shut as he is pleased, for he has it as the key of David, which he is Master of, Rev. iii. 7.

7. An absolute prince is described by this; (Dan. iv. 28.) which is, Thou wouldst be king, or kept alive; it is true of Christ, without a parenthesis.

Secondly, His ability to do it. Therefore he has power to quicken when he will as the Father doth, because he has life in himself, as the Father has.

v. 26. 1. It is certain that the Father has life in himself. Not only he is a self-existent Being, who does not derive from, or depend upon, any other, (Exod. 3. 14.) but he is a sovereign Giver of life; he has the disposal of life in himself, and of all good; (for so life sometimes signifies;) it is all derived from him, and dependent upon him. He is to himself the fountain of life, and all good. Author of their being and well-being; the living God, and the God of all living.

2. It is as certain as that he has given to the Son to have life in himself. As the Father is the Original of all natural life and good, being the great Creator, so the Son, as Redeemer, is the Original of all spiritual life and good; is that to the church, that the Father is to the world; see 1 Cor. 8. 6. Col. 1. 19. The kingdom of God on earth, is as fully and absolutely in the Son as the kingdom of providence is in the hand of the Creator; and as God, who gives being to all things, has his being of himself, so Christ, who gives life, raised himself to life by his own power, ch. 10. 18.

Thirdly, His acting according to his authority and ability. Having life in himself, and being authorized to quicken whom he will, by virtue hereof there are, according to the design of his power, and his powerful word; both which are here spoken of.

1. A resurrection that now is, (v. 29.) a resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, by the power of Christ's grace. The hour is coming, and now is. It is a resurrection begun already, and further to be carried on; when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God. This is plainly distinguished from that, v. 28., which speaks of the resurrection of the just; that shall come, which is not as that does, of the dead in their graves, and of all them, and their coming forth. Now, (1.) Some think this was fulfilled in those whom he miraculously raised to life, James's daughter, the widow's son, and Lazarus; and it is observable, that all whom Christ raised, were spoken to as, Damsel, arise; Young man, arise; Lazarus, come forth; whereas, those raised under the Old Testament, were raised as a child, or a child, but other applications.

1 Kings 17. 17. 2 Kings 4. 34. 13. 21. Some understand it of those saints that rose with Christ; but we do not read of the voice of the Son of God calling them. But, (2.) Rather understand it of the power of the doctrine of Christ, for the recovering and quickening of those that were dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. 2. 1. The hour was coming, when dead souls of graver, and all the life in that kind shall hear and live. This may refer especially to the calling of the Gentiles, which is said to be as life from the dead, and, some think, was prefigured by Ezekiel's vision, (ch. 37. 1.) and foretold, Isa. 26. 19. They dead men shall live. But it is to be applied to all the wonderful success of the gospel, among both Jews and Gentiles; and the whole life and all the life in it, Bith knelling to the ear, and shall hear and live; and shall be effectually called. Note. [1.] Sinners are spiritually dead, destitute of spiritual life, sense, strenth, and motion, dead to God, miserable, but neither sensible of their misery, nor able to help themselves out of it. [2.] The conversion of a soul to God is its resurrection from death to life; when it begins to live, it begins to live to God, to breathe after him, and move and live in him. It is by the power of the Son of God that souls are raised to spiritual life; it is wrought by his power, and that power conveyed and communicated by his word; The dead shall hear, shall be made to hear, to understand, receive, and believe, the voice of the Son of God, to hear it as his voice; then the Spirit by it gives life, otherwise the better killeth. [3.] The voice of God, the word of God, is such a voice, it will live by it. They that hear, and attend to what they shall hear, shall live. Hear, and your soul shall live, Isai. 53. 3.

2. A resurrection yet to come; this is spoken of, v. 28. 29. introduced with, Marvel not at this, which I have said of the first resurrection, do not reject it as incredible and absurd; for at the end of time you shall see a more sensible and amazing proof of the power and authority of the Son of man. As his own resurrection was reserved to the final and concluding proof of his personal commission, so the resurrection of all men is reserved to be a like proof of his commission to be executed by his Spirit. Now observe here.

(1.) When this resurrection shall be; The hour is coming; it is fixed to an hour, so very punctual that when it comes, they shall not be able to tarry. Not to one day, nor one year, nor one thousand years; but it will be in such a time, that it is to be a most dangerous business, for all that are alive, to act toward their own eternal welfare. [1.] It is not yet come, it is not the hour spoken of at v. 25. that is coming, and now is. These err dangerously, who said that the resurrection was past already, 2 Tim. 2. 18. But, [2.] It will certainly come, it is coming on, nearer every day than either, it is at the door. How far off it is we know not; but we are assured it is so near that it is infallibly designed and unalterably determined.

(2.) Who shall be raised; all that are in the graves, all that have died from the beginning of time, and all that shall die to the end of time. It was said, (Dan. 12. 2.) Many shall arise; Christ here tells us these many shall be all; all must appear before the Judge, and therefore all must be raised; every person, and the whole of every person; every one that ever was, and every one that shall be. The graves are the prison of dead bodies, where they are detained; their furnace, where they are consumed; (Job 24. 19.) yet, in prospect of their resurrection, we may call it their bed, where they sleep to be waked, again; their treasury, where they are laid up to be used again. Even those that are not put into graves, shall arise; but because most are put into graves, Christ uses this expression, all that are in the graves.

The Jews used the word sheol for the grave, which signifies the state of the dead; all that are in that state, shall hear.

[1.] The efficient of this resurrection: They shall hear his voice; that is, he shall cause them to hear it, as Lazarus was made to hear that voice. Come forth, a direct power shall go along with the voice, to put life into them and enable them to obey it. When Christ rose, there was no voice heard, not a word spoken, because he rose by his own power; but at the resurrection of the children of men we find three voices spoken of, 1 Thess. 4. 16. The Lord shall descend with a shout, the shout of a King, with the voice of the archangel; either Christ himself, the prince of the angels, or the commander is sent, under him, of the heavenly host; and with the trumpet of God; the soldier's trumpet sounding the alarm of war, the judge's trumpet publishing the summons to the court.
[1.] They that have done good, shall come forth to the resurrection of life; they shall live again, to live for ever. Note, First, Whatever name men are called by, or whatever plausible profession they make, it will be well in the great day with those only that have done good, that which is pleasing to God and profitable to others. Secondly, The resurrection of the body will be a resurrection of life to all those, and those only, that have been sincere and constant in doing good. They shall not only be publicly acquitted, as a pardoned criminal, we say, has his life; but they shall be admitted into the presence of God, and that is life, it is better than life. [2.] They that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation; they shall live again, to be for ever dying. The Pharisees thought that the resurrection pertained only to the just, but Christ here rectifies it, and makes it the resurrection of all men; whatso ever they pretend, will be treated in the day of judgment as evil men. Secondly, The resurrection will be to evil doers, who did not by repentance undo what they had done amiss, a resurrection of damnation. They shall come forth to be publicly convicted of rebellion against God, and publicly condemned to everlasting punishment; to be sentenced to it, and immediately sent to it without reprieve. Such will be the resurrection be.

[2.] Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's authority to execute judgment, v. 22—24, 27. As he has an almighty power, so he has a sovereign jurisdiction; and who so fit to preside in the great affairs of the other life as he who is the Father and fountain of life? Here is, First, Christ's commission or delegation to the office of a Judge, which is twice spoken of here: (v. 22.) He hath committed all judgment to the Son: and again, (v. 27.) He hath given him authority. 1. The Father judges no man; not that the Father has resigned the government, but he is pleased to govern by Jesus Christ; so that man is not under the terror of dealing with God immediately, but has the comfort of access to him by a Mediator. The Father judges no man; (1.) He does not rule us by the strong arm of majesty alone; he draws us to him upon certain terms settled by a Mediator. Having made us, he may do what he pleases with us, as the potter with the clay: but he does not so, he draws us with the cords of a man. (2.) He does not determine our everlasting condition by the covenant of innocence, nor take the advantage he has against us for the violation of that covenant; the Mediator's right as mediator, but he can a sufficient satisfaction, upon which the matter is referred to him, and God is willing to enter upon a new treaty; not under the law of the Creator, but the grace of the Redeemer. 2. He has committed all judgment to the Son, has constituted him Lord of all. (Acts 10. 36. Rom. 14. 9.) as Joseph in Egypt, Gen. 41. 40. This was prophesied of, Ps. 72. 1. Is. 11. 3. 4. Jer. 23. 5. Mic. 5. 1. Ps. 67. 4—66. 13—98. 9. All judgment is committed to our Lord Jesus; for, (1.) He is intrusted with the administration of the presidencial kingdom; is Head over all things, (Eph. 1. 22.) Head of every man, 1 Cor. 11. 9. All things consist by him, Col. 1. 17. (2.) He is empowered to make laws immediately to bind conscience. I say unto you, is now the form in which the statutes of the kingdom of heaven are; Be it enacted by the Lord Jesus, and by his authority. All the acts now in heaven, which are legislative, he is the only one authorized to appoint and settle the terms of the new covenant, and to draw up the articles of peace between God and man; it is God in Christ that recognizes the world, and to him he has given power to confer eternal life. The book of life is the Lamb's book; by his award we must stand or fall. (4.) He is commissioned to award on and complete the judgment of the dead; and as he has done it, what is pleasing to God and profitable to others. Secondly, The resurrection of the body will be a resurrection of life to all those, and those only, that have been sincere and constant in doing good. They shall not only be publicly acquitted, as a pardoned criminal, we say, has his life; but they shall be admitted into the presence of God, and that is life, it is better than life.

2. He has given him authority to execute judgment also, v. 27. Observe, (1.) What the authority is, which our Redeemer is invested with; an authority to execute judgment; he has not only a legislative, but an executive, power too. The phrase here is used particularly for the judgment of condemnation, Jude 15. παρ' τῆς δύναμις— to execute judgment upon all; the same with his taking vengeance, 2 Thess. 1. 8. The ruin of impenitent sinners comes from the hand of Christ; he that executes judgment upon them, is the same that would have wronged salvation for them, which makes the sentence unexceptionable; and there is no relief against the sentence of the Redeemer; salvation itself cannot save those whom the Saviour condemns, which makes the ruin remediless. (2.) Whence he has that authority; the Father gave it him. Christ's authority as Mediator is delegated and derived; he acts as the Father's Vicarage, as the Lord's anointed, the Lord's Christ. Now all this redounds very much to the honour of Christ; it is putting him into the guilt of blasphemy, in making himself equal with God; and very much to the comfort of all believers, who may with the greatest assurance venture their all in such hands.

Secondly, Here are the reasons (reasons of state) for which this commission was given him. He has all judgment committed to him for two reasons.

1. Because he is the Son of man, which speaks these three things. (1.) His humiliation and gracious condescension. Man is a worm, the son of man a worm; yet this was the nature, this the character, which the Redeemer assumed, in pursuance of the counsels of love; this low estate he stooped to, and submitted to all the mortifications attending it, because it was his Father's will; in recompense therefore, for his wretchedness and humiliation, he thus dignified him. Because he condescended to be the Son of man, his Father made him Lord of all, Phil. 2. 8, 9. (2.) His affinity and alliance to us. The Father has committed the government of the children of men to him, because, being the Son of man, he is of the same nature with those whom he is set over, and therefore the more unexceptionable, as a Judge. Their government shall proceed from the midst of them, Jer. 30. 21. Of this law was typical; One of thy brethren shall set up King over her. Deut. 17. 13. (3.) His being the Messiah promised. In that famous vision of his kingdom and glory, Dan. 7. 13, 14, he is called the Son of man; and, Ps. 89. 27, he is said to have overcome ten thousand of thy Hand. He is the Messiah, and therefore he is invested with all this power. The Jews usually called the Christ the Son of David; but Christ usually called himself the Son of man, which was the more humble title, and speaks him a Prince and Saviour, not to the Jewish nation only, but to the whole race of mankind.

2. That which Jesus Christ is here spoken of, (1.) As God's great design. The Son intended to glorify the Father, and therefore the Father intended to glorify the Son, ch. 16. 15. (2.) As man's great duty, in compliance with that design. If God will have the Son glorified, it is the duty of all these to honour him, to whom he is made known. Observe how

[1.] The dignity that is to be done to our Lord Jesus. We must honour the Son, must look upon him as one that is to be honoured, both upon the account of his transcendent excellences and perfections in himself, and of the relations he stands in to us, and must study to give him honour accordingly; must confess that he is Lord, and worship him; must honour him who was dishonoured for us.

3. How Christ is to be glorified. The sceptre rests upon location to the Son, to honour him with due honour; we must honour the Redeemer with the same honour that we honour the Creator with. So far was it from blasphemy that he made himself equal with God, that it is the highest exaltation that can be for us to make him otherwise. The truths and laws of the Christian religion, so far as they are revealed, are as sacred and honorable as those of natural religion, and so that to equalled had in estimation; for we lie under the same obligations to Christ, the Author of our well-being, that we lie under to the Author of our being; and have as necessary a dependence upon the Redeemer's grace as upon the Creator's providence, which is a sufficient reason for this law—honour the Son as we honour the Father.

To enforce this law, it is added, He that honours not the Son, honours not the Father who has sent him. Some pretend a reverence for the Creator, and speak honourably of him, who make light of their Redeemer, and speak contemptuously of him; but let such know that the honours and interests of the Father and Son are inseparably twisted and interwoven, that the Father never reckons himself hono rered by any that dishonour. the Son. Note, First, Indigities due to the Lord Jesus reflect upon God himself, and will be construed and reckoned for in the court of heaven. The Son having so far exposed the Father's honours as to take to himself the reproaches cast on him, (Rom. 15. 3.) the Father does it to him: he who has been cast out to him, (John 16. 11.) counts himself struck at through him. Secondly, The reason of this is, because the Son is sent and commissioned by the Father; it is the Father who hath sent him. Affronts to an ambassador are justly resented by the prince that sends him. And by this rule, those who truly honour the Son, honour the Father also; see Philip. 2. 11.

3dly, Here is the rule by which the Son goes in to the Father. We have this commission, so those words seem to come in, (v. 21.) He that heareth and believeth, hath everlasting life. Here we have the substance of the whole gospel; the preface commands attention to a thing most weighty, and asent to a thing most certain: "Glorify, verily, I say unto you, 1. in whom you hear all judgment is committed, in whose lips is a divine sentence; take from me the christian's character and charter.

1. The character of a christian; he that heareth and believeth, and doeth the Father's will, may not doubt of being a Christian. To be a Christian is declared to be: (1.) To hear the word of Christ. It is not enough to be within hearing of it, but we must attend on it, as scholars on the instructions of their teachers; and attend to it, as servants to the commands of their masters; we must hear and obey it, must abide by the gospel of Christ as the fixed rule of our faith and practice. (2.) To believe on him that sent him: for Christ's design is to bring us to God, and he is the first Object of all grace, so is he the last Object of all faith. Christ is our Lord, God is our Rest. We must believe on God as having sent Jesus Christ, and recommended himself to our faith and love, by manifesting his glory in the face of Jesus Christ. (2 Cor. 4. 6.) as his Father and our Father.

2. The charter of a christian, which all these are interested in that are christians indeed. See what we get by Christ: (1.) A charter of pardon; He shall not come into condemnation. The grace of the gospel is a full discharge from the curse of the law. A believer shall not only not be under condemnation eternally, but not come into condemnation now; not come into the danger of it, (Rom. 8. 1.) not come into judgment, but be not judged. (Rom. 5. 1.) He shall not die in his sins, but shall live in Christ, and may venture our souls upon, when we are disabled to do and live; see ch. 17. 2.

Fourthly, Here is the righteousness of his proceedings pursuant to this commission, v. 30. All judgment being committed to him, we cannot but ask how he manages it. And here he answers, My judgment is just. All Christ's acts of govern ment, both legislative and judicial, are exactly agreeable to the rules of equity: see Prov. 8. 8. There can be no exceptions against any of the determinations of the Redeemer, and therefore as there shall be no repeal of any of his statutes, so there can be no appeal from any of his sentences. His judgments are certainly just, for they are directed,

1. By the Father's command: I can of myself do nothing, nothing without the Father, but as I hear, I judge, as he has said before, v. 19. The Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father do; so here, nothing but what he hears the Father say. As I hear, (1.) From the secret; eternal counsels of the Father; so I judge. Would we know what we may depend upon in our dealing with God? Hear the Word of Christ. (2.) From the written commission, those secret things which belong not to us, but attend to the revealed dictates of Christ's government and judgment, and those will furnish us with an unerring guide; for what Christ has adjudged, is an exact copy or counterpart of what the Father has decreed. (2.) From the published records of the Old Testament. Christ, in all the execution of his undertaking had an eye to, and made use of, his business to conform to that, and fulfill that; as it was written in the volume of the book. Thus he taught us to do nothing of ourselves, but as we hear from the word of God, so to judge of things, and act accordingly,

2. By the Father's will; My judgment is just, and cannot be otherwise, because I seek not mine own will, but his who sent me. Not as if the will of Christ were contrary to the will of the Father, as the flesh is contrary to the spirit in us; but, (1.) Christ had, as Man, the natural and inherent affections of the human nature, sense of pain and pleasure, an inclination to life, an aversion to death; yet he pleased not himself, did not consult these, nor consider these, when he was to go on in his undertaking, but acquiesced entirely in the will of his Father. (2.) What he did as Mediator, was not the result of any peculiar, particular purpose and design of his own; what he did seek to do, was not for his own mind's sake, but he was therein guided by his Father's will, and the purpose which he had purposed to himself. This our Saviour did upon all occasions refer himself to, and govern himself by. Thus our Lord Jesus has opened his commission, (whether to the conviction of his enemies or no,) to his own honour, and the everlasting comfort of all his friends, who here see him able to save to the utmost.

31. If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. 32. There is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnessedeth of me is true. 33. Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness unto the truth. 34. But I receive not testimony from man: but these things I say, that ye might be saved. 35. He was a burning and a shining light: and ye were willing for a season to rejoice in his light. 36. But I have greater witness than that of John; for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me. 37. And the Father himself which hath sent me, hath borne witness of me. Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape. 38. And ye have not his word abiding in you; for whom he hath sent, him ye believe not. 39. Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. 40. And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life. 41. I receive not honour from men. 42. But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you. 43. I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. 44. How can ye believe which receive honour one of another, and seek not the honour that cometh from God only? 45. Do not think that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even Moses, in whom ye trust. 46. For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me: for he wrote of me. 47. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?

In these verses our Lord Jesus proves and confirms the commission he had produced, and makes it evident he was sent of God to be the Messiah.

I. He sets aside his own testimony of himself; (v. 31.) "If I bear witness of myself, though it is infallibly true, (ch. 8. 14.) yet, according to the common rule of judgment among men, you will not admit it as legal proof, nor allow it to be given in evidence." Now, 1. This reflects reproach upon the sons of men, and their veracity and integrity. Surely we may say deliberately, what David said in haste, All men are liars, else it would never have been such a received testimony, that a whole generation should be suspicious, and not to be relied on: if it is a sign that self-love is stronger than the love of truth. And yet, 2. It reflects honour on the Son of God, and speaks his wonderful condescension, that, though he is the faithful Witness, the Truth itself who may challenge to be credited upon his honour, and his own single testimony, yet he is pleased to waive his own personal character, that he may refer himself to his vouchers, that we might have full satisfaction. II. He produces other witnesses that bear testimony to him, that he was sent of God. 1. The Father himself bore testimony to him; (v. 32.) There is another that beareth witness; which I take to be meant of God the Father, for Christ mentions his testimony with his own, (ch. 8.) 18. I bear witness of myself, and the Father beareth witness of me. Observe, (1.) The seal which the Father put to his commission; He beareth witness of me, not only hath done so by a voice from heaven, but still doth so by the tokens of his presence with me. See who they are to whom God will bear witness. [1.] To those whom he sends and employs; where he gives commissions, he gives credentials. [2.] To those who hear witness to him; so Christ did. God will own and honour those that own and honour him. [3.] To those who decline bearing witness of themselves; so Christ did. God will take care that those who humbly and abase themselves, and seek not their own glory, shall not lose by it. (2.) The satisfaction Christ had in this testimony; I know that he which he witnessedeth of me, is true. I am very well assured that I have a divine mission, and do not in the least hesitate concerning it; thus he had the witness in himself. The devil tempted him to question his being the Son of God, but he never yielded. 2. John Baptist witnessed to Christ, v. 35, &c. John came to bear witness of the light; (ch. 1. 7.) in this he was sent of God to prepare his way, and direct the people to him; Behold the Lamb of God. Now the testimony of John was, (1.) A solemn and public testimony; You sent an emissary of priests and Levites to John, which gave him an opportunity of publishing what he had to say; it was not a popular but a judicial testimony. (2.) It was a true testimony, He bore witness to the truth, as a witness ought to do; the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Christ doth not say, He bore witness to me, (though every one knew he did,) but, like an honest man, He bore witness to the truth. Now John was confessedly such a holy, good man, so morbid to the world, and so conversant with divine things, that it could not be imagined he should be guilty of such a forgery and imposture as to say what he did concerning Christ, if it had not been so, and if he had not been sure of it. Two things are added concerning John's testimony. [1.] That it was a testimony, ex abundanti—more than he needed to vouch; (v. 34.) I receive not testimony from man. Thus Christ saw fit to quote John's testimony, it is with a protestation that it shall not be deemed or construed so as to prejudice the prerogatives of his self-sufficiency. Christ need not testify of himself in this manner. He has his testimony by his own works and words. He has no need to rely on the commendation of others, or certificates, but what his innumerable and everlasting excellence with bring with him; why then did Christ here urge the testimony of John? Why, these things I said, that ye might be saved. This he aimed at in all this discourse, to save not his own life, but the souls
I have a testimony greater than that of John; for if we believe the works of men, man of God, as was the witness of God immediately, and not by the ministry of men, is greater, 1 John 5. 9. Observre, Though the witness of John was a less cogent and less considerable witness, yet our Lord was pleased to make use of it. We must be glad of all the supports that offer themselves for the confirm-anation of our faith, though they may not amount to a demonstration. We must not vitiate any, under pretence that there are others more conclusive;
we have occasion for them all.

Now this greater witness was the works which his Father had given him to finish. That is,
(1.) In general; the whole course of his life and ministry—his revealing of God and his will to us, setting up his kingdom among men, reforming of the world, destroying of Satan's kingdom, restoring of fallen man to his primitive purity and felicity, and shedding abroad in men's hearts the love of God and one another—all that work, of which he said when he died, It is finished, it was all from first to last, after Deo dignum—a work worthy of God;
all he said and did, was holy and heavenly, and a divine purity, power, and grace shone in it, and proved abundantly that he was sent of God.

(2.) In particular. (1.) He himself was a most powerful proof for the proof of his divine mission, witnessed of him.
Now it is here said, [1.] That these works were given him by the Father, that is, he was both appointed and empowered to work them; for, as Mediator, he derived both commission and strength from his Father. [2.] They were given him to finish; he must do all those works of wonder which the counsel and foreknowledge of God had before been done; and his finishing of them proves a divine power; for, as for God, his work is perfect. [3.] These works did bear witness of him, did prove that he was sent of God, and that what he said concerning himself, was true; see Heb. 2. 4.
Acts 2. 22. That the Father had sent him as a Father, not as a master sends his servant on an errand, but as a father sends his son to take possession for himself; if God had not sent him, he would never have acceded him, would not have waded him, as he did by the works he gave him to do; for the world's Creator will never be his Deceiver.

4. He produces, more fully than before, his Father's testimony concerning him; (v. 57.) The Father that sent me, hath borne witness of me. The prince is not accustomed to follow his ambassador himself, to confirm his commission were very—by which he is, speaking; but God was pleased to hear witness of his Son himself by a voice from heaven at his baptism, (Matth. 3. 17.) This is my Ambassador, This is my beloved Son. The Jews reckoned Ruth-kathe daughter of a voice, a voice from heaven, one of the ways by which God made known his mind;
in that way he had owned Christ publicly and solemnly, and repeated it, Matth. 17. 5. Note, (1.)
The commission, which was given him at

Where he gives a commission, he will not fail to sell it; he that never sent him without witness, (Acts 14. 17.) will never leave any of his servants so, who

(2.) Where God demands belief, he will not fail to give sufficient evidence, as he does in all his speaking Christ. That which was to reflect concerning Christ, was chiefly this, that which the God had offended, (see Mark 3. 5.) was to accept of the Son himself, and that he was the one and himself (and he was fittest to do it) given us full satisfaction, declaring himself well pleased in him;
if we be so, the work is done.

Now it might be suggested, if God himself thus borne witness of Christ, how came it to pass that he was not universally received by the Jewish nation, and their rulers? To this, Christ here answers, that it was not to be thought strange, nor could their infidelity weaken his credibility, for two reasons.

[1] Because they were not acquainted with such extraordinary revelations of God and his will; Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape, or appearance. They showed themselves to be as ignorant of God, though they professed relation to him, as we are of a man we neither saw or heard. "But why do I talk to you of God's being, and his condescensions to us, when He has not appeared to you, nor have any acquaintance or communion with you?"

Note, Ignorance of God is the true reason of men's rejecting of the record he has given concerning his Son. A right understanding of natural religion would discover to us such admirable congruities in the christian religion, as would greatly dispose our minds to the entertainment of it. Some give this sense, It is not necessary we should expect an immediate, personal, and actual revelation of God, in voice, and the descent of a dove, which is such an extraordinary thing, that you never saw or heard the like; and yet for my sake there was such a voice and appearance; yea, and you might have heard that voice, you might have seen that appearance, as others did, if you had closely attended the ministry of John, but by slighting it you missed of that testimony."

"They were not affected, no not with the ordinary ways by which God had revealed himself to them; (v. 38.) Ye have not his word abiding in you. They had the scriptures of the Old Testament; might they not by them be disposed to receive Christ? Yes, if they had had their due influence upon them. But, First, The word of God was not in them; it was among them, in their country, in their hands, but not in them, in their hearts, not ruling in their souls, but only shining in their eyes, and sounding in their ears. What did it avail them that they had the oracles of God committed to them, (Rom. 3. 2.) when they had not these oracles committing in them? If they had, they would really have embraced Christ. Secondly, It did not abide. Many have the word of God coming into them, and making some impressions for a while, but it does not abide with them, it is not constantly in them, as a man at home, but only now and then and then as a wayfaring man. If the word abide in us, if we converse with it by frequent meditation, consult with it upon every occasion, and conform it in our conversation, we shall then readily receive the witness of the Father concerning Christ; see ch. 7. 17.

But how did it appear that they had not the word of God abiding in them? It appeared by this, Whither then went, him ye believe not. There was so much said in the Old Testament concerning Christ, to direct people when and where to look for him, and so to facilitate the discovery of him, that, if they had duly considered those things, they could not have avoided the conviction of Christ's being sent of God; so that their not believing in Christ, was a certain sign that the word of God did not abide there. The inward influence of the eternal Word, and Spirit, and grace of God in us, is best tried by the effects of it, particularly by our receiving of what he sends; the commands he sends, the messengers, the providences he sends, especially Christ, whom he hath sent.

5. The last witness he calls, is the Old Testament, which witnessed of him, and to it he appeals; (v. 39, 40.) Search the scriptures, all scripture. It may be they had the oracles committed to them, and yet do very well to do so; ye read them daily in your synagoguees, ye have rabbies, and doctors, and scribes, that make it their business to study them, and criticise upon them." The Jews boasted of the flourishing of scripture-learning in the days of Hillel, who died about twelve years after Christ's birth, and reckoned some of those who were then members of the Sanhedrin, the beauties of their wisdom, and the glories of their law; and Christ owns that they did indeed search the scriptures, but it was in search of their own glory; "Ye do search the scriptures; and therefore, if ye were not willfully blind, ye would believe in me." Note, It is possible for men to be very studious in the letter of the scripture, and yet to be strangers to the power and influence of it. Or, (2.) As we read it, Search the scriptures; and so, with a Spirit of faith to understand them, or apprehend; "Ye profess to receive and believe the scripture; there will I join issue with you, let that be the judge, provided you will not rest in the letter, (hereve in cortice,) but will search into it." Note, when appeals are made to the scriptures, they must be searched. Search the whole book of scripture throughout, compare one passage with another, and examine them one by another. We must begin with searching particular passages to the bottom, and see not what they seem to say formally first—at the first appearance, but what they say indeed. (3.) It is spoken to us in the nature of an advice, or command to all christians to search the scriptures. Note, All those who would find Christ, must search the scriptures; not only read them and hear them, but search them. Which denotes, First, Diligence in seeking, labours, and pains in the search of the meaning of the scriptures. Desire and design of finding. We must aim at some spiritual benefit and advantage in reading and studying the scripture, and often ask, "What am I now searching for?" We must search as for hid treasures, (Prav. 2. 4.) as those that sink for gold or silver, or that drive for pearl, Job 28. 11.—12. This enabled the Bereans, Acts 17. 11.

Now the word of God, which we are here directed to, to look in our eye, in our searching of the scripture; heaven our end, and Christ our Way. 1. We must search the scriptures for heaven as our great end; For in them ye think ye have eternal life. The scripture assures us of an eternal state set before us, and offers to us an eternal life in that state; it contains the chart that describes it, the charter that conveys it, the direction in the way that leads to it, and the foundation upon which the hope of it is built; and this is worth searching for, there where we are sure to find it. But to the Jews Christ saith only, Ye think ye have eternal life in the scriptures; because, though they did retain the belief and hope of eternal life, and grounded their expectations of it upon the scriptures, yet therein they missed it, that they looked for it by the bare reading and studying of the scripture. It was not an eternal life that was first set forth to them. He that has the words of Christ has eternal life; they thought they were sure of heaven, if they could say by heart, or rather by rote, such, and such passages of scripture as they were directed to by the tradition of the elders; as they thought all the vulgar cursed, because they did not thus know the law, (ch. 5. 49.) so they concluded all the learned and ably blessed. 2. We are to search in the scriptures for Christ, as the new and living Way, that leads to that end. These are they, the great and principal witnesses that testify of him. Note, (1.) The scriptures, even those of the Old Testament, testify of Christ, and by them God bears witness to him. The Spirit of Christ in the prophecies testified beforehand of him, (1 Pet. 1. 11.) the purposes and promises of God concerning him, and the previous prophecies of his glory and power. The Jews professed to have the Old Testament testified of the Messiah, and were critical in their remarks upon the passages that looked that way; and yet were careless, and wretchedly overseen, in the application of them. (2.) Therefore we must search the scriptures, and may hope to find eternal life in that search, because they testify of Christ; for this is eternal life, to know him; see 1 John 5. 11. Christ is the Treasure hid in the field of the scriptures, the Water in those wells, the Milk in those breasts. For this testimony he annexes a reproof of their infidelity and wickedness in four instances; particularly,

1. Their neglect of him and his doctrine; (v. 41.) "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life. Ye seek me, not because ye believe in me, but for the fruit that I have given you." Their estrangement from Christ was the fault, not so much of their understandings as of their wills. This is expressed as a complaint; Christ offered life, and it would not be accepted. Note, First, There is life to be had with Jesus Christ for poor sinners; life both in the knowledge of God, and in their acceptance of it; and comfort and glory: life is the perfection of our being, and inclusive of all happiness; and Christ is our Life. Secondly, Those that would have this life, must come to Jesus Christ for it; we may have it for the coming for it. It supposes an asent of the understanding to the doctrine of Christ, and the record given concerning him; it lies in the consent of the will to his government and grace, and it is an impossible compliance in the resolutions and actions. Thirdly, The only reason why sinners die is, because they will not come to Christ for life and happiness; it is not because they cannot, but because they will not. They will neither accept of the life offered, because spiritual and divine; nor will they agree to the terms on which it is offered; nor apply themselves to the use of the appointed means. Hence it follows, if the Lord will, he will observe the methods of cure. Fourthly, The wilfulness and obstinacy of sinners in rejecting the tenders of grace, are a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and what he complains of.

Those words, (v. 41.) I receive not honour from men, come in a parenthesis, to obviate an objection against him, as if he sought his own glory, and made himself the Head of a party, in obliging all to come to him, and applied him. Note, 1. He did not covet or court the applause of men; did not in the least affect that worldly pomp and splendour which the carnal Jews expected their Messiah to appear in. He charged those he cured, not to make him known, and withdrew from those that would have made him King. 2. He had not the applause of men. Instead of receiving honour from men, he received the contempt of them. He beloved the reproach of others more than the praise of men, for he made himself of no reputation. 3. He needed not the applause of men; it was no addition to his glory, whom all the angels of God worship, nor was he any otherwise pleased with it, than as it was according to his Father's will, and for the happiness of those who, in giving honour to him, received much greater honour from him.

[2.] Their want of the love of God; (v. 42.) "I know you by your love, that you have not the love of God in you. Why should I wonder that you do not come to me, when you want even the first principle of natural religion, which is the love of God?" Note, The reason why people slight Christ is, because they do not love God; for if we did indeed love God, we should love him who is his express Image, and hasten to him by whom all things are to be received in the name of God. He had charged them, (v. 35.) with ignorance of God, and here with want of love to him; therefore men have not the love of God, because they desire not the knowledge of him. Observe, First, The crime charged upon them: You have not the love of God in you. They pretended a great love to God, and thought they proved it by their zeal for the law, the temple, and the sabbath; and yet they were really without the love of God. Note, There are many who make a great profession of religion, who yet show they want the love of God by their neglect of Christ and their contempt of his commandments; they hate his holy lines, and undervalue his goodness. Observe, It is the love of God in us, the love that is seated in the heart, and is a living, acting principle there, that God will accept; the love shed abroad there, Rom. 5. 5.

Secondly, The proof of this charge, by the personal knowledge of Christ, who beholds the heart. (Rev. 2. 23.) and knows what is in man; I know you. Christ sees through all our disguises, and can say to each of us, I know the. 1. Christ knows men better than their neighbours know them. The people thought that the scribes and Pharisees were very devout and good men, but Christ knew that they had nothing of the love of God in them. 2. Christ knew the heart of every individual; those Jews had a very good opinion of themselves, but Christ knew how corrupt their inside was, notwithstanding the plausible shews of their outside; we may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive him. 3. Christ knows men who do not, and will not know him; he looks on those who industriously seek him, and calls by their own name, their true name, those who have not known him. Observe, 3. A man's love to Christ, is, their readiness to entertain false christs and false prophets, while they obstinately opposed him who was the true Messiah; (v. 43.) I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name, him will ye receive. Besotted, Obsessed, at this; (Rev. 2. 12, 13.) for my people have committed two evils, great evils indeed. First, They have forsook the Ancient ways of living; and for they would not receive Christ, who came in his Father's name, had his commission from his Father, and did all for his glory. Secondly, They have torn out broken cisterns, they hearken to every one that will set up in his own name. They forsake their own mercies, that is bad enough, and it is for living vanities, that is worse. Observe here, 1. These are false prophets who came in their own name, who run without being sent, and set up for themselves only. 2. It is just with God to suffer those to be deceived with false prophets, who receive not the truth in the love of it, 2 Thess. 2. 10, 11. The errors of Antichrist are the just punishment of those who obey not the doctrine of Christ. They that shut their eyes against the true light, are by the judg¬ment of God given up to wander end¬lessly in the paths of wickedness and perdition, when they know the will of God.

[3.] They are here charged with pride and vain glory, and unbelief, the effect of v. 44. Having sharply reproved their unbelief, like a wise physician, he here searches into the cause, lays the axe to the root. They therefore slighted and undervalued Christ, because they admired and over-valued themselves. Here is

First, Their unbelief of worlthy honour. Christ despised it, v. 41. They set their hearts upon it; Ye receive honour one of another; that is, Ye look for a Messiah in outward pomp, and presume yourselves worldly honour by him. Ye receive honour: 1. Ye desire to receive it, and aim at that in all you do. 2. Ye give honour to others, and applaud them, only that they may return it, and may applaud you. Petínus dumfíamaque virtús—He asks and we bestow. It is the proud man's art to thronize honour upon others only that it may rebound upon himself. 3. "Ye are very careful to keep all the honours to yourselves, and confine them to your own party, as if ye had the monopoly of that which is honourable." 4. "What respect is shown you, ye receive yourselves, and do not transmit it to God, as Herod." Idolizing men and their sentiments, and affecting to be idolized by them and their aprhances, are pieces of idolatry, as directly contrary to christianity.

Secondly, Their neglect of spiritual honour, called here the honour that comes from God only; this they sought not, nor minded. Note, 1. True honour is that which comes from God only, that is real and lasting honour; those are honourable indeed, whom he takes into covenant and communion with himself. 2. This honour have all the saints. And that true honour, through him received the honour that comes from God. He is not partial, but will give glory wherever he gives grace. This honour that comes from God, we must seek, must aim at, and act for, and take up with nothing short of it; (Rom. 2. 29.) we must account it our reward, as the Pharisees accounted the praise of men. These that will not come to Christ, and the objects of his heavenly honour, may make it appear that they seek not that comes from God, and it is their folly and ruin.

Thirdly, The influence this had upon their infidelity. How can ye believe, who are thus affected? Observe here, 1. The difficulty of believing arises from ourselves and our own corruption; we make our work hard to ourselves, and then complain it is impracticable. 2. The ambition and affection of worldly honour are a great hindrance to faith in Christ. How can they believe, who make the praise and applause of men their idol? When the profession and practice of serious godliness are un fashionable, are every where spoken against, when Christ and his followers are men wondered at, and to be a christian, is to be like a screeched bird, (and this is the common case,) how can they believe, the top of whose ambition is to make a fair show in the flesh.

6. The last witness here called is, Moses, ch. 45, &c. The Jews had a great veneration for Moses, and valued themselves upon their being the disciples of Moses, and pretended to adhere to Moses, in their opposition to Christ; but Christ here shows them,

[1.] That Moses was a witness against the unbelieving Jews, and accused them to the Father. There is one that accuses you, even Moses. This may be understood either, [1.] As showing the difference between the law and the gospel. Moses, that is, the law, accuses you; for by the law is the knowledge of sin; it condemns you, it is to those that trust to it a ministration of death and condemnation; but it is not the design of Christ's gospel to act thus. Think not that I will accuse you. Christ did not come into the world to condemn the world, John 1. 29. nor to find fault and pick quarrels with every body, or as a spy upon the actions of men, or a promoter, to fish for crimes; no, he came to be an Advocate, not an Accuser; to reconcile God and man, and not to set them more at variance; what faults were then that adhered to Moses against Christ, and desired to be avenged? Think not that I will accuse you. Christ did not come into the world to accuse you, John 4. 25. Or, [2.] As showing the manifest unrighteousness and infidelity of the Jews: Think not that I will appeal from your bar to God's, and challenge you to answer there for what you do against me, as injured innocence usually does: no, I do not need, you are already accused, and cast, in the court of heaven; Moses himself says enough to convict you of, and condemn you for, your unbelief. Let them not mistake concerning Christ: though he was a Prophet, he did not improve his interest in heaven against those that per-
The people's seeking him to Capernaum, v. 22, 23.

W. His conference with them, occasioned by the miracle of the loaves, a which he prepared time for seeking corn, food, and directed them to spiritual food, v. 25, 27; showing them how they must labour for spiritual food, v. 28, 29) and that what spiritual food is, v. 30, 31. Their discontent at what he said, and the refusal he gave them for it, v. 60, 61. The apostrophe of many from him, and his discourse unto his disciples that adhered to him upon that occasion, v. 66, 71.

1. AFTER these things Jesus went over the sea of Galilee, called elsewhere the lake of Gennesareth, here the sea of Tiberias, from a city adjoining, which Herod had lately enlarged and beautified, and called so in honour of Tiberius the emperor, and, probably, had made his metropolis. Christ did not go directly over, crosses this inland sea, but made a riding voyage to another place on the same side. It is not tempting God, to choose to go by easier way when there is convenience for it, even to those places where his word or his name might be good; for Christ never tempted the Lord his God, Matth. 4, 7.

2. The company that he was attended with; a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles, v. 2. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus, while he went about doing good, lived continually in a crowd, which gave him more trouble than honour. Good and useful men must not complain of a great deal of business, when they are serving God and their generation; it will be time enough to enjoy our selves, when we come to that world where we shall enjoy God. (2.) Christ's miracles drew many after him, that were not effectually drawn to him. They had their curiosity gratified by the strangeness of them, who had not their consciences convinced by the power of them.

3. Christ postin himself advantageously to entertain them; (v. 3.) He went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples, that he might the more conveniently be seen and heard by the multitude that crowded after him; this was a natural pulpit, and not, like Ezra's, made for the purpose. Christ was now driven to be a field-preacher; but his regard was never the worse, nor the less acceptable, for that, to those who knew how to value, who followed him still, not only when he went out to a desert place, but when he went up to a mountain, though up-hill be against heart. He sat there, as teachers do in cathedra—in the chair of instruction; he did not sit at ease, nor sit in state, yet he sat as one having authority; sat ready to receive addresses that were made to him; whoever would, might come, and find him there. He sat with his disciples; he condescended to take them to sit with him, to put a reputation upon them before the people, and give them an earnest of the glory in which they should shortly sit with him. We are said to sit with him, Eph. 2, 6.

4. The time when it was. The first words, After these things, do not signify that this immediately followed what is related in the foregoing chapter, for it was a considerable time after, and the information no more than, in process of time; but we are told, (v. 4.) that it was when the passover was nigh; which is here noted. (1.) Because, perhaps, that had brought in all the apostles from their respective expeditions, whether they were sent as itinerant preachers, that they might attend their Master to Jerusalem, to keep the feast. (2.) Because it was a custom with the Jews, religiously to observe the approach of the passover thirty days before, with some sort of solemnity; so long before, they had it in their eye, repaired the roads, mended bridges, if there was occasion, and discreetly of the passover and the institution of it. (3.) Because, perhaps, the approach of the passover, when every one knew Christ would go up to Jerusalem, and be absent for some time, made the multitude flock the more after him, and attend the more diligently on him. Note, The prospect of losing our opportunities should quicken us to improve them with double diligence: and when solemn ordinances are approaching, it is good to prepare for them by conversing with the word of Christ.

III. The miracle itself. And there observe,

1. The notice Christ took of the crowd that attended him; (v. 5.) He lift up his eyes, and saw a great company come to him, poor, mean, ordinary people, no doubt, for such make up the multitudes, especially in such remote corners of the country; yet Christ showed himself pleased with their attendance, and concerned for their welfare, to teach us to advocate to them of love, and not to set those with the dogs of our flock, whom Christ hath set with the hands of his. The souls of the poor are as precious to Christ, and should be so to us, as those of the rich.

2. The enquiry he made concerning the way of providing for them. He directed himself to Philip, who had been his disciple from the first, and had some settled authority and confidence, and that was the reason Christ turned to Peter afterward so far out of frame, that he is described by his relation to Peter: he acquainted Christ with what they had at hand; and in that we may see,

(1.) The strength of his love to those whom he saw his Master concerned for, that he was willing to bring out all they had, though he knew not but they might want themselves, and any one would have said, Charity begins at home. He did not go about to conceal it, under pretence of being a better husband of their provision than the Master was, but honestly gives in account of all they had. There is a lad here, a little lad: a little, probably, one that used to follow this company, as sutlers do the camp, with provisions to sell, and the disciples had bespoken what he had for themselves; and it was barley-loaves, and two small fishes. Here,

[2.] The provision was coarse and ordinary; they were barley-loaves. Canaan was a land of wheat; (Deut. 8. 8.) its inhabitants were commonly fed with the finest wheat, (Ps. 81. 16.) the kneicks of wheat; (Deut. 32. 14.) yet Christ and his disciples were glad of barley-bread. It does not follow hence, that we should tie ourselves to such coarse fare, and place religion in it: (when God brings that which is finer to our hands, let us receive it, and be thankful;) but it does follow, that therefore we must not be desirous of dainties, (Prov. 23. 5.) nor murmur if we be reduced to coarse fare, but be content and thankful, and well reconciled to it; barley-bread is what Christ had, and better than we deserve: nor let us despise the mean provision of the poor, nor reject it for the better, remembering how Christ was provided for. (1. Kings 4. 42, 43.) that twenty barley-loaves, with some other provision to follow, would not dine a hundred men without a miracle. There were but two fishes, and those small ones, (15. or 20.) so small, that one of them was but a morsel, placent amiss; I take the fish to have been pickled, or cured, for they had not fire to dress them with. The provision of bread was little, but that of fish was less in proportion to it, so that many a bit of dry bread they must eat before they could make a meal of their provision; but they were content with it. Bread is meat for our hunger; but of them that murmured for flesh, it is said, They asked meat for their lusts, Ps. 78. 18. Well, Andrew was willing that the people should have this, as far as it would go. Note, A distrustful fear of wanting ourselves, should not hinder us from needful charity to others.

(2.) See here the weakness of his faith, in that word, But what are they among so many? To offer that to such a multitude, is but to mock them. Philip and he had not the actual consideration of the power of Christ, (which they had heard,) nor the danger of the number of the people there had. Who filled the camp of Israel in the wilderness? He that could make one man cast a thousand, could make one loaf feed a thousand.

6. The directions Christ gave the disciples, to seat
the guests; (v. 10) "Make the men sit down, though you have nothing to set before them, and trust me for that." This was likely to bring great obedience to nothing, and going to buy without money: Christ would thus try their obedience. Observe, (1.) The furniture of the dining room; there was much grass in that place, though a desert place; see how beautiful nature is, it makes grass grow upon the mountains, Ps. 147. 8. The grass was uncateat; God gives not only enough, but more than enough. Here was this plenty of grass where Christ's people were nourished; and he brings other blessings along with it, They shall the earth yield her increase, Ps. 67. 6. This plenty of grass made the place more commodious for them that must sit on the ground, and served them for cushions, or beds; (as they called what they sat on at meat, Exod. 1. 6.) and considering what Christ says of the grass of the field, (Matt. 6. 29, 30;) these beds excelled those of Abraham's, nature's pomp is the most glorious. 2. The number of the guests; about five thousand; a great entertainment, representing that of the gospel, which is a feast for all nations, (Isa. 25. 6;) a feast for all comers.

7. The distribution of the provision, v. 11. Observe, (1.) It was done with thanksgiving; He gave thanks. Note, [1.] We ought to give thanks to God, and acknowledge what he has done for us, and we have it from the hand of God, and must receive it with thanksgiving, 1 Tim. 4. 4, 5. And this is the sweetness of our creature-comforts, that they will furnish us with matter, and give us occasion, for that excellent duty of thanksgiving. [2.] Though our provision be coarse and scanty; though we have neither plenty nor dainty, yet we must give thanks to God for what we have. The bread was distributed from the hand of Christ by the hands of his disciples, v. 11. Note, [1.] All our comforts come to us originally from the hand of Christ; whoever brings them, it is he that sends them, he distributes to them who distribute to us. [2.] In distributing the bread of life to those that follow him, he is pleased to make use of the ministration of his disciples; they are the servants at Christ's table, or rather rulers in his household, to give to every one their portion of meat in due season. (2.) It was done to universal satisfaction. They did not give everyone a little, but all had as much as they would; not a short allowance, but a full meal; and, considering how long they had fasted, with what an appetite they sat down, how agreeable this miraculous food may be supposed to be, above common food, it was not a little that served them, when they ate as much as they would, and on free cost. Those whom Christ feeds with the bread of life, he does not stint, Ps. 81. 10. There were but two small fishes, and yet they had of them too, as much as they would. He did not reserve them for the better sort of the guests, and put off the poor with dry bread, but treated them all alike, for they were all equals. They who call feeding upon fish fasting, reproach the entertainment Christ here made, which was a full feast.

8. The care that was taken of the broken meat. (1.) The orders Christ gave concerning it; (v. 12.) When they were filled, and every man had within him a sensible taste to the truth of the miracle, Christ said to the disciples, the servants he employed, Gather up the fragments. Note, We must always take care that we make no waste of any of God's good creatures; for the grant we have of them, though large and full, is with this proviso, useful waste only excepted. It is just with God to bring us to the want of that which we make waste of. The Jews were very careful not to lose any bread, or let it fall to the ground, to be trodden upon. Quis panem... unto them. It is 1; be not afraid. 21. Then they willingly received him into the ship: and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went.

Here is,

1. Christ's retirement from the multitude.
2. Observe what induced him to retire; because he perceived that they who acknowledged him to be that Prophet that should come into the world, would come, and take him by force, to make him a King, v. 13. Now here we have an instance, (1.) Of the irregular zeal of some of Christ's followers; nothing would serve but they would make him a King.

Now, [1.] This was an act of zeal for the honour of Christ, and against the contempt which the ruling part of the Jewish church put upon him. They were concerned to see so great aBenefactor to the world so little esteemed in it; and therefore, since royal titles are counted the most illustrious, they would make him a King, knowing that the Messiah was to be a King, and if a prophet, like Moses, then a sovereign Prince and Lawgiver, like him; and if they cannot set him up \textit{upon the holy hill of Zion}, a mountain in Galilee shall serve for the present.

The kingdom of Christ has feasted with the royal dignities of heaven, should, in return for his favour, make him their King, and set him upon the throne in their souls; let him that has fed us, rule us. But, [2.] It was an irregular zeal; for, \textit{First.}, It was grounded upon a mistake concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if it were to be of this world, and he must appear with outward pomp, a crown on his head, and an army at his foot; such a king as this thing was made to be. Secondly, Secondly, it was excited by the love of the flesh; they would make him their King, who could feed them so plentifully without their toil, and save them from the curse of eating their bread in the sweat of their faces. Thirdly, It was intended to carry on a secular design; they hoped this might be a fair opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke, which they were weary of. If they had one to head them, who could victual an army cheaper than another could provide for a family, they were sure of the sinews of the war, and could not fail of success, and the recovery of their ancient liberties. This is religion often prostituted to a secular interest, and Christ is served, only to serve a turn, Rom. 16. 18.

August. Nay, Fourthly, It was a tumultuous, seditionist attempt, and a disturbance of the public peace; it would make the country a seat of war, and expose it to the resentments of the Gentiles or the Romans, which was a Fitzgerald. It was contrary to the mind of our Lord Jesus himself; for they would take him by force, whether he would or no. Note, Those who force honours upon Christ, which he has not required at their hands, displease him, and do him the greatest dishonour. They that say, \textit{I am of Christ}, in opposition to those that are of Apollo and Cephus, (so making Christ the Head of a party,) take him by force, to make him a King, contrary to his own mind.

(2.) Here is an instance of the humility and self-denial of the Lord Jesus, that, when they would have made him a King, he departed; so far was he from countenancing the design, that he effectually quashed it. Herein he has left a testimony. [1.] Against ambition and affectation of worldly honour, to which he was perfectly mortified, and has taught us to be so. Had they come to take him by force, and make him a prisoner, he could not have been more industrious to avoid than he was when they would make him a King. Let not us then covet to be \textit{the idoles of the crowd}, nor be desirous of \textit{vain-glory}. [2.] Against faction and sedition, treason and rebellion, and whatever tends to disturb the peace of kings and provinces. By this it appears that he was no enemy to Caesar, nor would have his followers he so, but the quiet in the land; that he would have his ministers decline every thing that looks like sedition, and looks toward it, and improve their interest only for their work's sake.

2. Observe whither he retired; he departed again into a mountain, \textit{di vi ixe—into} the mountain, the mountain where he had preached, (r. 3.) whence he came down into the plain, to feed the people, and then returned to it alone, to be private. Christ, though so useful in the places of concourse, yet chose sometimes to be alone, to teach us to sequester ourselves from the world now and then, for the more free converse with God and our own souls; and never less alone, says the serious Christian, then when alone. Public services must not justly cut private devotions.

11. Here is the disciples' distress at sea. They that go down to the sea in ships, there see the works of the Lord, for he raiseth the stormy wind, Ps. 107.

1. Observe, [1.] Apply that to these disciples.

2. Here is the stormy wind arising, and fulfilling the word of God. They were Christ's disciples, and were now in the way of their duty, and Christ was now in the mount praying for them; and yet they were in this distress. The perils and afflictions of this present time may very well consist with our interest in Christ and his intercession. They had lately been feasted at Christ's table; but after the sunshine of comfort expect a storm. (1.) It was now dark; this made the storm more dangerous and uncomfortable. Sometimes the people of God are in trouble, and cannot see their way out; in the dark concerning the cause of their trouble, concerning the design and tendency of it, and what the issue will be. (2.) Jesus was not come to them. When they were in that storm, (Matth. 8. 21.) Jesus was with them; but now their Beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone. The absence of Christ is the great aggravation of the troubles of Christians. (3.) The sea arose by reason of a great wind. It was calm and fair when they put to sea, (they were not so presumptuous as to launch out in a storm,) but it arose when they were at sea. In times of adversity and great trouble, for it may arise when we little think of it. I am not to fear people, when they happen to be in storms at sea, that the disciples of Christ were so; and let the promises of a gracious God balance the threats of an angry sea; though in a storm, and in the dark, they are no worse off than Christ's disciples were. Clouds and darkness sometimes surround the children of light, but not their light. The Christian's distress.
And when they were got off a good way at sea, they see Jesus walking on the sea. See here, (1.) The power and might that Jesus owned, and the mystery, to control and dispense with them at his pleasure. It is natural for heavy bodies to sink in water, but Christ walked upon the water, as upon dry land which was more than Moses’s dividing of the water, and walking through the water. (2.) The concern Christ has for his disciples in distress; He drew nigh to the ship; for therefore he walked upon the water, as this implies for the half of the profile. Deut. 33. 26. He will not leave them comfortless when they seem to be tossed with tempests, and not comforted. When they are banished, as John, into remote places, or shut up, as Paul and Silas, in close places, he will find access to them, and will be nigh them. (3.) The relief Christ gives to his disciples in their fears. They were afraid, more afraid of an apparition (for so they supposed him to be) than of the winds and waves. It is more terrible to wrestle with the rulers of the darkness of this world than with a tempestuous sea. When they thought a demon haunts them, and perhaps was instrumental to raise the storm, they were more terrified than they had been while they saw nothing in it but what was natural. Note, [1.] Our real distresses are often much increased by our imaginary ones, the creations of our own fancy. [2.] Even the approaches of comfort and deliverance are often attended with the shuddering of the occasions of fear and perplexity. We are often not only worse frightened than hurt, but then most frightened when we are ready to be helped. But when they were in this fright, how affectionately did Christ silence their fears with that compassionate word, (v. 20.) It is I, be not afraid? Nothing is more powerful to convince sinners than that word, I am Jesus, whom thou seest; nothing is more powerful to comfort saints than that word, I am Jesus, whom thou lovest; it is I that love thee, and seek thee good; be not afraid of me, nor of the storm.” When trouble is nigh, Christ is nigh. 4. Here is their speedy arrival at the port they were bound for, (v. 17.) (1.) They welcomed Christ into the ship; they willingly received him. Note, Christ’s absencing himself for a time, is but so much the more to endear himself, at his return, to his disciples. (2.) They tarried till night, (v. 18.) Cant. 3. 4. (2.) Christ landed them safe at the shore: Immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. Note, [1.] The ship of the church, in which the disciples of Christ have embarked themselves and their all, may be much shaken and distressed, yet it shall come safe to the harbour at last; tossed at sea, but not lost; cast down, but not destroyed; the bush burning, but not consumed. [2.] The power and presence of the church’s King shall expeditiate and facilitate her deliverance, and conquer the difficulties which have baffled the skill and industry of all her other friends. The disciples had rowed hard, but could not make their point till they had got Christ in the ship, and then the work was done suddenly. If we have received Christ Jesus the Lord, have received him willingly, though the night be dark, and the wind high, yet we may comfort ourselves with this, we shall be in shelter and nearer to it than we think we are. Many a doubting soul is fetched to heaven by a pleasing surprise, or ever it is aware. 22. The day following, when the people which stood on the other side of the sea saw that there was no other boat there, save that one whereunto his disciples were entered, and that Jesus went not with his disciples into the boat, but that his disciples were gone away alone; 23. (Howbeit there came other boats from Tiberias, nigh unto the place where they did eat bread, after that the Lord had given thanks;) 24. When the people therefore saw that Jesus was not there, neither his disciples, they also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus. 25. And when they had found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, Rabbi, when camest thou hither? 26. Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled. 27. Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him hath God the Father sealed. In these verses, we have, 1. The careful inquiry which the people made after Christ, v. 23, 24. They saw the disciples go to sea, they saw Christ return to them on the other side of the sea, and information that he desired to be private for some time; but, their hearts being set upon it to make him a King, they way-laid his return: and, the day following, the hot fit of their zeal still continuing, 1. They are here much at a loss for him; he was gone, and they went not what was become of him; they saw there was no other boat there, but that in which the disciples went off. Providence so ordains it, that this bearing of the miracle of his walking on the sea, for there was no boat for him to go in. They observed also, that Jesus did not go with his disciples, but that they went off alone, and had left him among them on their side of the water. Note, Those that would find Christ, must diligently observe all his motions, and learn to understand the tokens of his presence and absence, that they may steer accordingly. 2. They are very inconsiderate in seeking him. They searched the places thereabouts, and when they saw that Jesus was not there, nor his disciples, (neither he, nor any one that could give tidings of him,) they resolved to search elsewhere. Note, Those that would find Christ, must accomplish a diligent search; must seek till they find; must go from sea to sea, to seek the word of God, rather than live without it. And those whose Christ has feasted with the bread of life, should have their souls carried out in earnest desires toward him. Much would have more in common with Christ. Now, (1.) They resolved to go to Capernaum, in quest of him; there were his head-quarters, where he usually resided. Thither his disciples were gone, and they knew he would not be long absent from them; they that would find Christ, must go forth by the footsteps of the flock. (2.) Providence favoured them with an opportunity of gaining his help, which was the speciest way; for there came other boats from Tiberias, that his further off upon the same shore, nigh, though not so much to the place where they did eat bread, in which they might soon make a trip to Capernaum, and, probably, the boats were bound for that part. Note, Those that in sincerity seek Christ, and seek opportunities of conversing with him, are rewarded, and assisted: Prerogatives in these instances. The commonest, having occasion to mention their choice of the much filled bread, adds, after that the Lord had given
II. The success of this inquiry; (v. 25.) They found him on the other side of the sea. Note, Christ was made known to them, not by these discoveries made upon him by grace, but by their convictions being strong, and their desires warm, they followed him presently. Good motions are often crushed, and come to nothing, for want of being prosecuted in time. They came to Capernaum, and, for aught that appears, these unsound hypocritical followers of Christ had a calm and pleasant passage, while his sincere disciples had a rough and stormy one. It is not strange if it fare worse with the best men in this evil world. They are seeking Jesus. Note, Those that would find Christ, and find comfort in him, must be willing to take pains, and, as those here, compass sea and land, to seek and serve him who came from heaven to earth, to seek and save us.

III. The question they put to him when they found him; Rabbi, when comest thou hither? It should seem by v. 59, that they found him in the synagogue. They knew that was the likeliest place to see Christ in, for it was his custom to attend public assemblies for religious worship, Luke 4. 16. Note, Christ must be sought, and will be found, but in the congregations of his people, and in the administration of his ordinances; public worship is what Christ chooses to own, and grace with his presence, and the manifestations of himself. There they found him, and all they had to say to him, was, Rabbi, when comest thou hither? They saw he would not be made a King, and therefore say no more of that, but call him Rabbi, their Teacher. Their inquiry relates to that, how he came hither, when, and how, he came thither? But such an answer as their case required.

IV. The answer Christ gave them, did not direct to their question. What was it to them, when and how, he came thither? But such an answer as their case required.

1. He discovers the corrupt principle that they acted from, in their following of him; (v. 26.) Verily, verily, I say unto you, I that search the heart, and know what is in man, I the Amen, the faithful Witness, Rev. 3. 14, 15. To seek me, that is the heart, but it is not from a good principle. Christ knows not only what we do, but why we do it. These followed Christ, (1.) Not for his doctrine's sake, not for his doctrine's sake. The miracles were the great confirmation of his doctrine; Nicodemus sought for him, for the sake of them, (ch. 3. 2.) and argued from the power of his works to the truth of his word; but these here were so stupid and mindless, that they never considered that. But, (2.) It was for their own bellies' sake; because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled; not because he taught them, but because he was a prophet. He had given them, 1. A full meal's meat; They shall eat, and were filled; and some of them perhaps were so poor, that they had not known for a long time before now, what it was to have enough, to eat and leave. 2. A dainty meal's meat; it is probable that, as the miraculous wine was the best wine, so was the miraculous food more than usually pleasant. 3. A cheap, meal's meat, that cost them nothing; no reckoning was had in it. Note, Many follow Christ for loaves, and not for love. Thus they do, who aim at secular advantage in their profession of religion, and follow it, because by this craft they got their preferments. Quanti preposter nobis facta de Christo—This fable respecting Christ, what a gainful concern we have made of it! said one of the popes: these people complimented Christ with Rabbi, and showed he was a great man. He was but a prophet, and the display of their hypocrisy; his ministers must hence learn not to flatter those that flatter them, nor to be bribed by fair words, but to give faithful reproofs where there is cause for them; nor cry jeevar to all that cry Rabbi to them.

2. He directs them to better principles; (v. 27.) Labour not for the meat that perisheth. This does not forbid honest labour for food convenient, 2 Thess. 3. 12. But we must not make the things of this world our chief care and concern. Note, (1.) The things of the world are meat that perisheth. Worldly wealth, honour, and pleasure, these are meat; they feed the fancy, and many times that is all, and fill the belly, things which men hunger after as meat, and glut themselves with, and which a carnal heart, as long as they last, may make a shift to live upon; but they perish, are of a perishing nature, wither of themselves, and are exposed in the fire, to those that have the largest share of them, are not sure to have them while they live, but are sure to lose them and lose them when they die. 2. It is therefore folly for us inordinately to labour after them. First, We must not labour in religion, nor work the works thereof, for this perish ing meat, with an eye to this; must not make our religion subservient to a worldly interest, nor aim at secular advantages in sacred exercises. Secondly, We must not at all labour for this meat; that is, we must not make these perishing things our chief good, nor make our care and pains about them our chief business; not seek those things first and most, Prov. 23. 45. 2. To quicken and excite our gracious pursuits; "Bestow your pains to better purpose, and labour for that meat which belongs to the soul. Which he observes,

1. [1] That it is unseckably desirable; it is meat which endures to everlasting life; it is happiness which will last as long as we must, which not only itself endures eternally, but will nourish us up t everlasting life. The blessings of the new covenant, are our preparatory for eternal life, our preservative to it, and the pledge and earnest of it.
I am undoubtedly attainable. Shall all the treasures of the world be manaced, and all the fruits of the earth gathered together, to furnish us with provisions that will last to eternity? No, The sea is not in me; among all the treasures hid in the sand, it cannot be gotten for gold; but it is that which the Son of man shall give; or 32-42, either which meat, or which life, the Son of man shall give. Observe here, First, Who gives this meat? the Son of man, the great high-priest and mediator of the stores, who is intrusted with the administration of the kingdom of God among men, and the dispensation of the gifts, graces, and comforts of that kingdom, and has power to give eternal life, with all the means of it, and preparations for it. We are bid to labour for it, as if it were to be got by our own industry, and sold upon that valuable consideration, as the heathen said, Di laboribus omnia venturus. The gods sell all advantages to the industrious. When we have laboured over so much for it, we have not merited it as our hire, but the Son of man gives it. And what more free than gift? It is an encouragement, that he who has the giving of it, is the Son of man, for then we may hope the sons of men that seek it, and labour for it, shall not fail to have it. Secondly, What authority he has to give it; for him the Father has sealed, with the Spirit of truth. God the Father sealed him with the Spirit that rested on him, by the voice from heaven, by the testimony he bore to signs and wonders. Divine revelation is perfected in him; in him the vision and prophecy is sealed up, (Deu. 9. 24.) to him all believers seal that he is true, (Ch. 5, 32.) and in him are all sealed, (2 Cor. 1. 22.)

28. Then said they unto him, What shall we do, that we might work the works of God? 29. Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, That ye believe on him whom he hath sent. 30. They said therefore unto him, What sign shewest thou them, that we may see, and believe thee! What dost thou work? 31. Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat. 32. Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. 33. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. 34. Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. 35. And Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. 36. But I said unto you, that ye also have seen me, and believe not. 37. All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. 38. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. 39. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me. That of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. 40. And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day. 41. The Jews then murmured at him, because he said, I am the bread which came down from heaven. 42. And they said, Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How is it then that he saith, I came down from heaven? 43. Jesus therefore answered and said unto them, Murmur not among yourselves. 44. No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day. 45. It is written in the prophets, And they shall all be taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me. 46. Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God: he hath seen the Father. 47. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlasting life. 48. I am that bread of life. 49. Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. 50. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die. 51. I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. 52. The Jews therefore strove among themselves, saying, How can this man give us his flesh to eat? 53. Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. 54. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life: and I will raise him up at the last day. 55. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. 56. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. 57. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. 58. This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and were dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live for ever. 59. These things said he in the synagogue, as he taught in Capernaum.
Whether this conference was with the Capernaums, in whose synagogue Christ now was, or with those who came from the other side of the sea, is not certain, or material; however it is an instance of Christ's condescension, that he gave them leave to ask him questions, and did not resent the interruption as an affront, no not from his common hearers, though not his immediate followers. Those that would be apt to teach, must be swift to hear, and ready to answer. It is the wisdom of teachers, when they are asked even impertinent, unprofitable questions, from them, to take occasion to answer that which is necessary. Thus, that question may be rejected, but not the request.

I. Christ having told them that they must work for the meat he spoke of, must labour for it, they inquire what work they must do, and he answers them, v. 28, 29.

1. Their inquiry was pertinent enough; (v. 28.) What shall we do, that we may work the works of God? Some understand it as a jest question; What works of God can we do more and better than those we do in obedience to the law of Moses?" But I rather take it as a humble, serious question, speaking them to be, at least for the present, in a good mind, and willing to know and do their duty; and I take it that they who asked this question How and What, (v. 38.) and made that request, (v. 34.) were not under a certain opinion with those that murmured, (v. 41, 42.) and strove, (v. 52.) for these are expressly called the Jews, which came out of Judea (for those were strictly called Jews) to cavil, whereas these were of Galilee, and came to be taught. This question here intimates that they were convinced that they who would obtain this everlasting meat, (1.) They must aim to do something great. They who look high in their expectations, and hope to enjoy God, must aim high in those endeavours, and study to do the works of God, works which he requires, and will accept of, works of God distinguished from the works of worldly men in their worldly pursuits. It is not enough to speak the words of God, but we must do the works of God. (2.) That they must be willing to do any thing; What shall we do? Lord, I am ready to do whatever thou appointest, though ever so disgusting to flesh and blood, Acts 9. 6.

2. Christ's answer was plain enough; (v. 29.) This is the work of God, that ye believe. Note, (1.) The work of faith is the work of God. They inquire after the works of God, (in the plural number,) being careful about many things; but Christ directs them to one work, which includes all, the one thing needful, that ye believe, which supersedes all the works of the ceremonial law; the work which is necessary to the acceptance of all the other works, and which produces them, for without faith you cannot please God. It is God's work, for it is of his working in us, it subjects the soul to his working on us, and quickens the soul in working on you. (2.) That faith is the work of God, which closes with Christ being the Son of God, and whom God hath sent, as God's Commissioner in the great affair of peace between God and man, and as such to rest upon him, and resign ourselves to him. See ch. 14. 1.

II. Christ having told them that the Son of man would give them this meat, they inquired concerning his name, and he answers their inquiry.

1. Their inquiry is after a sign; (v. 30.) What sign shewest thou? What do such sons of men require, that, since he required them to give him credit, he should produce his credentials, and make it out by miracle, that he was sent of God. Moses having confirmed his mission by signs, it was requisite that Christ, who came to set aside the ceremonial law, should in like manner confirm his: "What doth thou work at? What lasting characters of a divine power dost thou design to leave upon thy doctrine?" But herein they missed it, (1.) That they overlooked all the many miracles which they had before them; twice wrought by him, and which a ministered to an abundant proof of his divine mission. Is this a time of day to ask, What sign shewest thou? especially at Capernaum, the staple of miracles, where he had done so many mighty works, signs so significant of his office and undertaking? Were not these very persons but the other day miraculously fed, when all and as they that will not see: for they may be so blind as not to see whether he be day or night, when the sun shines in their faces. (2.) That they preferred the miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness before all the miracles Christ wrought; (v. 51.) Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; and to strengthen the objection, they quote a scripture for it: He gave them bread from heaven; (taken from Ps. 73. 24.) he gave them of the corn of heaven. What a good use might be made of this story which they here refer to! It was a memorable instance of God's power and goodness, often mentioned to the glory of God; (Neh. 9. 20, 21.) yet see how these people perverted it, and made an ill use of it.

[1.] Christ reproved them for their fondness of the miraculous bread, and bid them not set their hearts upon meat which perisheth; "Why," say they, meat for the belly was the great good thing that God gave to our fathers in the desert; and why should we not then labour for that meat? If God made much of them, why should we not be for these that will make much of us.

[2.] Christ had fed five thousand men with five loaves, and had given them that as one sign, to prove that He was the true bread; but, under colours of specifying the miracles of Moses, they tacitly undervalue that miracle of Christ, and evade the evidence of it. Christ fed his thousands; but Moses his hundred thousands: Christ fed them but once, and then reproved those who followed him in hope to be still fed, and put them off with a discourse of spiritual food; but Moses fed his followers forty years, and miracles were not the rarities, but their daily bread. Christ fed their thousands with one piece of barley-bread, and fishes out of the sea; but Moses fed Israel with bread from heaven, angels' food. Thus big did these Jews talk of the manna which their fathers did eat; but their fathers had slighted it, as much as they did now the barley-leaves, and called it light bread, Numb. 21. 5. Thus apt are we to slight and overlook the appearances of God's power and grace in our own times, while we tend to admire the wonders which our fathers told us of. Suppose this miracle of Christ was out-done by that of Moses, yet there were other instances in which Christ's miracles out-shone his; and besides, all true miracles prove a divine doctrine, though not equally illustrious in the circumstances, which were ever diversified according as the occasion did require. As in the case of the manna. The barley-leaves, so much, and much more, did the doctrine of Christ exceed the law of Moses, and his heavenly institutions the carnal ordinances of that dispensation.

2. Here is Christ's reply to this inquiry; wherein, (1.) He rectifies their mistake concerning the typical manna. It was true, their fathers did eat manna in the desert. But Moses did not give it them, nor were they obliged to him for it; he was but the instrument, and therefore they must look beyond him to God. We do not find that Moses did so much as pray to God for the manna; and he spake unadvisedly, when he said, Must we fetch water out of the rock? Moses gave them not either that bread, or that water. [2.] It was not given them, as they imagined, from heaven, from the highest heavens, but only from the clouds, and therefore not so much excelling that which had its rise from the earth, as they thought. Because the Scripture saith, He gave them the bread from heaven, &c. does not follow that it was heavenly bread, or was intended to be the nourishment of souls. Misunderstanding scripture-language occasions many mistakes in the things of God.

(2.) He informs them concerning the true Manna, of which that was a type; But my father gave you the true bread from heaven; the true bread, &c. (v. 46.) which was not but a shadow and figure, is now given, not to your fathers, who are dead and gone, but to you of this present age, for whom the better things were reserved; he is now giving you that Bread from heaven, which is truly so called. As much as the throne of God's glory is above the clouds of the air, so much doth the spiritual Bread of the everlasting日内耳 excite the manna. In calling God his Father, he speaks himself greater than Moses; for Moses was faithful but as a servant, Christ as a Son, Heb. 3. 5.

Now this objection of theirs concerning the manna, gave further occasion to Christ to discourse of himself under the similitude of bread, and of believing under the similitude of eating and drinking: to which, together with the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, and with the remarks made upon it by the hearers, the rest of this discourse may be reduced.

[1.] Christ, having spoken of himself as the great Gift of God, and the true Bread, (v. 32.) largely explains and confirms this, that we may rightly know him.

First, He here shows that he is the true Bread; 1. the repeats again and again, v. 33, 35, 42-51. Observe,

1. That Christ is Bread; is that to the soul, which bread is to the body, nourishes and supports the spiritual life, (is the Staff of it,) as bread does his bodily life; it is the staff of life. The doctrine of the gospel concerning Christ, that he is the Mediator between God and man, that he is our Peace, our Righteousness, our Foundation, our Corner-stone, by these things to live. Our bodies could better live without God than our souls without Christ. Bread-corn is bruised; (Isa. 28. 28.) so was Christ; he was born at Bethlehem, the house of bread, and typified by the sheaf-bread.

2. That he is the Bread of God, (v. 33.) divine Bread; it is he that is of God, (v. 46.) Bread which my Father gives, (v. 52.) which he has made to be the Food of our souls; the Bread of God, family, his children's Bread. The Levitical sacrifices are called the bread of God, (Lev. 21, 22.) and Christ is the great Sacrifice; Christ, in his words and ordinances, the Feast upon the sacrifice.

3. That he is the Bread of life; (v. 33. and again, v. 48.) that Bread of life, alluding to the tree of life in the midst of the garden of Eden, which was to Adam and Eve, (Gen. 2, 9.) which is the tree of life, of which he might eat, and live. Christ is the Bread of life, for he is the Fruit of the tree of life. (1.) He is the living Bread; (so he explains himself, v. 51.) I am the living Bread. Bread is itself a dead thing, and nourishes not but by the help of the faculties of a living body; but Christ is himself living Bread, and nourishes by his own power. Manna was a dead thing; if kept one night, it would become dried, and bread worms; but Christ is everliving, everlasting Bread, that never moulds, or waxes old. The doctrine of Christ crucified, is now as strengthening and comforting to a believer as ever it was, and his meditation still of as much value and efficacy as ever. (2.) He gives life unto the world, world as God's great Agent, and the world's great Physician. It was not any private business that brought him hither, but he came to settle affairs between parties no less considerable than the great Creator, and the whole creation. (2.) Christ, when he was in the world, did not carry on any private design, nor had any separate interest at all, distinct from theirs for whom he acted. The scope of his whole life was to glorify God, and do good to men; he therefore never consulted his own ease, safety, or quiet; but, when he was called to lay down his life, though he had a human nature which started at it, he set aside the consideration of that, and resolved his will as Man into the will of God; Not as I will, but as thou wilt.

(3.) He appoints us, in particular, with the will of his Father, which he came to do; he here declares the decree, the instructions he was to pursue.

(1.) The private instructions given to Christ, that he should be sure to save all the chosen remnant; and this is the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son; (v. 38.) "This is the Father's will, who hath sent me; this is the charge I am intrusted with, that all which he had given me I should bring to perfect."

Note. [1.] There is a certain number of the children of men, given by the Father to Jesus Christ, to be his care, and so to be to him for a name and a praise: given him for an inheritance, for a possession. Let him do all that for them, which their case requires; teach them, and heal them, pay their debt, and plead their cause, prepare them for, and preserve them to, the Savour. Those whom God chose to be the objects of his special love, he lodged as a trust in the hands of Christ.

[2.] Jesus Christ has undertaken that he will lose none of those that were thus given him of the Father. The many sons whom he was to bring to glory, shall all be forthcoming, and none of them missing. Matth. 18. 14. None of them shall be lost for want of sufficient power, and shall be sufficient to get redemption and to sanctify them. If I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, let me bear the blame for ever, Gen. 43. 9.

[3.] Christ's undertaking for those that are given him, extends to the resurrection of their bodies; I will raise it up again at the last day; which supposes all that goes before, but this is to crown and complete the undertaking; the body is a part of the man, and therefore a part of Christ's purchase and charge; it pertains to the promises, and therefore it shall not be lost. The undertaking is not only that he shall lose none, no person, but that he shall lose nothing, no part of the person, and therefore not the body. Christ's undertaking will never be accomplished till the resurrection, when the souls and bodies of the undertaking shall be gathered together to Christ, that he may present them to the Father; Behold, I and the children that thou hast given me, Heb. 2. 13. 2 Tim. 1. 12.

[4.] The spring and original of all this, is the sovereign will of God; the counsels of his will, according to which he works all this. This was the commandment he gave to his Son, when he sent him into the world, and to which the Son always had an eye.

(2.) The public instructions which were to be given to the children of men, in what way, and upon what terms, they might obtain salvation by Christ; and this is the covenant of grace between God and man. Who the particular persons were, that were given to Christ, is a secret; The Lord knows them that are his, we do not, nor is it fit we should; but, though their names are concealed, their characters are published. An offer is made of life and happiness upon gospel-terms, that by it those that were given to Christ might be brought to him, and others left inexcusable, as it was in the time of Adam. He revealed will, of him that sent me; the method agreed upon, upon which to proceed with the children of men, that every one, Jew or Gentile, that sees the Son, and believes on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up." This is the gospel, indeed, good news; not reviving to hear this? [1.] That eternal life may be had, if it be not our own fault; that, whereas upon the sin of the first Adam, the way of the tree of life was blocked up, by the grace of the second Adam it is laid open again. The crown of glory is set before us as the prize of our high calling, which we may run for and obtain. [2.] Every one may have it. This gospel is to be preached, this offer made to all, and none can say, It belongs not to me," Rev. 22. 17. [3.] This everlasting life is sure to all those who believe in Christ, and to them only. He that sees the Son, and believes on him, shall be saved. Some understand this saying as a limitation of this condition of salvation to those only that have the revelation of Christ and his grace made to them. Every one that has the opportunity of being acquainted with Christ, and improves that so well as to believe him, and to put his trust in him, will live an eternal life, so that none shall be condemned for unbelief, (however they may be for other sins,) but those who have had the gospel preached to them, who, like these Jews here, (v. 36.) have seen, and yet have not believed; have known Christ, and yet not trusted in him. But I rather understand seeing here to mean the same thing with believing, for it is ειπες, which signifies not so much the sight of the eye, (as των ἀνθρώπων μέτα τον θάνατον, which signifies not so much the sight of the ear, (as τον θανατον μετα των ἀνθρώπων,) as the contemplation of the mind. Every one that sees the Son, that is, believes on him, sees him with an eye of faith, by which we come to be duly acquainted and affected with the doctrine of the gospel concerning him. It is to look upon him, as the stung Israelites upon the brazen serpent. It is not a blind faith that Christ must be seen, but with the sight of the eye, the Lord is our sight, and if we cast out our eyes from it, and follow him, but that we should see him, and see what ground we go upon in our faith. It is then right, when it is not taken up upon hear-say, (believing as the church believes,) but is the result of a due consideration of, and insight into, the motives of credibility; Now mine eyes see thee; He have heard him ourselves. [4.] Those who believe in Jesus Christ, in order to their having everlasting life, shall be raised up by his power at the last day. He had it in charge as his Father's will, (v. 35.) and here he solemnly makes it his own undertaking, I will raise him up, which signifies not only the return of the body to life, but the putting of the whole man into a full possession of the eternal life promised.

[5.] John discoursing thus concerning himself, as the Bread of life that came down from heaven, let us see what remarks his hearers made upon it. First, When they heard of such a thing as the Bread of God, which gives life, they heartily prayed for it; (v. 34.) Lord, evermore give us this Bread. I cannot think that this is spoken scoffingly, and in a way of derision, as most interpreters understand it. Here we have a gospel term by which bread is called, and we are to be fed with it; not for one meal, as with the five loaves, but evermore; as if this were no better a prayer than that of the impenitent thief, If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us. But I take this re quest to be made, though ignorantly, yet honestly, and to be well meant; for they call him Lord, and desire a share in what he gives, whatever he means by it. General and confirmed notions of divine things produce in carnal hearts some kind of desires toward them, and wishes of them; like Balaam's wish, to die the death of the righteous. Those who have an indistinct knowledge of the things of God, who see many wonderful things, but have no full and adequate knowledge in the inarticulate prayers for spiritual blessings. They think the favour of God a good thing, and heaven a fine place, and cannot but wish them their own, while they have no value or desire at all for that holiness which is necessary both to the one and the other. Let this be the desire of our souls; have we tasted that the Lord is gracious, been feasted with the word of God, and Christ in the word; let us say, 'Lord, evermore give us this bread; let the Bread of life be our daily Bread, the heavenly Manna our continual Feast, and let us never know the want of it.

Secondly, But when they understood, that by this Bread of life Jesus meant himself, then they desisted. Whether they were the same persons that had prayed for it, (v. 34.) or some others of the company, does not appear; it seems to be some others, for they lived longer than the other; and (v. 43.) They murmured at him. This comes in immediately after that solemn declaration which Christ had made of God's will, and his own undertaking concerning man's salvation, (v. 33, 40.) which certainly were some of the most weighty and gracious words that ever proceeded out of the mouth of our Lord Jesus, the most faithful, and best worthy of all acceptation; one would think that, like Israel in Egypt, when they heard that God had thus provided for them, they should have bowed their heads, and worshipped with what Christ said; and though they did not openly oppose and contradict it, yet they privately whispered among themselves in contempt of it, and instilled into another one's minds prejudices against it. Many that will not professedly contradict the doctrine of Christ, (their visits are on weak, groundless, that they are either ashamed to own them, or afraid to have them silenced,) yet say in their heart, that they do not like it.

Now, 1. That which offended them, was, Christ's asserting his original to be from heaven, v. 41, 42. How is it that he saith, I came down from heaven? They had heard of angels coming down from heaven, but never of a man. So disapproving the proofs he had given them of his being more than a man.

2. That which they thought justified them herein, was, that they knew his extraction on earth; Is this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? They took it amiss, that he should say that he came down from heaven, when he was one of them. They speak slightly of his blessed name, Jesus: Is not this Jesus? They take it for granted that he was religious in his youth, though he was only reputed so to be. Note, Mistakes concerning the person of Christ, as if he were a mere man, conceived and born by ordinary generation, occasion the offence that is taken at his doctrine and offices. Those who set him on a level with the other sons of men, whose father and mother we know, no wonder if they derogate from the honour of his satisfaction, and the mysteries of his undertaking, and, like the Egyptians, that murmured at his promise to raise us up at the last day.

2. Christ, having spoken of faith as the great work of God, (v. 29.) discourses largely concerning this work, instructing and encouraging us in it.

First, He shows what it is to believe in Christ.

1. To believe in Christ, is to come to Christ; He that comes to me, is the same with him that believes in me; (v. 35.) and again, (v. 37. He that comes unto me; so v. 44, 45. Repentance toward God is coming to him, (Jer. 3, 22.) as our chief Good and highest End; and so faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ is coming to him as our Prince and Saviour, and our Way to the Father. It denotes the outgoings of our affection toward him, for these are the first and fundamental parts of every true Christian's life, which we must make a point of; it is to come off from all these things that stand in opposition to him, or competition with him, and to come up to those terms upon which life and salvation are offered to us through him. When he was here on earth, it was more than barely coming where he was; so it is now, more than coming to his word and ordinances.

2. It is to feed upon Christ; (v. 51.) If any man eat this Bread, the former denotes applying ourselves to Christ, this denotes applying Christ to ourselves, with appetite and delight, that we may receive life and strength and comfort from him. To feed on him as the Israelites on the manna, having quitted the flesh-fots of Egypt, and not depending on the labour of their hands, (to eat of that,) but living purely on the bread given them from heaven.

Secondly, If we be assured of the comforts of our being, and the continuance of it in the midst of these conforts, we have enough; now these two are here secured to true believers.

They shall never want, never hunger, never thirst, v. 35. Desires they have, earnest desires, but these shall be supplied by a suitable, so seasonably, so abundantly supplied, that they cannot be called hunger and thirst, which is uneasy and painful. Those that did eat manna, and drank of the rock, hungered and thirsted afterwards. Manna sufficed them, water out of the rock failed them, but there is such an over-flowing fulness in Christ as can never be exhausted, and there are such over-flowing communications from him as can never be interrupted.

2. They shall never die, nor be eternally; for, (1.) He that believes on Christ, has everlasting life, (v. 47.) he has the assurance of it, the grant of it, the earnest of it; he has it in the promise and firstfruits. Union with Christ and communion with God in Christ, are everlasting life begun. (2.) Whereas they that did eat manna, died, Christ is such Bread as a man may eat of, and never die, v. 49, 50. Observe here;

[1.] The insufficiency of the typical manna; Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. There may be much good use made of the death of our fathers; their graves speak to us, and their monuments are our memorials, particularly of this, that the greatest plenty of the most dainty food will neither prolong the thread of life, nor put by the stroke of death. They that did eat manna died, like the other men. There could be nothing amiss in their diet, to shorten their days, nor could their deaths be hastened by the toils and fatigues of life; (for they neither sowed nor reaped;) and yet they died. First, Many of them died by the immediate strokes of God's vengeance for their unbelief and murmuring; for, though they did eat that spiritual meat, yet with many of them God was not well pleased, but they were exterminated in the wildness. Their eating manna was no security to them from the wrath of God, as believing in Christ is to us. Secondly, The rest of them died in a course of nature, and their carcasses fell, under a divine sentence, in that wilderness where they did eat manna. In that very age when miracles were daily bread, was the life of man reduced to the sitt it now stands at, as appears, Ps. 90. 10. Let them not boast so much of maonna then.

[2.] The all-sufficiency of the true Maonna, of which the other was a type; This is the Bread that cometh down from heaven, that truly divine and heavenly Food, that a man may eat thereof, and not die; not fall under the wrath of God, but bring forth that second death; no, nor the first death finally and irrecoverably; not die, nor perish, nor come short of the heavenly Canaan, as the Israelites did of the earthly; for want of faith, though they had maonna.

This is further explained by that promise in the next words, If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; v. 33. That is the meaning which the word cometh down in this place has, he shall pass through to that world where there shall be no more death. To live for ever, is not to be for ever, (the damned in hell shall be for ever, the soul of man was made for an endless state;) but to be happy for ever. And because the body must needs die, and he be as water split upon the ground, Christ here undertakes for the gathering of that up too; (as he has done both before, at the last day; and even that shall live for ever.)

Thirdly, He shows what encouragements we have to believe in Christ. Christ here speaks of some who had seen him, and yet believed not, v. 36. They saw his person and miracles, and heard him preach, and yet were not wrought upon to believe in him. Faith is not always the effect of sight; the soldiers were eye-witnesses of his Resurrection; but welcome them, instead of believing in him, belied him; so that it is a difficult thing to bring people to believe in Christ: and by the operation of the Spirit of grace, those that have not seen, yet have believed.

Two things we are assured of, to encourage our faith.

1. That the Son will bid all those welcome, that come to him; (v. 37.) Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out—We welcome you, and shall this word be to our souls, which bids us welcome to Christ! Him that cometh; it is in the singular number, speaking favour, not only to the body of believers in general, but to every particular soul that applies itself to Christ. Here, (1.) The duty required is a pure gospel-duty; come to Christ, that we may come to God by him. His beauty and love, those great attractions, must draw us to him; sense of the necessity of grace, draw us to him; see this thing to bring us to Christ. (2.) The promise is a pure gospel-promise; I will in no wise cast out—We welcome you, and shall this word be to our souls, which bids us welcome to Christ! Him that cometh; it is in the singular number, speaking favour, not only to the body of believers in general, but to every particular soul that applies itself to Christ.

We have reason to fear that he should cast us out; considering our meanness, our villeness, our unworthiness to come, our weakness in coming; we may justly expect that he should shun us when we come to him, and shut his doors against us; but he obviates these fears with this assurance, he will not do it; will not disdain us though we are mean, will not reject us though we are sinful. Do poor scholars come to him, to be taught? Though they be dull and slow, he will not cast them out. Do poor patients come to him, to be cured? Poor crowds come to him, to be advised? Though their case be bad, and though they cannot pay, he will in no wise cast them out. But, [2.] More favour is implied than is expressed; when it is said that he will not cast them out, the meaning is, He will receive them, and entertain them, and give them all that which they come to him for. As he will not refuse them at their first coming, so he will not afterward, upon every dis- pleasure, cast them out. His gifts and callings are without stint.

2. That the Father will, without fail, bring all those to him in due time, that were given him. In the federal transactions between the Father and the Son, relating to man’s redemption, as the Son undertook for the justification, sanctification, and salvation, of all that should come to him; (‘Let me have them put into my hands, and then leave the management of them to me;) so the Father, the Fountain and Original of being, life, and grace, undertook to get them into his hand all that were given him, and bring them to him.

Now, (1.) He here assures us that this shall be done; (v. 57.) All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me. Christ had complained, (v. 36.) of those, who, though they had seen him, yet would not believe on him; and then he adds this, [1.] For their conviction and awakening, plainly intimating that they were not only not his, but they were not his when they persisted in it, would be a certain sign that they did not belong to the election of grace; for how can we think that God gave us to Christ, if we give ourselves to the world and the flesh? 2 Pet. 1. 10. [2.] For his own comfort and encouragement; Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious. The election has obtained; and shall, though multitudes be blinded, Rom. 11. 7. Though he lose many of his creatures through the neglect of his charge; All that the Father giveth him, shall come to him, notwithstanding. Here we have,

First, The election described; All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me; the persons of the elect, and all that belongs to them; all their services, all their interests; as all that he has, is theirs, so all he is, is theirs: they were given him in full recompense of his undertaking. Not only all persons, but all things, are gathered together in Christ, (Eph. 1. 10.) and reconciled, Col. 1. 20. The giving of the chosen remnant to Christ is spoken of, (v. 39.) as a thing done; he hath given them; here it is spoken of as a thing in the doing, he giveth them; because, when the first-believers were brought into the world, it should seem, there was a renewal of the grant; see Heb. 10. 5. &c. God was now about to give him the heathen for his inheritance, (Ps. 2. 8.) to put him in possession of the desolate heritages, (Isa. 49. 8.) to divide him a portion with the great, Isa. 53. 12. And though the Jews, who saw him, believe not on him, yet these (whom he shall come to me;) the other sheep, which are not of this fold, shall be brought, ch. 10. 15. See Acts 13. 46—49.

Secondly, The effect of it secured; They shall come to me. This is a prediction, that as many as were in the counsel of God ordained to life, shall be brought to life by being brought to Christ. They are scattered, are mingled among the nations; yet none of them shall be forgotten; not a grain of God’s corn shall be lost, as is promised, Amos 9. 9. They are alienated from Christ, and averse to him, and yet they shall come. As God’s omniscience is engaged for the finding of them all out, so is his omnipotence for the bringing of them all in. Not, They shall be driven to me, but, They shall come freely, shall be made willing.

(2.) He here acquaints us how it shall be done. How shall those who are given to Christ, be brought to him? Two things are to be done in order to it.

[1.] Their understandings shall be enlightened; that is promised, v. 45. 46. It is written in the prophets, who spake of these things before, And they shall all be taught of God; this we find, Isa. 54. 13. and Jer. 41. 5. They shall all know me. Note, In order to our believing in Jesus Christ, it is necessary that we be taught of God; that is, First, That God shall teach us to believe; and, Secondly, That we shall be taught to believe; that is, He will make both what we are to believe concerning Christ, and why we are to believe it. There are some things which even nature teaches, but to bring us to Christ there is need of a higher light. Secondly
That there be a divine work wrought in us, enabling us to understand and receive these revealed truths, and the evidence of them, God, in giving us reason, teaches us more than the heavens do; but in giving us faith, he teaches us more than the natural man. Thus all the church's children, all that are genuine, are taught of God; he hath undertaken their education. Whatever we may do, we are guided by way of inference from this, that every man that has heard and learned of the Father, comes to Christ, v. 45. 1. It is here implied that none will come to Christ but those that have heard and learned of the Father. We shall never be brought to Christ, but under a divine conduct; except God by his grace enlighten our minds, inform our judgments, and rectify our mistakes; and not only tell us, that we may hear, but teach us, that we may learn, the truth as it is in Jesus, we shall never be brought to believe in Christ. 2. That this divine teaching does so necessarily produce the faith of God's elect, that we may conclude that those who do not come to Christ, have never heard or learned of the Father, for, if they had, doubtless they would have come to Christ. In vain do men pretend to be taught of God, if they believe not in Christ, for he teaches us another lesson, Gal. 1. 8, 9. See how God deals with men. This divine conduct moves men. Those who have no communications with the cards of a man, opens the understanding first, and then by that in a regular way, influences the inferior faculties; thus he comes in by the door, but Satan, as a robber, climbs up another way. But lest any should dream of a visible appearance of God the Father to the children of men, (to teach them these things,) and entertain any gross conceptions about hearing and learning of the Father, he adds, v. 46. As that any one may come to the Father; it is implied, nor can see him, with bodily eyes, or may expect to learn of him as Moses did, to whom he spake face to face; but God, in enlightening men's eyes and teaching them, works in a spiritual way. The Father of spirits hath access to, and influence upon, men's spirits, unincarned. Those that have not seen his face, have felt his power. And yet there is one intimately acquainted with the Father, he knew of God, that had seen the Father, ch. 1. 18. Note, (1.) Jesus Christ is of God in a peculiar manner, God of God, Light of Light; not only sent of God, but begotten of God before all worlds. (2.) It is the prerogative of Christ to have seen the Father, perfectly to know him and his counsels. (3.) Even that illumination which is preparative to faith, is conveyed to us through Christ. Those that learn of the Father, forasmuch as they cannot know him, are made acquainted with much of the knowledge of Christ, who alone hath seen him. As all divine discoveries are made through Christ, so through him all divine powers are exerted. [2.] Their wills shall be bowed. If the soul of man had now its original rectitude, there needed no more to influence the will, than the illumination of the understanding; but in the depraved soul of fallen man there is a rebellion of the will against the right dictates of the understanding; a carnal will, which is contrary to itself to the divine light and law; it is therefore requisite that there be a work of grace wrought upon the will, which is here called drawing; v. 44. As man can come to me, except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him. The Jews murmured at the doctrine of Christ; not only would not receive it themselves, but were angry that others did; Christ overheard their secret whisperings, and said, (v. 45,) No man can come to me, except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him. They lay not the fault of your dislike of my doctrine one upon another, as if it is because you find it generally distasteful; no, it is owing to yourselves, and your own corrupt dispositions, which are such as amount to a moral impotency; your antipathies to the truths of God and prejudices against them are so strong, that nothing less than a divine power can conquer them. And this is the case of all mankind; "No man can come to me, can persuade himself to come up to the terms of the gospel, except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him," v. 44. Observe, First, The nature of the work; it is drawing, which speaks not a force put upon the will, whereby we are made willing, and a new bias given to the soul, by which it inclines to God. This seems to be more than a moral persuasion, for by that it is in the power of man to draw; yet it is not to be called a physical impulse, for it lies out of the reach of nature; but he that formed the spirit of man within him by his creating power, and fashioned the hearts of men by his providential influence, knows how to new fashion the soul, and to alter its bent, and temper, and make it conformable to himself and his own will, without doing any wrong to its natural liberty. It is such a drawing as works not only a compliance, but a cheerful compliance, a complacency; Draw us, and we will run after thee. Secondly, The necessity of it: no man, in this weak and helpless state, can come to Christ without it. As we cannot do any natural action with out the靠着 an influence from above, so we cannot do any action, morally good, without the influence of special grace, in which the new man lives, and moves, and has its being, as much as the man that has in the divine providence. Thirdly, The Author of it; the Father, who hath sent me. The Father, having sent Christ, will succeed him, for he would not send him on a fruitless errand. Christ having undertaken to bring souls to God, it is the Father who undertakes to bring them to him, and to give him possession of those whom he had given him a right to. God, having by promise given the kingdom of Israel to David; did at length draw the hearts of the people to him; so having sent Christ to save souls, he sends souls to him to be saved by him. Fourthly, The crown and perfection of this work; and I will raise him up at the last day. This is four times mentioned in the last verse; and doubtless it includes all the intermediate and preparatory workings of divine grace. When he raises them up at the last day, he will put the last hand to his undertaking, will bring forth the tapstone. If he undertake this, surely he can do any thing, and will do everything, that is necessary in order to it. Let our expectations be carried out towards a happiness reserved for the last day, when all the years of time shall be completely and ended. [3.] Christ, having thus spoken of himself as the Bread of life, and of faith as the work of God, comes more particularly to show what of himself is this Bread, namely, his flesh, and that to believe, is to eat of that, v. 51—58, where he still prosecutesthe metaphor of food. Observe, First, The preparation of this food; The bread that I will give is my flesh; v. 51. The flesh of the Son of man, and his blood, v. 53. His flesh is meat indeed, and his blood a drink indeed, v. 56. Secondly, The participation of this food; we must eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, v. 53. Again, v. 54. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, and the same words, (v. 56, 57,) he that eateth me. This is certainly a parable, or figurative discourse, wherein the actions of the soul upon things spiritual and divine, are represented by those of the body. It is undeniable which make the truths of Christ more intelligible to some, and less so to others, Mark 4. 12. Now let us see, 1. How this discourse of Christ was liable to mistake and misconstruction, that men might see, and not perceive.
(1.) It was misconstrued by the carnal Jews, to whom it was first delivered; vi. 52. They strive among themselves; they whispered in each other's ears their dissatisfaction; How can this man give us his flesh to eat? Christ spake (v. 51.) of giving his flesh for us, to suffer and die; but they, without due consideration, understood it of his giving it to us, to be eaten; which gave occasion to Christ to tell them, that, however what he said was otherwise intended, yet, if they would understand him aright, there was no such absurd thing (if rightly understood) as, prinim facie—in the first instance, they took it to be.

(2.) It has been wretchedly misconstrued by the church of Rome for the support of their monstrous doctrine of Transubstantiation, which gives the lie to our senses, contradicts the nature of a sacrament, and overthrows all convincing evidence. They, like these Jews here, understand it of a corporal and carnal eating of Christ's body, like Nicodamus, ch. 3. 4. The Lord's supper was not yet instituted, and therefore it could have no reference to that; it is a spiritual eating and drinking that is here spoken of, not a sacramental.

(3.) It is misunderstood by many ignorant, carnal people, who from hence infer, that if they take the sacrament, they can eat the body, and drink the blood of Christ; which is, as it makes many that are weak causelessly uneasy if they want it, so it makes many that are wicked causelessly easy if they have it. Let us see therefore,

2. How this discourse of Christ is to be understood.

(1.) What is meant by the flesh and blood of Christ. It is called, (v. 53.) The flesh of the Son of man, and his blood, his Messias and Mediator; the flesh and blood which he assumed in his incarnation, (Heb. 2. 14.) and which he gave up in his death and sufferings; my flesh which I will give to be crucified and slain. It is said to be given for the life of the world, that is, (1. ) Instead of the life of the world, which was forfeited by sin, Christ gives his own flesh as a ransom or counter-price. Christ was our Bait, bound body for body, (as we say,) and therefore his life must go for ours, that ours may be spared. Here am I, let these go their way. [v. 53.]

In order to the life of the world, to purchase a general offer of eternal life to all the world, and the special assurances of it to all believers. So that the flesh and blood of Christ are the redemption for the world from the incurable and dying; Christ should him himself satisfied, and the redemption wrought out by him, with all the precious benefits of redemption; pardon of sin, acceptance with God, the adoption of sons, access to the throne of grace, the promises of the covenant, and eternal life; these are called the flesh and blood of Christ. First, because they are purchased by his flesh and blood, by the breaking of his body, and the shedding of his blood. Well may the purchased privileges be dennominated from the price that was paid for them, for it puts a value upon them; write upon them pretium sanguinis—the price of blood. Secondly, Because they are meat and drink to our souls. Flesh with the blood was prohibited; (Gen. 9. 4.) but the privileges of the gospel are as flesh and blood to us, prepared for the nourishment of our souls. He that before compared himself to bread, which is necessary food; here to flesh, which is delicious. It is a feast of fat things, Isa. 25. 6. The soul is supplied with Christ as with marrow and fatness, Ps. 63. 5. It is meat indeed, and drink indeed; truly so, that is spiritually; so Dr. Whitby; as Christ is called the true Vine, or truly Meat, an opposition to the shows and shadows with which the world is loaden with flesh and drink. In Christ and his gospel are real supply and solid satisfaction; that is meat indeed, and drink indeed, which satiates and replenishes, Jer. 31. 25, 26.

(2.) What is meant by eating this flesh, and drinking this blood, which is so necessary and beneficial; it is certain that it means neither more nor less than believing in Christ. As we partake of meat and drink by eating and drinking, so we partake of Christ and his benefits by faith: and believing in Christ includes these four things, which eating and drinking do. (1. ) It implies an appetite to Christ.

This spiritual eating and drinking begins with hungering and thirsting for Christ. John 6. 35. This is no fortuitous desires after Christ, not willing to take up, with any thing short of an interest in him; Give me Christ or else I die. [2.] An application of Christ to ourselves. Meat looked up to will not nourish us, but meat fed upon, and so made our own, and as it were one with us. We must so accept of Christ as to appropriate him to ourselves; my Lord and my God, ch. 20. 28. [3. ] A feast in Christ and in his salvation. The doctrine of Christ crucified must be meat and drink to us, most pleasant and delightful. We must feast upon the dainties of the New Testament in the blood of Christ, taking as great a complacency in the methods which infinite wisdom has taken to redeem and save us, as we do in the most needful supplies or grateful delights of this world. [4.] A feast in him and from him, and a dependence upon him for the support and comfort of our spiritual life, and the strength, growth, and vigour of the new man. To feed upon Christ is to do all in his name, in union with him, and by virtue drawn from him; it is to live upon him as we do upon our meat. How our lives are nourished by our food we cannot describe, but that we are so we know and find; so it is with this spiritual nourishment. Our Saviour was so well pleased with this metaphor, (as very significant and expressive,) that, when afterward he would institute some outward sensible signs, by which to represent our communicating of the benefits of his death, he chose those of eating and drinking, and made them sacramental actions. Having thus explained the general meaning of this part of Christ's discourse, the particulars are reducible to two heads.

First, The necessity of our feeding upon Christ; (v. 53.) Except we eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, we have not life in you. That is, 1. It is a certain sign that you have no spiritual life in you, if you have no desire toward Christ, nor doth he navigate in you. If the soul does not hunger and thirst, certainly it does not live; it is a sign that we are dead indeed, if we are dead to such meat and drink as this. When artificial bees, that by curious springs were made to move to and fro, were to be distinguished from natural ones, (they say,) it was done by putting honey among them, which the natural bees only looked to, but the artificial ones denied it not, for they had no life in them. 2. It is certain that you can have no spiritual life, unless you derive it from Christ by faith; separated from him you can do nothing. Faith in Christ is the primium vivendi—the first living principle of grace; without it we have not the truth of spiritual life, nor any title to eternal life; our bodies may as well live without meat, as our souls without Christ.

Secondly, The benefit and advantage of it, in two things.

1. We shall be one with Christ, as our bodies are with our food when it is digested; (v. 56.) He that eateth my flesh, and drinks my blood, that lives by faith in Christ crucified, (it is spoken of as a continued act,) he dwelleth in me, and I him. By faith we have a close and intimate union with Christ; he feeds us, we feed him. John 6. 21—23. 1 Pet. 2. 24. Believers dwell in Christ as their strong hold or city of refuge; Christ dwells in them as the Master of the house, to rule it, and provide for it. is the union between Christ and believers, that he sources in their griefs, and they share in his graces
and joys; he sups with them upon their bitter herbs, and they with him upon his rich dainties. It is an inseparable union, like that between the body and the digested food. Rom. 8. 35. 1 John 4. 13.
2. We shall live, shall be eternally fed by him, as our bodies live by our food. (1.) We shall live by him; (v. 57.) as the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even shall live by me. We have here the series and order of the divine life. [1.] God as the living Father hath life in and of himself. I am that I am, is his name for ever. [2.] Jesus Christ, as Medi-26.) but he has it of the Father; he that sent him, not only qualified him with that life which was necessary to so great an undertaking, but constituted him the Treasury of divine life to us; he breathed on the second Adam the breath of spiritual lives,
as into the first Adam the breath of natural lives.
[3.] True believers receive this divine life by virtue of their union with Christ, which is inferred from the union between the Father and the Son, as it is compared to it, ch. 17. 21. For therefore he that eateth me, or feeds on me, even he shall live by me;
those that live upon Christ, shall live by him.
The life of believers is had from Christ; (ch. 1.
16.) it is hid with Christ; (Col. 3. 4.) we live by him as the members by the head, the branches by the root; because he lives, we shall live also. (2.) We shall live by the flesh and drinketh my blood, as it is prepared in the gospel to be the food of souls, he hath eternal life, he hath it now, v. 40. He hath that in him, which eternal life began; he hath the earnest and foretaste of it, and the hope of it; he shall live for ever, v. 54. His happiness shall run parallel with the longest line of eternity itself.
The history of our Lord's conversation with an account where Christ had this discourse with the Jews, (v. 39.)
In the synagogue as he taught; implying that he taught them many other things besides these, but this was that in his discourse, which was new. He adds this,
that he said these things in the synagogue, to show,
[1.] The credit of Christ's doctrine. His truths sought no corners, but were publicly preached in mixed assemblies, as able to abide the most severe and searching test. Christ, when he was eternally upon his trial; (ch. 18. 30.) I ever taught in the synagogue.
[2.] The credibility of his narrative of it. To assure you that the discourse was fairly represented, he appeals to the synagogue at Capernaum, where it might be examined.

66. From that time many of his disciplcs went back, and walked no more with him. 67. Then said Jesus unto the twelve, Will ye also go away? 68. Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. 69. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God. 70. Jesus answered them, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? 71. He spake of Judas Iscahriot the son of Simon: for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve.

We have here an account of the effects of Christ's discourse, some were offended, and others edified by it; some driven from him, and others brought nearer to him.

1. To some it was a savour of death unto death;
not only to the Jews, who were profess'd enemies to him and his doctrine, but even to many of his disciplcs, such as were disciples at large, who were his frequent hearers, and followed him in public; a mixed multitude, like those among Israel, that began all the discontent. Now we have here, 1.
Their murmurs at the doctrine they heard; (v. 64.)
not a few, but many of them were offended at it. Of the several sorts of ground that received the seed, only one in four brought forth fruit. See what they say to it; (v. 66.) This is a hard saying, who can hear it? (1.) They do not like it themselves. "What stuff is this? But the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man? If it be understood figuratively, it is not intelligible; if literally, not practicable. What! must we turn Cannibals?
Can we not be religious, but we must be barbarous?"
St. Christiani adorant quot condimenta, (said Averacs,) sit anima mea cum philosophis—If Christians adore what they eat, my mind shall continue with the philosophers. Now, when they found it a hard saying, if they had humbly begged of Christ to have disclosed unto them this parable, he would have opened it, and their understandings for the first time he taught them but they were not willing to have Christ's sayings explained to them, because they would not lose this pretence for rejecting them —that they were hard sayings. (2.) They think it impossible that any one else should like it; "Who can hear it? Surely none can." Thus the scoffers at religion are ready to undertake that all the intelligent part of mankind concur with them; they conclude with great assurance that no man of sense will admit the doctrine of Christ, nor any man of spirits submit to his laws; because they cannot hear to be so tutored, so tied up, themselves, they think none can; Who can hear it? Thanks be to God, thousands have heard these sayings of Christ, and have found them not only easy, but pleasant, as their necessary food.

2. Christ's animadversions upon their murmur-ings.

(1.) He well enough knew their murmurs, v. 61.
Their cavils were secret in their own breasts, or whispered among themselves in a corner. But,
[1.] Christ knew them; he saw them, he heard them. Note, Christ takes notice not only of the bold and open defiance that are done to his name, but of the secret thoughts and cavils that are put upon his doctrine by carnal professors; he knows that which the foot with in is heard, and cannot for shame speak out; he observes how his doctrine is received by these to whom it is preached;
who rejoice in it, and who murmur at it; who are reconciled to it, and bow before it, and whq quarrel with it, and rebel against it, though ever so secretly.

[2.] He knew it in himself, not by any information given him, or any external indication of the thing, but by his own (and it seemed to him, by divine knowledge) as a divinity revealed to him, (that which the prophets desired to know, was sometimes hid from them, as 2 Kings 4. 27.) but by a divine knowledge in him. He is that essential Word that discers the thoughts of the heart, Heb. 4. 12, 13. Thoughts are words to Christ; we should therefore take heed not only what we say and do, but what we think.

2. He well enough knew how to answer them; "Dost this offend you? Is this a stumbling-block to you?" See how people by their own willful mistakes create offences to themselves; they take offence where there is none given, and make it even there where there is nothing to make it. Note, We may justly wonder that so much offence should be taken at this doctrine of Christ; for so little cause. Christ speaks of it here with wonder. "Dost this offend you? How unreasonable are your quarrels.

Now, in answer to those who condemned his doctrine as intricate and obscure, (Si non vos intelligite, debemus negriere.) If you are unwilling to be understood, you ought to be neglected.

[1.] He gives them a hint of his ascension into heaven, which, he says, would give it irresistible evidence of the truth of his doctrine; (v. 62.) What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before, and what then? [1] If I should tell you of that, surely it would much more offend you, and you would think my pretensions too high indeed. If this be so hard a saying, that you cannot hear it, how will you digest it when I tell you of my returning from heaven, when I come down? See ch. 1. 50. Those too much inclined to smaller difficulties, should consider how they will get over greater. [2.] When you see the Son of man ascend, this will much more offend you, for then my body will be less capable of being eaten by you in that gross sense wherein you now understand it;" so Dr. Whitby. Or, [3.] When you see that, or hear it from those that shall see it, surely then you will be satisfied. You then shall not have the ascension of me, when I say I came down from heaven, for that was it that you quarrelled with; (v. 42.) but will you think so when you see me return to heaven?" if he ascended, certainly he descended, Eph. 4. 9, 10. Christ did often refer himself thus to subsequent proofs, as ch. 1. 50, 51.—2. 14. Matth. 12. 40.—36. 64. Let us wait a while, till the mystery of God shall be finished, and then we shall see that there was no reason to be offended at any of Christ's sayings.

[2.] He gives them a general key to this, and all such parabolical discourses, teaching them that they are to be understood spiritually, and not after a corporal and carnal manner; (v. 63.) It is the spirit that quickens, the flesh profiteth nothing. As it is in the natural body, the animal spirits quicken and move it; but the soul is not quickened by food; our food would profit nothing; (what would the body be the better for bread, if it were not quickened and animated by the spirit?) so it is with the soul.

[1.] The bare participation of ordinances, unless the spirit of God work with them, and quicken the soul by them, profiteth nothing; the word and ordinances, if the Spirit work with them, are as food to a living man; but not if they are used without the Spirit. As the flesh of Christ, the Sacrifice for sin, will avail us nothing unless the blessed Spirit quicken our souls thereby, and inforce the powerful influences of his death upon us, till we by grace are planted together in the likeness of it. [2.] The doctrine of Christ's flesh, and drinking his blood, if it be understood literally, profiteth nothing, but rather leads us into mistakes and prejudices; but the spiritual sense and meaning of it quicken the soul, make it alive and lively; for so it follows, "The words thus. I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life; and my words of my doctrine are not in vain among you; but to believe that Christ died for me, and to derive from that doctrine strength and comfort in my approaches to God, my opposition of sin, and preparations for a future state; this is the spirit and life, of that saying, and construing it thus, it is an excellent saying. The reason why men mistake Christ's sayings, is, because they mistake them. The literal sense of a parable does not always seem wiser for it, but the spiritual meaning is instructive. [3.] The flesh, that is, those that are in the flesh, (so some understand it,) that are under the power of a carnal mind, they profit nothing by Christ's discourses; but the Spirit, that is, those that have the Spirit, that are spiritual, they are quickened and enlivened by them; for they are received as modum recipiendu so as to correspond with the state of the receiver's mind. They found fault with Christ's sayings, whereas the fault was in themselves; it is only to sensual minds that spiritual things are senseless and senseless, spiritual minds relish them; see 1 Cor. 2. 14, 15.

[3.] He gives them an intimation of his knowledge of them, and that he had expected no better from them; "Indeed, that very day hath the word preached did not profit them, because it was not mixed with faith, Heb. 4. 2. They did not believe him to be the Messiah, else they would have acquiesced in the doctrine he preached, and not have quarrelled with it, though there were some things in it dark and hard to be understood. Open-tet discernent credere—Young beginners in learning must take things upon their teacher's word. Note. First, As those who are nominal christians there are many who are real infidels. Secondly, The unbelief of hypocrites, before it discovers itself to the world, is naked and open before the eyes of Christ. He knew from the beginning who they were of the multitudes that followed him, that believed, and who of the twelve should betray him; he knew, from the beginning of their acquaintance with him, and attendance on him, when they were in the hottest pang of their zeal, who were sincere, as Nathanael, (ch. 1. 47.) and who were not. Before they distinguished themselves by an overt act, he could infallibly distinguish who believed, and who did not; whose love was counterfeit, and whose cordial. We may gather hence, I. That the apostacy of those who have long made a plausible profession of reliyet to come; but if we pretend to judge men's hearts, we step into Christ's throne, and anticipate his judgment. We are often deceived in men, and see cause to change our sentiments of them; but this we are sure of, that Christ knows all men, and his judgment is according to truth.

(1.) The reason why they did not believe his reproach, and that of the Lord was not revealed unto them; (25:33.) For, as we have said unto you, that no man can come to me, except it were given unto him of my Father; referring to v. 41. Christ therefore could not but know who believed, and who did not, because faith is the gift and work of God, and all his Father's gifts and works could not but be known to him, for they all passed through his hands. There he had said that none could come to him, except it were given of the Father; here he saith, except it were given him of my Father: which shows that God draws souls by giving them grace and strength, and a heart to come; without which, such is the moral impotency of man in his fallen state that he cannot come.

3. We have here their final apostasy from Christ happened: (v. 66.) From that time many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him. When we admit into our minds hard thoughts of the word and works of Christ, and conceive a secret dislike, and are willing to hear insinuations tending to their reproach, we are then entering into temptation; it is as the letting forth of water, it is breaking back, which, if infinite mercy prevent not, will end in drawing back; therefore Observe principles—Take heed to yourselves.

(1.) See here the backsliding of these disciples. Many of them went back to their houses, and families, and callings, which they had left for a time to follow him: went back, one to his farm, and another to his mercantile; went back, as Orpah did, to their people, and to their gods, Ruth 1:13. They had entered themselves in Christ's school, but they gave back, though one play truant for once, but took leave of him and his doctrine for ever. Note, The apostasy of Christ's disciples from him, though really a strange thing, yet has been such a common thing, that we need not think strange at it. Here were many that went back. It is often so; when some backslide, many backslide with them; the disease is infectious.

(2.) The occasion of this backsliding: From that time many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him. Behold his enemies in all new sorts than before; they now accuse him, not only of greater grief. Christ forewarned that the enemy thus take offence at what he said, and yet he said it. This is the unkind word and truth of Christ, must be faithfully delivered, whoever are offended at it. Men's humours must be capitivated to God's word, and not that accommodated to men's humours.

(3.) The decree of their apostasy: They walked no more with him, returned no more to him, and attended no more upon his ministry. It is hard for the enmity of the soul to be reconciled to God, when it has tasted the good word of God, if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance, Heb. 6:1-6.

II. This discourse was to others a savour of life unto life. Many went back, but, thanks be to God, all did not; even then the twelve stuck to him. Though the faith of some be overthrown, yet the foundation of God stands sure. Observe here, 1. The affectionate question which Christ put to the twelve (v. 67.) Will ye also go away? He saith nothing to them who went back. If the unbelief depart, let them depart; it was no great loss of those whom he never had; light come, light go; but he takes this occasion to speak to the twelve, to confirm them, and by trying their steadfastness the more to fix them. Will ye also go away? (1.) "It is at your choice whether ye will or no; if ye will forsake me, now is the time when so many do; it is an hour of temptation; if you will go back, go back with me. Note, The apostasy of Christ's disciples is a trial of their piety; and he is engaged against their wills; his soldiers are volunteers, not pressed men. The twelve had now time enough to try how they liked Christ and his doctrine, and, that none of them might afterward say that they were trepanned into discipleship, and, if it were to do again, they would not do it, he here allows them a power of a second opinion, and leaves them at their discretion; as Jos. 24:15. Remember ye the days of old, at your first, if you do go away. "If there were any secret inclination in the heart of any of them to depart from him now, he stops it with this awakening question, Will ye also go away? Think not that ye hang at as loose an end as they did, and may go away as easily as they can. They have not been so intimate with me as ye have been, nor received so many favors at my hands as they did. Will ye also? Remember your character, and say, Whatever others do, we will never go away. Should such a man as I flee?" Neh. 6:11. Note, The nearer we have been to Christ, and the longer we have been with him, the more mercies we have received from him, and the more engagements we have laid ourselves under to him, the greater will be our sin if we go back, and the more will we be deeply displeased. Will ye also go away? No, I have faster hold of thee than so; I hope better things of you; (Heb. 6:9.) for we are they that have continued with me," Luke 22:28. When the apostasy of some is a grief to the Lord Jesus, the constancy of others is so much the more his honour, and he is pleased with it accordingly. Christ and believers know one another too well to part with one another in any displeasure.

2. The believing reply which Peter, in the name of the rest, made to this question, v. 68-69. Christ put the question to them, as Joshua put Israel to their choice when they should serve, with design to draw out from them a promise to adhere to him, and it had the like effect. Nay, but we will serve the Lord. Peter was upon all occasions the mouth of the rest, not so much because he had more of his Master's character, but because he had more of the tongue of his own; and what he said was sometimes approved, and sometimes reprimanded; (Matt. 16:17, 23.) the common lot of those who are swift to speak. This here was well said, admirably well; and, probably, he said it by the direction, and with the express assent of his fellow-disciples; at least, he knew their mind, and spake the sense of them all, and did not except Judas, for we must hence the better consider whom they will to be, and which they would have to be among us, Ps. 73:27, 28. Hos. 2:9. Whither shall we go? Shall we make our heart to the world? It will certainly deceive us. Shall we return to sin? It will certainly destroy us. Shall we leave the Fountain of living waters for broken cisterns? The disciples resolve to continue their pursuit of life and happiness, and will have a Guide to it, and will adhere to Christ as their Guide, for they can never have a better. Shall we go to the heathen philosophers, and become their disciples? They be become vair in their imaginations, and, professing themselves to be wise in other things, are become fools in religion. Shall we go to the Scribes and Pharisees, and sit at their feet? What good can they do us, who have made void the commandments of God by their traditions? Shall we go to Moses? He will send us back again to thee. Therefore, if ever we find the way to happiness, it must be in following thee. Note, Christ is thy religion, that is thy doctrine. If thou didst love the apostles, as Christ saith with other institutions, for then it will be seen how far it excels them all. Let them who find fault with this religion, before they quit it, find a better. A divine Teacher we must have; can we find a better than Christ? A divine revelation we cannot be without; if the scripture be not such a one, where else may we look for it? (c) Here is a good reason for this resolution. It will not the imconsiderable resolve of a blind affec tion, but the result of mature deliberation. The disciples were resolved never to go away from Christ.

[1.] Because of the advantage they promised themselves by him; Thou hast the words of eternal life. They themselves did not fully understand Christ's discourse, for as yet the doctrine of the cross was not revealed unto them. Yet, however, they were satisfied that he had the words of eternal life, that is, First, That the word of his doctrine showed the way to eternal life, set it before us, and directed us what to do, that we might inherit it. Secondly, That the word of his doom and determination must confer eternal life. His having the words of eternal life, is the same with his having power to give eternal life, that is, When they were given him, ch. 17. 2. He had in the foregoing discourse assured eternal life to his followers; these disciples fastened upon that plain saying, and therefore resolved to stick to him, when the others overlooked that, and fastened upon the hard sayings, and therefore forsook him. Though we cannot account for every mystery, every obscurity, in Christ's doctrine, yet we know, in the general, that it is the word of eternal life, and therefore must live and die by it: for if we forsake Christ, we forsake our own lives.

[2.] Because of the assurance they had concerning him; (v. 69.) We know, and are sure, that thou art that Christ. If he be the promised Messiah, he must bring in an everlasting righteousness. (Dan. 9. 24.) and therefore has the words of eternal life, for righteousness and eternal life are the same thing, and therefore he must be the only Saviour, as the only Saviour, Christ they observed, First, The doctrine they believed; that this Jesus was the Messiah promised to the fathers, and expected by them, and that he was not a mere man, but the Son of the Living God, the same to whom God had said, Thou art my Son, Ps. 2. 7. In times of temptation to apostasy, it is good to have recourse to our first principles, and stick to them; and if we faithfully abide by that which is just done, we shall be the better able both to find and to keep the truth in matters of doubtful disputation. Secondly, The degree of their faith; it rose up to a full assurance; We are sure. We have known it by experience; that is the best knowledge. We should take occasion from others' wavering to be so much the more established, especially in that which is the profession of the gospel of Christ, as boldly to venture our souls upon it, knowing whom we have believed, then, and not till then, shall we be willing to venture every thing else for it.

3. The melancholy remark which our Lord Jesus made upon this reply of Peter's; (v. 70, 71.) Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? And the evangelist tells us, whereas to great advantage of Judas Iscariot. Peter had undertaken for them all, that they would be tight to their Master. Now Christ does not condemn his charity, (it is always good to hope the best,) but he tacitly corrects his confidence. We must not be too sure concerning any. God knows them that are his, we do not. Observe here,

(1.) Hypecrtes and betrayers of Christ are no better than devils. Judas not only had a devil, but he was a devil. One of you is a false accuser; so sometimes signifies; (1 Tim. 3. 11.) and it is probable that Judas, when he sold his Master to the chief priests, represented him to them as a bad man, to justify himself in what he did. But I rather take it as we read it, He is a devil; a devil incarnate; a fallen apostle, as the devil a fallen angel. He is Satan, an adversary, an enemy to Christ. He is Abaddon, and Apollyon, a son of perdition. He was of his father the devil, did his lusts, was in his interests, as Cain, 1 John 3. 12. These whose bodies were possess'd by the devil are never called devils. (Demoniacs, but not devils;) but Judas, into whose heart Satan entered, and filled it, is called a devil.

(2.) Many that are seeming saints, are real devils. Judas had as fair an outside as many of the apostles; his venem was, like that of the serpent, covered with a fine skin. He cast out devils, and appeared an enemy to the devil's kingdom, and yet himself a servant of Satan. Not only he need not be one short, but he is one now. It is strange, and to be wondered at; Christ speaks of it with wonder; Have not 17 it is sad, and to be lamented, that ever Christianity should be made a cloak to diabolism.

(3.) The disguises of hypocrites, however they may deceive men, and put a cheat upon them, cannot deceive Christ, for his piercing eyes sees through every pretence. To this the Scribes and Pharisees answered, You be a teacher of the law, and yet do these things; and though they said, and in the very words which Jesus afterwards reproved them by, Judas was not chosen to eternal life, (ch. 13. 18.) and yet one of you is a devil. Note, Advance ment to places of honour and trust in the church, is no certain evidence of saving grace, We have prospered in thy name.

(4.) In the most select societies on this side heaven, it is no new thing to meet with those that are chosen to grace, and then of the evil ones. Of the apostles, whose last conversation with an incarnate Deity, as great an honour and privilege as ever men were chosen to, one was an incarnate devil. The historian lays an emphasis upon this, that Judas was one of the twelve that were so dignified and distinguished. Let us not therefore reject and unchurch the twelve, because one of them is a devil, nor say that they are all cheats and hypocrites, because one of them was so; let those that are so, bear the blame, and not those who, while they are undiscovered, incorporate with them. There is a society within the veil, into which no unclean thing shall enter; a church of first-born, in which are no false brethren.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Christ's declining for some time to appear publicly in Judas, v. 1. 11. His design to go up to Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles, and his discourse with his kindred in Galilee, concerning his going up to this feast, v. 3. 13. 11. His preaching publicly in the temple at Jerusalem, and how the people, not daring to follow him, have his discourse with the Jews, (1.) Concerning his doctrine, v. 16. 18. (2.) Concerning the crime of sabbaths violators, added to his charge, v. 19. 24. (3.) Concerning his own self, how and why he came, and whether he was going, v. 23. 36. 2. On the last day of the feast. (1.) His gracious invitation to poor souls to come to him, v. 37. 39. (2.) The reception that it met with. (1.) Many of the people, disputed about it, v. 39. 44. The chief priests would have brought him into trouble for it, but were first, disappointed by their officers, v. 13, 49) and then silenced by one of their own court, v. 50, 53.

1. A FTER these things, Jesus walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill him. 2. Now the Jews' feast of tabernacles was at hand. 3. His brethren therefore said unto him, Depart hence, and go into Judæa, that thy disciples also may see the works that thou dost. 4. For there is no man that doeth any thing in secret, and he himself seeketh to be known openly. 5. If thou do these things, shew thyself to the world. 6. For neither did his brethren believe in him. 7. Then Jesus said unto them, My time is not yet come: but your time is alway ready. 8. The world cannot hate you; but me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil. 9. Go ye up into this feast: I go not up yet unto this feast, for my time is not yet full come. 10. When he had said these words unto them, he abode still in Galilee. 11. But when his brethren were gone up, then went he also up unto the feast, not openly, but as it were in secret. 12. Then the Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he? 13. And there was much murmuring among the people concerning him: for some said, He is a good man: others said, Nay; but he deceiveth the people. 14. Howbeit no man spake openly of him, for fear of the Jews. We have here,

1. The reason given why Christ spent more of his time in Galilee than in Judea; (v. 1.) because the Jews, the people in Judea and Jerusalem, sought to kill him; for curing the impotent man on the sabbath-day, ch. 5. 16. They thought to be the death of him, either by a popular tumult, or by a legal prosecution; in consideration of this, he kept at a distance in another part of the country, very much out of the lines of Jerusalem's communication. It is not said, He durst not, but, He would not, walk in Jewry: it was not through fear and cowardice that he declined it, but in prudence, because his hour was not yet come.

Note, 1. Gospel-light is justly taken away from those that endeavour to extinguish it, and blow it out. Christ will withdraw from those that drive him from them, and hide his face from those that spit in it, and justly shut up his bowels from those that spurn at them. 2. In times of imminent peril, it is not only allowable, but advisable, to withdraw, and abstain for our own safety and preservation, and to choose the service of those places which are least perilous, Matth. 16. 23. Then, and not till then, we are called to expose and lay down our lives, when we cannot save them without sin. 3. If the providence of God casts persons of merit into places of obscurity and little note, it must not be thought strange. It was the lot of our Master himself; he who was fit to have sat in the highest of Men's seats, willingly walked in Galilee among the ordinary sort of people. Observe, He did not sit still in Galilee, nor bury himself alive there, but walked; he went about doing good. When we cannot do what and where we would, we must do what and where we can.

II. The approach of the feast of tabernacles, (v. 2.) one of the three solemnities which called for the personal attendance of all the males at Jerusalem; see the institution of it, Lev. 23. 50, 54. and the revival of it after a long disuse, Neh. 8. 14. It was intended to be both a memorial of the tabernacle-state of Israel in the wilderness, and a figure of the tabernacle-state of God's spiritual Israel in this world. This feast, which was instituted so many hundred years before, was still religiously observed. Note, Divine institutions are never antiquated, nor go out of date, by length of time: nor must wildness-mercies ever be forgotten. But it is called the Jews' feast, because it was now shortly to be abolished, as a mere Jewish thing, and left to them that served the tabernacle.

1. Their ambition and vain-glory in urging him to make a more public appearance than he did, "Depart hence," (said they,) and go into Judæa, (v. 11;) where they would make a better figure than thou dost here. Two reasons they give for this advice. Observe,

1. That it would be an encouragement to those in and about Jerusalem, who had a respect for him; for, expecting his temporal kingdom, the royal seat of which they concluded must be at Jerusalem, they would have disciples there to be particularly acquainted, and thought the time he spent among them a little difficult. He would have his miracles thrown away, and his miracles turning to no account unless they at Jerusalem saw them. Or, "That thy disciples, all of them in general, will be gathered at Jerusalem to keep the feast, may see thy works, and not, as here, a few at one time, and a few at another."

2. That it would be for the advancing of his own name and honour: There is no man that doeth anything in secret, if he himself seeks to be known openly. They take it for granted, that Christ sought to make himself known, and therefore thought it absurd for him to conceal his miracles: "If thou do these things, if thou be so well able to gain the applause of the people, and the approbation of the rulers, by thy miracles, venture abroad, and show thyself to the world. Supported by these credentials, thou canst not fail of acceptance, and therefore it is his discourse to set up for an interest, and think of being great."

Now one would not think there were any harm in this, and yet the evangelist notes it as an evidence of their infidelity, for neither did his brethren believe in him; (v. 5.) if they had, they would not have said this. Observe, [1.] It was an honour to be of the kindred of Christ, but no saving honour; they that hear his word and keep it are the precursors of the values. Surely none come runs in no blood in the world, when not in that of Christ's family. [2.] It was a sign that Christ did not aim at any secular interest, for then his kindred would have struck in with him, and he would have secured them first. [3.] There were those who were akin to Christ according to the flesh, who did believe in him, (three of the twelve were his brethren,) and yet others, as nearly allied to him as they, did not believe on him. Many that have the same external privileges and advantages, do not make the same use of them.

But what was there amiss in this advice which they gave him? I answer, First, It was a piece of presumption for them to prescribe to Christ, and to teach him what measures to take: it was a sign that they did not believe him able to guide them, when they did not think him sufficient to guide himself. Secondly, They discovered a great carelessness of his safety, when they would have gone to Judea, where they knew the Jews sought to kill him. They that believed in him, and loved him, dissuaded him from Judea, ch. 11. 8. Thirdly, Some think they hoped that if his miracles were wrought at Judea, the Pharisees and rulers would try them, and discover some cheat in them, which would justify their unbelief. So Dr. Whitby. Fourthly, Perhaps they were weary of his company in Galilee, (Per (are not all these that speak, Galileans?) and this was, in effect, a desire that he would depart out of their coasts. Fifthy, They causally insinuate that he neglected his disciples, and denied them such a sight of his works as usual in the temple, and have often been turned to the reproach of both him and it. Sixthly, They seem to question the truth of the miracles he wrought, in saying, "If thou do these things; if thou wilt bear the test of public scrutiny, in the courts above, produce them there." Eighthly, They think Christ altogether such a one as themselves, as subject as they to the politics of the world, for, he is not of this world, its children, its servants, and in with its interests; and, no doubt, the world will love its own," see ch. 15. 19. Unholy seals, whom the holy God cannot love, the world that lies in wickedness cannot hate; but he, in showing himself to the world, laid himself open to the greatest danger; for me it hateth. Christ was not only inhabited with sin, but alsoThose, who are members of the world, appear to be in the liberty of Galilaeans; but Christ, who knows all men, and all things, knew that the best and most proper time for it would be about the middle of the feast. We, who are ignorant and short-sighted, are apt to prescribe to him, and to think he should deliver his people, and so show himself now, just now; the present time is not his best; but which is not his, judge, and it may be, his time is not yet come; his power is not yet ready for deliverance, nor his enemies ripe for ruin; let us therefore wait with patience for his time, for all he doth, will be most glorious in its season.

2. His life was sought, so was not theirs, v. 7. They, in showing themselves to the world, did not expose themselves to be caught; and he, though he were, for he is not of the world, its children, its servants, and in with its interests; and, no doubt, the world will love its own," see ch. 15. 19. Unholy seals, whom the holy God cannot love, the world that lies in wickedness cannot hate; but he, in showing himself to the world, laid himself open to the greatest danger; for me it hateth. Christ was not only inhabited with sin, but also

3. He shows the difference between himself and them, in two things.

1. His time was set, so was not theirs; My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready. Understand it of the time of his going up to this feast. It was an indifferent thing to them when they went, for they had nothing of moment to do, either where they were, or to detain them there, in going to, hasten them thither; but every minute of Christ's time was precious, and its own particular business allotted to it. He had some work yet to be done in Galilee before he left the country; in the harmony of the gospels betwixt this motion made by his kindred and his going up to this feast, comes in the story of his sending forth his seventy disciples, which was an affair of very great consequence, that his time is not yet; for that must be done first. Those who live useless lives have their time always ready, they come and go when they please; but those whose time is filled up with duty, will often find themselves possessed, and they have not yet time for that which others can do at any time. Those who are made the servants of God, as all men are, and who have made themselves the servants of all, as all useful men have, must not expect nor covet to be masters of their own time. The confinement of business is a thousand times better than the liberty of Galilaeans. Or, it may be, the time of his appearing proved to be an imaginary time. If, Jerusalem; Christ, who knows all men, and all things, knew that the best and most proper time for it would be about the middle of the feast. We, who are ignorant and short-sighted, are apt to prescribe to him, and to think he should deliver his people, and so show himself now, just now; the present time is not his best; but which is not his, judge, and it may be, his time is not yet come; his power is not yet ready for deliverance, nor his enemies ripe for ruin; let us therefore wait with patience for his time, for all he doth, will be most glorious in its season.

2. He dismisses them, with a design to stay behind for some time in Galilee; (v. 8.) Go ye up to this feast; go. [1.] He allows their going to the feast, though he knew the time was not right, and hypocritical in it. Note, Even those who go not to ordinances with right affections and sincere intentions, must not be hindered or discouraged from going; who knows but they may be wrought upon there? [2.] He denies them his company when they went to the feast, because they were carnal and hypocritical. Those who go to ordinances for ostentation, or to serve some secular purpose, are to be excluded without Christ, and will speed accordingly. How sad is the condition of that man, though he reckon himself akin to Christ, to whom he saith, "Go up, to such an ordinance, Go pray, Go hear the word, Go receive the sacrament, but I go not up with thee? Go thou and appear before God, but I will not appear for them," as Exod. 33. 1, 3. But if the presence of Christ go not with us, to what purpose should we go up? Go up, I go not up. When we are going up to the feast, let us concern ourselves to be careful what company we have and choose, and to avoid that which is vain and carnal, lest the old of good affections be quenched by corrupt communication. I will not go up yet to this feast; he does not say, I will not go up at all, but not yet. There may be reason for deferring a particular duty, which yet must not be wholly omitted or laid aside. 9. 11. 12. He said, His time is not yet full come. Note, Our Lord Jesus is very exact and punctual in knowing and keeping his time, and as it was the time fixed, so it was the last time.

3. Christ's continuance in Galilee till his full time was come, v. 9. He, saying these things to them, (πάρεις ἀπέραντα) aloud still in Galilee; because of this discourse he continued there; for, (1.) He had said he would not go up yet to this feast, and therefore he abode still in Galilee. It becomes the followers of Christ to be not too hasty and sudden in going up to the feast. 4. His going up to the feast when his time was come. Observe, (1.) When he went; when his brethren were gone up. He would not go up with them, lest they should have made a noise and disturbance, under pretence of showing him to the world; whereas it agreed both with the prediction and with his spirit, not to strive or cry, or let his voice be heard in the streets, Isa. 42. 2. But he went up after them. We may lawfully join in the same religious services with those among us that shall decline an intimate acquaintance and converse with them, for the blessing of ordinances depends upon the grace of God, and not upon the grace of our fellow-worshippers.

His carnal brethren went up first, and then he went. Note, In the external performances of religion it is possible that formal hypocrites may get the start of those that are sincere and religious, brought thither by vain-glory, and go thence unjustified, as he, Luke 10. 10. It is not he who comes first, that will be the question, but, Who comes truest? If we bring our hearts with us, it is no matter who gets before us.

(2.) How he went, v. 22, 23.—As if he were hugging himself: not openly, but as it were in secret, rather for fear of being offended, than of receiving injuries. He went up to the feast, because it was an opportunity of honouring God and doing good; but he went up as it were in secret, because he would not provoke the government. Note, Provided the work of God be done effectually, it is best done when it is done with least noise. The kingdom of God needs not come with observation, Luke 17. 20. We may do the work of God privately, and yet do it deservedly.

The great expectation that there was of him among the Jews at Jerusalem, v. 11—13. Having formerly come up to the feasts, and signified himself by the miracles he wrought, he had made himself the subject of much discourse and observation.

(1.) They could not but think of him; v. 11. The Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Whence is he? [1.] The common people longed to see him there, that they might have his curiosity gratified with the sight of his person and miracles. They did not think it worth while to go to him, Galilee, though, if they had, they would not have lost their labour, but they hope the feast will bring him to Jerusalem, and then they shall see him. If an opportunity of acquaintance with Christ come to their door, they can like it well enough. They sought him at the feast. When we attend upon God in his holy ordinances, we should seek Christ in them, seek him at them, as the godly feasts. Those who would see Christ at a feast, must seek him there. Or, (2.) Perhaps it was his enemies that were thus waiting an opportunity to seize him, and, if possible, to give an effectual stop to his progress. They said, Where is he? and, What is that fellow? Thus scornfully and contemptibly do they speak of him. Or it intimated how their hearts were with the rights of him, and their town with talk of how they needed not name him. When they should have welcomed the feast as an opportunity of serving God, they were glad of it as an opportunity of persecuting Christ. Thus Saul hoped to stay David at the new moon, 1 Sam. 20. 57. Those who seek opportunity to sin in solemn assemblies, for religious worship, provoke God's ordinances to the last degree, and the law of Christ to ground; it is like striking within the verge of the court.

(3.) The people differed much in their sentiments concerning him; v. 12. There was much murmuring, or muttering rather, among the people concerning him. The enmity of the rulers against Christ, and their inquiries after him, made him to be so much more talked of and observed among the people. This ground the gospel of Christ has been more often inquired into, and by being everywhere spoken against, it has come to be everywhere spoken of, and by that means has been spread the further, and the merits of his cause have been the more searched into.

This murmuring was not against Christ, but concerning him; some murmured at the rulers, because they did not contain and encourage him; others murmured at him, because they did not silence and restrain him. Some murmured that he had so great an interest in Galilee; others, that he had so little interest in Jerusalem. Note, Christ and his religion have been, and will be, the subject of much controversy and debate. Luke 12. 31, 32. If all would agree to entertain Christ as they ought, there would be perfect peace; but when some receive the light, and others resolve against it, there will be murmuring.

The brethren were not many, as they were hid and dry, lay quiet; but when it was said unto them, Live, there was a noise and a shaking, Ezek. 5. 17. But the noise and encounter of liberty and business are preferable, surely, to the silence and agreement of a prison.

Now what were the sentiments of the people concerning him?

[1.] Some said, He is a good Man. This was a truth, but it was but short of being the whole truth. He was not only a good Man, but more than a man, he was the Son of God. Many who have no ill thoughts of Christ, have yet lost thoughts of him, and scarcely honour him, even when they speak well of him, because they do not say enough; yet indeed it was his honour, and the reproach of those who persecuted him, that even they who should not believe him to be the Messiah, could not but own he was a good Man.

[2.] Others said, Nun, but he deceiveth the people; if that had been true, he had been a very bad man. The doctrine he preached, was sound, and could not be contested; his miracles real, and could not be disproved; his conversation manifestly holy and good; and yet it must be taken for granted, in twitting him, that there is some undiscovered error at the bottom, because it is the interest of the chief priests to oppose him and run him down. Such murmuring as there was among the Jews concerning Christ, there is still among us: the Socinians say, He is a good Man, and further they say not; the deists will not allow this, but say, He deceived the people. Thus some diminish him, others abuse him, but great is the truth.

3. They were frightened by their superiors from speaking openly of him; (v. 13.) No man spake openly of him, for fear of the Jews. Either, First, They durst not openly speak well of him. While any one was at liberty to censure and reproach him, none durst vindicate him. Or, Secondly, They durst not speak at all of him openly. Because nothing could justly be said against him, they would not suffer any thing to be said of him. It was a crime to mention him. Thus many have aimed to suppress truth, under colour of silencing disputes about it, and would have all talk of religion hushed, in hopes thereby to bury it in oblivion itself.

14. Now about the midst of the feast Jesus went up into the temple, and taught.

15. And the Jews marvelled, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned? 16. Jesus answered them, and said, My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. 17. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself.

18. He that speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory; but he that seeketh his glory that sent him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is in him. 19. Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me? 20. The people answered and said, Thou hast a devil: who goeth about to kill thee? 21. Jesus answered and said unto them, I have done one work, and ye all marvel.

22. Moses therefore gave unto you circumcision: (not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers;) and ye on the sabbath-day circumcise a man. 23. If a man on the sabbath-day receive circumcision, that the law of Moses should not be broken: are ye angry at me, because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath-day? 24. Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment. 25. Then said some of them of Jerusalem, Is not this he, whom they seek to kill? 26. But, lo, he speaketh boldly, and they say nothing unto him. Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ? 27. Howbeit we know this man whence he is: but when Christ cometh, no man knoweth whence he is. 28. Then cried Jesus in the temple as he taught, saying, Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am; and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. 29. But I know him: for I am from him, and he hath sent me. 30. Then they sought to take him: but no man laid hands on him, because his hour was not yet come. 31. And many of the people believed on him, and said, When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done? 32. The Pharisees heard that the people murmured such things concerning him; and the Pharisees and the chief priests sent officers to take him. 33. Then said Jesus unto them, Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto him that sent me. 34. Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come. 35. Then said the Jews among themselves, Whither will he go, that we shall not find him? Will he be gone unto the dispersed among the Gentiles, and teach the Gentiles? 36. What manner of saying is this that he said, Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come!

Here is,
I. Christ's public preaching in the temple; (v. 14.) He went up into the temple, and taught, according to his custom when he was at Jerusalem. His business was to preach the gospel of the kingdom, and he did it in every place of concourse. His sermon ended with a caution because, probably, it was to the same purport with the sermons he had preached in Galilee, which were recorded by the other evangelists. For the gospel is the same to the plain and to the polite. But that which is observable here, is, that it was about the midst of the feast; the fourth or fifth day of the eight. Whether he did not come up to Jerusalem till the middle of the feast, or whether he came up at the beginning, but kept private till now, is not certain. But, Query, Why did he not go to the temple sooner, to preach? Answer, 1. Because the people would have more leisure to hear him, and it might be hoped, would be better disposed to hear him, when they had spent some days in their booths, as they did at the feast of tabernacles. 2. Because he would choose to appear then, when both his friends and his enemies had done looking for him; and so give a specimen of the method he would observe in his appearances, which is to come at midnight, Matt. 25. 6. But why did he appear thus publicly now? Surely it was to shame his persecutors, the chief priests and elders, (1.) By showing that, though they were very bitter against him, yet he did not fear them, nor their power. See Isa. 50. 7, 8, 9.) By taking their work out of their hands. Their office was to teach the people in the temple, and particularly at the feast of tabernacles, Neh. 8. 17, 18. They but either did not teach them at all, or taught for doctrines the commandments of men, and therefore he goes up to the temple, and teaches the people. When the shepherds of Israel made a prey of the flock, it was time for the chief shepherd to appear, as was promised, Ezek. 34. 22, 23. Mal. 3. 1.

II. His discourse with the Jews hereupon; and the conference is reducible to four heads.

1. Concerning his doctrine. See here,
(1.) How the Jews admired it; (v. 15.) They marvilled, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned? Observe here, (1.) That our Lord Jesus was not educated in the schools of the prophets, or at the feet of the rabbins; not only did not travel for learning, as the philosophers did, but did not make any use of the schools and academies in his own country. Moses was taught the learning of the Egyptians, but Christ was not taught so much as the learning of the Jews; having received the Spirit without measure, he needed not receive any knowledge from man, or by man. At the time of Christ's appearing, learning flourished both in the Roman empire and in the Jewish church; more than in any age before or since, and in such a time of inquiry Christ chose to establish his religion, not in an illiterate age, lest it should look like a design to impose upon the world: yet he himself studied not the learning then in vogue. [2.] That Christ had letters, though he had never learned them; was mighty in the scriptures, though he never had any doctor of the law or of the prophets. It is confessed, that Christ's ministers should have learning, as he had; and since they cannot expect to have it as he had it, by inspiration, they must take pains to get it in an ordinary way. [3.] That Christ's having learning, though he had not been taught it, made him truly great and wonderful; the Jews speak of it here with wonder. First, Some, it is likely, took notice of it to his honour: He that had no human learning, and yet so far excelled all that had, certainly must be endued with a divine knowledge. Secondly, Others, probably, mentioned it in diminution and contempt of him: Whatever he seems to have, he cannot really have any true learning, for he was never at the university, nor took his degree. Thirdly, Some perhaps suggested that he had got his learning by magic arts, or some unlawful means or other; since they knew not how he could be a scholar, they will think him a conjurer.

[2.] What he asserted concerning it: three things. [1.] That his doctrine is divine; (ver. 16.) My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. They were offended, because he undertook to teach, though he had never learned. In answer to which he tells them, that his doctrine was so much as was not to be learned. For it was the product of the wisdom of God, and the knowledge of the holy and powerful natures enlarged and elevated by reading and conversation, but it was a divine revelation. As God equal with the Father, he might truly have said, My doctrine is mine, and his that sent me; but being now in his estate of humiliation, and being, as Mediator, God's Servant, it was more congruous to say, "My doctrine is not mine, not mine only, or mine originally, as Man and Mediator, but his that sent me:" which he speaks not only properly to himself, but to the being that sent me. God had promised concerning the great Prophet, that he would put his words into his mouth, (Deut. 18, 19.) to which Christ seems here to refer. Note, It is the comfort of those who embrace Christ's doctrine, and the condemnation of those who reject it, that it is a divine doctrine, it is of God, and not of man.

[2.] That the most competent judges of the truth and authenticity of Christ's doctrine, are those that with a sincere and upright heart desire and endeavour to do the will of God; (ver. 17.) If any man be willing to do the will of God, have his will made into the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or, whether I speak of myself. Observe here,

First, What the question is, concerning the doctrine of Christ: whether it be of God or not; whether the gospel be a divine revelation, or an imposture. Christ himself was willing to have his doctrine inquired into, whether it were of God or no, much more should his ministers: and we are concerned to examine what grounds we go upon, for if we be deceived, we are miserably deceived.

Secondly, Who are likely to succeed in this search: those that do the will of God, at least are desirous to do so. Whether they are that will do the will of God; they are such as are impartial in their inquiries concerning the will of God, and are not biased by any lust or interest; and such as are resolved by the grace of God, when they find out what the will of God is, to conform to it. They are such as have an honest principle of regard to God, and are truly desirous to glorify and please him. Whence it is that such a one shall know of the truth of Christ's doctrine. (1.) Christ has promised to give knowledge to such; he hath said, He shall know, and he can give an understanding. Those who improve the light they have, and carefully live up to it, shall be secured by divine grace from destructive mistakes. (2.) They are disposed and prepared to receive that knowledge. He that is inclined to submit to the rule of the divine law, and to take upon himself to be what God requires of him, to him has that shall be given; those have a good understanding, that do his commandments. Ps. 111. 10. Those who resemble God, are most likely to understand him.

[5.] That hereby it appeared that Christ, as a Teacher, did not speak of himself, because he did not seek himself, ver. 18. First, See here the character of a deceiver: he seeketh his own glory, which is a sign that he speaks of himself, as the false christs and false prophets did. Here is the description of the cheat; they speak of themselves, and have no commission or instructions from God; no warrant but their own will, no inspiration but their own imagination, their own politics and artifice. Ambassadors speak not of themselves; those ministers speak of God, (2 Thess. 3. 6.) that they speak of themselves. But see the discovery of the cheat; by this their pretensions are disproved, they consult purely their own glory; self-seekers are self-seekers. They who speak from God, will speak for God, and for his glory; they who aim at their own preferment and interest, make it to appear that they had no commission from God.

Secondly, See the contrary character Christ gives of himself and his doctrine: He that seeketh his glory that sent him, as I do, makes it to appear that he is true. 1. He was sent of God. Those teachers, and those only, who are sent of God, are to be received and entertained by us. Those who bring a divine message, must prove a divine mission, either by special revelation, or by regular institution. 2. He sought the glory of God. First, As Mediator, he was the tender of his whole conversation, to glorify God. 3. This was a proof that he was true, and there was no unrighteousness in him. False teachers are most unrighteous; they are unjust to God whose name they abuse, and unjust to the souls of men whom they impose upon. There cannot be a greater piece of unrighteousness than this. But Christ made it appear that he was true, that he was really what he said he was, that there was no unrighteousness in him; no falsehood in his doctrine, no falsehood or fraud in his dealings with us. 2. They discourse concerning the crime that was laid to his charge for curing the impotent man, and bidding him carry his bed on the sabbath-day, for which they had formerly prosecuted him; and which was still the pretence of their enmity to him. (1.) He argues against them by way of rest, that there are four worse practices, ver. 19. How could they for shame enquire him for a breach of the law of Moses, when they themselves were such notorious breakers of it! Did not Moses give you the law? And it was their privilege that they had the law, no nation had such a law; but it was their wickedness that none of them kept the law, they rebelled against it, and lived contrary to it. Many that have the law given them, when they see it do not keep it. Their neglect of the law was universal; None of you keepeth it: neither those of them that were in posts of honour, who should have been most knowing, nor those who were in postis subjection, who should have been most obedient. They boasted of the law, and pretended a zeal for it, and were enraged at Christ for seeming to transgress it, and yet none of them kept it: like those who say that they are for the church, and yet never go to church. It was an aggravation of their wickedness in persecuting Christ for breaking the law, that they themselves did not keep it; "You are broken for the law, why then do you about it?" 23. Note, Those are commonly censorious of others, who are most faulty themselves. Thus hypocrites, who are forward to pull a mote out of their brother's eye, are not aware of a beam in their own. Why go ye about to kill me? Some make this to be the instance of their not keeping the law; "Ye keep not the law; if ye did, ye would understand yourselves better than to go about to kill me for doing a good work." Those that support themselves and their interest by persecution and violence, whatever they pretend, (though they may call themselves custodies intrinquesque tabulæ—te guardians of both tables,) are not keepers of the law of God. Chemnitz understands this as a reason why it is time to supersede the law of Moses by the gospel, because the law was found insufficient to restrain sin, and though it commanded, but ye do not keep it, nor are kept by it from the greatest wickedness; there is therefore need of a clearer light and better law to be brought in; why then do you aim to kill me for introducing it? 22. Here the people rudely interrupted him in his discourse, and contradicted what he said; (v. 20.) Thou hast a devil; who goes about to kill me? This speaks, 1. The good opinion they had of their rulers, who, they think, would never attempt so atrocious a thing as to kill him: no, such a generation they had for their elders and chief priests, that they would swear for them they would do no harm to an innocent man. Probably, the rulers had their little emissaries among the people, who suggested this to them: many deny that wickedness which at the same time they are contriving. 2. The ill opinion they had of our Lord Jesus; Thou hast a devil, thou art possessed with a lying spirit, and art a mad man for saying so; so some; or rather, Thou art melancholy, and art a weak man; thou freest thouthself with causeless fears, as hypochondriacal people are apt to do. Not only open frenzy, but silent melancholies, were then commonly imputed to the power of Satan. Their art created, hast a discomfited brain. Let us not think it strange if the best of men be put under the worst of characters. To this vile calumny our Saviour returns no direct answer, but seems as if he took no notice of it. Note, Those who would be like Christ, must put up with affronts, and pass by the injurings and injuries done them; must not regard them, much less return them; the worst of them all return them. If the deaf man, heard not. When Christ was reviled, he reviled not again. 23. (2.) He argues by way of appeal and vindication. 1. He appeals to their own sentiments of this miracle; (v. 21.) I have done one work, and ye all marvel. Ye cannot choose but marvel at it as truly great, and altogether supernatural; ye must all confess it to be an effect of God. Though I have done but one work that you have any sort of fault with, yet you marvel, you are offended and displeased as if I had been guilty of some heinous or enormous crime. 2. He appeals to their own practice in other instances; I have done one work on the sabbath, and it was done easily with a word's speaking, and ye all marvel, ye make a mighty strange thing of it, that a religious man should dare to do such a thing, whereas ye yourselves many a time do that which is a much more servile work on the sabbath-day, in the case of circumcision; if it be lawful for you, nay, and your duty, to circumcise a child on the sabbath-day, when it happens to be the eighth day, as no, doubt, it is, much more was it lawful and good for me to heal a diseased man on that day. Observe, First, the rise and original of circumcision; Moses gave you circumcision, gave you the law concerning it. Hence, Circumcision is a gift given you, and (v. 23.) they are said to receive it; it was not imposed upon them as a yoke, but conferred upon them as a favour. Note, the ordinances of God, and particularly these which are seals of the covenant, are gifts given to men, and are to be received as such. 2. Moses is said to give it, because it was a part of that law which was given by Moses; yet as Christ said of the manner—(ch. 6. 52.) Moses did not give it them, but God's law, and it was not of Moses first, but of the fathers, v. 22. Though it was incorporated into the Mosaic institution, yet it was ordained long before, for it was a seal of the righteousness of faith, and therefore commenced with the promise four hundred and thirty years before, Gal. 3. 17. The church-membership of being circumcised was the seal of that covenant for his law, and therefore did not fail with it; but with the fathers, belonging to the patriarchal church, and was part of that blessing of Abraham, which was to come upon the Gentiles, Gal. 3. 14. Secondly, The respect had to the law of circumcision above that of the sabbath, in the constant practice of the Jewish church. The Jewish casuists frequently take notice of it, Circumcision et ipsas sublegiones—Circumcision and its curse drive away the sabbath; so that if a child was born one sabbath-day, it was without fail circumcised the next. If then, when the sabbath-rest was more strictly insisted on, yet those works were allowed which were in ordine ad spiritualitatem—toward the keeping up of the religion, much more are they allowed now under the gospel, when the stress is laid more upon the sabbath-work. Thirdly, The inference Christ draws from hence in justification of himself, and of what he had done; (v. 23.) A man-child on the sabbath-day receiveth circumcision, that the law of circumcision might not be broken; or, as the margin reads it, without breaking the law, namely, of the sabbath. Divine commands must be construed so as to agree with each other. Note, Now, if this be allowed by yourselves, how much more ought it to be done by me, because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath-day! id. χαράτημα; the word is used only here, from χαράτημα—fel-call. They were angry at him with the greatest indignation: it was a spiteful anger, anger with gall in it. Note, It is very absurd and unreasonable for us to condemn others for that which we justify ourselves in. Observe the comparison Christ makes between the healing of a child, and his healing a man on the sabbath-day. 1. Circumcision was but a ceremonial institution; it was of the fathers indeed, but not from the beginning; but what Christ did was a good work by the law of nature, a more excellent law than that which made circumcision a good work. 2. Circumcision was a bloody ordinance, and made sore, but what Christ did was done with no more than fleshly. The law works pain, and if that work makes that part which was circumcised, much more a gospel-work, which works peace. 3. Especially, considering that whereas, when they had circumcised a child, yet their care was only to heal up that part which was circumcised, which might be done, and yet the child remain under other illnesses, Christ had made this man every whit whole, as Bengel says: I have made not only the man healthful and sound, The whole body was healed, for the disease affected the whole body; and it was a perfect cure, such as left no relics of the disease behind; say, Christ not only healed his body, but his soul too, by that admiration, Go, and sin no more, and so indeed made the whole man. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb, the nearer the church, the further from God.

These people of Jerusalem showed their ill-will to Christ.

First, By their reflecting on the rulers, because they let him alone; Is not this he whom they seek to kill? The multitude of the people that came up out of the country pressed the door to see the man. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb, the nearer the church, the further from God.

Secondly, By their enforcement against him, which also seemed to have been the design of God against this man. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb, the nearer the church, the further from God.

He concludes this argument with that rule, (v. 24.) Judge nothing according to the appearance, but according to that which is true in the heart. This may be applied, either, (1.) In particular to this work which they quarrelled with as a violation of the law. Be not partial in your judgment; judge not by appearances, but with respect of persons; knowing faces, as the Hebrew phrase is, Deut. 1. 17. It is contrary to the law of justice, as well as charity, to censure those who differ in opinion from us, as transgressors, in taking that liberty which yet in those of our own party, and way, and opinion, we allow of; as it is also to commend that in some as necessary strictness and severity, which in others we condemn as imposition and persecution.

Or, (2.) In general to Christ's person and preaching, which they were offended at and prejudiced against. These things that are false and designed to impose upon men, commonly appear, when they are judged of according to the outward appearance, as having a more plausible, prima facie— at the first glance. This was it that gained the Pharisees such an interest and reputation, that they appeared right up to men; (Matt. 23. 27, 28.) and men judged of them by that appearance, and so were sadly mistaken in them. But, saith Christ, Be not too confident that all are real saints, who are seeming ones. With reference to himself, his sound, and inward man, he showed by his own example. Circumcision was no more a mark of the outward, than it is a mark of the inward grace; but, as to Christ, his inward person was the truest mark of salvation, the truest evidence of grace; but then it was the grace of the soul, not of the body. It was contrary to the law of God, to judge of persons, men, or things, with respect of persons; the rule to judge by their outward appearance, and not by the inward heart, was his doctrine, (Phil. 2. 7.) This was, that we must judge according to the heart; for the outward appearance is not of this world, nor to come with observation. If a divine power accompanied him, and God bare him witness, and the scriptures were fulfilled in him, though his appearance was ever so mean, they ought to receive him, and to judge by faith, and not by the sight of the outward appearance; and judging of Christ by that rule, their judgment was from first to last a continual mistake, for the kingdom of Christ was not of this world, nor to come with observation. If a divine power accompanied him, and God bare him witness, and the scriptures were fulfilled in him, though his appearance was ever so mean, they ought to receive him, and to judge by faith, and not by the sight of the outward appearance.

First, By their reflection on the rulers, because they let him alone; Is not this he whom they seek to kill? The multitude of the people that came up out of the country pressed the door to see the man. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb, the nearer the church, the further from God.

Secondly, By their enforcement against him, which also seemed to have been the design of God against this man. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb, the nearer the church, the further from God.

That he came to lay violent hands on him, not only to do him a mischief, but some way or other to be the death of him; but by the restraint of an invisible power it was prevented, nobody touched him, because his hour was not yet come; that was not their reason why they did it not, but God's reason why he hindered them from doing it. Note, First, The faithful preachers of the truths of God, though they behave themselves with ever so much prudence and meekness, must expect to be hated and persecuted by those who think themselves tormented by their testimony, Rev. 11. 10. Secondly, God has wicked men in a chain, and whatever mischief they would do, yet they can do no more than God will suffer them to do. The malice of persecutors is innocent, when it is mere instrumentality, and when Satan fills their hearts, yet God ties their hands.
Thirdly, God's servants are sometimes wonderfully protected by inscrutable, unaccountable means.
Their enemies do not do the mischief they designed,
and yet neither they themselves nor any one else can tell why they did not. Fourthly, Christ had his hour set, which was to put a period to his day and work on earth so have all his people, and all his ministers, and till that hour comes, the attempts of their enemies against them are ineffectual, and their day shall be lengthened as long as their Master has any work for them to do; nor can all the powers of hell and earth prevail against them, until they have finished their testimony.

3. The good effect which Christ's discourse had, is twofold; upon some of his hearers;
(v. 31.) Many of the people believed on him.
As he was set for the full of some, so for the rising again of others. Even there where the gospel meets with opposition, yet there may be a great deal of good done, 1 Thess. 2. 2. Observe here,
First, Who they were, that believed: not a few,
but many: more than one would have expected when stem ran so strong the other way. But these many were of the people, that is of the multipude, the crowd, the inferior sort, the mob, the rabble, some would have called them. We must not measure the prosperity of the gospel by its success among the great ones; nor must ministers say that they labour in vain, though none but the poor, and those of no figure, receive the gospel, 1 Cor. 1. 28.

Secondly, Many means that shall give life.
Thirdly, How soon their faith was: they do not positively assent, as the Samaritans did. This is indered the Christ, but they only argue, When Christ comes, will he do more miracles than these?
They take it for granted that Christ will come, and when he comes, will do many miracles. Is not this he then? In him we see, though not all the worldly pomp we have admired, yet all the divine power we have believed, the Messiah should appear in; and therefore why may not this be he?" They believe it, but have not courage to own it. Note, Even weak faith may be true faith, and so accounted, so accepted by the Lord Jesus, who despises not the day of small things.

(2.) Whither he was going, v. 32—36. Where obnoxious persons were.

[1.] The design of the Pharisees and chief priests against him, v. 32.

First, The provocation given them, was, they had information brought them by their spies, who insinuated themselves into the conversation of the people, and gathered stories to carry to their jealous masters, that the people murmured such things concerning him; that the people, when they had a respect to the王者, for notwithstanding all they had done to make him odious, though the people did but whisper these things, and had not courage to speak out, yet the Pharisees were enraged at it. The equity of that government is justly suspected by others, which is so suspicious of itself, as to take notice of, or be influenced by, the secret, various, and uncertain movements of the common people. The Pharisees had the greatest reasons to be solicitous for the respect of the people, and were sensible that if Christ did thus increase, they must decrease.

Secondly, The project they had hereupon, was, to seize Jesus, and take him into custody; They sent officers to take him, not to take up those who murmured concerning him, and frighten them; no, the most effectual way to disperse the flock, is, to snare the shepherd. The Pharisees seem to have been the scribes, and God.

The discourse of our Lord Jesus hereupon; (r. 33, 34.) Yet a little while I am with you, and then I go to him that sent me; ye shall seek me, and shall not find me; and where I am, thither ye cannot come. These words, like the pillar of cloud and fire, have a bright side and a dark side.

First, They have a bright side towards our Lord Jesus himself, and speak abundance of comfort to him and all his faithful followers, that are exposed to difficulties and dangers, for his sake. Three things.

1. That he had but a little time to continue here in this troublesome world. He sees that he is never likely to have a quiet day among them; but the best of it is, his warfare will shortly be accomplished, and then he shall be no more in this world, ch. 17. 11. Whosoever we are with in this world, the friends of Jesus, it is but a little while, and then we shall be with the Lord. And it is matter of comfort to those who are in the world, but not of it, and therefore are hated by it and sick of it, that they shall not be in it always, they shall not be in it long. We must be a while with those that are pricking and grieving thorns; but, thanks be to God, it is but a little while, and we shall be out of their reach. Our days being evil, it is well they are few.

2. That, when he should quit this troublesome world, he should go to him that sent him. I go to him, I am driven away by force, but, I willingly go; having finished my errand, I return to him who sent me or errand. Then, when I have common work with you, then, and not till then, I go to him that sent me, and will receive me, will receive me. There is a message from God against him; but not only does not hinder him from, but will hasten him to, the glory and joy that were set before him. Let those who suffer for Christ, comfort themselves with this, that they have a God to go to, and are going to him, going space, to be for ever with him.

3. That those who persecuted him here, whereas the world, yet none of their persecutors could follow him to heaven; Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me. It appears by their vanity to his followers when he was gone, that if they could have reached him, they would have persecuted him; But ye cannot come into that temple, as ye do into this. Where I am, that is, where I then shall be: but he expresses it thus, because even when he was on earth, by his divine nature, he was out of their reach, Rev. 12. 13. Or it denotes, that he shall be so soon there, that he was as good as there already. Note, It adds to the happiness of glorified saints, that they are out of the reach of the devil and all his wicked instruments.

Secondly, These words have a black and dark side toward those wicked Jews that hated and persecuted Christ. They now longed to be rid of him, Jesus with him from the earth; but let them not know it.

1. That according to their choice, so should their doom be. They were industrious to drive him from them, and their sin shall be their punishment; he will not trouble them long, yet a little while and he will depart from them. It is just with God to forsake these that think his presence a burden. They that are weary of Christ, need no more to make them miserable than to have their wish.

2. That they would certainly repent their choice when it was too late. (1.) They should in vain seek the presence of the Messiah: Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me. Ye shall expect the Christ to come, but your eyes shall fail with looking for him, and ye shall never find him. They who rejected the true Messiah when he did come, were justly abounded unto a miserable and endless expectation of one that should never come. Or, it may refer to the final rejection of sinners from the favor and grace of Christ at the great day; these who now seek Christ, shall find him, but the day is coming, when those who now refuse him, shall seek him, and shall not find him. See Prov. 1. 28. They will in vain cry, Lord, Lord, open to us. Or, perhaps these words might be fulfilled in the despair of some of the Jews, who possibly might be convinced, and not converted, who might feel the power of the Spirit upon them again; but the day of grace is over; (Luke 17. 22.) yet that is not all.

(2.) They should in vain expect a place in heaven; Where I am, and where all believers shall be with me, thither ye cannot come. Not only because they are excluded by the just and irreversible sentence of the Judge, and the sword of the angel at every gate of the new Jerusalem, to keep the way of the tree of life against them; or because they are disabled by their own iniquity and infidelity; Ye cannot come, because ye will not. Those that hate to be where Christ is, in his word and ordinances on earth, are very unfit to be where he is in his glory in heaven; for indeed heaven would be no heaven to them, such are the antipathies of an un sanctified soul to the felicities of that state.
36.) They said among themselves, Whither will he go?

Secondly, Their daring contempt of Christ’s threatenings. Instead of trembling at that terrible word, Ye shall seek me, and not find me, which speaks the utmost degree of misery, they banter it and make a jest of it, as those sinners that mock at fear, and are not affrighted, Isa. 5. 19. Amos 5. 18. Let him make jest. But be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong.

Thirdly, Their inveterate malice and rage against Christ. All they dreaded in his departure, was, that he would be out of the reach of their power; “Whither will he go, that we shall not find him? If he be above ground, we will have him; we will leave no place unsearched,” as Ahab in quest of Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 16.

Fifthly, Their proud disdain of the Gentiles, whom they here call the dispersed of the Gentiles; meaning either the Jews that were scattered abroad among the Greeks, (James 1. 1. 1 Pet. 1. 1.) be go and make an interest among those silly people? or, the Gentiles dispersed over the world, in distinction from the Jews, who were incorporated into one church and nation; will he make his court to them?

Fifthly, Their jealousy of the least intimation of favour to the Gentiles; “Will he go and teach the Gentiles? Will he carry his doctrine to them?” Perhaps they had heard of some items of respect shewed by him to the Gentiles, as in his sermon at Nazareth, and in the case of the centurion and the woman of Canaan, and there was nothing they dreaded more than the comprehension of the Gentiles. So common is it for those who have lost the power of religion, to be very jealous for the monopoly of the name. They now made a jest of his going to teach the Gentiles; but not long after he did it in good earnest by his apostles and ministers, and gathered those dispersed people, sorely to the grief of the Jews, Rom. x. 19. 20. So true is that of Solomon, The fear of the wicked, it shall come upon him.

37. In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink.

38. He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

39. (But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified.) Many of the people therefore, when they heard this saying, said, Of a truth this is the prophet. Others said, This is the Christ. But some said, Shall Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the scripture said, That Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem, where David was? So there was a division among the people because of him. And some of them would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him.

In these verses, we have,

1. Christ’s discourse, with the explication of it, v. 37—39. It is probable that these are only short hints of what he enlarged upon, but they have in them the substance of the whole gospel; here is a gospel-invitation to come to Christ, and a gospel-promise of comfort and happiness in him. Now observe,

1. When he made this invitation; on the last day of the feast of tabernacles, that great day. The eighth day, which concluded that solemnity, was to be a holy convocation, Lev. 23. 36. Now on this day Christ published this gospel-call. Because, (1.) Much people were gathered together; and if the invitation was given to many, it might be hoped that some would accept of it, Prov. 1. 21. Numerous assemblies give opportunity of doing the more good. (2.) The people were now returning to their homes, and he would give them this to carry away with them as his parting word. When a great congregation is to be dismissed, and is about to scatter, as here, it is affecting to think, that in all probability they will never come all together again in this world, and therefore if we can say or do any thing to help them to heaven, that must be the time. It is good to be lively at the close of an ordinance. Christ made this offer on the last day of the feast; [1.] To those who had turned a deaf ear to his preaching on the foregoing days of this sacred week; he will try them once more and if they will yet hear his voice they shall be saved. [2.] To those who perhaps might never have such another offer made them, and therefore were concerned to accept of this; it would be half a year before there would be another feast, and in that time they would many of them be in their graves. Behold, now is the accepted time.

2. How he made this invitation; Jesus stood, and cried; which denotes (1.) His great earnestness and importance. His heart was upon it, to bring poor souls in to himself. The elevation of his body and the elevation of his voice were indications of the intense ness of his mind. Love to souls will make preachers lively. (2.) His desire that all might take notice, and take hold of this invitation. He stood, and cried, that he might the better be heard; for this is what every one that hath ears, is concerned for. I speak to you the gospel, saith the Lord, and no man can hear it, because it fears no trials. The heathen oracles were delivered clandestinely by them that peeped and muttered; but the oracles of the gospel were proclaimed by one that stood, and cried. How sad is the case of man, that he must be importuned to be happy, and how wonderful the grace of Christ, that he will importune him! No one, Isa. 35. 1.

3. The person itself, which is, (1.) Very general; if any man thirst, whoever he be, he is invited to Christ. Be he high or low, rich or poor, young or old, bond or free, Jew or Gentile. (2.) Very gracious; If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. If any man desires to be truly and eternally happy, let him apply himself to me, and be ruled by me, and I will undertake to make him so. [1.] The persons invited are said to be thirsting, which may be understood, either First, Of the indigence of their cases; either as to their outward condition; if any man be destitute of the comforts of this life, or fatigued with the crosses of it, let his poverty and afflictions draw him to Christ for that peace which the world can neither give nor take away; or, as to their inward state; “If any man want spiritual food, he may be very thirsty.” Or, Secondly, Of the inclination of their souls and their desires towards a spiritual happiness. If any man hunger and thirst after righteousness, that is, truly desire the good-will of God toward him, and the good work of God in him.
[2.] The invitation itself; Let him come to me. Let him not go to the ceremonial law, which would neither justify the conscience nor purify it; and therefore could not make the conscience tranquil, for Ex. 10. 1. Nor let him go to the heathen philosophy, that does but beguile men, lead them into a wood, and leave them there; but let him go to Christ, admit his doctrine, submit to his discipline, believe in him; come to him as the Fountain of living waters, the Giver of all comfort.
[3.] The satisfaction promised; Let him come and drink; he shall have what he comes for, and is satisfied with it; that holy spring should be only refresh, but replenish, a soul that desires to be happy.
[4.] A gracious promise annexed to this gracious call; (p. 38.) He that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow—
(1.) See here what it is to come to Christ. It is to believe on him, as the scripture hath said; it is to receive and entertain him as he is offered to us in the gospel. We must not frame a Christ according to our fancy, but believe in a Christ according to the scripture.
(2.) See how thirsty souls, that come to Christ, shall be made to drink. Israel, that believed Moses, drank of the rock that followed them, the streams followed; but believers drank of a Rock in them, Christ in them, as it is, (Ps. 116. 10.) Ch. 4. 14. Provision is made not only for their present satisfaction, but for their continual, perpetual comfort. Here is, [1.] Living water, running water, which the Hebrew language calls living, because still in motion. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are compared to living (meaning running) water, because they are the active quickening principles of spiritual life, and the earnest and ordinances of eternal life. See Jer. 2. 13. [2.] Rivers of living water, which denotes both plenty and constancy. The comfort flows in both plentifully and constantly as a river; strong as a stream to bear down the oppositions of doubts and fears. There is a fulness in Christ of grace for grace. [3.] These flow out of his belly, that is, out of his heart and soul. That is the subject of the Spirit’s working, and the seat of his government. There gracious fountain streams abound and flow out of the heart, in which the Spirit dwells, flow the issues of life. Prov. 4. 23. There divine comforts are lodged, and the joy that a stranger doth not intermeddle with. He that believes hath the witness in himself, 1 John 5. 10. Satan lies in wait—Light abounds within.
Observe further, where there are springs of grace and comfort in the soul, they will send forth streams. Out of his belly shall flow rivers. First, Grace and comfort will evidence themselves. Good affections will produce good actions, and a holy heart will be seen in a holy life; the tree’s known by its fruits, and the fountain by its streams. Secondly, They will communicate themselves for the benefit of others; a good man is a common good. His mouth is a well of life. Prov. 10. 11. It is not enough that we drink waters out of our own cistern, that we carry the comfort of the grace given us, but we must let our fountains be dispersed abroad, Prov. 5. 15, 16.
These words, as the scripture hath said, seem to refer to some promise in the Old Testament to this purport, and there are many; as that God would pour out his Spirit, which is a metaphor borrowed from waters, (Prov. 1. 23. Joel 2. 28. Isa. 44. 3. Zech. 12. 10.) The word means to water, (Job 15. 11.) that there should be rivers of water, (Isa. 41. 18.) that rivers of water should be like a spring of water, (Isa. 55. 11.) and the church a well of living water, Cant. 4. 15. And here may be an allusion to the waters issuing out of Ezekiel’s temple, Ezek. 47. 1. Compare Rev. 22. 1. and Zech. 14. 8. Dr. Lightfoot and others tell us, it was a custom of the Jews, which they received by tradition, on the last day of the feast of tabernacles, to have a great solemnity, which they called Hutsantemem, —The pouring out of water. They fetched a golden vessel of water from the pool of Siloam, brought it into the temple with sound of trumpet and other ceremonies, and, upon the ascent to the altar, poured it out before the Lord with all possible expressions of joy. Some of their writers make the water to signify the law, and refer to Isa. 12. 5. 33. 1. Others, that this washing of the Saviour might here allude to this custom. Believers shall have the comfort, not of a vessel of water fetched from a pool, but of a river flowing from themselves. The joy of the law, and pouring out of the water, which signified that, are not to be compared with the joy of the gospel in the wells of salvation.
3. Here is the evangelist’s exposition of this promise (p. 39.) This shall be the sign by which not any outward advantages accruing to believers, (as perhaps some misunderstood him,) but of the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Spirit. See how scripture is the best interpreter of scripture.
Observe, (1.) It is promised to all that believe on Christ, that they shall receive the Holy Ghost. Some received his miraculous gifts; (Mark 16. 17. 18.) all receive his sanctifying graces. The gift of the Holy Ghost is one of the promises of the new covenant, (Acts 2. 39.) and, if promised, no doubt performed to all that have an interest in that covenant.
(2.) The Spirit dwelling and working in believers, is a fountain of living, running water, out of which plentiful streams flow, cooling and cleansing as water, mollifying and moistening as water, making them fruitful, and others joyful; see ch. 5. 3. Where the apostles spoke so fluently of the things of God, as the Spirit gave them utterance, (Acts 2. 4.) and afterward preached and wrote the gospel of Christ with such a flood of divine eloquence, then this was fulfilled, out of his belly shall flow rivers.
(3.) This plentiful effusion of the Spirit was yet the matter of a promise; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified. See here, [1.] That the Holy Ghost was not yet given. It was necessary that he should be glorified, and he was ever worthy of all honour; but he was yet in a state of humiliation and contempt. He had not forfeited the glory he had before all worlds, nov, he had merited a further glory, and beside his hereditary honours, might claim the achievement of a mediate royal crown; and yet this is in reverison. Jesus is now in heaven (Isa. 42. 1.) is now satisfied, (Isa. 53. 11.) is now justified, (1 Tim. 3. 16.) but he is not yet glorified. And if Christ must wait for his glory, let us not think much to wait for ours.
[2.] That the Holy Ghost was not yet given. The Holy Ghost was not yet given, in that visible manner that was intended. If we compare the clear knowledge and strong grace of the disciples of Christ themselves, after that divine and essential grace had been given, and written in their hearts and consciences, and because we see the same graces not yet arrived at in us, here, we shall understand in what sense the Holy Ghost was not yet given; the earnest and first-fruits of the Spirit were given, but the full harvest was not yet come. That which is most properly called the dispensation of the Spirit, did not yet commence. The Holy Ghost was not yet given in such rivers of living water as should issue forth to water the whole earth, even the Gentile world; not in the gifts of tongues, to which perhaps this promise principally refers.

[3.] That the reason why the Holy Ghost was not yet given, was, because Jesus was not yet glorified. First, The death of Christ is sometimes called his glorification; (ch. 13. 31.) for in his cross he conquered and triumphed. Now the gift of the Holy Ghost was purchased by the blood of Christ, that was the valuable consideration upon which the grant was grounded, and therefore till that price was paid. (though many other gifts were bestowed upon its being secured to be paid,) the Holy Ghost was not given. Secondly, There was not so much need of the Spirit while Christ was himself upon earth, as there was when he was gone, to supply the want of him. Thirdly, The giving of the Holy Ghost was to be an answer to Christ's intercession, (ch. 14. 16.) and an act of his dominion; and therefore till he is glorified, and enters upon both these, the Holy Ghost is not given. Fourthly, The conversion of the Gentiles was the glorifying of Jesus. When certain Greeks began to inquire after Christ, he said, Now is the Son of man glorified. (ch. 12. 23.) Now the time for that was not yet come, when the gospel should be propagated in the nations; and therefore there was as yet no occasion for the gift of tongues, that river of living water. But observe, though the Holy Ghost was not yet given, yet he was promised; it was now the great promise of the Father, Acts 1. 4. Though the gifts of Christ's grace are long deferred, yet they are well secured; and while we are waiting for the good promised, we have the promise to live upon, which shall speak and shall be fulfilled.

II. The consequences of this discourse; what entertainment it met with; in general, it occasioned differences; (v. 43.) There was a division among the people because of him. There was a schism, so the word is; there were diversities of opinions, and those managed with heat and contention; various sentiments, and those such as set them at variance. The churlish, narrow-souled and ill-natured people, who would not, or could not, or would not be willing to, or would not, or could not, or would not willingly embrace his gospel? No, the effect of the preaching of his gospel would be division, for while some are gathered to it, others will be gathered against it; and this will put things into a ferment, as here; but this is no more the fault of the gospel, than it is the fault of a wholesome medicine, that it stirs up the febrile humours in the body, in order to the discharge of them. Observe what the debate was:

1. Some were taken with him, and well-affect ed to him; Many of the people, when they heard this saying, heard him with such compassion and kindness invite poor sinners to him, and with such authority engage to make them happy, that they could not but think highly of him. (1.) Some of them said, This is the prophet. (v. 44.) Others went further, and said, This is the Christ. (v. 41.) not the prophet of the Messiah, but the Messiah himself. The Jews had at this time a more than ordinary expectation of the Messiah, which made them ready to say upon every occasion, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there; and this seems to be only the effect of some such confused and floating notions, which caught at the first appearance, for we do not find that these people became his disciples and followers; a good opinion of Christ is far short of a lively faith in Christ; many give Christ a good word, that give him no more. These here said, This is the Prophet, and this is the Christ, but could not persuade themselves to leave a country and all for his being; Christ, and testimony to Christ was but a testimony against themselves.

2. Others were prejudiced against him. No sooner was this great truth started, that Jesus is the Christ, than immediately it was contradicted and argued against; and this one thing, that his rise and original were (as they took it for granted) out of Galilee, was thought enough to answer all the arguments for his being the Christ. For, Shall Christ come out of Galilee? Has not the scripture said, that Christ comes of the seed of David? See here, (1.) A laudable knowledge of the scripture. They were so far in the right, that the Messiah was to be a Rod out of the stem of Jesse, (Isa. 11. 1.) that out of Bethlehem should arise the Governor, Mic. 5. 2. This even the common people knew by the traditional expositions which their scribes gave them. Perhaps these people, who had these scriptures so ready to object against Christ, were not alike knowing in other parts of holy writ, but had these put into their mouths by their leaders, to fortify their prejudices against Christ. Many that espouse some corrupt notions, and spend their zeal in defence of them, seem to be very ready in the scriptures, when indeed they know little more than these scriptures which they have been taught to pervert.

(2.) A culpable ignorance of our Lord Jesus. They speak of it as certain and past dispute, that Jesus was of Galilee, whereas by inquiring of himself, or his mother, or his disciples, or by consulting the genealogies of the family of David, or the register at Bethlehem, they might have known, that he was of the line of David; but this they willingly are ignorant of. Thus gross falsehoods in matters of fact concerning persons and things, are often taken up by prejudiced and partial men, and great resolves founded upon them, even in the same place and the same age wherein the persons live and the things are done, while the truth might easily be found out.

3. Others were engaged against him, and they would have taken him. (v. 44.) Though what he said was most sweet and gracious, yet they were exasperated against him for it. Thus did our Master suffer ill for saying and doing well. They would have taken him; they hoped somebody or other would seize him, and if they had thought no one else would, they would have done it themselves. They would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him, being restrained by an invisible power, because his hour was not come. As the malice of Christ's enemies is always unreasonable, so sometimes the suspension of it is unaccountable.

45. Then came the officers to the Chief Priests and Pharisees: and they said unto them, Why have ye not brought him? 46. The officers answered, Never man spake like this man. 47. Then answered them the Pharisees, Are ye also deceived? 48. Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him? 49. But this people who knoweth not the law are cursed. 50. Nicodemus saith unto them, (he that came to Jesus by night, being one of them,) 51. Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth? 52
They answered and said unto him, Art thou also of Galilee? Search, and look: for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet. 5. And every man went unto his own house.

The chief priests and Pharisees were here in a close cabal, contriving how to suppress Christ; though this was the great day of the feast, they attended not the religious services of the day, but left that to the vulgar, to whom it was common for those great ecclesiastics to consign the turn over the business of devotion, while they thought themselves better employed in the affairs of church policy. They sat in the temple, thinking it to be a prisoner to them, they having issued out warrants for the apprehending of him, v. 32. Now here we are told,

1. What passed between them and their own officers, who returned without him, re infecta—having done nothing. Observe,

1. The reproof they gave the officers for not executing the warrant they gave them: Why have ye brought this Man? He appeared publicly because he were many of them, and would have assisted them in taking him; this was the last day of the feast, and they would not have such another opportunity; Why then did you neglect your duty? It vexed them that those who were their own creatures, who depended on them, and on whom they depended, into whose minds they have instilled prejudices, should bring such reproaches upon themselves. Note, Mischievous men find that they cannot do the mischief they would, Ps. 112. 10. Neh. 6. 16.

2. The reason which the officers gave for the non-execution of their warrant; (v. 46.) Never man spoke like this Man. Now, (1.) This was a very great truth, that never any man spoke with that wisdom, and power, and grace, that convincing clearness and truth, which makes all the advantage, which with Christ spake: none of the prophets, no, not Moses himself. (2.) The very officers that were sent to take him, were taken with him, and acknowledged this. Though it is probable that they were men who had no quick sense of reason or eloquence, and, it is certain, had no inclination to think well of Jesus, yet so much self-evidence was there in what Christ said, that they could not but begin him before all the things that sat in Moses’s seat. This Christ was preserved by the power God has upon the consciences even of bad men. (3.) They said this to their lords and masters, who could not endure to hear any thing that tended to the honour of Christ, and yet could not avoid hearing this. Providence ordered it so, that this should be said to them, that it might be a vexation in their sin, and an aggravation of their sin. Their own officers are witnesses against them, who could not be suspected to be biased in favour of Christ. This testimony of their’s should have made them reflect upon themselves, with this thought. Do we know what we are doing, when we are hating and persecuting one that speaks so admirably well? 3. The Pharisees endeavour to secure their officers to their interest, and to beget in them prejudices against the, whom they thought to them begin to be well affected to; to prevent which they suggest two things: (1.) That, if they embrace the gospel of Christ, they will deceive themselves; (v. 47.) Are ye also deceived? Christianity has, from its first rise, been represented to the world as a great cheat upon it, and they that embrace it as men deceived, then when they began to be undeceived. They that looked for a Messiah in external pomp, thought them deceived who believed in a Messiah that appeared in poverty and disgrace; but the event declares that none were ever more shamefully deceived, or put a greater cheat upon themselves, than those who promised themselves worldly wealth and secular dominion with the Messiah. Observe what a complaint the Pharisees put upon these officers; Are ye also deceived? What mean ye to be coadjutors, and ye have thought to be better than to be imposed upon by every pretender and upstart teacher? They endeavour to prejudice them against Christ, by persuading them to think well of themselves.

(2.) That they will disparage themselves. Most men, even in their religion, are willing to be governed by the example of those of the first rank; and, to be healthful, and be relatively to their own officers, they, who profess repentances, such as they were, gave them a sense of honour; are desired to consider,

1. That, if they become disciples of Christ, they go contrary to those who were persons of quality and reputation; Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him? You know they have not, and you ought to be bound up by their judgment, and to be hearken and do in religion are going to the will of your superiors; will you be wiser than they? Some of the rulers did embrace Christ, (Matt. 9. 18. ch. 4. 53.) and more believed in him, but wanted courage to confess him; (ch. 12. 42.) but when the interest of Christ runs low in the world, it is common for its adversaries to represent it as lower than really it is. But it was too true, that few, very few, of them did. Note, First. The cause of Christ has seldom been in bad hands and Pharisees on its side. It needs not secular supports, nor proposes secular advantages, and therefore neither courts, nor is courted by the great men of this world. Self-denial and the cross are hard lessons to rulers and Pharisees. Secondly. This has confirmed many in their prejudices against Christ and his gospel, that the rulers and Pharisees have been no friends to them. Shall a child be instructed in the way of the Lord, and the way of the transgressor, and the way of the thief? And to go to hell in compliment to the rulers and Pharisees.

3. That they will link themselves with the despicable vulgar sort of people; (v. 49.) That this people who know not the law are cursed; meaning especially those that were well-affect ed to the doctrine of Christ. Observe,

4. How secretly and dishonourably they call them: this people. It is not, these, this low people, distinguished from them that were the clergy, but

The church’s common interests are betrayed, when any one part of it studies to render the other mean and despisable. If they mean the followers of Christ, though they were generally persons of small figure and fortune, yet by owning Christ they discovered such a sacred city, integrity, and interest in the favours of Heaven, as made them truly great and considerable. Note, As the way to Heaven is by true religion and the gospel, so the things which are despised by the world are those which God has chosen.
Secondly. How unjustly they reproach them as ignorant of the word of God; They know not the law; as if none knew the law but those that knew it from them; and no scripture-knowledge were current but what came out of their mint; and as if none knew the law but such as were observant of their canons and traditions. It is observable of those whom they then accused, they knew the law, and the prophets too, better than they did. Many a plain, honest, un-learned disciple of Christ, by meditation, experience, prayers, and especially obedience, attains to a more clear, sound, and useful knowledge of the word of God, than some great scholars with all their wit and learning. Thus David came to understand most things and abundantly, Ps. 99. 100. If the common people did not know the law, yet the chief priests and Pharisees, of all men, should not have upbraided with it: for whose fault was it but theirs, who should have taught them better; but instead of that, took away the key of knowledge? Luke 11. 52.

Thirdly. How magisterially they pronounce sent-tence upon them; they are cursed; hateful to God and all men, and also to themselves. It is well that their saying they were cursed, did not make them so, for the curse causeless shall not come. It is an usurpation of God’s prerogative, as well as great uncharitableness, to say of any particular persons, much more of any body of people, that they are reproaches. We are unable to try, and therefore unfit to condemn, and our rule is, Bless, and curse not, but let the doer of evil be snuffed out, and made fools of. But they use this odious word, They are cursed, to express their own indignation, and to frighten their officers from having anything to do with them; thus the language of hell, in our profane age, calls every thing that is displeasing, cursed, and damned, and confounded. Now, for ought that appears, those officers had their convictions stifled and snuffed by those sentences, and they never inquire further after Christ; one word from a ruler or Pharisee will sway more with many than the true reason of things, and the great interests of their souls.

11. What passed between them and Nicodemus, a member of their own body, v. 50, 52. Observe, 1. The just and rational objection which Nicode-mus made against their proceedings. Even in their corrupt and wicked Sanhedrim, God left not himself quite without witness against their enmity; nor was the vote against Christ carried nemine contradicente—unanimously. Observe, (1.) Who it was, that appeared against them; it was Nicodemus, he that came to Jesus by night, heing one of them, v. 50. Observe, concerning him, [1.] That, though he had been with Jesus, and taken him for a Teacher, yet he retained his place in the council, and his vote among them. Some impute this to his weakness and cowardice, and think it was his fault that he did not quit his place; but Christ had never said to him, Follow me, else he would have done as others, that left all to follow him: therefore it seems rather to have been his woedsome situation. Perhaps many of those whom they then accused, had grown up his place, because there he might have opportunity of serving Christ and his interest, and stemming the tide of the Jewish rage, which perhaps he did more than we are aware of. He might there be as Hushai among Absalom’s counsellors, instrumental to turn their counselis into foolishness. Though we must in no case deny our Master, yet we may wait for an opportunity to do to it to the best advantage. God has his remnant among all sorts: and many times finds, or puts, or makes, some good in the worst places and societies. There was Daniel in Nebuchadnezzar’s court, and Nehemiah in Artaxexes’. [2.] That, though at first he came to Jesus by night, for fear of being known, and still continued in his post; yet, when there was occasion, he boldly appeared in defence of Christ, and opposed the whole counsel that were set against him. Thus many believers, who at first were timorous, and ready to flee at the shaking of a leaf, have cut length, by divine grace, grown courageous, and able to laugh at the shaking of a spear. Let none justify the disguising of their faith by the example of Nicodemus, unless, like him, they be ready upon the first occasion openly to appear in the cause of Christ, though they stand alone in it, for so Nicodemus did here, and ch. 19. 30.

(1.) What was alleged against their proceedings, (v. 51.) Doth our law judge any man before he hear him, (over pr" so hear from himself,) and know what he doth? By no means, nor doth the law of any civilized nation allow it. Observe, [1.] He prudently argues from the principles of their own law, and an incontestable rule of justice, that no man is to be condemned unheard. Had he urged the excellency of Christ’s doctrine, or the evidence of his miracles, they would have had no chance to continue their discourse with him, (ch. 3.) It had been but to cast peals before swine, who would trample them under their feet, and would turn again, and rend him; therefore he waves them.

(2.) Whereas they had reproached the people, especially the followers of Christ, as ignorant of the law, he here tacitly retorts the charge upon themseh, and says, that the ignorant were of some of the first principles of the law, so unfit were they to give law to others.

(3.) The law is here said to judge, and hear, and know, when magnifies that govern, and are go-vemed by it, judge, and hear, and know; for they are the mouth of the law, and whatsoever they bind and loose according to the law, is justly said to be bound and loosed by the law: they were of some of the principles of the law, so unfit were they to give law to others.

(4.) It is highly fit that none should come under the sentence of the law, till they have first by a fair trial undergone the scrutiny of it. Judges, when they receive the complaints of the accuser, must always reserve in their minds room for the defence of the accused, for they have two ears to remind them to hear both sides; this is said to be the manner of Romans, Acts 25. 16. The method of our law is Quer and Terminer, first to hear and then to determine.

[5.] Persons are to be judged, not by what is said of them, but by what they do; our law will not ask what men’s opinions are of them, or oracles against them, but, What have they done? What overt acts can they be convicted of? Sentence must be given, secundum aggressi et probati—according to what is alleged and proved. Facts, and not faces, must be known in judgment; and the scale of justice be used before the sword of justice.

Now we may suppose that the motion Nicodemus made in the house upon this was, That Jesus should be desired to come and give them an account of himself and his doctrine, and that they should favour him with an impartial unprejudiced hearing; but, though not in words, could this be marked in his maxim, none of them would second his motion.

2. What was said to this objection. Here is no direct reply given to it; but, when they could not resist the force of his argument, they fell foul upon him, and what was to seek in reason they made up in railing and reproach. Note, It is a sign of a bad cause, when men cannot bear to hear reason, and take it as an evil to be marked of maxims. Many more are afraid of reason, as a kind of a cue to any reason that is against them. See how they taunt him: Art thou also of Galilee? v. 52. Some think he was well enough served for continuing among woman was taken in adultery, in the very act. 5. Now Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned: but what saest thou? 6. This they said, tempting him, that they might have to accuse him. But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground, as though he heard them not. 7. So when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. 8. And again he stooped down, and wrote on the ground. 9. And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst. 10. When Jesus had lifted up himself, and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman, where are those thine accusers? --- Hath no man condemned thee? --- 11. She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more.

Though Christ was basely abused in the foregoing chapter, both by the rulers and by the people, yet here we have him still at Jerusalem, still in the temple: how often would he have gathered them! Observe,

1. His retirement in the evening out of the town; (v. 1.) He went unto the mount of Olives; whether to some friend's house, or to some booth pitched there, now at the feast of tabernacles, is not certain: whether he rested there, or, as some think, continued all night in prayer to God, we are not told. But he went out of Jerusalem, perhaps, because he had never a friend there, that had either kindness or courage enough to give him a night's lodging, while his persecutors had houses of their own to go to; (ch. 7:53.) he could not so much as borrow a place to lay his head on, but what he must go a night in the cold open air. Two out of town for him. He retired, (as some think,) because he would not expose himself to the peril of a popular tumult in the night. It is prudence to go out of the way of danger, whenever we can do it without going out of the way of duty. In the daytime, when he had work to do in the temple, he willingly exposed himself, and was under special protection, Isa. 49:2. But in the night, when he had not work to do, he withdrew into the country, and sheltered himself there.

II. His return in the morning to the temple, and to his work thence; v. 2. Observe,

1. What a diligent Preacher Christ was: Early in the morning he came again and taught. Though he had been teaching the day before, he taught again the next day. Christ was a constant Preacher, in season and out of season. These things are taken to be examples concerning Christ's preaching: (1.) The time: early in the morning. Though he lodged out of town, and perhaps had spent much of the night in secret prayer, yet he came early. When a man's work is to be done for God and souls, it is good to begin betimes, and take the day before: (2.) The place: in the temple, not so much because it was a consecrated place, for then he would have chosen it at other times; as because it was a place of concourse. And he would hereby countenance solemn assemblies for religious worship, and

CHAP. VIII.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's evading the snare which the Jews laid for him, in bringing to him a woman taken in adultery, v. 1. 11. II. Divers discourses or conferences of his with the Jews that exalted him, and sought occasion against him, and made every thing he said a matter of controversy. 1. Concerning his being the Light of the world, v. 12. 19. 2. Concerning the ruin of the unbelieving Jews, v. 21. 30. 3. Concerning liberty and bondage, v. 31. 38. 4. Concerning the Father and the Son, v. 38. 47. 5. Here is his discourse, in answer to their demand, respecting his miraculous works, v. 48. 50. 6. Concerning the imputation of believers, v. 51. 59. And in all this he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself.

1. JESUS went unto the mount of Olives. 2. And early in the morning he came again into the temple, and all the people came unto him; and he sat down, and taught them. 3. And the Scribes and Pharisees brought unto him a woman taken in adultery; and when they had set her in the midst, 4. They say unto him, Master, this...
encourage people to come up to the temple, for he had not yet let it desolate. (5.) His posture; he sat down, which was one having authority, and as one that intended to abide by it for some time.

2. How diligently his preaching was attended upon; All the people came unto him; and perhaps many of them were the country-people, who were this day to return home from the feast, and were desirous to hear one sermon more from the mouth of this new returned. They came to him, though he came early. They that seek him early shall find him. Though the rulers were displeased at those that came to hear him, yet they would come; and he taught them, though they were angry at him too. Though there were few or none among them that were persons of any figure, yet Christ bid them welcome, and taught them.

3. His dealing with those that brought to him the woman taken in adultery, tempting him. The Scribes and Pharisees would not only not hear Christ patiently themselves, but they disturbed him when the people were attending on him. Observe here,

1. The case proposed to him by the Scribes and Pharisees, who herein contrived to pick a quarrel with him, and bring him into a snare, v. 3-6.

(1.) They set the prisoner to the bar; (v. 3.) they brought in a woman taken in adultery; perhaps now lately taken, during the time of the feast of tabernacles, when it may be, their dwelling in booths, and their feasting and joy, might, by wicked minds, corrupt the best things, be made occasions of sin. Those that were taken in adultery, were by the Jewish law to be put to death, which the Roman powers allowed them the execution of, and therefore she was brought before the ecclesiastical court. Observe, She was taken in her adultery; though adultery is a work of darkness, which the criminals commonly take all the care they can to conceal, yet sometimes it is strangely brought to light. Those that presume themselves secrecy in sin, deceive themselves. The Scribes and Pharisees bring her to Christ, and set her in the midst of the assembly, as if they would leave her wholly to the judgment of Christ, he having sat down, as a Judge upon the bench.

(2.) They prefer an indictment against her; (v. 4.) Master, this woman was taken in adultery. Here they call him Master, whom but the day before they had called a Deceiver; in hopes with their flatteries to have ensured him, as those, Luke 20. 20. But then there may be imposed upon them, that he was not so much a Deceiver, as and for that.

[1.] The crime for which the prisoner stands indicted, is no less than adultery; which even in the patriarchal age, before the law of Moses, was looked upon as an iniquity to be punished by the judges, Job 31. 9. 11. Gen. 34. 24. The Pharisees, by their virulent prosecution of this offender, seemed to have a great zeal against the sin, when it appeared afterwrards it was not a new sin, but one she had brooked before it; may they were within full of all uncleanliness Matt. 23. 27. 28. Note, It is common for those that are indifferent to their own sin, to be severe against the sins of others.

[2.] The proof of the crime was from the notorious evidence of the fact, an incontestible proof; she was taken in the act, so that there was no room left to plead Not guilty, had she not been taken in this act, she might have given great colour to the plea, that her heart had been perfectly hardened; but sometimes it proves a mercy to sinners, to have their sin brought to light, that they may do no more purposefully. Better our sin should shame us than damn us; and be our sin, as order before us for our conviction than for our denunciation.

[3.] They produce the statute in this case made and provided, and upon which she was indicted, v.

3. Moses in the law commanded that such should be stoned. Moses commanded that they should be stoned to death, (Lev. 20. 10. Deut. 22. 22.) but not that she should be stoned, if she was espoused, not married, or was a priest's daughter Deut. 22. 21. Note, Adultery is an exceeding sinful sin, for it is the rebellion of a vile lust, not only against the command, but against the covenant of our God. It is the violation of a divine institution in innocence, by the indulgence of one of the basest lusts of nature.

4. They pray his judgment in the case; But what saith thou, who pretendst to be a Teacher come from God, to repeal old laws and enact new ones? What hast thou to say in this case? If they had asked this question in sincerity, with a humble desire to know his mind, it had been very commendable. They that are intrusted with the administration of justice, should look up to Christ for direction; but this they said tempting him, that they might have to accuse him, v. 6. [1.] If he should confirm the sentence of the law, and let it take its course, they would censure him as inconsistent with himself, (he having received publicans and harlots,) and with the character of the Messiah, who should be meek, and have salvation, and proclaim a year of release; and perhaps they would accost him, with a Roman_char, and incite him to examine the Jews in the exorcism of a judicial power. But, [2.] If he should acquit her, and give his opinion that the sentence should not be executed, (as they expected he would,) they would represent him, First, As an Enemy to the law of Moses, and as one that usurped an authority to correct and control it, and would confirm that prejudice against him, which his enemies were so insinuating to propagate, that he came to destroy the law and the prophets. Secondly, As a friend to sinners, and, consequently, a Favourer of sin; if he should seem to connive at such wickedness, and let it go unpunished, they would represent him as countenancing it, and being a Patron of offences. If he were a Protector of offenders; than which no reflection could be more invincible upon one that professed the strictness, purity, and business, of a Prophet.

2. The method he took to resolve this case, and so to break this snare.

(1.) He seemed to slight it, and turned a deaf ear to it; he stooped down, and wrote on the ground. It is impossible to tell, and therefore needless to ask, what he wrote; but it is the only mention made in the gospels of Christ's writings: Eusebius indeed tells us he wrote, the wheat to the wheat, and the tares to the tares. Some think they have a liberty of conjecture as to what he wrote here. Grotius says, It was some grave weighty saying, and that it was usual for wise men, when they were very thoughtful concerning any thing, to do so. Jerom and Ambrose suppose he wrote, Let the names of these wicked men be written in the dust. Others this, The earth accuses the earth, but the judgment of the Lord is with all flesh; the secrets of the heart to be known. The earth refers to our conscience, to speak, when difficult cases are proposed to us, not quickly to short our belt; and when provocations are given us, or we are hasted, to pause and consider before we reply; think twice before we speak once; The heart of the wise studies to answer. Our translation from some Greek copies, which add, ποιεῖται παραγωγή, (though the most copies have it not,) give this account of our conscientious, that he had not heard them not. He did as it were look another way, to show that he was not willing to take notice of their address, saving, in effect, Who made me a Judge or a Diviner? It is safe in many cases to be deaf to that which it is not safe to answer, Ps. 88. 13. Christ would not have his ministers to be entangled in secular affairs; let them rather employ themselves in any lawful studies, and fill up their time with wriing on the ground, (which nobody will heed,) than now themselves in that which does not belong to them. But when Christ seemed as though he heard he heard not, nor made it appear that he not only heard their words, but knew their thoughts.
(2.) When they impudently or rather imperti-nently pressed him for an answer, he turned the conviction of the prisoners upon the prosecutors, v. 7.
[1.] They continued asking him, and his seeming to not to take notice of them, made them the more vehement, for now they thought sure enough that they had run him aground, and that he could not avoid the imputation of handing over one of the names of Moses, if he should acquit the prisoner, or his own desire of mercy and pardon, if he should condemn him; and therefore they pushed on their appeal to him with vigour; whereas they should have construed his disregard of them as a check to their design, and an intimation to them to desist, as they tendered their own reputation.
[2.] At last, he put them all to shame and silence with one word: He lifted up himself, awaking as one out of sleep, (Ps. 78. 65.) and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.
First, Here Christ avoided the snare which they had laid for him, and effectually saved his own reputation. He neither reflected upon the law, nor excused the prisoner’s guilt; nor did he on the other hand, even when it appeared plain to his conscience that their heat: see the good effect of consideration.
When we cannot make our point by steering a direct course, it is good to fetch a compas.

Secondly, In the net which they spread is their own foot taken. They came with design to accuse him, but they were forced to accuse themselves. Christ owns it was fit the prisoner should be prosecuted, but appeals to their consciences, whether they were fit to be the judges to take away the lives of others, [1.] He here refers to that rule which the law of Moses prescribed in the execution of criminals, that the hand of the witnesses must be first upon them, (Deut. 17. 7.) as in the stoning of Stephen, Acts 7. 58.
The Scribes and Pharisees were the witnesses against this woman. Now Christ puts it to them, whether, according to their own law, they would dare to be the executioners. But they take away the law; and instead of which, he now taking away with their tongues: would not their own consciences fly in their faces if they did?

2. He builds upon an uncontested maxim in morality, that it is very absurd for men to be zealous in punishing the offences of others, while they are every whit as guilty themselves; and they are not better than self-condemned, who judge others, and yet themselves do the same thing; “If there be any of us without sin, without sin of this nature, that has not some time or other been guilty of forication or adultery, let him cast the first stone at her.” Not that magistrates, who are conscious of guilt themselves, should therefore come at others’ guilt. But therefore, (1.) Whenever we find fault with others, we ought to reflect upon ourselves, and to be more severe against sin in ourselves than in others. (2.) We ought to be favourable, though not the passers-by, persons of those that offered, and to restore them with a spirit of meekness, considering ourselves and our own corrupt nature.
Ant sumus, aut simus, vel possumus esse nosque eux—We either are, or have been, or may be, what he is. Let this restrain us from throwing stones at our brethren, and proclaiming their fault. Let him that is without sin, begin such discourse as that, and then those that are truly humbled for their sin, will blush at it, and be glad to let it fall. (3.) Those that are any way obliged to animadver upon the faults of others, are concerned to look well to themselves, and keep themselves pure; (Matt. 5. 2.) Quo alterum mentem frui, solum us interi ens spirat.

The snuffers of the tabernacle, that snuffed up smoke, (Lev. 16. 12.) perhaps he refers to the trial of the suspected wife by the jealous husband, with the waters of jealousy. The man was to bring her to the priest, (Num. 5. 15.) in the Scribes and Pharisees brought this woman to Christ. Now it was a received opinion among the Jews, and confirmed by experience, that if the husband who brought his wife to that trial,
had himself been at any time guilty of adultery, (Levit. 20. 20.) the veriest law of God would have had no effect upon the wife. “Come then,” said Christ, “according to your own tradition will judge you; if you are without sin, stand to the charge, and let the adulteress be executed; but if not, though she be guilty, while you that present her, are equally so,
according to your own rule, she shall be free.”
4. In this he attended to the great work which he came into the world about, and that was to bring sinners to repentance; not to destroy, but to save.
He aimed to bring, not only the prisoner to repentance, by showing her his mercy, but the prosecutors, too, by shewing them their sins: they thought to insnare him, he sought to convince and convert them. Thus the blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul.

[5.] Having given them this startling word, he left them to consider of it, and again steeped down, Tell them, according to Jer. 8. 9. As when they made their address, he seemed to slight their question, so now that he had given them an answer, he slighted their resentment of it; not caring what they said to it; nay, they needed not to make any reply:
the matter was lodged in their own breasts, let them make the best of it there. Or, he would not seem to wait for an answer, lest they should sit in a sudden justify themselves, and then to entrust matters to it; but gives them time to pause, and to commune with their own hearts. God said, I heardken and heard, Jer. 8. 6. Some Greek copies here read, He wrote on the ground, Iesus misso factus est in crucem—the sins of every one of them; this he could do, for he sets our indignities before him; and this he will do, for he will set them in order before us too; he seals up our transgressions, Job 12. 17. as in the sand; so they are written as with a pen of iron and the point of a diamond, (Jer. 17. 1.) never to be forgotten till they are forgiven.

[4.] The Scribes and Pharisees were so strangely thunderstruck with the words of Christ, that they let fall their persecution of Christ; whom they durst no further tempt; and their prosecution of the woman whom they durst no longer accuse; (v. 9.)
They went out one by one: First, Perhaps his word on the ground frightened them, as the handwriting on the wall frightened Belshazzar. They concluded he was writing contrary things against them, writing their doom. Happy they who have no reason to be afraid of Christ’s writing! Secondly, However, what he said, frightened them, by sending them to their own consciences; he showed them to themselves, and they were afraid; and when they stood up, was written so as not to be oblitered, and to be shown to the world, and shame them before men, and therefore they thought it best to withdraw. They went out one by one, that they might go out softly, and not be a noisy and disturb Christ:
they got them away by stealth, as people being ashamed steal away when they fear in battle, 2 Sam.
19. 3. The order of their departure, as we see of, beginning at the elders, or in the order of age; they were the first aware of the discovery that they were in of being put to the blush. And if the elder point the field, and retreat incredulously, no marvel if the younger follow them. Now see here
1. The force of the word of Christ for the conviction of sinners. They which heard it, were convicted by their own consciences. Conscience is God's deputy in the soul, and one word from him will set it to work, Heb. 4. 12. Those that had been old in adulteries, and long fixed in a proud opinion of themselves, the eldest even of them, were here startled by the word of Christ; even Scribes and Pharisees, who were most coveted of themselves, by the very letter of Christ's word are made to retire with shame.

2. The folly of sinners under these convictions, which appears in these Scribes and Pharisees. (1.) It is folly for those that are under convictions, to make it their principal care to avoid shame, as Judas, (Gen. 38. 23.) lest we be ashamed. Our care should be more to save our souls than to save our credit. Soul evidenced his hypocrisy, when he said, I have sinned, yet now honour me, I pray thee. There is no way to get the honour and comfort of penitents, but by taking the shame of penitents.

(2. It is folly for those that are under conviction, to contrive how to shift off their convictions, and to get rid of them. The Scribes and Pharisees had the wound opened, and now they should have been declaring it; they were ashamed, they might have been healed, but that was the thing they dreaded and declined. (3.) It is folly for those that are under convictions to get away from Jesus Christ, as these here did, for he is the only one that can heal the wounds of conscience, and speak peace to us. Those that are convicted by their consciences, will be condemned by their Judge, if they be not justified by their Lord, and will they then go from him? To whom will they go?

Note. Those whose cause is brought before our Lord Jesus, will never have occasion to remove it into any other court, for he is the only judge of heaven and earth. The law which doth not serve us, and calls for judgment against us, is by the gospel of Christ made to withdraw, its demands are answered, and its clamours silenced, by the blood of Jesus. Our cause is lodged in the gospel-court; we are left with Jesus alone, it is with him only that we have now to deal, for to him all judgment is committed; let us therefore secure our interest in him, and we are in no danger. Let his gospel rule us, and it will infallibly save us.

[6.] Here is the conclusion of the trial, and the issue it was brought to; (v. 10, 11.) Jesus lifted up himself, and he saw none but the woman. Though Christ may seem to take no notice of what is said and done, but leave it to the contending sons of men to deal it among themselves, yet, when the hour of their own judgment, he will no longer keep silence. When David had appealed to God, he prayed, Lift up thyself, Ps. 7. 6. and 94. 2. The woman, it is likely, stood trembling at the bar, as one doubtful of the issue. Christ was without sin, and might cast the first stone; but though none more severe than he against sin, for he is infinitely just and holy, none more compassionate than he to sinners, for he is infinitely loving, he will find him so, now that she stands upon her deliverance.

Here is the method of the courts of judicature ob served:

First, The prosecutors are called; Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee? But not that Christ knew where they were; but he asked, that he might shame them who declined his judgment, and encourage her who resolved to abide by it. St. Paul's challenge is like this, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Where are these their accusers? The accuser of the brethren shall be fairly cast out, and all indictments leg- and no acquittal quitted.

Secondly, They do not appear when the question was asked; Hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. She speaks respectfully to Christ, calls him Lord, but is silent concerning her prosecutors, says nothing in answer to that question which concerned them, Where are those thine accusers? She does not triumph in their retreat, or insist over them as witnesses against themselves, or, guilty against her. If we hope to be forgiven by our Judges, we must forgive our accusers: and if their accusations, how invidious soever, were the happy occasion of awaking our consciences, we may easily forgive them this wrong. But she answered the question which concerned herself, Has no man condemned thee? True penitents find it enough to give account of their own consciences, and will not undertake to give account of other people.

Thirdly, The prisoner is therefore discharged; Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more. Consider this,

1. As her discharge from the temporal punishment; "If they do not condemn thee to be stoned to death, neither do I." Not that Christ came to deliver the women from the stoning of his sword of justice, or, that it is his will that capital punishments should not be inflicted on malefactors; so far from that, the administration of public justice is established by the gospel, and made subservient to Christ's kingdom; By me kings reign. But Christ would not condemn this woman. (1.) Because it was none of his business, he was no judge or divider, and therefore would not intermeddle in secular affairs. His kingdom was not of this world. Tractent fabrilia fabri; Let every one act in his own province. (2.) Because she was prosecuted by those that were more guilty than she, and could not for shame insist upon their demand of justice against her. This law appointed the hands of the witnesses to be first upon the criminal, and afterward the hands of all the people, so that if they could not get a stoning, it might be got by worse. The justice of God, in inflicting temporal judgments, sometimes takes notice of a comparative righteousness, and spares those who are otherwise obnoxious, when the punishing of them would gratify those that are worse than they, Deut. 32. 26. 27. But when Christ dismissed her, it was with this caution, Go, and sin no more. Impunity emboldens malefactors to proceed and stand before the Judge who, if they have found means to escape the edge of the law, need to double their watch, lest Satan get advantage; for the fairer the escape was, the fairer the warning was to go and sin no more. They who help to save the life of a criminal, should, as Christ here, help to save the soul with this caution.

2. As her discharge from the eternal punishment. By Christ's SM. Life, He is, in effect, to say, I do forgive thee; and the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, and could upon good grounds give this absolution; for as he knew the hardiness and impertinent hearts of the prosecutors, and therefore said that which would confound them, so he knew the tenderness and sincere repentance of the prisoner, and therefore said that which would comfort her, as he did to that woman who was a sinner, such a sinner as this, who was likewise looked upon with disdain by a Pharisee; (Luke 7. 48.) Thy sins are forgiven thee, go in peace. So here
Neither do I condemn thee. Note, (1.) They are truly happy, whom Christ doth not condemn, for his discharge is a sufficient answer to all other challenges, they are alloram monjudges—before an un rashoned judge. (2.) Christ will not condemn those, who, though they have sinned, will go and sin no more. Ps. 85. 8. Isa. 55. 7. He will not take the advantage he has against us for our former rebellions, if we will but lay down our arms and return to our allegiance. (3.) Christ's favour to us in the re mission of the sins that are past, should be a pre vailing argument with us to go and sin no more, Rom. 6. 1, 2. Will not Christ condemn thee? Go then and sin no more.
12. Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. 13. The Pharisees therefore said unto him, Thou bearest record of thyself: thy record is not true. 14. Jesus answered and said unto them, Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true: for I know wherein I came, and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I come, and whither I go. 15. Ye judge after the flesh; I judge no man. 16. And yet if I judge, my judgment is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent me. 17. It is also written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true. 18. I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me beareth witness of me. 19. Then said they unto him, Where is thy Father? Jesus answered, Ye neither know me, nor my Father: if ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also. 20. These words spake Jesus in the treasury, as he taught in the temple: and no man laid hands on him; for his hour was not yet come.

The rest of the chapter is taken up with debates between Christ and contradicting sinners, who cal vill at the most gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth. It is not certain whether these dis putes were the same day that the adulteress was discharged, it is probable that they were, for the evangelist mentions no other day, and takes notice (v. 2.) how early Christ began that day's work. Though those Pharisees that accused the woman, were absconded, yet there were other Pharisees, (v. 13.) to confront Christ, who had brass enough in their foreheads to keep them in countenance, though some of their party were put to such a shameful retreat; nay perhaps that made then the more in dustrious to pick quarrels with him, to retrieve, if possible, the reputation of their baffled party.

In these verses, we have,
1. A great doctrine laid down, with the application of it.
   1. The doctrine is, That Christ is the Light of the world; (v. 12.) Then spake Jesus again unto them; though he had spoken a great deal to them, to little purpose, and what he had said was opposed, yet he spake again, for he speaketh once, ye take. They had turned a deaf ear to what he had said, and yet he spake again to them, saying, I am the Light of the world. Note, Jesus Christ is the Light of the world. One of the nabhics with, Light, is the name of the Messiah, as it is written, Dan. 2. 22. And Light dwelleth with him. God is Light, and Christ is the Image of the invisible God; God is light, Light of lights. He was expected to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, (Luke 2. 32.) and so the Light of the world, and not of the Jewish church only. The visible light of the world is the sun, and Christ is the Sun of righteousness. Observe, that the whole world, so does one Christ, and no more. Christ's being the Light, speaks, (1.) What he is in himself—most excellent and glorious. (2.) What he is to the world—the Fountain of light, enlivening every man. What a dungeon would the world be without the sun? So would it be without Christ, by whom light came into the world, ch. 2. 9.
2. The inference from this doctrine is, He that followeth me as a traveller follows the light in a dark night, shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. If Christ be the Light, then,
   (1.) It is our duty to follow him, to submit ourselves to his conduct, and in every thing take direc tion from him, in the way that leads to happiness. Men follow false lights—ignorant, that lead them to destruction. Mark, none of these Christ is the Light of the world. It is not enough to look at this Light, and to be zealous upon it, but we must follow it, believe in it, and walk in it, for it is a light to our feet, not our eyes only.
   (2.) It is the happiness of those who follow Christ, that they shall not walk in darkness. They shall not be left destitute of those instructions in the way of truth, which are necessary to keep them from distressing error, and those directions in the way of duty, which are necessary to keep them from doing sin. They shall have the light of life, that knowledge and enjoyment of God, which will be to them the light of spiritual life in this world, and of everlasting life in the other world, where there will be no death nor darkness. Follow Christ, and we shall undoubtedly be happy in both worlds. Follow Christ, and we shall follow him to heaven.

II. The objection, which the Pharisees made against this doctrine, and it was very trilling and frivolous; (v. 13.) Thou bearest record of thyself: thy record is not true. In this objection they went upon the suspicion which we commonly have of men's self-commendation, which is concluded to be the native language of self-love, such as we are all ready to condemn in others, but few are willing to reject it in themselves. But in this case the objection was very unjust, for, 1. They had no proper ground for the objection, and a diminution to the credibility of his doctrine, which in the case of one who introduced a divine revelation was necessary and unavoidable. Did not Moses and all the prophets bear witness of themselves, when they avouched themselves to be the God's messengers? Did not the Pharisees ask John Baptist, What saivest thou of thyself? 2. They overlooked the testimony of all the other witnesses, which had corroborated the testimony he bore of himself. Had he only borne record of himself, his testimony had indeed been suspicious; and the belief of it might have been suspended; but his doctrine was attested by more than two or three credible witnesses, enough to establish every word of it.

III. Christ's reply to this objection, v. 14. He does not retort upon them, as he might, ("You pre ress yourselves to be believe on account of, but your witness is not true,";) but plainly vindicates himself, and though he had waved his own testimony, (ch. 5. 31.) yet here he abides by it, that it did not derogate from the credibility of his other proofs, but was necessary to show the force of them. He is the Light of the world, and it is the properiy of light to be self-evidencing. First principles prove them selves.

He urge three things, to prove that his testi mony, though of himself, was true and ient.
1. That he was conscious to himself of his own authority, and abundantly satisfied in himself concerning it. He did not speak as one at uncertainty, nor propose a disputable notion, which he himself hesitated about, but declared a decree, and gave such an account of himself as he would abide by; I know whence I come and whither I go. He was fully apprized of his own undertaking from first to last; knew whose errand he went upon, and what his success would be; he knew what he was before his manifestation to the world, and what he should be after; that he came from the Father, and was going to him, (ch. 16, 28.) came from glory, and was going to the Father's glory, (John 12, 49.) This is a mark of godliness, that though the world know them not, as it knew him not, yet they know whence their spiritual life comes, and whither it tends, and go upon sure grounds.

2. That they were very incompetent judges of him, and of his doctrine, and not to be regarded.

(1.) Because they were ignorant, willingly and resolvedly ignorant. Ye cannot tell where I come, and whither I go. To what purpose is it to talk with those who know nothing of the matter, nor desire to know? He had told them of his coming from heaven and returning to heaven, but it was foolishness to them, they received it not, it was what the brutish man knows not, Ps. 92. 6. They took upon them to judge of that which they did not understand, which lay quite out of the reach of their acquaintance.

(2.) Because they were partial; (v. 13.) Ye judge after the flesh. When fleshly wisdom gives the rule of judgment, and outward shows and appearances only are given in evidence, and the case decided according to them, then men judge after the flesh, and when the consideration of a secular interest turns the scale in judging of spiritual matters, when we judge in favour of that which pleases the carnal mind, and recommends us to a carnal world, we judge after the flesh; and the judgment cannot be right, when the rule is wrong. The Jews judged of Christ and his go ing by outward appearances, and because he appeared so mean, thought it impossible he should be the Light of the World; as if the sun under a cloud were no sun.

(3.) Because they were partial and unfair toward him, intimating in that, I judge no man; I neither make nor meddle with your political affairs, nor does my doctrine or practice at all entrench upon, or interfere with, your civil rights or secular powers. He thus judged no man; now if he did not war after the flesh, it was very unreasonable for them to judge him after the flesh; and to treat him as an offender against the civil government. Or, I judge no man, that is, not now in my first coming, that is deferred till I come again. ch. 3. 17. Prima dispensatio Christi mediocritate est, non judiciis—The first coming of Christ was for the purpose of administering, not justice, but medicine.

3. That his testimony of himself was sufficiently supported and corroborated by the testimony of his Father, with whom, and for whom, (v. 16.) And if I judge, my judgment is true; because He did in his doctrine and life, (ch. 9. 38.) though not politically. Consider him then, (1.) As a Judge, and his own judgment was valid; if I judge, I who have authority to execute judgments, to whom all things are delivered, I who am the Son of God, and have the Spirit of God, if I judge, my judgment is true, of incontestable rectitude and uncontrollable authority. Rom. 2. 23. if I should judge, my judgment is true, and then you would be condemned. But the judgment-day is not yet come, you are not yet to be condemned, but stored, and therefore now I judge no man, so Chrysostom.

Now that which makes his judgment unexceptionable, is,

[1.] His Father's concurrence with him; I am not alone, but I and the Father. He had the Father's concurring counsel to direct; as he was with the Father above the world, in forming the counsels, so the Father was with him in the world, in furnishing and executing these counsels, and never left him in a state of controversy without advice. Isa. 11. 2. All the counsels of justice (and of war too) were given him both, Zech. 6. 13. He had also the Father's concurrent power to authorize and confirm what he did; see Ps. 69. 21; Jer. 42. 1. He did not act upon his own mere will, as thevd and carnal man does, but by the Father's, and by the authority aforesaid, ch. 3. 17. and 14. 9. 10.

[2.] His Father's commission to him; I am the Father that sent me. Note, God will go along with them that he sends; see Exod. 3. 10, 12. Come, and I will send thee, and certainly I will be with thee. Now, if Christ had a commission from the Father, and the Father's presence with him in all his administrations, no doubt his judgment was true and valid; no exception lay against it, no appeal lay from it.

(2.) Look upon him as a Witness, and now he appeared no otherwise, (having not as yet taken the throne of judgment,) and as such his testimony was true and unexceptionable: this he shews, (v. 17, 18.)

But he quotes a maxim of the Jewish law, v. 17. that the testimony of two men is true. Not as if it were always true in itself, for many a time a hand was joined in hand to hear a false testimony, 1 Kings 21. 10. But it is allowed as sufficient evidence, upon which to ground a verdict, (verum dictum,) and if nothing appear to the contrary, it is taken for granted to be true. Reference is here had to that law, (Deut. 17. 6.) If the mouth of two witnesses shall he that is worthy of death, he be to death. And see Deut. 19. 15. Numb. 35. 30. It is in favour of life, that in capital causes two witnesses were required, as with us in case of treason. See Heb. 6. 18.

Secondly, He applies this to the case in hand; (v. 18.) I am one that hear witness of myself. Behold two witnesses? Though in human courts, where judgment is required, the criminal or candidate is not admitted to be judge of his own cause, in a matter purely divine, which can be proved only by a divine testimony, and God himself must be the Witness, if the formality of two or three witnesses he insisted on, there can be no other than the eternal Father, the eternal Son of the Father, and the eternal Spirit. Now if the testimony of two distinct persons, that are men, and therefore may deceive, or be deceived, is conclusive, much more ought the testimony of the Son of God concerning himself, backed with the testimony of his Father concerning him, to command assent; see 1 John 5. 7. 8—11.

Now this proves, not only that the Father and the Son are two distinct Persons, (for their respective testimonies are here spoken of as the testimonies of two several persons,) but that these two are one, not only one in their testimony, but equal in power and glory, and therefore the same in substance. St. Austin here takes occasion to caution his hearers against Sabellianism on the one hand, which confounded the persons in the Godhead, and Arianism on the other, which denied the Godhead of the Son and Spirit. Alias est filius, et alius fater, non tamens abhii, sed hoc ipsum est patet, et fiius, scilicet Deus Filius, et Deus Patre in Domino. The Son is one Person, and the Father is another; they do not, however, constitute two Beings, but the Father is the same Being that the Son is, that is, the only true God. Tract. 36. in Ioann.

Christ here speaks of himself and the Father 2
Witnesses to the world, giving in evidence to the reason and conscience of the children of men, whom he deals with as men. And these Witnesses to the world now, will in the great day be witnesses against those that perish in unbelief, and their word will judge the quick and the dead.

This was the sum of the first conference between Christ and these carnal Jews; in the conclusion of which, we are told how their tongues were let loose, and their hands tied.

1. How their tongues were let loose, (such was the malice of hell) to cavil at his discourse, ver. 19. Though in what he said there appeared nothing of human policy or artifice, but a divine sincerity, yet they see themselves to cavil advantage with him. None so incurably blind, as those that resolve they will not see.

Observe, (1.) How they evaded the conviction with a cavil; Then said they unto him, Where is thy Father? They might easily have understood, by the tenor of this and his other discourses, that when he spake of his Father, he meant no other than God himself; yet they pretend to understand him of a common person; and since he appealed to his testimony, they bid him call his witness, and challenge him, if he could, to produce him. Where is thy Father? Thus, as Christ said to them, (ver. 15.) they judge after the flesh. Perhaps they hereby intend a reflection upon the meanness and obscurity of his family; Where is thy Father? that he should be fit to give evidence in such a case as this? Thus they turn it off with a taunt, when they could not resist the wisdom and spirit with which he spake.

(2.) How he evaded the cavil with a further correction; he did not tell them where his Father was, but charged them with wilful ignorance; Ye know me not, nor my Father. It is no purpose to discourse to you about divine things, who talk of them as blind men do of colours. Poor creatures! ye know nothing of the matter.

[1.] He charges them then with ignorance of God: Ye know not my Father. and Judah was God known, (Ps. 110. 1.) they had some knowledge of him as the God that made the world, but their eyes were darkened that they could not see the light of his glory shining in the face of Jesus Christ. The little children of the christian church know the Father, know him as a Father; (1 John 2. 13.) but these rulers of the Jews did not, because they would not, so know him.

[2.] He shews them the true cause of their ignorance of God; If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also. The reason why men are ignorant of God, is, because they are unacquainted with Jesus Christ. Did we know Christ, First, in knowing him we should know the Father, whose Person he is the express image of, ch. 14. 9. Christ isom proveth hence the Godhead of Christ, and his equality with his Father. We cannot say, (Jer. 31. 2.) He that know a man, knows an angel; or, (He that knows a creature, knows the Creator;) but we may say, (He that knows Christ, knows the Father.) Secondly, by him we shall be instructed in the knowledge of God, and introduced into an acquaintance with him. If we knew Christ better, we should know the Father better; but where the christian religion is slighted and opposed, natural religion will soon be lost and laid aside. Devils make ways for themselves to become vain in their imaginations concerning God, that will not learn of Christ.

2. See how their hands were tied, though their tongues were thus let loose; such was the power of Heaven to restrain the malice of hell. These words spake Jesus, these bold words, these words of conviction and reproof, in the treasury, an apartment of the temple, where, to be sure, the chief priests, whose gain was their godliness, were mostly resident, attending the business of the revenue. Christ taught in the temple, sometimes in the part, sometimes in another, as he saw occasion. Now the pursuers who had so great a concern in the temple, and he keel upon it as their demesne, might easily, with the assistance of their unjustities that were at their beck, either have seized him, and exposed him to the rage of the mob, and that punishment which they called the beating of the rebels; or, at least have silenced him, and stopped his mouth there, as Amon, though tithered in the land of Judah, was forbidden to prophesy in the king's chapel, Amos 7. 12. 13. Yet even in the temple, where they held him in their realm, We man laid hands on him, for his hour was not yet come. See here, (1.) The restraint laid upon his persecutors by an invisible power; none of them durst meddle with him. God can set bounds to the wrath of men, as he does to the waves of the sea; let us not therefore fear danger in the way of duty. For God hath Satan and all his instruments in a chain. (2.) The reason of this restraint; His hour was not yet come. The frequent mention of this, intimates how much the time of our departure out of this vale of tears depends upon the fixed counsel and decree of God. It will come, it is coming; not yet come, but it is at hand. Our enemies cannot hasten it any sooner, nor our friends delay it any longer, than the time appointed of the Father; which is very comfortable to every good man, who can look up and say with pleasure, My times are in thy hands; and better there than in our own. His hour was not yet come, because his work was not done, nor his testimony finished. To all God's purposes there is a time.

21. Then said Jesus again unto them, I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins; whither I go, ye cannot come. 22. Then said the Jews, Will he kill himself? Because he saith, Whither I go, ye cannot come. 23. And he said unto them, Ye are from beneath; I am from above; ye are of this world; I am not of this world. 24. I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins; for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins. 25. Then said they unto him, Who art thou? And Jesus saith unto them, Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning. 26. I have many things to say and to judge of you; but he that sent me is true; and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of him. 27. They understood not that he spake to them of the Father. 28. Then said Jesus unto them, when ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things. 29. And he that sent me is with me; the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him. 30. As he spake those words, many believed on him.

Christ here gives fair warning to the careless unbelieving Jews, to consider what would be the consequence of their infidelity, that they might prevent it before it was too late; for he spake words of terror as well as words of grace. Observe here,
I. The wrath threatened; (v. 21.) Jesus said again unto them that which might be likely to do them good. He continued to teach in kindness to those few who received his doctrine, though there were many that resisted it, which is an example to ministers to go on with their work, notwithstanding opposition, because of what they have in hand.

Here note, 1. Christ's voice; he had pity upon the offers of his grace, and they had not danced; now he mourns to them in the denunciations of his wrath, to try if they would lament. He said, I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins. Whither I go ye cannot come. Every word is terrible, and speaks spiritual judgments, which are the sorest of all others; worse than war, pestilence, and famine; and that which the Old Testament prophets denounced.

Four things are here threatened against the Jews. 1. Christ's departure from them; I go my way, that is, "It shall not be long before I go; you need not take so much pains to drive me from you, I shall go of myself." They said to him, Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways; and they took up stones to stone him, but he withdrew from them.

I. The glory is gone, our defence is departed, when Christ goes. Christ frequently warned them of his departure before he left them; he bid often farewell, as one loath to depart, and willing to be invited, and that would have them stir up themselves to take hold on him.

2. Their enemy to the true Messiah, and their foes less and the cursed ingenuity of the false Messiah when he was gone away, which were both their sins and their punishments: Ye shall seek me, which speaks either, (1.) Their enmity to the true Christ; "Ye shall seek to ruin my interest, by persecuting my doctrine and followers, with a fruitless design to root them out." This was a continual vexation and torment to themselves, made them incurably ill-natured, and brought wrath upon the other (God's and our own) to the utmost term.

II. Their ruin, as follows, (2.) Their ruin was to be after false Christ: "Ye shall continue your expectations of the Messiah, and be the self-perplexing seekers of a Christ to come when he is already come;" like the Sadducees, who, being struck with blindness, wearied themselves to find the door, Rom. 9. 31, 32.

3. Their final impenitency; Ye shall die in your sins, without an error in all our English Bibles, even in the old bishops' translation, and that of Geneva, (the Rhenish only excepted,) for all the Greek copies have it in the singular number, εἰς τῶν ἐννομίων — in your sin, so all the Latin versions; and Calvin has a note upon the difference between this and v. 24. where it is plural, τις σωσίας, that here it is meant especially of the sin of unbelief, in honor prevatio — in this sin of yours. Note, Christ that live in unbelief, are for ever undone, if they die in unbelief. Or it may be understood in general, Ye shall die in your iniquity, as Ezek. 3. 19. and 33. 9. Many that have long lived in sin, by a timely repentance, through grace, are saved from dying in sin; but for those who go out of this world of probation into that of retribution under the guilt of sin unpardoned, and the power of sin unbroken, there is no return. Salvation itself cannot save them. Job 20. 11. Ezek. 32. 37.

4. Their eternal separation from Christ and all happiness in him; Whither I go ye cannot come. When Christ left the world, he went to a state of perfect happiness: he went to paradise, thither he took the penitent thief with him, that did not die in his sins; but the impenitent not only shall not come to him, but are left behind. Note, Salvation itself cannot save, for heaven would not be heaven to those that die unsanctified, and unmeet for it. Ye cannot come, because we have no right to enter into that Jerusalem, Rev. 22. 14. Whither I go ye cannot come, to fetch me thence, so Dr. Whitby; and the same is the comfort of all good christians, that, when they are got to heaven, they will be out of the reach of their enemies' malice.

II. The use they made of this threatening. Instead of trembling at this word, they bantered it, and turned it into ridicule; (v. 22.) Will he kill himself? See here, 1. What slight thoughts they had of Christ's threatenings; they could make themselves and one another merry with them, as those that mocked the messengers of the Lord, and turned the buffetings of the word of the Lord into a by-word, and fresque upon frese, line upon line, into a merry song. Isa. 30. 1. But of his enemies, let your hands be made strong, 2. What ill thoughts they had of Christ's meaning, as if he had an inhuman design upon his own life, to avoid the indignities done him, like Saul. This is indeed (say they) to go whither we cannot follow him, for we will never kill ourselves. Thus they make him not only such a one as themselves, but worse; yet in the calamities brought by the Romans upon the Jews, many of them in discontent and despair did kill themselves. They had put a much more favourable construction upon this word of his; (ch. 7. 34, 35.) Will he go to the dispersed Gentiles? But see how indulged malice grows more and more malicious.

III. The confirmation of what he said. 1. He had said, Whither I go ye cannot come, and here he says, and hence for us; (v. 23.) Ye are from beneath, I am from above; ye are of this world, I am not of this world. Ye are a πτωματικα — of those things which are beneath; noting, not so much their rise from beneath, as their affection to these lower things: "Ye are in with these things, as those that belong to them; how can ye come where I go, when your spirit and disposition are so directly contrary to mine?" See here, (1.) What the Spirit of the Lord Jesus was — not of this world, but from above. He was perfectly dead to the wealth of the world, the ease of the body, and the praise of men, and was wholly taken up with divine and heavenly things; and none shall be with him but those who are born from above, and have their conversation in heaven. (2.) How contrary to this the in-spirit was; Ye are from beneath, and this world is the province of a carnal worldly spirit; and what communion could Christ have with them?

2. He had said, Ye shall die in your sins, and here he stands to it; "Therefore I said, Ye shall die in your sins, because ye are from beneath," and he gives this further reason for it. If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins, v. 24. See here, (1.) What we are required to believe, that I am He, εἰς τῶν ἐννομίων — that I am, which is one of God's names, Ezek. 3. 14. It was the Son of God that there said, Εξωθήκ ας Εξωθήκ — I will be what I will be; for the delivering of Israel was but a figure of good things to come, but now he saith, I am He; he that should come, he that ye expect the Messias to be, that ye would have me to be to you. I am more than the bare name of the Messias: I do not only call myself such, but I claim the possession and fullness of the name, that I am the fullness of the name, and not only the name; that no other shall be Anything the name, which is the name of Christ's grace will be an argument of powerful enough, and none but the Spirit of Christ's grace will be an agent powerful enough, to turn us from sin to God, and that Spirit is given, and that doctrine given, to be effectual to those only who believe in Christ; so that if Satan be not by faith dispossessed, he has a lease of the soul for its life; if Christ do not cure us, our case is desperate, and we shall die. [2.] Without faith we cannot be saved from the punishment of sin when we die, for the wrath of God remains upon them that believe not, Mark 16. 16. Unbelief is the damning sin, it is a sin against the remedy. Now this implies the great gospel-promise, If we believe that Christ is he, and receive him accordingly, we shall die in our sins. The law shall die in your sins, for we are all under the judgment of the law; but the gospel is a dispensation of the obligation, upon condition of believing; the curse of the law is exalted and annulled to all that submit to the grace of the gospel; believers die in Christ, in his love, in his arms, and so are saved from dying in their sins.

IV. Here is a further discourse concerning himself, occasioned by his requiring faith in himself as the condition of salvation, v. 23—29. Observe, 1. The question which the Jews put to him; (v. 25.) Who art thou? This they asked tamely, and not with any desire to be instructed. He had said, Ye must believe that I am he. By his not saying expressly who he was, he plainly intimated that in his person he was such a one as could not be described by any, and in his office such a one as was expected by all that observed for preparation in Israel; yet this awful manner of speaking, which had so much significance in it, they turned to his reproach, as if he knew not what to say of himself: Who art thou, that we must with an implicit faith believe in thee, that thou art some mighty One: we know not who, or what, nor are worthy to know?

2. His answer to this question, wherein he directs them how they may be saved. He refers himself to what he had said all along: Do you ask who I am? Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning. The original here is a little intricate, Είπαν δὲ γι' αὐτόν Μοί ῥητά καὶ διδόσατε, which some read thus; I am the beginning, which also I speak unto you. So Austin takes it, Christ is called Εἰκὼν τοῦ Βασιλέως, that is, the light of the world, and that by our Lord's discourses. Those who object that it is the access-giver, and who therefore not properly answering to σφόν δὲ, must undertake to construe by grammatical-rules that parallel expression, Rev. 1, 8. 18. But most interpreters agree with our version. Do you ask who I am? [1.] I am the same that I said unto you from the beginning. In the scriptures of the Old Testament, the same that from the beginning was said to be the Saviour of the world, that should break the serpent's head, the same that in all the ages of the church was the Mediator of the covenant, and the Faith of the patriarchs. [2.] From the beginning of my public ministry. The account he had already given of himself, he resolved to solve by; he had declared himself to be the Son of God, (ch. 5. 17.) to be the Christ, (ch. 4. 26.) and the bread of life, and had prepared himself as the Mediator of the new covenant, which is necessary to our salvation, and to this he refers himself, as an an-er to their question. Christ is one with himself, what he had said from the beginning, he saith still. His is an everlasting gospel.

2. He refers himself to his Father's judgment, and the instructions he had from him; (v. 26.) I have many things, more than ye think of, to say, and in them to judge of you. But why should I trouble myself any further with you? I know very well that he who sent me, is true, and will stand by me, and bear me out. For I speak to the world (to which I am sent as an Ambassador) those things, all those, and those only, which I have heard of him.

Here, [1.] He suppresses his accusations of them. He has many things to charge them with, many evidences to produce against them: but for the present he had said enough. Note, Whatever discourses of sin are made to us, he that searches the heart, has more store to judge of us. 1 John 3. 20. How much more severe reckonings with sinners in this world, there is still a farther reckoning yet behind, Dunt. 35. 34. Let us learn hence not to be forward to receive, nor to deny all that we can say, even against the worst of men; we may have many things to charge them with, which yet it is better to leave unsaid, for what is it to us?

[2.] He enters his appeal against them to his Father: He that sent me, here two things comfort him.
First, That he had been true to his Father, and to the trust reposed in him: I speak to the world (for his gospel was to be preached to every creature) those things which I have heard of him, which were given for a Witness to the people, (Isa. 55. 4.) he was, Amen, a faithful Witness. Rev. 3. 14. He did not conceal his doctrine, but spake it to the World; being of common concern, it was to be of common notice; nor did he change or alter it, nor vary from the instructions he received from him that sent him. Secondly, That his Father would be true to him; true to the promise, that he would make him shine as a sharp sword; true to his own character of him, which was a decree, (Ps. 2. 7.) true to the threatenings of his wrath against those that should reject him. Though he should not accuse them to his Father, yet the Father, who sent him, would undoubtedly reckon with them, and would be true to what he had said, (Dunt. 18, 19.) that whenever would not hearken to that Prophet whom God would raise up, he would reject him; and if he would not, the Father would accuse them; For, saith he, he that sent me is true, and will pass judgment on them, though I should not be considered among the prophets. Thus when he lets fall the present prosecution, he binds them over to the judgment day, when it will be too late to dispute what they will not now he persuaded to believe, 1. as a deaf man, heard not, for the Spirit sealed them, Ps. 81. 15. 16.

Upon this the evangelist of Saviour's discourse, the evangelist has a melancholy remark; (v. 27.) They understood not that he spake to them of the Father. See here, 1. The power of Satan to blind the minds of them who believe not. Though Christ spake so plainly of God as his Father in heaven, yet they did not understand him, but thought he spake of some father he had in Galilee. Thus the plainest things are riddles and paradoxes to those who are blind and unconverted. 2. The reason why the threatenings of the word make so little impression upon the minds of sinners; it is because they understand not what they are engaged in. When Christ told them of the truth of that sent him, as a warning to them to prepare for his judgment, which is according to truth, they slighted the warning, because they understood not the nature of the judgment; it was, that they made themselves answerable to it. 3. He refers himself to their own convictions hereafter, v. 28, 29. He finds they will not understand him, and therefore adjoins the trial till further evidence should come in; they that will not receive, shall see, Isa. 6. 21. Now observe here,

[1.] What they should ere long be convinced of; We shall know that I am he, that Jesus is the true Messiah. Whether you will own it or no before men, you shall be made to know it in your own con-sciences, the convictions of which, though you may sting, yet you cannot baffle: that I am he, not that you represent me to be, but that I preach myself to be, that he should come. Two things they should believe of me.1st, That he did nothing of himself, not of himself as Man, of himself alone, of himself without the Father, with whom he was one. He does not hereby derogate from his own inherent power, but only denies their charge against him as a false Prophet, of which he said, that they prophesied out of their own bellies. Thence, logically, That as his Father taught him, so he spoke these things, that he was not of himself taught, but the Father taught. The doctrine he preached was the counterpart of the covenants of God, which he was intimately acquainted with; and in many other offerings they used the significant ceremony of hearing the sacrifice up, and moving it before the Lord; thus was Christ lifted up. Or it notes that his death was his exaltation: they that put him to death, thought thereby for ever to have sunk him and his interest, but it proved to be the advancement of both, ch. 12, 24. When the Son of man was crucified, the Son of man was glorified. Christ had called his dying his going away, here his being lifted up; thus the death of the saints, as it is their departure out of this world, so it is their advancement to a better. Observe, He speaks of these he is now talking with, as the instruments of his death; when ye have lifted up the Son of man: not that they were to be the priests to offer him up, (no, that was his own act, he offered up himself,) but they would be his betrayers and murderers; see Acts 2, 23. They lifted him up to the cross, but then he lifted himself up to his Father. Observe with what tenderness and mildness Christ here speaks to those who, he certainly knew, would put him to death, to teach us not to hate or seek the hurt of any, though we have reason to think they hate us, and seek our hurt.

Now Christ speaks of his death, as that which would be a powerful conviction of the infidelity of the Jews: When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know this. And why then? First, Because careless and unthinking people are often taught the worth of mercy by the want of it, Lord Jesus Christ. Thus, by putting Christ to death, would so awaken their consciences, that they would be put to serious inquiries after a Saviour, and then would know that Jesus was he who alone could save them. And so it proved, when, being told that with wicked hands they had crucified and slain the Son of God, they cried out, What shall we do? and were made to know immediately that Jesus was the Christ, Acts 2, 37. Thirdly, There would be such signs and wonders attending his death, and the lifting of him up from death in his resurrection, as would give a stronger proof of his being the Messiah, than any that had been yet given; and multitudes were hereby brought to believe that Jesus is the Christ, who had before contradicted and opposed him. Fourthly, By the death of Christ the pouring out of the Spirit was purchased, who would convince the world that Jesus is he, ch. 16, 7, 8. Fifthly, The judgments which the Jews brought upon themselves, by putting Christ to death, which filled up the measure of their iniquity, were a sensible conviction to the most hardened Jews, and a proof of Christ, and he often foretold that desolation as the just punishment of their invincible unbelief, and when it came to pass, (Io, it did come,) they could not but know that the great Prophet had been among them, Ezek. 33, 33.

[3.] What supported our Lord Jesus in the mean time, v. 21. He that sent me is with me, in my whole undertaking, for the Father (the Son, and first spring of this affair, from whom, as its great cause and author it is derived) hath not left me alone to manage it myself, nor deserted the business or me, in the prosecution of it, for I do always those things that please him. Here is, First, The assurance which Christ had of his Father's presence with him, which includes both a divine power going along with him to enable him for his work, and a divine favour manifested to him to encourage him in it. He that sent me is with me, Isa. 42, 1. Ps. 89, 21. This greatly emboldens our faith in Christ and our reliance upon his word, that he had, and knew he had, his Father with him, to confirm the word of his Servant. Isa. 44, 26. The other of our Lord's words, he has power to give eternal life, Matt. 10, 28, is here explained, and the confidence and safety of the believer, as well as the mission, and assist his management, and never left him alone, either solitary or weak; it also aggravated the wickedness of those that opposed him, and was an intimation to them of the premunire they run themselves into by resisting him, for thereby they were found fighters against God. How easily sooner they might think to crush him and run him down, let them know that he had one to back him, with whom it is the greatest madness that can be to contend.

Secondly, The ground of this assurance: For I do always those things that please him. That is, 1. That great affair which our Lord Jesus was continually engaged in, was an affair which the Father that sent him was highly well pleased with. His whole undertaking is called the pleasure of the Lord, Isa. 53, 10, because of the counsel of the eternal mind about it, and the complectency of the eternal mind in it. 2. His management of that affair was in nothing displeasing to his Father; in executing his commission he punctually observed all his instructions, and did in nothing vary from them; no mere man since the fall could say such a word as this (for many things his own will,) but could attest his mission, and assist his management, and never leave him alone, either solitary or weak. Lord Jesus never offended his Father in any thing, but, as became him, he fulfilled all righteousness, and this was necessary to the validity and value of the sacrifice he was to offer up; for if he had in any thing displeased the Father himself, and so had had any sin of his own to answer for, the Father could not have been pleased with him as a Propitiation for sin. (For many things his own will,) but became us as was perfectly pure and spotless. We may likewise learn hence, that God's servants may expect God's presence with them, when they choose and do those things that please him, Isa. 56, 4, 5.

V. Here is the good effect which this discourse of Christ is had upon some of his hearers; (v. 30.) As he spoke these words, there was an instant effect on him. Note, 1. Though multitudes perish in their unbelief, yet there is a remnant according to the election of grace, who believe to the saving of the soul. If Israel, the whole body of the people, be not gathered, yet there are those of them, in whom Christ will be glorious, Isa. 49, 5. This the apostle insists upon, to reconcile the Jews' rejection with the promises made unto their fathers. There is a remnant, Rom. 11, 5, 2. The words of Christ, and particularly his threatening words, are made effectual by the grace of God, to bring in poor souls to believe in him. When Christ told them that if they believed not, they should die in their sins, and never get to heaven, they thought it was time to look about them, Rom. 1. 16, 18. Sometimes there is a wide door opened, and an effective one, even there where there are many adversaries. Christ will carry on his work, though the heathen rage. The gospel gains great victories, sometimes, there where it meets with great opposition. Let this encourage God's ministers to preach the gospel, though it be with much contention, for they shall not labour in vain. Many may be secretly brought home to God by those enemies who are openly contending against him, and being called at by men of corrupt minds. Austin has an affectionate ejaculation in his lecture upon these words, Unam et me, locutus, multi credunt; non me, sed mecum in vo— I wish that when I speak, many may believe, not on me, but with me on him.

31. Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; 32. And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. 33. They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free? 34. Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever cometh unto the Father in the Son's name, is the servant of sin. 35. And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the Son abideth ever. 36. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. 37. I know that ye are Abraham's seed: but ye seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you.

We have, in these verses,

I. A comfortable doctrine laid down concerning the spiritual liberty of Christ's disciples, intended for the encouragement of those Jews which believed. Christ, knowing that his doctrine began to work upon some of his hearers, and perceiving that various did chide with them, who were the proud Pharisees, and addressed himself to those weak believers; then when he had denounced wrath against those that were hardened in unbelief, then he spake comfort to those few feeble Jews which believed in him. See here, 1. How graciously the Lord Jesus looks to those that tumble at his word, and are ready to receive it; he has something to say to those who have hearing ears, and will not pass by those who set themselves in his way, without speaking to them. 2. How carefully he cherishes the beginnings of grace, and meets those that are coming toward him. These Jews that believed, were yet but weak; but Christ did not therefore cast them off, for he gathers the lambs in his arms. When faith is in its infancy, he has knees to prevent it, breasts for it to suck, that it may not die from the cold.

In what he said to them, we have two things, which he saith to all that should at any time believe, (1.) The character of a true disciple of Christ; If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed. When they believed on him, as the great Prophet, they gave up themselves to be his disciples. Now, at their entrance into his school, he lays down this for a settled rule, that he would own none for his disciples but those that continued in his word.

[1.] It is implied that there are many who profess themselves Christ's disciples, who are not his disciples indeed, but only in show and name. [2.] It highly concerns those that are not strong in faith, yet to see it that they be sound in the faith, that, though they be not disciples of the highest form, yet that they be disciples indeed. [3.] Those who seem willing to be Christ's disciples, ought to be told that they had as good never come to him, unless they come with a resolution by his grace to abide by him. Let those who have thoughts of conversing with Christ, have no thoughts of reserving a power of revocation. Children are set to school, and bound apprentices only for a few years; but those only are bound who will stick to it all their lives. [4.] They only that continue in Christ's word, shall be accepted as his disciples indeed, that adhere to his word in every instance without partiality, and abide by it to the end without apostasy. It is wise—to dwell in Christ's word, as a man does at home, which is his centre and rest and refuge. Our converse with the word and conformity to it must be constant. If we continue disciples to the end, and not otherwise, we approve ourselves disciples indeed.

(2.) The privilege of a true disciple of Christ. Here are two precious promises made to those who thus approve themselves disciples indeed, v. 32. [1.] Ye shall know the truth, shall know all that truth which it is needful and profitable for you to know, and shall be more confirmed in the belief of it; shall know the word of God, which is truth. Even those who are true believers and disciples indeed, may be, and are, much in the dark concerning many things which they should know. God's children are but children, and understand and speak as children. Did we not need to be taught, we should not need to be disciples. Secondly, It is a very great privilege to know the truth; to know the particular truths which we are to believe, in their mutual dependences and connections, and the grounds of our belief. Here are the reasons of our belief; to know what is truth, and what proves it to be so. Thirdly, It is a gracious promise of Christ to all who continue in his word, that they shall know the truth as far as is needful and profitable for them. Christ's scholars are sure to be well taught.

[2.] The truth shall make you free. That is, First, The truth which Christ teaches tends to make men free. Isa. 61. 1. Justification makes us free from the guilt of sin, by which we are bound over to the judgment of God, and bound under amazing fears; sanctification makes us free from the bondage of corruption, by which we are restrained from that service which is perfect freedom, and constrained to that which is perfect slavery. Gospel-truth frees us from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and the more grievous burdens of the traditions of the elders. It makes us free from our spiritual enemies, free in the service of God, free to the privileges of sons, and free of the Jerusalem which is from above, which is free. Secondly, The knowing, entertaining, and believing, of this truth does actually make us free, free from prejudices, mistakes, and false notions, than which nothing more endures and entangles the soul, free from the domination of bad passions, and free from the enchainment to the government of itself, by reducing it into obedience to its Creator. The mind, by admitting the truth of Christ in the light and power, is vastly enlarged, and has scope and compass given it, is greatly elevated and raised above things of sense, and never acts with so true a liberty as when it acts under a divine command. 2 Cor. 3. 17. The enemies of Christianity pretend to free-thought, whereas really those are the freest reasonings, that are guided by faith, and those are men of free thought, whose thoughts are captivated and brought into obedience to Christ.

11. The offence which the carnal Jews took at this doctrine, and their objection against it. Though it were a doctrine that were disdained by the Pharisees, yet they cavilled at it, p. 33. The Pharisees, who grudged this comfortable word to them that believed, the standers by, who had no part or lot in this manner, they thought themselves reflected upon and affronted by the gracious charter of liberty granted to them that believed; and therefore, with a great deal of pride and envy, they answered that the liberty therefore are free-born, and have not lost our birth-right freedom, we were never in bondage to any man; how saith thou then, to us Jews, Ye shall be made free? 1. See here what it was that they were grieved at; it was an incitement in those words, Ye shall be made free; as if the Jewish church and nation were in some sort of bondage, which reflected on the Jews in general; and as if all that did not believe in Christ continued in that bondage, which reflected on the Pharisees in particular. Note, The privileges of the faithful are the envy and vexation of unbelievers, Ps. 112. 10.

2. See what it was that they alleged against it; whereas Christ intimated that they needed to be made free, (5.) Abraham's seed, and Abraham was a prince, and a great man; though we live in Canaan, we are not descended from Canaan, nor under his doom, a servant of servants shall he be; we hold in frank-almoign—free alms, and not in villenage—by a servile tenure. It is common for a sinking decaying family to boast of the glory and dignity of its ancestors, and to borse out of the greatness that they were in, and display it; so the Jews here did. But this was not all. Abraham was in covenant with God, and his children by his right, Rom. 11. 28. Now that covenant, no doubt, was a free charter, and invested them in privileges not consistent with a state of slavery, Rom. 9. 4. And therefore they think they had no occasion with so great a sum as they reckoned faith in Christ to be, to obtain this freedom, when they were thus free-born. Note, It is the common fault and folly of those that have pious parentage and education, to trust to it, and boast of it, as if it would atone for the want of real holiness. They were Abraham's seed, but what would that avail them, when we find one in hell, that could call Abraham Esther? Saving benefits are not, like common privileges, conveyed by entail to us and our issue, nor can a title to heaven be made by descent, nor may we claim as heirs at law, by making out our pedigree; our title is purely by purchase, not our own, but our Redeemer's for us, under certain provisos and limitations, which if we do not observe, it will not avail us to be Abraham's seed. Thus many, when they are pressed with the necessity of regaining from sin, turn it off with this. 2. We are the children of Abraham; but they are not all Israel, which are of Israel.

(1.) We were never in bondage to any man. Now observe, [1.] How false this allegation was. I wonder how they could have the confidence to say a thing in the face of a congregation, which was so notoriously untrue. Was not the seed of Abraham in bondage to the Egyptians? Were they not often in captivity, and their heads among captives, in the time of the judges? Were they not seventy years captives in Babylon? Nay, were they not at this time tributaries to the Romans, and though not in a personal, yet in a national bondage to them, and craving to be made free? And yet, to confront Christ, they have the impudence to say, We were never in bondage. Thus they would expose Christ to the ill-will both of the Jews, who were very jealous for the honour of their liberty, and of the Romans, who would not be thought to enslave the nations they conquered. [2.] How foolish the application was. Christ had spoken of a liberty wherein the truth would make them free, which must be mentioned spiritual liberty, for truth, as it is the enriching, so is the enfranchising, of the mind, and the enlarging of that from the captivity of error and prejudice; and yet they plead against the offer of spiritual liberty, that they were never in corporal bondage; as if because they were never in bondage to any man, they were never in bondage to any lust. Note, Carnal hearts are under a spiritual bondage to sin, and a liberty by Christ; tell them of wrong done to their precious souls, and the hazard of their eternal welfare, and you bring certain strange things to their ears; they say of it, as they did, Ezek. 20. 49. Doth he not speak parables? This here was much like the blind Nicodemus made about being born again.

III. 2. On Saviour's vindication of his doctrine from these objections, and the further explanation of it, v. 34—37. where he does these four things.

1. He shews that, notwithstanding their civil liberties, and their visible church-membership, it was possible that they might be in a state of bondage; (v. 34.) Whosoever commits sin, though he be of Abraham's seed, and never in bondage to any man, yet he is the servant of sin. Observe, Christ does not say, that they, though they were not in the falsehood of their present bondage, or their present present bondage, but further explains what he had said for their edification. Thus ministers should with meekness instruct those that oppose them, that they may recover themselves, not with passion provoke them to entangle themselves yet more. Now here,

(4.) The preface is very solemn: Verily, verily, I say unto you, an awful asseveration, which our Saviour often used, to command a reverent attention and a ready assent. The style of the prophets was, Thus saith the Lord, for they were faithful as servants; but Christ, being a Son, speaks in his own name, I say unto you, I the Amen, the faithful Witness; he pawns his veracity upon it. I say it to you, who boast of your relation to Abraham, as if that would save you. 2. The truth is of universal concern, though here delivered upon a particular occasion: Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin, and sadly wants to be made free. A state of sin is a state of bondage.

(1.) See who it is on whom this brand is fastened—Every man that committeth sin, is— binds every man. There is not a just man upon earth, that lives, and sins not; yet every one that sins, is not a servant of sin; for then God would have no servants; but he that makes sin, that makes choice of sin, prefers the way of wickedness before the way of holiness; (Jer. 44. 16, 17.) that makes a covenant with sin, enters into league with it, and makes a marriage with it; that makes covenanters with sin, and beholds it in a familiar eye, as a mother looks upon her sickly child, and yet that stigmatizes iniquity, and that makes a custom of sin, who walks after the flesh, and makes a trade of sin.

(2.) See what the brand is, which Christ fastens upon them that thus commit sin—he stigmatizes them, gives them a mark of servitude. They are servants of sin; imprisoned under the guilt of sin, under an arrest, in hold for it, constrained under sin, and they are subject to the power of sin. He is a servant of sin, he makes himself so, and is so accounted; he has sold himself to work wickedness; his lusts give law to him, he is at their beck, and is not his own master. He does the work of sin, supports its interest, and accepts its wages, Rom. 6. 16.

2. He saws them that being in a state of bondage, having a room in the house of God would not entitle them to the inheritance of sons: for (v. 33.) the servant, though he be in the house for a while, yet, being but a servant, abideth not in the house for ever; services (we say,) are no inheritances, they are but temporary, and not for a perpetuity; but the son of the family abideth ever. Now, (1.) This points primarily at the rejection of the Jewish church and nation. Israel had been God's son, his first-born; but they wickedly degenerated into a servile disposition, casted out to the world and the flesh, and therefore, by virtue of their bastardage, the children of the church-membership, Christ tells them that having thus made themselves servants, they should not abide in the house for ever. Jerusalem, by opposing the gospel of Christ, which proclaimed liberty, and adhering to the Sinaitic covenant, which gendered to bondage, after its term was expired, came to be in bondage with her children, (Gal. 4. 24, 35.) and therefore was unchristian and distantly cut off as the cursed son of the bond-woman, Gen. 21. 10. Chrysostom gives this sense of this place, "Think not to be made free from sin by the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, for Moses was but a servant, and had not that perpetual authority in the church, which the Son had; but if the Son make you free, it well," v. 36. But, (2.) It looks further, to the rejection of all that are the servants of sin, and receive not the adoption of the sons of God; though those unapt servants may be in God's house a while, as retainers to his family, yet there is a day coming, when the children of the bond-woman, and of the slave, shall be distinguished. True believers only, who are the children of the promise and of the covenant, are accounted free, and abide for ever in the house, as Isaac: they shall have a seat in the holy place on earth, (Heb. 10. 13.) and mansions in the holy place in heaven, ch. 14. 2.

3. He shews them the way of deliverance out of this state of bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God, Rom. 8. 21. The case of those that are the servants of sin, is sad, but thanks be to God it is not helpless, it is not hopeless. As it is the privilege of all the sons of the family, and their dignity above the servants, thought they be in the house for ever; so he who is the Son, the First-born, among many brethren, and the Heir of all things, he has a power both of manumission and of adoption; (v. 36.) if the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.

Note. (1.) Jesus Christ in the gospel offers us our freedom; he has authority and power to make free.
[1.] To discharge prisoners; this he does in justification, his charity satisfied for our guilt on which the gospel-offer is grounded, which is to all a conditional act of indemnity, and to all true believers, upon their believing, an absolute charter of pardon; moreover he makes satisfaction for our debt, for which we were by the law arrested and in execution. Christ, as our Saviour, or rather our Bail, (for he was not originally bound with us, but upon our insolvency bound for us,) compounds with the creditor, and pays the debt of the injured justice with more than an equivalent, takes the bond and judgment into his own hands, and gives them up cancelled to all that by faith and repentance give him (if I may so say) a counter security to save his honour harmless, and so they are made free; and from the debt, and every part thereof, they are for ever acquitted, exonerated, and discharged, and a general release sealed of all actions and claims; while against those who refuse to come up to these terms, the securities lie still in the Redeemer's hands, in full force. (2.) He has a power to rescue bondservants, and this he does in sanctification; by the powerful arguments of his grace, and the powerful operation of his Spirit, he breaks the power of corruption, in the soul, raffles the servant of sin, and binds the son of liberty, and virtue, and fortifies God's interest against sin and Satan, and so the soul is made free. (3.) He has a power to naturalize strangers and foreigners, and this he does in adoption. This is a further act of grace; we are not only forgiven and healed, but preferred, there is a charter of privileges as well as pardon; and thus the Son makes us free deacons of the kingdom of priests, the holy nation, the new Jew, the new Israel.

(2.) Those whom Christ makes free, are free indeed. It is not to, the word used, v. 31, for disciplines indeed, but free truly. It notes, (1.) The truth and certainty of the promise; the liberty which the Jews boasted of, was an imaginary liberty, they boasted of a false gift; but the liberty which Christ gives, is a certain thing, it is real, and has real effects; the servants of sin promise them nothing, but the bond-woman's children, but he has broken her bondman's bonds anew; but they cheat themselves, none are free indeed but those whom Christ makes free. (2.) It notes the singular excellency of the freedom promised; it is a freedom that deserves the name, in comparison with which all other liberties are no better than slaveries, so much does it turn to the honour and advantage of these that are made free here. It is a glorious liberty, for the servants of sin, have, (1.) no liberty at all; (2.) they cannot enjoy it; Satan, the Spirit of this world, is the principle of slavery to all mankind; (John 8. 44.) it is substance; (Prov. 8. 31.) while the things of the world are shadows, things that are not. He applies this to these unbelieving cavilling Jews. In answer to their boasts of relation to Abraham, v. 36. "I know very well that ye are Abraham's seed, but now we seek to kill me, and therefore have forfeited the honour of your relation to Abraham, because my word hath in you." Observe here,

(1.) The dignity of their election allowed them; "I know that ye are Abraham's seed, every one knows it, and it is your honour." He grants them what was true; and in what they said that was false, (that they were never in bondage to any,) he does not contradict them, for he studied to fit them, and not to provoke them, and therefore said that he would cleanse them; I know that ye are Abraham's seed. They boasted of their descent from Abraham, as that which aggrandiz'd their names, and made them exceeding honourable, whereas really it did but aggravate their crimes, and make them exceeding sinful. Out of their own mouths will he judge vain-glory hypocrites, who boast of their parentage and education; "Are ye Abraham's seed? Who then did you not treat in the manner of his faith and obedience? (v. 37.)

(2.) The disagreeableness of their practice with this dignity; "But ye seek to kill me." They had attempted it several times, and were now designing it, which quickly appeared, (v. 39.) when they took up stones to cast at him. Christ knows all the wickedness, not only which they do, but which they seek and design, and endeavour to do. To seek to kill any innocent man, is a crime black enough, but to cavil and imagine the death of him that was King of kings, is a crime which we want words to express the heinousness of.

(3.) The reason of this inconsistency; why were they that were Abraham's seed, so very invertebrate against Abraham's promised Seed, in whom they Here Christ and the Jews are still at issue; in

1. He here traces the difference between his sentiments and their's to a different rise and original;

(v. 38.) I speak that which I have seen with my Fa-

der and that which I have heard in my Father.

Here are two fathers spoken of, according to the two families, into which the sons of men are divided—

God and the devil, and without controversy these are contrary the one to the other.

1. Christ's doctrine was from heaven, it was copied out of the counsels of infinite wisdom, and the kind intentions of eternal love. (1.) I speak that which is not a plausible hypothesis, supported by probable arguments, but it is an exact counterpart of the incontestable truths lodged in the eternal mind. It was not only what he had heard from his Father, but what he had seen with him, when the counsel of peace

was between them both. Moses spake what he heard from God, but he might not see the face of God;

Paul had been in the third heaven, but what he had seen there, he could not tell; he must not utter; for it was Christ's prerogative to have seen what he spake,

and to speak what he had seen.

2. Their doings were from hell; “Ye do that which ye have seen with your father. Ye do, by your own works, father yourselves, for it is evident whom ye resemble, and therefore easy to find out your original.” As a child that is trained up with the words and fashions, and grows like him by an affected imitation as well as by a natural image, so these Jews, by their malicious opposition to Christ and the gospel, made themselves as like the devil as if they had in-dustiously set him before them for their pattern.

II. He takes off and answers their vain-glorious boasts of relation to Abraham and to God, as their fathers, and shews the vanity and falsehood of their preten

ditions.

1. They pleaded relation to Abraham, and he re-pied to that plea. They said, Abraham is our fa-ter, v. 39. In this they intended, (1.) To do honour to themselves, and to make themselves look great. They had forgotten the mortification given them by that acknowledgment prescribed them. (Deut. 28. 5.) A servant ready to perish was my father; and the charge exhibited against their degenerate ancestors

(whose steps they tred in, and not those of the first founder of the family,) thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite, Ezek. 16. 3. As it is common for those families that are sinking and going to decay, to boast most of their pedigree, so it is common for these churches that are corrupt and depraved, to value themselves upon their antiquity,

and the eminence of their first planters, Juda-

Tree, suit Iblum—We have been Trojans, and there once was Troy. (2.) They designed to cast an odium upon Christ, as if he reflected upon the patriarch

Abraham, in speaking of their father, as one they had learned evil from. See how they sought an occasion to quarrel with him.

He answers them with confidence, and overthrow-thereby this plea, and discovers the vanity of it by a plain and cogent argument;

“Abraham's children will do the works of Abraham, but ye do not do Abraham's works, therefore ye are not Abraham's children.”

[1.] The proposition is plain; “If ye were Abra-hem's children, ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham. Ye do the deeds of your father. Then said they to him, We are not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God. Jesus said unto them, If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me.

Why do ye not understand my speech? Even because ye cannot hear my word.

Why are ye of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it. And because I tell you the truth, ye believe me not. Which of you convinceth me of sin? And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God, heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God.
ham's children, such children of Abraham as could claim an interest in the covenant made with him and his seed, which would indeed put an honour upon you, then ye would do the works of Abraham, for to those only of Abraham's house, who kept the ways of the Lord, as Abraham did, would God perform what he had spoken," Gen. 18. 19. "Those only are reckoned as Abraham's seed, who walked in the steps of his faith and obedience, Rom. 4. 12. Though the Jews had their genealogies, and kept them exact, yet they could not by them make out their relation to Abraham, so as to take the benefit of the old entail. (per formam dom—according to the form of the gift,) unless they walked in the same spirit; good women's rights are not granted; they are not usque ad pedem. "Children may, and do, inherit the Wrath of God, while they are yet on earth."

1. They were not the sons of the bond-women, the Ishmaelites were; nor begotten in incest, as the Mobabites and Ammonites were. (Deut. 23. 3.) nor were they a spurious brood in Abraham's family, but Hebrews of the Hebrews, and being born in bountiful wealth, they might call God Father, who instituted that honourable estate in innocence; for a legitimate seed, not tainted with divorces or the plurality of wives, is called a seed of God, Mal. 2. 15. (2.) Others take it figuratively. They begin to be aware now, that Christ spoke of a spiritual not a carnal fatherhood, of the father of their religion; and so.

1. They deny themselves to be a generation of idolaters; "We are not born of fornication, and are not bastards, but legitimate sons; we have one Father, even God." (1 Cor. 4. 15.) Some take it literally. They were not the sons of the bond-women, the Ishmaelites were; nor begotten in incest, as the Mobabites and Ammonites were; (Deut. 23. 3.) nor were they a spurious brood in Abraham's family, but Hebrews of the Hebrews, and being born in bountiful wealth, they might call God Father, who instituted that honourable estate in innocence; for a legitimate seed, not tainted with divorces or the plurality of wives, is called a seed of God, Mal. 2. 15. (2.) Others take it figuratively. They begin to be aware now, that Christ spoke of a spiritual not a carnal fatherhood, of the father of their religion; and so.

2. They bestow themselves to be true worshippers of the true God. We have not many fathers, as the heathen had, gods many, and lords many, and yet were without God, as figured by the son of the people, has many fathers, and yet none certain; no, the Lord our God is one Lord and one Father, and therefore it is well with us. Note, Those flatter themselves, and put a damning cheat upon their own souls, who imagine that their profession of the true religion, and worshipping of the true God, will save them, though they worship not God in spirit and in truth, nor are true to their profession, owning nothing to the true God himself. Now our Saviour gives a full answer to this fallacious plea, (p. 42, 43.) and proves, by two arguments, that they had no right to call God Father.

First. They did not love Christ; "If God were your Father, you would love me. He had disproved their relation to Abraham by their going about to kill him; (p. 48.) but here he disproves their relation to his Father, by his being the true object of all their love. A man may pass for a child of Abraham, if he do not appear an enemy to Christ by gross sin; but he cannot approve himself a child of God, unless he be a faithful friend and follower of Christ. Note, All that have God for their Father, have a true love to Jesus Christ, an esteem of his person, a grateful sense of his love, a sincere affection to his cause and kingdom, a complacency in the salvation wrought out by him, and in the method and terms of it, and a care to keep his commandments, which is the arest evidence of our love to him. We are here in a state of probation, upon our trial how we will conduct ourselves to our Maker, and accordingly it will be with us in the state of retribution. God has taken various methods to prove us, and this was one; he sent his Son into the world, with sufficient proofs of his sonship and mission, concluding that all that called him, and who were the children of God, and bore the name of Christ, were welcome, who was the First-born among many brethren; see 1 John 5. 1. By this our adoption will be proved or disproved—Did we love Christ, or no? If any man do not, he is so far from being a child of God, that he is anathema, accursed, 1 Cor. 16. 22.

Now our Saviour proves that if they were God's children, they would love him; for, saith he, I proceed forth, and came from God. They will love him, for—

1. He was the Son of God; I proceeded forth from God. THIS means his divine Υἱός, or original from the Father, by the communication of the divine essence, and also the union of the divine ζύγον to his human nature; so Dr. Whitby. Now this could not but recommend him to the affections of all that were born of God. Christ is called the Beloved, because, being the beloved of the Father, he is certainly the Beloved of all the saints, Eph. 1. 6.

2. He was sent of God, came from him as an Ambassador to the world of mankind. He did not come of himself, as the false prophets, who had not either their mission or their message from God, Jer. 23. 21. Observe the emphasis he lays upon this, I came forth of the Father, 22. or rather, as he sent me; he had both his credentials and his instructions from God; he came to gather together in one the children of God, (ch. 11. 52.) to bring many sons to glory, Heb. 2. 10. And would not all God's children embrace with both arms a messenger sent from their Father on such errands? But these Jews made it appear that they were nothing akin to God, by their want of affection to Jesus Christ.

Secondly, They did not understand him. It was a sign that they did not belong to God's family, that they did not understand the language and dialect of the family; Ye do not understand my speech, v. 43. Christ's speech was divine and heavenly, but intelligible enough to those that were acquainted with the voice of Christ in the Old Testament; a voice that had made the word, but he sent me; he had both his credentials and his instructions from God; he came to gather together in one the children of God, (ch. 11. 52.) to bring many sons to glory, Heb. 2. 10. And would not all God's children embrace with both arms a messenger sent from their Father on such errands? But these Jews made it appear that they were nothing akin to God, by their want of affection to Jesus Christ.

And the reason why they did not understand Christ's speech made the matter much worse; even because ye cannot hear my word, that is, Ye cannot persuade yourselves to hear it attentively, impartially, and without prejudice, as it should be heard. The meaning of this cannot, is an obstinate will not; as the Jews could not hear Stephen, (Acts 7. 57.) nor Paul, Acts 22. 22. nor his Son, and his apostles, 1 Cor. 1. 24. The antipathy of men's corrupt hearts to the doctrine of Christ, is the true reason of their ignorance of it, and their errors and mistakes about it. They do not like it nor love it, and therefore they will not understand it; like Peter, who pretended he knew not what the damsel said, (Matt. 26. 70) when in truth he knew not what to say to it. Ye cannot hear my word, for ye have stopped your ears, (Ps. 8. 4, 5.) and God, in a way of righteous judgment, has made your ears heavy, Isa. 6. 10.

III. Having thus disproved their relation both to Abraham and to God, he comes next to tell them plainly who he was who was the father of the devil, v. 44. If they be not God's children, they are the devils', for God and Satan divide the world of mankind; the devil is therefore said to work in the children of disobedience, Eph. 2. 2. All wicked people are the devil's children, children of Brivity, (2 Cor. 6. 13.) the serpent's seed, (Gen. 3. 15.) children of the wicked one, Matt. 13. 38. They make wars, render, obey his commands, and follow his example. Idolaters said to a stock, Thou art my father, Jer. 2. 27.

This is a high charge, and sounds very harsh and horrid, that any of the children of men, especially the church's children, should be called children of the devil, and therefore our Saviour fully proves it.

1. By a general argument: The lusts of your father, ye will do, 50. (v. 44.) In the devil's lusts, the lusts which he would have you to fulfill; you gratify and please him, and comply with his temptations, and are led captives by him at his will and wav, you do those lusts which the devil himself fulfills. Fleshly lusts and worldly lusts the devil tempts men to; but, being a spirit, he cannot fulfill them himself. The peculiar lusts of the devil are pride, envy, wrath and malice, and such like things, his powers, and their corrupt reasonings; pride and envy, and wrath and malice; enmity to that which is good, and enlisting others to that which is evil; these are lusts which the devil fulfills, and these who are under the dominion of these lusts, resemble the devil, as the child does the parent. The more there is of contemplation, and curiosity, and secret complacency, in sin, the more it proceeds, and the more the sinner will do the devil's lusts. "The lusts of your father you delight to do," so Dr. Hammond; they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel.

2. By two particular instances, wherein they manifestly resembled the devil—murder and lying. The devil is an enemy to life, because God is the God of life, and life is the happiness of man; and an enemy to truth, because God is the God of truth, and truth is the bond of human society.

(1.) He was a murderer from the beginning, not from his own beginning, for he was created an angel of light, and had a first estate, which was pure and good, but from the beginning of his apostacy, which was soon after the creation of man. He was σάταν—homiades—a man-slayer. [1] He was a hater of man, and so in affection and disposition was a murderer of him. He has his name Satan, from Sinaab—Hatred. He maligns God's image upon man, envies his happiness, and earnestly desired his ruin, was an avowed enemy to the whole race. [2] He was man's tempter to that sin which brought death into the world, and so he was effectually the murderer of all mankind, which in Adam had but on name. The angel of light, the holder of souls, deceived them into sin, and by it slew them; (2 Cor. 11. 11.) poisoned man with the forbidden fruit, and, to aggravate the matter, made him his own murderer. Thus he was not only at the beginning, but from the beginning, which intimates that thus he has been...
ever since; as he began, so he continues, the murder of men by his temptations. The great tempter is the great destroyer. The Jews called the devil, the angel of death. [5.] He was the first wheel in the first murder that ever was committed by Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother; 1 John 3. 12. If the devil had not been very wring in Cain, he could not have done such an unnatural thing as to kill his own brother. Cain killing his brother by the instigation of the devil, the devil is called the murderer, which does not speak Cain’s personal guilt the less, but the devil’s the more, whose torments, we have reason to think, will be the greater when the time comes, for all that diawessness which he has drawn men into. See well. The devil is against the wills of the devil, and ever to hearken to him, (for he is a murderer, and certainly aims to do mischief, even when he speaks fair,) and to wonder that he who is the murderer of the children of men, should yet be, by their own consent, so much their master.

Now herein these Jews were followers of him, and murderers like him; murderers of souls, which they led blindfold into the ditch, and made the children of hell; sworn enemies to Christ, and now ready to be his betrayers and murderers, for the same reason that Cain killed Abel. These Jews were that seed of the serpent, that were to bruise
the heel of the Seed of the woman; Now ye seek to kill me.

Now he was a liar. A lie is opposed to truth, (1 John 2. 21.) and, accordingly, the devil is here described to be,

First, He is a deserter from truth; he abode not in the truth, did not continue in the purity and rectitude of his nature wherein he was created, but left his first state; when he degenerated from goodness, he departed from truth, for his apostasy was founded in a lie. The angels were the hosts of the Lord; those that fell, were not true to their Commander and Sovereign, they were not to be trusted, being charged with folly and delusion, Job 4. 18. By the truth here we may understand the revealed will of God concerning the salvation of man by Jesus Christ, the truth of which Christ was now preching, and which the Jews opposed; herein they did like their father the devil, who, seeing the honour put upon the human nature in the first Adam, and foreseeing the much greater honour intended it in the second Adam, would not be reconciled to that counsel of God, nor stand in the truth concerning it, but, from a spirit of pride and envy, set himself to resist it, and to thwart the designs of it; and so did these Jews here, as his children and agents.

Secondly, He is destitute of the truth; There is no truth in him. His interest in the world is supported by lies and falsehoods, and there is no truth, nothing
you can confide in, in him, nor in anything he says
or does. The notions he propagates concerning good and evil, are false and erroneous, his proofs are lying wonders, his temptations are all cheats; he has great knowledge of the truth, but having no affection to it, but on the contrary, being a sworn enemy to it, he did not choose to speak it. His interest in the world is supported by lies and falsehoods, and there is no truth, nothing
you can confide in, in him, nor in anything he says
or does. The notions he propagates concerning
good and evil, are false and erroneous, his proofs are lying wonders, his temptations are all cheats; he
has great knowledge of the truth, but having no affection to it, but on the contrary, being a sworn enemy to it, he

[2.] He is a friend and patron of lying; When he spakest a lie, he speaketh of his own. Three things are here said of the devil, with reference to the sin of lying.

First, That he is a liar; his oracles were lying oracles, his prophets lying prophets, and the images in which he was worshipped, teachers of lies; he tempted our first parents with a downright lie; all his temptations are carried on by lies, calling evil
good, and good evil, and promising impunity in sin;
he knows them to be lies, and suggests them with an intention to deceive, and so to destroy. When he now contradicted the gospel in the Seraphim and Pharsars, it was by lies, and when afterward he corrupted it in the man of sin, it was by strong delusions, and a great complicated lie.

Secondly, That when he speaks a lie, he speak-of his own, is παροιμία. It is the proper term of his generation, of his own creation, of his own invention. It is a false statement, a false word, put it into him. When men speak a lie, they borrow it from the devil, Satan fills their hearts to lie; (Acts 5. 3.) but when the devil speaks a lie, the model of it is of his own framing, the motives to it from himself, which speaks the desperate depth of diawesness into which these apostate spirits are sunk; as in their first deception they had no tempter, so in their last they have none.

Thirdly, That he is the father of every lie; not only of the lies which he himself suggests, but of those which others speak; he is the author and founder of all lies; when men speak lies, they speak from him, and as his mouth, they come originally from him, and bear his image. 2. He is the father of every lie; so it may understand God, who is the Father of Life. A deep truth, it is congruous to reason and natural light, to the order of our faculties, and the laws of society,
that we should speak truth; but the devil, the author of sin, the spirit that works in the children of disobedience, has so corrupted the nature of man, that the wicked are said to be estranged from the truth, speaking lies; (Ps. 58. 3.) he has taught them with their tongues to use deceit, Rom. 3. 15. He is the father of every lie; the are they, who betray them up in the way of lying, when they resemble and obey, and with whom all liars shall have their portion for ever. Christ having thus proved all murderers and all liars to be the devil’s children,
leaves it to the consciences of his hearers to say,
There art the men.

But he comes in the following verses to assist them in the application of it to themselves; he does not call them liars, but shews them that they were no friends to truth, and therein resembled him who abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him.

Two things he charges upon them,

1. That they would not believe the word of truth,
(1. 45.) ὡς γὰρ ἔφη Ἰησοῦς, ἐμοί δὲ ἐρωτήσω. Two was it may be taken. (1.) 'Though I tell you the truth, yet you will not believe me, (sai,) that I do so." Though he gave abundant proof of his commission from God, and his affection to the children of men, yet they would not believe that he told them the truth. Now was truth fallen in the street, and could not enter, Isa. 59. 14, 15. The greatest truths with some gained not the least credulity; for they rebelled against the light, Job 24. 13. Or, (2.) Re-cause I tell you the truth, (so we read it,) therefore you believe me not. They would not receive him, nor entertain him as a prophet, because he told them
some unpleasing truths, which they did not care to hear of; told them the truth concerning themselves and their own case, shewed them their faces in a glass that would not flatter them; therefore they would not believe a word he said. Miserable is the case of those to whom the light of divine truth is become a torment.

Now, to shew them the unreasonableness of their infidelity, he condescends to put the matter to this fair issue, v. 46. He and they being contrary, either he was in an error or they were. Now take it either way.

[3.] If he were in an error, why did not they convince him? The falsehood of professing prophets was discovered either by the ill tendency of their doctrines, (Deut. 13. 2.) or by the ill tenor of their conversation; Ye shall know them by their fruits;
but (sixth Christ) which of you, you of the Sanhedrim, that take upon you to judge of prophets, which of you convincest me of sin? They accused him of some of the worst of crimes—gluttony, drunkenness, blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking; confederacy with Satan, and what not. But they were all malicious groundless calumnies, and such as every one that knew, knew to be utterly false. When they had done their utmost by trick and artifice, subornation and perjury, to prove some crime upon him, the very judge that condemned him, owned he found no fault in him.

The sin he here challenges to convict him of, is, First, An inconsistent doctrine. They had heard him say, what he would teach any thing in the abstract or unwholesome, any contradiction, either of himself or of the scriptures, or any corruption of truth or manner insinuated by his doctrine? ch. 18. 20. Or, Secondly, An incongruous conversation. "Which of you can justly charge me with any thing, in word or deed, unbecoming a prophet? See the wonderful concordance of our Lord Jesus, that he demanded not credit any further than the allowed motives of credibility support his demands. See Jer. 2. 5. 31. Mic. 6. 5. Ministers may from hence learn, 1. To walk so circumspectly, as that it may not be in the power of their most strict observers to convict them of sin, that the ministry be not blamed. The only way not to be convicted of sin, is, not to sin. 2. To be willing to admit a scrutiny; though we are confident in many things that are in the right, yet we should be willing to have it tried whether we be not in the wrong. See Job 6. 24.

[2.] If they were in an error, why were they not convinced by him? "If I say the truth, why do you not believe me? If you cannot convict me of error, you must own that I say the truth, and why do you not then give me credit? Why will you not deal with me faithfully?" Observe, If men would inquire into the reason of their infidelity, and examine why they do not believe that which they cannot gainsay, they would find themselves reduced to such absurdities as they could not but be ashamed of; for it will be found that the reason why we believe not in Jesus Christ, is, because we are not willing to part with our sins, and deny ourselves, and serve God faithfully. They are not of the christian religion, because we would not indeed be of any, and unbelief of our Redeemer resolves itself into a downright rebellion against our Creator.

2. Another thing charged upon them, is, that they would not hear the words of God; (v. 47.) which further shows how groundless their claim of relation to God was. Here is,

[1.] A doctrine laid down; He that is of God, heareth God's words; that is, [1.] He is willing and ready to hear them, is sincerely desirous to know what the mind of God is, and cheerfully embraces whatever he knows to be so. God's words have such an authority over, and such an agreement with, all that are born of God, that they meet them, as the child Samuel did, with, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Let the word of the Lord come. [2.] He apprehends and discerns them, he so hears them, as to perceive the voice of God in them, which the natural man does not, 1 Cor. 2. 14. He that is of God, is soon aware of the discoveries he makes of himself, of the nearness of his name; (Ps. 75. 1.) as they of the family know the master's tread, and the master's knock, and open to him immediately, (Luke 12. 36.) as the sheep know the voice of their shepherd more than the stranger's. Cant. i. 12.

[2.] The application of this doctrine, for the conviction of these unbelieving Jews; Ye therefore hear him not; that is, "Ye heed not, ye understand not, ye believe not, the words of God, nor care to hear them, because ye are not of God. Your being thus deaf and dead to the words of God, is a plain evidence that ye are not of God." It is in his word that God manifests himself, and is present among us; we are therefore reckoned to be well or ill affected to God, according as we are well or ill affected to his word; see 2 Cor. 4. 18. Or, their not being of God, was the reason why they did not profitably hear the words of God which Christ spake; therefore they did not understand and believe him, not because the things themselves were obscure, or wanted evidence, but because the hearers were not of God, were not born again. If the word of the kingdom do not bring forth fruit, the blame is upon the hearers, Isa. 5. 13. The passage appears by the parable of the sower, Matt. 13. 3, 4.

48. Then answered the Jews, and said unto him, Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil? 49. Jesus answered, I have not a devil; but I honour my Father, and ye do dishonour me. 50. And I seek not mine own glory: there is one that seeketh and judgeth.

Here is,

1. The malice of hell breaking out in the base language which the unbelieving Jews gave to our Lord Jesus. Hitherto they had cavilled at his doctrine, and had made audacious remarks upon that; but now they openly pronounced him a Samaritan, and a devil, and a Samaritan and a devil! See 2 Cor. 4. 4. 1 John 4. 6.

[1.] That he was a Samaritan, that is, that he was an enemy to their church and nation, one that they hated, and could not endure. Thus they exposed him to the ill-will of the people, with whom you could not put a man into a worse name, than to call him a Samaritan. If he had been a Samaritan, he had been punishable, by the beating of the rebels, (as they called it,) for coming into the temple. They had often called him a Galilean—a mean man; but, as if that were not enough, though it contradicted the other, they will have him a Samaritan, and a devil! What is this? Are Jews to this day call the Christians, in reproach—Cuthi—Samaritans? Note, Great endeavours have in all ages been used to make good people odious by putting them under black characters, and it is easy to run that down with a crowd and a cry, which is once put into an ill name. Perhaps because Christ justly inveighed against the pride and tyranny of the priests and elders, they hereby suggest that he aimed at the ruin of their church, in aiming at its reformation, and was falling away to the Samaritans.

[2.] That he had a devil. Either, [1.] That he was in league with the devil; having reproached his doctrine as tending to Samaritanism, here they reflect upon his miracles as done in combination with Beelzebub. Or rather, [2.] That he was possessed with a devil, that he was a melancholy man, whose brain was clouded, or a mad man, whose brain was heated; and that which he said was no more to be believed than the extravagant rambles of a distracted man, or one in a delirium. Thus the divine revelation of those things which are above the dis coviery of reason, have been often branded with the charge of enthusiasm, and the prophet was called a mad fellow, 2 Kings 9. 11. Isai.9. 7. The inspiration of the Pagan oracles and prophets was indeed a conflict in hearts that lived for God, and contend for that, their hearts were more hardened, and their prejudices confirmed. They value themselves on their enmity to Christ, as if they had never spoken better than when they spake the worst they could of Jesus Christ. Those have arrived at the highest pitch of wickedness, who aver their impurity, repeat what they should retract, and justify themselves in that for which they ought to condemn themselves. It is bad to say and do ill, but it is worse to stand to it; I do well to be angry. When Christ spake with so much boldness against the sins of the great men, and thereby incensed them against him, they who were sensible of no interest but what is secular and sensual, concluded him beside himself, for they thought that none but a madman would lose his preference, and hazard his life, for his religion and conscience.

11. Here is the meekness and meekliness of Heaven shining in Christ's reply to this vile calumny, v. 49, 50. 1. He denies their charge against him; I have not a devil; as Paul, (Acts 26. 23.) I am not mad. The imputation is unjust; "I am neither actuated by a devil, nor in compact with one," and this he evidenced by what he did against the devil's kingdom. He takes no notice of their calling him a Samaritan, because it was a calumny that disproved itself, it was a personal reflection, and not worth taking notice of; but saying he had a devil, reflected on his commission, and therefore he answered that. St. Augustine gives this descent upon his not saying any thing to their calling him a Samaritan—that he was indeed that good Samaritan spoken of in the parable, Luke 10. 33.

2. He asserts the sincerity of his own intentions; But I honour my Father. They suggested that he took undue honours to himself, and derogated from the honour due to God only, both which he denies here, in saying that he made it his business to honour his Father, and him only. It also proves that he had not a devil, for, if he had, he would not honour God. Note, They who can truly say that they make it their constant care to honour God, are sufficiently armed against the censures and reproaches of men.

3. He complains of the wrong they did him by their calumnies; Ye do dishonour me. By this it appears that, as Man, he had a tender sense of the disgrace and indignity done him, reproach was a sword to his soul, yet he undertook it for his salvation. It is the will of God, that all men should honour the Son, yet there are many that dishonour him; such a contradiction is there in the carnal mind to the will of God. Christ honoured his Father so as never man did, and yet was himself dishonoured so as never man was; for though God has promised that those who honour him will honour, he never promised that men should honour them.

4. He clears himself from the imputation of vanity, in saying this concerning himself, v. 50. See here, (1.) His contempt of worldly honour; I seek not mine own glory. He did not aim at that in what he had said of himself, or against his persecutors; he did not court the applause of men, nor covet preference in the world, but indifferently declined both. He did not seek his own glory distinct from his Father's, nor had any separate interest of his own. For men to search their own glory, is not glory indeed, (Prov. 25. 27.) but their shame rather, to be so much out in their aim. This comes in here as a reason why Christ made so light of their reproaches; "You do dishonour me, but cannot disturb me, shall not disquiet me, for I seek not mine own glory." Note, Those who are dead to men's praise, can safely bear their contempt.

(2.) His heavenly dishonour; There is one that seeketh and judgeth. In two things Christ made it appear that he sought not his own glory: and here he tells us what satisfied him as to both. [1.] He did not court men's respect, but was indifferent to it, and in reference to this he saith, "There is one that seeketh, that will secure and advance, my interest in the esteem and affections of the people, while I am in no care about it." Note, God will seek their honour, that do not seek their own; for before honour is humility. [2.] He did not revenge men's affronts, but was uncencerned at them, and in reference to this he saith, "There is one that judgeth, that will vindicate my honour, and severely reckon with those that trample upon it." Probably, he refers here to the judgments that were coming upon the nation of the Jews for the indulgencies they did to the Lord Jesus. See Ps. 38. 13. 14. I heard not, for thou wilt hear. It we undertake to judge for ourselves, whatever damage we sustain, our amends is in our own hands; but if we be, as we ought to be, humble appellants and patient expectants, we shall find, to our comfort, there is one that judgeth.

51. Verily, verily, I say unto you. If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death. 52. Then said the Jews unto him, Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead, and the prophets and thou sayest, If a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death. 53. Art thou greater than our father Abraham, which is dead? And the prophets are dead: whom maketh thou thyself? 54. Jesus answered, If I honour myself, my honour is nothing: it is my Father that honoureth me; of whom ye say, that he is your God. 55. Yet ye have not known him; but I know him; and if I should say, I know him not, I shall be a liar like unto you: but I know him, and keep his saying. 56. Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad. 57. Then said the Jews unto him, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? 58. Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am. 59. Then took they up stones to cast at him: but Jesus hid himself, and went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by.

In these verses, we have,

1. The doctrine of the immortality of believers laid down, v. 51. It is ushered in with the usual solemn preface, Verily, verily, I say unto you, which commands both attention and assent, and this it is he saith, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death. Where we have,
1. The character of a believer; he is one that keeps the saying of the Lord Jesus, 166; 20:12; 1 Thess. 5:23—my word; that word of mine which I have delivered to you; this we must not only receive, but keep; not only have, but hold. We must keep it in mind and memory, keep it in love and affection, so keep it as in nothing to violate it, or go contrary to it, keep it without spot, (1 Tim. 6. 14.) keep it as a trust committed to us, keep in it as our way, keep to it as our rule.
2. The privilege of a believer; He shall by no means see death for ever; so it is in the original. Not as if the bodies of believers were secured from the stroke of death, no, even the children of the Most High must die like men, and the followers of Christ have been, more than other men, in deaths often, and killed all the day long; how then is this promise made good, that they shall not see death? Ans. (1.) The property of death is so altered to them, that they do not see it as death, they do not see the terror of death, it is quite taken off; their sight does not terminate in death, as their's does who live by sense; no, they look so clearly, so comfortably, through death, and beyond death, and are so taken up with their state on the other side death, that they overlook death, and see it not. (2.) The power of death is so broken, that though there is no remedy, but they must see death, yet they shall not see death for ever, for though they shall see death, yet the day will come when death shall be swallowed up in victory. (3.) They are perfectly delivered from eternal death, shall not be hurt of the second death. That is the death especially meant here, that death which is for ever, which is opposed to everlasting life, this they shall never see, for they shall never come into condemnation; they shall have their everlasting lot where there will be no more death, where they cannot die any more, Luke 20. 36. Though now they cannot avoid seeing death, and tasting it too, yet they shall shortly be there where it will be seen no more for ever, Exod. 14. 13.

The Jews' cavil at this doctrine. Instead of having hold on this precious promise of immortality, which the nature of man has an ambition of; (who is there that does not love life, and dread the sight of death?) they lay hold on this occasion to reproach him, and that makes them so kind an offer, say, didst thou know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead. Observe here.
1. Their railing; Now we know that thou hast a devil, that thou art a madman; thou raves, and sayest that thou knowest not what. See how these swine trample under foot the precious pearls of gospel-promises. If now at last they had evidence to prove him mad, why did they say, (v. 48.) before they had that proof, Thou hast a devil? But this is the method of malice, first to fasten an invidious charge, and then to fish for evidence of it; Now we know that thou hast a devil. If he had not abundantly proved himself a Teacher come from God, his promises of immortality to his credulous followers might justly have been ridiculed, and charity itself would have imputed them to a crazed Fancy; but when these Jews had obtained that evidence which confirmed it, and the Jewish religion taught them to expect such a Prophet, and to believe in him; for them therefore thus to reject him, was to abandon that promise to which their twelve tribes hoped to come, Acts 26. 7.

2. Their reasoning, and the colour they had to run him down thus. In short, they look upon him as a provocateur, as one that makes himself greater than Abraham and the prophets; Abraham is dead, and the prophets they are dead too; very true, by the same token that these Jews were the genuine offspring of those that killed them. Now, (1.) It is true, Abraham and the prophets were great men, great in the favour of God, and great in the esteem of all good men. (2.) It is true, they kept God's sayings, and were obedient to them; and yet, (3.) It is true, they died, they never pretended to have, much less to give immortality, but every one in his own order was gathered to his people. It was their honour that they died in faith, but die they must. Why should a good man be afraid to die, when Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead? They have tracked the way through that darksome valley, which should reconcile us to death, and help to take off the terror of it. Now they think Christ talks too much about death, when he saith, If a man keep my sayings, he shall never taste death. Tasting death means the same thing with seeing it; and well may death be represented as grievous to several of the senses, which is the destruction of them all. Now their arguing goes upon two mistakes:
[1.] They understood Christ of an immortality in this world, and that was a mistake. In the sense that Christ spake, it was not true that Abraham and the prophets were dead, for God is still the God of Abraham, and the God of the holy prophets; (Rev. 22. 6.) now God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; therefore Abraham and the prophets are still alive, and, as Christ meant it, they had not seen nor tasted death.
[2.] They thought none could be greater than Abraham or any of the prophets, whereas they could not but know that the Messiah was greater than Abraham or any of the prophets, who did virtuously, but he excelled them all; nay, they borrowed their greatness from him. It was the honour of Abraham, that he was the Father of the Messiah, and the honour of the prophets, that they testified beforehand concerning him; so that he certainly obtained a far more excellent name than they. Therefore instead of inferring from Christ's making himself greater than Abraham, that he had a devil, they should have inferred from his proving himself so, (by doing the works which neither Abraham nor the prophets ever did,) that he was the Christ; but their eyes were blinded.
They scornfully asked, Whom maketh thou thyself? As if he had been guilty of pride and vain-glory; whereas he was so far from making himself greater than Abraham, that he said, I am not worthy to be called my father, his own glory, emptied himself, and made himself less than he was, and was the greatest Example of humility that ever was.

III. Christ's reply to this cavil; still he vouchsafes to reason with them, that every mouth may be stopped. No doubt, he could have struck them dumb or dead upon the spot, but this was the day of his patience.
1. In his answer he insists not upon his own testimony concerning himself, but waves it as not sufficient or conclusive; (v. 48.) If I honour myself, my honour is nothing, v. 49. (If I glory myself. Note, Self-honour is no honour; and the affection of glory is both the forfeiture and the defacement of it: it is not glory, (Prov. 23. 27.) but so great a reproach, that there is no sin which men are more inhumanly ready to hide than this; even he that most affects praise, would not be thought to do it. Honour of our own creating is a mere chimera, has nothing in it, and therefore is called vain-glory. Self-admirers are self-deceivers. Our Lord Jesus was not one that honoured himself, as they represented him; he was crowned by him who is the Fountain of honour, and glorified not himself to be made a High-Priest, Heb. 5. 5.
2. But he refers himself to his Father, God; and to their father, Abraham.
(1.) To his Father, God; It is my Father the honour me. By this he means, [1.] That he derived from his Father all the honour he now claimed; he had commanded them to believe in him, to follow him, and to keep his word, all which put an honour upon him, but it was the Father that had helped upon, that blessed all fulness in him, that sanctified him, and sealed him, and sent him into the world to receive all the honours due to the Messiah, and to be the chief glory of Israel, whom he has given to aid him.

[2.] That he defended upon his Father for all the honour he further looked for; he counted not the appallings of the age, but despised them; for his eye and heart were upon the glory which the Father had promised him, and which he had with the Father before the world was. He aimed at an advancement with the Father, not with the world.

1. He here takes occasion to shew the reason of his being called the Son of God, notwithstanding this testimony; and that was, their unacquaintance with God; as if he had said, "But why should I talk to you of my Father's honouring me, when he is one you know nothing of? You say of him, that he is your God, yet you have not known him." Where observe,

1. The profession they made of relation to God; "Ye say that he is your God, the God ye have chosen, that he is not the God of Israel; but all are not so indeed, that are of Israel," Rom. 9. 6. Note, Many pretend to have an interest in God, and say that he is their's, who yet have no just cause to say so. They who called themselves the temple of the Lord, having professed the excellence of Jacob, did butt trust in lying words. What will it avail us to say, He is our God, if we be not in sincerity his people, nor such as he will own?

2. Their ignorance of him, and estrangement from him, notwithstanding this profession; Yet ye have not known him. (1.) Ye know him not at all. These Pharisees were so taken up with the study of their traditions concerning things foreign and trifling, that they never minded the most needful and useful knowledge; like the false prophets of old, who caused people to forget God's name by their dreams, Jer. 23. 27. Or, (2.) Ye know him not aright, but mistake concerning him; and that is as bad as not knowing him at all, or worse. Men may be able to dispute subtly concerning God, and yet may think such a one as themselves, and not know him. Ye say that he is our's, and it is natural to us to desire to know our own, yet ye know him not. Note, There are many who think they know a man, and yet know him not. For, again, we have no certain knowledge of him. It is only the name of God which they have learned to talk of, and to hearken with; but for the nature of God, his attributes and perfections, and relations to his creatures, they know nothing of the matter; we speak this to their shame, 1 Cor. 15. 34. Multitudes satisfy themselves, but deceive themselves, with a titular relation to an unknown god.

This Christ changes upon the Jews here. [1.] To show how vain and groundless their pretensions of relation to God were. "Ye say that he is your's, but ye give yourselves the lie, for it is plain that you do not know him;" and we reckon that a cheat is effectually convicted, if it be found that he is ignorant of the persons he pretends alliance to. [2.] To shew the true reason why they were not wrought upon by Christ's doctrine and miracles. They knew not God, and therefore perceived not the image of God, nor the voice of God in Christ. Note, The true knowledge of God is of the greatest use to men, because they have not the knowledge of God. Men therefore submit not to the righteousness of Christ, because they are ignorant of God's righteousness, Rom. 10. 3. "They that know not God, and obey not the gospel of Christ, are put together, 2 Thess. 1. 8.

2. Secondly, He gives them the reason of his assurance, that his Father would honour him and own him; But I know him; and again, I know him; which bespeaks, not only his acquaintance with him, having him in his bosom, but his confidence in him, to stand by him, and bear him out in his whole undertaking; as was prophesied concerning him; (Isa. 50. 7, 8.) "I know that I shall not be ashamed, for He is near that justified me;" and as Paul, I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day, 2 Pet. 1. 1. The Son is known to be faithful, and powerful, and heartily engaged in the cause which 1 know to be his own. Observe,

1. How he professes his knowledge of his Father, with the greatest certainty, as one that was neither afraid, nor ashamed to own it. If I should say I know him not, I should be a liar like unto you. He who is such a liar as he that knows not God, Yet he that is a liar, will be afraid, to make himself appear otherwise, while pretending to know him. Verse 14. Mr. Clark observes well upon this, that it is a great sin to deny God's grace in us.

2. How he proves his knowledge of his Father, I know him and keep his saying; or his word. Christ, as Man, was obedient to the moral law, and, as Redeemer, to the mediatorial law; and in both he kept his Father's word, and his own word with the Father. Christ requires of us, (v. 51.) that we keep his sayings; and he has set here as a type of obedience, a copy without a blemish, he kept his Father's sayings; well might he who learned obedience, teach it, see Heb. 5. 8. 9. Christ by this evidences that he knew the Father. Note, The best proof of our acquaintance with God is our obedience to him. Those only know God aright, that keep his word; it is a ruled case, 1 John 2. 3. Hereby we know that we know him, and do not only fancy it, if we keep his commandments.

(2.) Christ refers them to their father, when they boasted so much of a relation to, and that was Abraham, and this closes the discourse.

[1.] Christ asserts Abraham's prospect of him, and respect to him; (v. 56.) Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad. And by this he proves that he was not at all out of the way, when he made himself greater than Abraham.

Two things he here speaks of as instances of that patriarch's respect to the promised Messiah.

First, The ambition he had to see his day; he rejoiced, by loving it, he leaped at it. The word, though it commonly signifies rejoicing, must here seem to be transport of desire rather than delight; otherwise the latter part of the verse would be a tolerancy; he saw it, and was glad. He reached out, or stretched himself forth, that he might see my day as Zaccheus, that ran before and climbed the tree, to see Jesus. The notices he had received of the Messiah to come, had raised in him an expectation of something great, which he earnestly longed to know more of. The dark intimation of that which is considerable, puts men upon inquiry, and makes them earnestly ask Who? and What? and Where? and When? and How? And thus the prophets of the Old Testament, having a general idea of a grace that was to be revealed, but which they did not distinctly define; (1 Pet. 1. 10.) and Abraham was as industrious herein as any of them. God told him of a land that he would give his posterity, and of the wealth and honour he designed them; (Gen. 15. 14.) but he never leaped thus to see that day, as he did to see the day of the Son of man. He could not look with so much indifference upon the promised Seed as he did upon the prophet's words; he was not excited by mere interest. Abraham was conscious of being on Christmas day, though it was at a great distance; but this degenerate seed of his discerned not his day, nor bid it welcome when it came. The appearing of Christ, which gracious souls love and long for, carnal hearts dread and loathe.

Secondly, The satisfaction he had in what he did see of it; He saw it, and was glad. Observe here, (1.) The more he knew of Abraham, the pious design of Abraham; he longed to see Christ's day, and he saw it. Though he saw it not so plainly and fully and distinctly as we now see it under the gospel, yet he saw something of it, more afterward than he did at first. Note, To him that has, and to him that asks, shall be given; to him that uses and improves what he has, and that desires and prays for more of the knowledge of Christ, God will give more. But how did Abraham see Christ's day? (1.) Some understand it of the sight he had of it in the other world. The separate soul of Abraham, when the veil of flesh was rent, saw the mysteries of the kingdom of God in heaven. Calvin mentions this sense of it, and does not much disallow it. Note, The longings of gracious souls after Jesus Christ will be fully satisfied with them when they come to heaven, and not till then.

But, (2.) It is probable he saw it, or rather apprehended an earnest sight he had of Christ's day in this world. They that received not the promises yet saw them after: Heb. 11. 13. Balaam saw Christ, but not now, not nigh. There is room to conjecture that Abraham had some vision of Christ and his day, for his own private satisfaction, which is not, nor must be, recorded in his story, like that of Daniel's, which must be wholly hid, and sealed up, to the end of the time. In the prevalency of his intercession for Sodom he beheld some glance of the future, it was Christ's intercession; in the casting out of Ishmael, and the establishment of the covenant with Isaac, he saw a figure of the gospel-day, which is Christ's day, for these things were an allegory. In offering Isaac, and the ram instead of Isaac, he saw a double type of the great Sacrifice; and his calling the place Jehovah.Shall He be seen, intimates that he saw something in it than others did, which he could produce; and in making his servant put his hand under his thigh, when he swore, he had a regard to the Messiah.

3. How Abraham entertained these discoveries of Christ's day, and bid them welcome; he saw, and was glad. He was glad of what he saw of God's favour to himself, and glad of what he foresaw of the mercy God had in store for the world. Perhaps this refers to Abraham's laughing when God assured him of a son by Sarah; (Gen. 17. 16, 17.) for that was not to be a discovery of the Messiah, but of a promise in that promise he saw Christ's day, and it filled him with joy unspeakable. Thus he embraced the promises. Note, A believing sight of Christ and his day will put gladness into the heart. No joy like the joy of faith: we are never acquainted with true pleasure, till we are acquainted with Christ.

[2.] The Jews, civil at this, and reproach him (John 57.) They supposing that if Abraham saw him and his day, he also had seen Abraham, which yet was not a necessary inference, but this turn of his words would best serve to expose him; yet it was true that Christ had seen Abraham, and had talked with him as a man talks with his friend. Secondly, They suppose it a very great absurdity that Abraham, the father of the faithful, should have seen Jesus, who was dead so many ages before he was born. The state of the dead is an invisible state; but here they ran upon the old mistake, understanding that corporally, which Christ spake spiritually. Now this gave them occasion to despise his youth; and to upbraid him with it, as if he were but of yesterday, and knew nothing: Thou art not yet fifty years old. They might as well have said, Thou art not forty; for he was now but thirty-two, or thirty-three years old. As to this, Irenaeus, one of the first fathers, with this passage supports the tradition which he says he had from some that had conversed with St. John, that our Saviour lived to be fifty years old, which he contends for, Advers. Heres. lib. 2. cap. 39. 40. See what little credit is to be given to tradition; and as to this here, the Jews spake at random; some year they would mention, and therefore pitched upon one that they thought he was far enough short of: he did not look to be forty, but they were sure he could not be fifty, much less contemporary with Abraham. Old age is reckoned to begin at fifty, (Numb. 4. 47.) so that they mean no more than, Thou art not to be reckoned an old man; many of us are much thy seniors, and yet pretend to see more of the Messiah than thou.

First, as God, I am; and his name is God; (Exod. 3. 14.) it speaks his self-existence: he does not say, I was, but, I Am, for he is the First and the Last, immutably the same; (Rev. 1. 8.) thus he was not only before Abraham, but before all worlds, Prov. 8. 23. ch. 1. 1. Secondly, As Mediator. He was the appointed Messiah, long before Abraham; the Lamb from the foundation of the world, (Rev. 13. 8.) the channel of conveyance of light, life, and love, from God to man. This supposes his d vine nature, that he is the same in himself from eternity, (Heb. 13. 8.) and that he is the same to man ever since the fall; he was made of God Wis- dom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemp- tion, to Adorn the times of Noah, and Sodom, and Sheol, and all the patriarchs that lived and died by faith in him before Abraham was born. Abraham was the root of the Jewish nation, the rock out of which they were hewn. If Christ was before Abra- ham, his doctrine and religion were no novelty, but were, in the substance of them, prior to Judaism, and ought to take place of it. [4.] This great word ended the dispute abruptly, and put an end to it: they could bear to hear no more from him, and he needed to say no more to them, having witnessed this good confession, which was sufficient to support all his claims. One would think that Christ's discourse, in which sown so much both of grace and glory, should have captivated them all; but their invertebrate prejudice against the holy spiritual doctrine and law of Christ, which were so contrary to their pride and worldliness, baffled all the methods of conviction. Now was fulfilled that prophecy, (Mal. 3. 1, 2.) that when the Messenger of the covenant should come to his temple, they would not abide the day of his coming, because he would be like a refiner's fire. Observe here, First. How they were enraged at Christ for what he said; They took up stones, to cast at him, v. 59. Perhaps they looked upon him as a blasphemer, and such indeed were indeed to be stoned; (Lev. 24. 16.) but they must be first legally tried and convicted; it was well justice and order, if every man pretends to execute a law at his pleasure. Besides, they had said but just now, that he was a distracted man, and if so, it was against all reason and equity to punish him as a malefactor for what he said. They took up stones. Dr. Lightfoot will tell you how they came to have stones so ready in the temple; they had workmen at this time repairing the temple, or making some additions, and the pieces of stone which they hewed off, served for this purpose. See here the desperate power of sin and Satan in and over the children of disobedience. Who would think that ever there should be such wickedness as this in men; such an open and daring rebellion against one that undeniably proved himself to be the Son of God. Thus every one has a stone to throw at his holy relig- ion, Acts 28. 22.

Secondly, How he made his escape out of their hands.

1. He absconded; Jesus hid himself, v. 59. — He hid, either by the crowd of those who wished well to him, to shelter him; (he that ought to have been upon a throne, high and lifted up, is content to be lost in a crowd;) or perhaps he concealed himself behind some of the walls or pillars of the temple; (In the secret of his tabernacle he shall hide me, Ps. 27. 5.) and the power, casting a mist before his eyes, made him invisible. In this case, if the wicked rise, a man is hidden, a wise and good man, Prov. 28. 12, 28. Not that Christ was afraid, or ashamed to stand by what he said, but his hour was not yet come, and he would countenance the flight of his ministers and people in times of persecution, when they are called to it. The Lord hid Jeremiah and Baruch, Jer. 36. 26. 28.

2. He departed from the midst of the temple, going through the midst of them, undiscovered, and so passed by. This was not a cowardly inglorious flight, nor such as argued either guilt or fear. It was fore- told concerning him, that he should not fail or be discouraged, Isa. 42. 4. But, (1.) It was an instance of his power over his enemies, and that they could do no more against him than they gave them leave to do; by which it appears, that when afterward he was taken in their pits, he offered himself, ch. 10, 43.

18. They now thought they had him sure, and yet he passed through the midst of them, either their eyes being blinded, or their hands tied, and thus he left them to vex, like a lion disappointed of his prey. It was one instance of his prudent provision for his own safety, whom he knew they would not hurt, nor his testimony finish; thus he gave an example to his own rule, When they persecute you, in one city, flee to another; or, if occasion be, to a wilder- ness, for so Elijah did, (1 Kings 19. 3, 4.) and the woman, the church, Rev. 12. 6. When they took up stones to throw at him, Christ could have commanded the fixed stones, which did not come out of the wall against him to his cause, or the earth to open and swallow him; then he was close to accommodate himself to the state he was in, to make the example imitable by the prudence of his followers, without a miracle. (5.) It was a righteous deserting of those who (worse than the Gadarenes, who forced him to depart) stoned him from among them. Christ will not long stay with those who bid him be gone. Christ did again visit the temple after this; some of the Jews, he hid off from; but at last he abandoned it for ever, and left it desolate. Christ now went through the midst of the Jews, and none of them counted his stay, or stirred themselves to take hold on him, but were even content to let him go. Note, God never forsakes any till they have first provoked him to withdraw, and will have none of him. Calvin ob-erves, that these chief priests, when they had driven Christ out of the temple, turned themselves over on the possession they kept of it: "But," (says he) "these deceive themselves, who are proud of a church or temple which Christ has forsaken. Lon- ge faltentur, cum templum se habeant. Preach "the desertion of the Jews, and the kingdom of God comes not, so it goes not with ob- servation. See Judg. 16. 20. Samuel wis- not that the Lord was departed from him. Thus it was with these forsaken Jews—God left them, and they never missed him.

CHAP. IX.

After Christ's departure out of the temple, in the close of the foregoing chapter, before this discourse of his in this chapter is recorded in this chapter, he had been for some time abroad in the country; it is supposed about two or three months; in which interval of time Dr. Lightfoot and other harmonists place all the passages that occur from Luke 16. 17 to Luke 16. 17. What is recorded, chapter 7, and 8, was at the feast of tabernacles, in September; what is recorded in this and the following chapter, was at the feast of dedica- tion, in December, chapter 10, 22. Mr. Clark and others place this chapter entirely after the chapter we have, I. The miraculous cure of a man that was born blind, v. 1. 7. 2. The discourses which were oc- casioned by it. 1. A discourse of the neighbours among themselves, 22. 30. 2. Between the Pharisees and the man, v. 13. 34. 3. Between Christ and the poor man, v. 35. 38. 4. Between Christ and the Phar- isees, v. 39. ad finem.—to the end.

1. And as Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth.

2. And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind? 3. Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him. 4. I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work. 5. As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. 6. When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay.

7. And said unto him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam, (which is by interpretation, Sent.) He went his way therefore, and washed, and came seeing. We have here sight given to a poor beggar that had been blind from his birth. Observer,

Commentary.

The case before us is the piteous case of this poor blind man; (2.) As Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth. The first words seem to refer to the last of the foregoing chapter, and countenance their opinion, who in the harmony place this story immediately after that. There it was said, and here, without so much as repeating his name, (though our translators supply it.)

παραλαβὼν ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἠρέσθη,—and as he passed by. 1. Though the Jews had so basely abused him, and both by word and deed gave him the highest provocation imaginable, yet he did not slip any opportunity of doing good among them, nor take up a resolution, as justly he might have done, never to have favoured them with any good offices. The cure of this blind man was a kindness to the public, performing his work for his living, who before was a charge and burthen to the neighbourhood. It is noble, and generous, and Christ-like, to be willing to serve the public, even when we are slighted and disoblige by it, or think ourselves so. 2. Though he was in his flight from a threatening danger, and escaping for his life, yet he willingly halted and stayed a while to show mercy to this poor man. We may have causes that the good may, when we have opportunities of doing good. 3. When the Pharisees drove Christ from them, he went to this poor blind beggar. Some of the ancients make this a figure of the bringing of the gospel to the Gentiles, who sat in darkness, when the Jews had rejected it, and driven it from them. 4. Christ took this poor blind man in his way, and cured him in transitus—as he passed by. Thus should we take occasion of doing good, even as we pass by, whatever we are.

Now, (1.) The condition of this poor man was very sad; he was blind, and had been so from his birth. If the light is sweet, how melancholy must it needs be for a man, all his days, to eat in darkness? He that is blind, has no enjoyment of the light, but he that is born blind, has no idea of it. No the like, such a one would give a greater reason to have his curiosity satisfied with but one day's sight of light and colours, shapes and figures, though he were never to see them more. Whi is the light of life given to one that is in this misery, that is deprived of the light of the sun; whose way is thus hid, and whom God hath thus hedged in? Job 3. 20. 23. Let us bless God that it was not our case. The eye is one of the most delicate cases, and to deny us this privilege, is a莫过于 nice and fine. In the formation of animals, it is said to be the first part that appears distinctly discernible. What a mercy is it that there was no miscarriage in the making of ours. Christ cured many that were blind by disease or accident, but here he cured one that was born blind. [1.] That he might give an instance of his power to help in the most desperate cases, and to relieve when none else can. [2.] That he might give a specimen of the work of his grace upon the souls of sinners, which give sight to those that were by nature blind. (2.) The compassion of our Lord Jesus toward them was very tender. He saw him; that is, he took cognizance of his case, and looked upon him with concern. When God is about to work deliverance, he is said to see the affliction; so Christ saw this poor man. Others saw him, but not as he did. This poor man could not see Christ, but Christ saw him, and anticipated both his prayers and expectations with a surprising cure. Christ is often found of those that seek him not, nor him, Isa. 65. 1. And if one of those or approached to Christ, is it because we were first known of him, (Gal. 4. 9.)

and apprehended by him, Phil. 3. 12.

II. The discourse between Christ and his disciples concerning this man. When he departed out of the temple, they went along with him, for these were they that continued with him in his temptations, and who had seen his power. Now it happened other way he went; and they lost nothing by their adherence to him, but gained experience abundantly. Observe, 1. The question which the disciples put to their Master upon this blind man's case, v. 2. When Christ looked upon him, they had an eye to him too; Christ's commissions should kindle our's. It is probable that Christ told them that this poor man was born blind, or they knew it by common fame; but they did not make Christ to him, instead of that, they started a very odd question concerning him, Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Now this question of their's was, (1.) Uncharitably censorious. They take it for granted that this extraordinary calamity was the punishment of some extraordinary unclean wickedness, and hereby this man was driven from his senses. It was a common custom of men that dwelt at Jerusalem, Luke 13. 4. For the barbarous people to infer, Surely this man is a murderer, was not so strange; but it was inexcusable in them who knew the scriptures, who had read that all things come alike to all, and knew that it was adjudged in Job's case, that the greatest sufferers are not therefore to be looked upon as the greatest sinners. Nothing can more strongly show the innocence of the sufferers, and avaricious punishments, but the grace of charity calls the afflictions of others trials, unless the contrary is very evident. (2.) It was unnecessarily curious. Concluding this calamity to be inflicted for some very heinous crime, they ask, Who were the criminals, this man, or his parents. And what was this to them? Or what good would it do them to know it? We must not be so much concerned about other people's sins than concerning our own; whereas, it is more our concern to know wherefore God contends with us, than wherefore he contends with others; for to judge ourselves is our duty, but to judge our brother is our sin.

They enquire, [1.] Whether this man was punished for some sin of his own, either committed or unpunished; or his parents, for some other reason of his birth. Some think that the disciples were tainted with the Pythagorean notion of the pre-existence of souls, and their transmigration from one body to another. Was this man's soul condemned to the dungeon of this blind body, to punish it for some great sin committed in another body which it had before animated? The Pharisees seem to have had the same opinion of his case, when they said, The Master. Perhaps the disciples asked this, as if all those, and those only, were born in sin, whom nature had stigmatised. Or, [2.] Whether he was punished for the wickedness of his parents, which God sometimes visits upon the children. It is a good reason why parents should take heed of sin, lest their children smart for them when they are gone. Let us not thus be cruel to our own, as the patriarch in the midst of his tribe. Perhaps the disciples asked this, not as believing that this was the punishment of some actual sin of his own, or his parents, but Christ having intimated to another patient that his impotency was the cause of his sin, ch. 5. 14. "Master," say they, "whose sin is the cause of this impotency?" Being at less what construction to put upon his providence, they desire to be informed. The equity of God's dispensations is always certain, for his righteousness is as the great mountains, but not always to be accounted for, his judgments are a great deep.

2. Christ's answer to this question. He was always at teach to, and to rectify his disciples' mistakes.

(1.) He gives the reason of this poor man's blindness: "Neither has this man sinned, nor his parents; but therefore he was born blind, and hath continued so to this day, that now at last the works of God should be made manifest in him," v. 3. Here Christ, who perfectly knew the secret springs of the divine counsels, has told two things concerning such unaccountable events.

[1.] That they are not always inflicted as punishments of sin. The sinfulness of the whole race of mankind does indeed justify God in all the miseries of human life; so that they who have the least share of them, must say that God is kind; and they who have the greatest share, must not say that he is unjust; but many are made much more miserable than others in this life, who are not at all more sinful. Not that God makes men sinners, but it was not any uncommon guilt that God had an eye to in inflicting this upon him. Note, We must take heed of judging any to be great sinners, merely because they are great sufferers, lest we be found, not only persecuting those whom God has smitten, (Ps. 69. 26.) but accusing those whom he has justified, and condemning those for whom Christ died, which is different and dangerous, Rom. 3. 33, 34.

[2.] That they are sometimes intended for the glory of God, and the manifesting of his works. God has a sovereignty over all his creatures, and a propriety in them, and may make them serviceable to his glory in such a way as he thinks fit, in doing or suffering; and if God be glorified, either by us or in us, we were not made in vain.

This man was born blind, and it was worth while for him to be so, and to continue thus long dark, that the works of God might be manifest in him. That is, First, That the attributes of God might be manifested in him: his justice in making sinful man liable to such grievous calamities; his ordinary power and goodness in supporting a poor man under such a grievous and tedious affliction; especially, that his extraordinary power and goodness might be manifested in curing him. Note, The difficulties of Providence, otherwise unaccountable, may be resolved into these. God's calamities tend in them to shew himself, to declare his glory, to make himself to be taken notice of. Those who regard him not in the ordinary course of things, are sometimes alarmed by things extraordinary. How contentedly then may a good man be a loser in his comforts, while he is sure that thereby God will be one way or other a gainer in his glory! Second, That the counsels of God concerning the Redeemer might be manifested in him. He was then blind, that our Lord Jesus might have the honour of curing him, and might therein prove himself sent of God to be the Light of the world. Thus the fall of man was permitted, and the blindness that followed it, that the works of God might be manifest in opening the eyes of the blind. It was now a great while since this man was born blind, and yet it never appeared till now who he was. Note, The intentions of God concerning the great works he does after the event, perhaps many years after. The sentences in the book of Providence are sometimes long, which you must read a great way before you can apprehend the sense of.

(2.) He gives the reason of his own forwardness and readiness to help and heal him, v. 4, 5. It was not for ostentation, but in pursuance of his under-not be long, I am the Light of the world. He had said this before, ch. 8. 12. He is the Sun of righteousness, that has not only light in his wings for those that can see, but heating in his wings, or beams, for those that are blind and cannot see, therein far exceeding in virtue that great light which rules by day. Christ would therefore cure this blind man, the representative of a blind world, because he came to be the Light of the world, not merely to give light, but to remove blindness. So says John, First, A great encouragement to come to him, as a guiding, quickening, refreshing Light. To whom should we look but to him? Which way should we turn our eyes, but to the light? We partake of the sun’s light, and so we may of Christ’s grace, without money, and without price. Secondly, A good example of usefulness in the world. What Christ saith of himself, he saith of his disciples: Ye are lights in the world, and so, let your light shine. What were candles made for but to burn? III. The manner of the cure of the blind man, ver. 6, 7. The circumstances of the miracle are singular, and, no doubt, significant. When he had thus spoken for the instruction of his disciples, and the opening of their understandings, then he addressed himself to the opening of the blind man’s eyes. He did not do it in a more private, for his greater safety, or more publicly, for his greater honour, or till the Sabbath was past, when it would give less offence; what good we have opportunity of doing, we should do it quickly; he that will never do a good work till there is nothing to be objected against it, will leave many a good work for ever undone, Ezech. 11. 4. In the cure observe, 1. The preparation of the eye-salve. Christ spit on the ground, and made clay of the spittle. He could have cured him with a word, as he did others, but he chose to do it this way, to shew that he is not tied to any method. He made clay of his own spittle, because there was no water near; and he would teach us not to be nice or curious, but, when we have at any time occasion, to be willing to take up with that which is next hand, if it will but be made to serve the turn. Why should we go about for that which may as well be had and done a nearer way? Christ’s making use of his own spittle intimates that there is healing virtue in every thing that belongs to Christ; clay made of Christ’s spittle was much more precious than the balm of Gilead. 2. The application of it to the place: He anointed the clay and laid it to the man’s eyes, and readeth in it, He spread (springs) he daubed the clay upon the eyes of the blind men, like a tender physician; he did it himself with his own hand, though the patient was a beggar. Now Christ did this, (1.) To magnify his power in making a blind man to see by that method which one would think more likely to make a seeing man blind. Daubing clay on the eyes would close them up, but never open them. The work was of the artificers; and he makes men feel their own blindness before he gives them sight. (2.) To give an intimation that it was his mighty hand, the very same that at first made man out of the clay; for by him God made the worlds, both the great world, and man the little world. Man was formed out of the clay, and moulded like the clay; and here Christ used the same materials he gives sight to the body, he used to make the soul to see. (3.) To represent and typify the healing and opening the eyes of the mind by the grace of Jesus Christ. The design of the gospel is to open men’s eyes, Acts 26. 18. Now the eye-salve that does the work, is of Christ’s preparing; it is made up, not as this, of his spittle, but of his blood, the blood and water that came out of his pierced side; we must come to Christ for the eye-salve. Rev. 5. 18. He only calls, and he only is appointed to make it up, Luke 4. 18. The means used in this work are very weak and unlikely, and are made effectual only by the power of Christ; when a dark world was to be enlightened, and nations of blind souls to have their eyes opened, God chose the foolish things, and weak, and despised, for the doing of it. And the method Christ takes, is, first to make men feel themselves blind, as this poor man did, whose eyes were opened, and then to give them sight. Paul in his conversion was struck blind for three days, and then the scales fell from his eyes. The way prescribed for getting spiritual wisdom, is, Let a man become a fool, that he may be wise, 1 Cor. 3. 18. We must be made unwise with our blindness, as this man here, and then healed. 3. The directions given to the patient, ver. 7. His Physician said to him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam. Not that this washing was needful to effect the cure; but, (1.) Christ would hereby try his obedience, and whether he could with an implicit faith obey the orders of one he was so much a stranger to. (2.) He would likewise try how he stood affected to the tradition of the elders, which taught, no person was to wash another’s eyes (for many that are blind are very knowing) that it is a public business, to wash the eyes, no not with spittle, medicinally, on the sabbath-day, much less to go to a pool of water to wash them. (3.) He would hereby represent the method of spiritual healing, in which, though the effect is owing purely to his power and grace, yet there is duty to be done by us. Go, search the scriptures, attend upon the ministry, converse with Christ. This is like washing in the pool of Siloam. Premised graces must be expected in the way of instituted ordinances. The waters of baptism were to them who had been trained up in darkness, like the pool of Siloam, in which they might not only wash, and he clean, but wash, and have their eyes opened. Hence they that were baptized, are said to be ephesians enlightened; and the ancients called baptism, illumination. Concerning the pool of Siloam, observe, [1.] That it was supplied with water from mount Zion, so that these were the waters of the sanctuary, (Ps. 46. 4) living waters which were healing, Ezek. 47. 9. [2.] That the waters of Siloam had of old signified the throne and kingdom of the house of David, pointing at the Messiah, (Isa. 8. 6) and the Jews who refused the waters of Siloam, Christ’s doctrine of his kingdom, and refused his work. Observe, Christ would try this man, whether he would cleave to the waters of Siloam or no. [3.] The evangelist takes notice of the signification of the name, its being interpreted Sent. Christ is often called the Sent of God; the messenger of the covenant; (Mal. 3. 1) so that when Christ sent him to the pool of Siloam, he did in effect send him to himself, for Christ is sii sent in all, to the healing of souls. Christ, as a Prophet, did not work to himself, but sent himself. The Fountain opened, a Fountain of life, not a pool. 4. The patient’s obedience to these directions: he went his way therefore, probably led by some friend or other; or perhaps he was so well acquainted with Jerusalem, that he could find the way himself; nature often supplies the want of sight with an uncommon sagacity; and he washed his eyes. Probably he differed and repented of his first notion that he who bid him do it, was that Jesus whom he heard so much of, else he would not have come, at his bidding, on that which looked so far off’s errand. In confidence of Christ’s power, as well as in obedience to his command, he went, and washed. 5. The cure effected: he came seeing. There is more glory in this concise narrative, he went, and washed, and came seeing, than in Cæsar’s Vest, with
8. The neighbours therefore, and they who before had seen him that he was blind, said, Is not this he that sat and begged? 9. Some said, This is he: others said, He is like him: but he said, I am he. 10. Therefore said they unto him, How were thine eyes opened? 11. He answered and said, A man that is called Jesus made clay, and anointed mine eyes, and said unto me, Go to the pool of Siloam, and wash: and I went and washed, and I received sight. 12. Then said they unto him, Where is he? He said, I know not. 13. Whether this was the same man that had before been blind, yea. 14. The neighbours therefore, that lived near the place where he was born and bred, and knew that he had been blind, could not but be amazed when they saw that he had his eyesight, had it on a sudden, and perfectly; and they said, Is not this he that sat and begged? 15. It seems, this blind man was a common beggar, being disabled to work for his living; and so discharged in the obligation of calling such to serve any one who would not work, neither should be eat. When he could not go about, he sat; if we cannot work for God, we must sit still quietly for him. When he could not labour, his parents not being able to maintain him, he begged. Note, Those who cannot otherwise subsist, must not, like the unjust steward, be ashamed to beg; let no man be ashamed of any thing but sin. There are some common beggars who are objects of charity, that should be distinguished; and we must not let the beasts starve for the sake of the drones or wasps that are among them.

As to this man, 1. It was well ordered by Providence, that he on whom this miracle was wrought, should be a common beggar, and so divinely known and remarkable, by which means the truth of the miracle was better attested, and there was no witness against those infidel Jews who would not believe that he had been blind, than he had been maintained in his father's house. 2. It was the greatest instance of Christ's condescension, that he seemed (as I may say) to take more pains about the cure of a common beggar than others. When it was for the advantage of his miracles that they should be wrought on those that were remarkable, he might have chosen some other occasion to make his name so by their poverty and misery, not by their diont.

In answer to this inquiry, (1.) Some said, This is he, the very same man; and these are witnesses to the truth of the miracle, for they had long known him stone-blind. (2.) Others, who could not think it possible that a man born blind should thus on a sudden receive his sight, for that reason, and no other, said, He is not he, but is like him, and so, by their confession, if he be, it is a great miracle that is wrought upon him. Hence we may take occasion to think, (1.) Of the wisdom and power of providence in ordering such a universal variety of the fates of men and women, so that no two are so like, but that they may be distinguished, which is necessary to society, and commerce, and the administration of justice. And, (2.) Of the wonderful change that the grace of God can make in the heart and life of some who before were very wicked and vile, but are thereby so universally and visibly altered, that one would not take them to be the same persons.

This controversy was soon decided by the man himself; he said, (2.) I am he, the very man that so lately sat and begged; I am he that was blind, and was an object of the charity of men, but now see, I am a benefactor of the blind and the deaf. I am a son of God." We do not find that the neighbours appealed to him in this matter, but he, hearing the debate, interposed, and put an end to it. It is a piece of justice we owe to our neighbours, to rectify their mistakes, and to set things before them, as far as we are able, in a true light. Applying it spiritually, it teaches us that those who are savingly enlightened by the grace of God, should be ready to own what is wrought, and acknowledge that blessed change was wrought, 1 Tim. 1. 13, 14. 11. How he came to have his eyes opened, v. 10 — 12. They will now turn aside, and see the great sight, and inquire further concerning it. He did not sound a trumpet when he did these things, nor perform his cures upon a stage; and yet, like a city upon a hill, they could not be hid. Two things these neighbours inquire after.

1. The manner of the cure: How were thine eyes opened? The works of the Lord being great, they ought to be sought out, Psalm 111. 2. It is good to observe the way and method of God's works, and they will appear the more wonderful. We may apply it spiritually; it is strange that blind eyes should be opened, but more strange when we consider how they are opened; how weak the means are, that are used, and how strong the opposition that is conquered.

In answer to this, he gives them a plain and full account of the matter; (v. 11.) A man that is called Jesus, made clay,—and I received sight. Note, Those who have experienced special instances of God's power and goodness in temporal or spiritual things, should be ready upon all occasions to communicate their experiences, for the glory of God and the encouragement of other others. See David's collection of his experiences, his own and others', Ps. 34. 4—6. It is a debt we owe to our benefactor, and to our brethren. God's favours are lost upon us, when they are lost with us, and go no farther.

2. Concerning the Author of it; (v. 12.) Where is he? Some perhaps asked this question out of curiosity; "Where is he, that we may see him?" A man that did such cures as these, might well be a show, which one would go a good way for the sight of. Others, perhaps, asked out of ill will; "Where is he, that we may seize him?" There was an appearance, both for the discovering and apprehending of him; (ch. 11. 57.) and the unthinking crowd, in spite of all reason and equity, will have ill thoughts of those that are put into an ill name. Some, we hope, asked this question out of good will; "Where is he, that we may be acquainted with him? Where is he, that we may come to him, and share in the favours he is so free of?"

In answer to this he could say nothing; I know not. As soon as Christ had sent him to the pool of Siloam, it should seem, he withdrew immediately, (as he did, ch. 5. 13.) and did not stay till the man returned, as if he either doubted of the effect, or waited for the man's thanks. Humble souls take more pleasure in doing good than in hearing of it again; it will be time enough to hear of it in the resurrection of the just and unjust.

13. They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind. 14. And it was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. 15. Then again the Pharisees also asked him how he had received his sight. He said unto them, He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see. 16. Therefore said some of the Pharisees, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath-day. Others said, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? And there was a division among them. 17. They say unto the blind man again. What sayest thou of him, that he hath opened thine eyes? He said, He is a prophet. 18. But the Jews did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight. 19. And they asked them, saying, Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? How then doth he now see? 20. His parents answered them and said, We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind: 21. But by what means he now seeth, we know not; or who hath opened his eyes, we know not: he is of age; ask him: he shall speak for himself. 22. These words spake his parents, because they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man did confess that he was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. 23. Therefore said his parents, He is of age; ask him. 24. Then again called they the man that was blind, and said unto him, Give God the praise: we know that this man is a sinner. 25. He answered and said, Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not: one thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see. 26. Then said they to him again, What did he to thee? How opened he thine eyes? 27. He answered them, I have told you already, and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? Will ye also be his disciples? 28. Then they reviled him, and said, Thou art his disciple; but we are Moses' disciples. 29. We know that God spake unto Moses: as for this fellow, we know not from whence he is. 30. The man answered and said unto them, Why herein is a marvellous thing, that ye know not from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes. 31. Now we know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him he heareth. 32. Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. 33. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing. 34. They answered and said unto him, Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us? And they cast him out.

One would have expected that such a miracle as Christ wrought upon the blind man, should have settled his reputation, and silenced and shamed all opposition, but it had the contrary effect: instead of being embraced as a prophet for it, he is prosecuted as a criminal.

I. Here is the information that was given in to the Pharisees concerning this matter; (v. 13.) They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind. They brought him to the great Sanhedrim, which consisted chiefly of Pharisees, at least the Pharisees in the Sanhedrim were most active against Christ.

1. Some think that they who brought this man to the Pharisees, did it with a good design, to shew them that this Jesus, whom they persecuted, was not what they thought, and that he was not really a prophet, and one that gave considerable proofs of a divine mission. What hath convinced us of the truth and excellency of religion, and hath removed our prejudices against it, we should be forward, as we have opportunity, to offer to others for their conviction.

2. It should seem rather, that they did it with an ill design, to exasperate the Pharisees the more against Christ, and the more to shew the world, that for they were bitter enough of themselves. They brought him with such a suggestion as that, (ch. 11. 47. 48.) If ye let him thus alone, all men will believe on him. Note, Those rulers that are of a persecuting spirit, shall never want ill instruments about them, that will blow the coals, and make them worse.

II. The ground which was pretended for this in formation, and the colour given to it. That which is good, was never mingled but under the imputation of something evil. And the crime objected here, (v. 14.) was that, It was the sabbath-day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. The profanation of the sabbath-day is certainly wicked, and gives a man a very ill character; but the traditions of the Jews had made it that to be a violation of the sabbath, which was far from being so. Many a time this matter was contested between Christ and the Jews, that it might be settled for the benefit of the church in all ages. But it may be asked, Why would Christ not only work miracles on the sabbath-day, but work them in such a manner as he knew would give offence to the Jews? When he had healed the impotent man, why should he bid him carry his bed? Could he not have curing him so as to put a veil upon the sight of the Jews? He would not seem to yield to the imposed power of the Scribes and Pharisees; their government was illegal, their impositions were arbitrary, and their zeal for the rituals consumed the substantial of religion; and therefore Christ would not give place to them by subjection, no not for an hour. Christ was made under the law of God, but not under their laws. 2. He knew that the Scribes had both by the law the right, and by the law the right of command, and vindicate it from their corrupt gospels, and so teach us, both, that a weekly sabbath is to be perpetually observed in the church, one day in seven; (for what need was there to explain that law, if it must be presently abrogated?) and that it is not to be so ceremonially observed by us as it was by the Jews. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed, and the sabbath to be kept, not so much for its own sake, as in order to the sabbath-work. 3. Christ chose to work his cures on the sabbath-day, to dignify and sanctify the day, and to intimate that spiritual cures should be wrought mostly on the christian sabbath-day. How many blind eyes have been opened by the preaching of the gospel, that blessed eye-salve, on the Lord's day; how many important souls cured on that day! 4. The trial and examination of this matter by the Pharisees, v. 15. So much passion, prejudice, and ill-humour, and so little reason, appear here, that the discourse is nothing but cross questions. One would think, when a man in these circumstances was brought before them, they should have been so taken up in admirings the miracle, and congratulating the happiness of the poor man, that they could not have been peevish with him. But their curiosity was awakened by a man of such consequence, of humanity, and divinity too. Let us see how they teased this man.

1. They interrogated him concerning the cure itself. (v. 17.) They doubted whether he had indeed been born blind, and demanded proof of that, which even the prosecuters had acknowledged; (v. 18.) They did not mean that, they would not, that he was born blind. Many of the clearest teeth, may find it if they please; and they that resolve to hold that deceit, will never want a handle to hold it by. This was not a prudent caution, but a prejudiced infidelity. However, it was a good way that they took for the clearing of this: They called the parents of the man that had received his sight. They did, in hopes to disprove the miracle itself. parents who are to attest a miracle, and who are best fitted to do it, if they had said that they could not be sure that this was their son, and that it was only some weakness or dimness in his sight that he had been born with, which, if they had been able to get him for him, might have been cured long since, or otherwise overeated, for fear of the court, the Pharisees had gained their point, had robbed Christ of the honour of this miracle, which would have lessened the reputation of all the rest. But God's ordered and overruled this counsel of their's, that it turned to the more effectual proof of the miracle, and left them under a necessity of being either convinced or confounded.

Now in this part of the examination we have,

[1.] The questions that were put to them: (v. 19.) They asked them in an impetuous threatening way, Is this your son? Dare you swear it? Do you say he was born blind? Are you sure of it? Or did he pretend to be so, to have an excuse for his begging? How then doth he now see? That is impossible, and therefore you had better deny it. Those who cannot bear the light of truth, do all they can to eclipse it, and hinder the discovery of it. Thus the Pharisees, and the Sanhedrim, and the judases, and the scribes, and the mismanagers, rather, lead witnesses out of the way, or teach them how to conceal or disguise the truth, and so involve themselves in a double guilt, like that of Jc rhobeam, who sinned, and made Israel to sin.

[2.] Their answers to these interrogatories, in which,

First, They fully attest that which they could safely say in this matter; safely, that is, upon their own confession, they knew it was true. They knew, as they themselves into a perjurer; (v. 20.) We know that this is our son; (for they were daily conversant with him, and had such a natural affection to him as the true mother had; (1 Kings 3. 26.) which made them know it was their own;) and we know that he was born blind.

They had reason to know, it, inasmuch as it had cost them many a sad thought, and many a careful troublesome hour, about him. How often had they looked upon him with grief, and lamented their child's blindness more than all the burthens and inconveniences of their poverty, and wished he had never been born, rather than be born to such an uncomfortable life! These who are ashamed of their children, or any of their relations, because of their bodily infirmities, may take a reproof from these parents, who freely owned, This is our son, though he was born blind, and lived upon alms.

Secondly, They cautiously decline giving any evidence concerning his cure; partly, because they were not themselves eye-witnesses of it, and could say nothing to it of their own knowledge; and partly, because they found it was a tender point, and would not bear to be meddled with. And therefore having owned that he was their son, and was born blind, further these dependents say nothing. (v. 21.) By what means he now sees, we know not, or who has opened his eyes, we know not, otherwise than by hearsay; we can give no account, either by what means or by whose hand it was done.

See how the wisdom of this world teaches men to trim the matter in critical junctures. Christ was accused as a sabbath-breaker, and as an impostor. Now these parents of the child looked upon them as eye-witnesses of the cure, were yet fully assured of it, and were bound in gratitude to have borne their testimony to the honour of the Lord Jesus, who had done their son so great a kindness; but they had not courage to do it, and then though it might serve to atone for their not appearing in favour of him, that they said nothing to his prejudice; whereas in the day of trial, he that is not of us is against us. Luke 11. 23. Mark 8. 58.

That they might not be further urged in this matter, they refer themselves and the court to him: He is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself. This implies that while children are not of age, (while they are infants, such as cannot speak,) it is incumbent upon their parents to speak for them, speak to God for them in prayer, speak to the church for them in baptism; but when they are of age, it is fit that they should be asked whether they will be willing to stand to that which their parents did for them, and let them speak for themselves. This man, though he was born blind, seems to have been of quick understanding above many, which enabled him to speak for himself better than his friends could speak for him; and he told them, he did not know whether it was done to make him do good or evil. It makes up in the mind what is wanting in the body, 1 Cor. 12. 23, 24. His parents turning them over to him, was only to save themselves from trouble, and expose him; whereas they that had so great an interest in his mercy, had reason to embarrass with him in his hazards for the honour of that Jesus who had done so much for them.

Here is, (1.) The late law which the Sanhedrin had made. It was agreed and enacted by their authority. That if any man within their jurisdiction did confess that Jesus was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. Observe,

[1.] The crime designed to be punished, and so prevented by this statute, and that was embracing Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah, and discovering this by any overt act, which amounted to a confessing of him. They themselves did expect a Messiah, but they could by no means bear to think that this Jesus should be, nor admit the question whether he were so, for two reasons. First, Because his precepts were all so contrary to their traditional laws. The spiritual worship he prescribed, overthrew their formalities; nor did any thing more effectually destroy their singularity and narrow-spiritedness than that universal charity which he taught; humility and mortification, repentance and self-denial, were lessens new to them, and sounded harsh and strange in their ears. Secondly, Because his promises and appearances were so much contrary to those which the Pharisees expected. They expected a Messiah in outward pomp and splendor, that should not only free the nation from the Roman yoke, but advance the grandeur of the Sanhedrin, and make all the members of it princes and peers: and now to hear of a Messiah, whose outward circumstances were all mean and poor, whose first appearance and principal residence were in Galilee, a despised province, who never made himself known to them, nor sought their favor, whose followers were neither sword-men, nor gowmen, nor any men of honor, but contemptible fishermen, who proposed and promised no redemption but from sin, no consolation of Israel but what is spiritual and divine, and at the same time bid his followers expect the cross, and count upon persecution; this was such a revelation as in the judgment of many of the Pharisees, could change the minds of their people with such a blow to their power and interest, and such a disappointment to all their hopes, that they could never be reconciled to it, nor so much as give it a fair or patient hearing, but, right or wrong, it must be crushed.

[2.] The penalty to be inflicted for this crime. If any should own himself a disciple of Jesus, he should be deemed and taken as an apostate from the faith of the Jewish church, and a rebel and traitor against the government of it, and should therefore be put out of the synagogue, as one that had renounced himself unworthy of the honors, and incapable of the privileges, of their church; he should be excommunicated, and expelled the commonwealth of Israel. Nor was this merely an ecclesiastical censure, which a man that made no conscience of their authority, might slight; but it was, in effect, an outlawry, which excluded a man from civil community, and exposed him to the dangers of every kind. Note, First, Christ's holy religion, from its first rise, has been opposed by penal laws made against the professors of it; as if men's consciences would otherwise naturally embrace it, this unnatural force has been put upon them. Secondly, The church's artillery, when the command of it has fallen into ill hands, has often been turned against itself, and employed against the most orthodox and zealous of its members, to serve a carnal and secular interest. It is no new thing to see the cast out of the synagogue, that were the greatest beauties and blessings of it, and to hear those that expelled them say, The Lord be glorified, Isa. 66. 5.

Now of this edict it is said, 1. That the Jews had agreed it, or conspired it. Their consultation and communion herein, were a perfect conspiracy against their greatest interest, and against the Lord and his Anointed. 2. That they had thereby agreed it. Though he had been but a few months in any public character among them, and one would think, in so short a time could not have made them, jealous of him, yet thus early were they aware of his growing interest, and already agreed to do their utmost to suppress it. He had barely made his escape out of the temple, and while they saw them thus hasting to finish his attempts to get to their sons presently took this course, to make it penal for any body to own him. Thus unanimous and thus expeditions are the enemies of the church, and their counsels; but He that saith in heaven, laugheth at them, and has them in derision, and so may we.

(2.) The influence which this law had upon the parents of the blind man. They declined saying any thing of Christ, and shuffled it off to their son, because they feared the Jews. Christ had incurred the frowns of the government, to do their son a kindness, but they would not incur them, to do him any honor. Note, The fear of man brings a snare, (Prov. 29. 25.) and often makes people deny and disown Christ, and his truths and ways, and act against his consciences. Well, the parents have thus disentangled themselves, and are discharged from any concern for his success, and any interest in the examination of the man himself; the doubt of the Pharisees, whether he was born blind, was put out of doubt by them; and therefore,

2. They inquired of him concerning the manner of the cure, and made their remarks upon it, v. 15. 16.

[1.] The same question which his neighbours had put to him, now again the Pharisees asked him, how he had received his sight. This they inquired, not with any sincere desire to find out the truth, by tracing the report to the original, but with a desire to find an occasion against Christ; for if the man should relate the matter fully, they would prove Christ a sabbath-breaker; if he should vary from his former story, they would have some colour to suspect the whole story of his miracles and parables.

[2.] The same answer, in effect, which he had before given to his neighbours, he here repeats to the Pharisees: He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see. He does not here speak of the making of the clay, for indeed he had not seen it made. That circumstance was not essential, and might give the Pharisees most occasion against him, and therefore he omits it. In the former account he said, I washed, and received sight; but lest they should think it was only a glimpse for the present, which a heated imagination might fancy itself to have; he now says, "I do see: it is a complete and lasting cure." [9.]

The remarks made upon this story were very different, and occasioned a debate in the court. v. 16.

First, Some took this occasion to enforce and condemn Christ for what he had done. Some of the Pharisees said, This man is not of God, as he pretends, because he keepeth not the sabbath-day. 4. The trouble and trouble in which this censure is grounded, is very true—that the Pharisees, who are the pretenders to prophecy not sent of God; those pretenders to sanctity not born of God, who do not keep the sabbath-day. They that are of God, will keep the commandments of God; and this is his commandment, that we sanctify the sabbath. They that are of God, keep up communion with God, and delight to hear from him, and speak to him, and therefore will not keep such sabbath as they proceed from sin and darkness, the sabbath is called a sign, for the sanctifying of it is a sign of a sanctified heart, and the profaning of it a sign of a profane heart. But, The application of it to our Saviour is very unjust, for he did religiously observe the sabbath-day, and never in any instance violated it, never did otherwise than well on the sabbath-day. We are not to keep the sabbath according to the ritual of the Pharisees, but we keep it according to the command of God, and therefore, no doubt, he was of God, and his miracles proved him to be Lord also of the sabbath-day. Note, Much unrighteous and uncharitable judging is occasioned by men's making the rules of religion more strict than God by his own authority and his own wisdom, and adding their own facts and rules to God's appointments, as the Jews have done, in the case of sabbath-sacrification. We ourselves may forbear such and such things, on the sabbath-day, as we find a distinction to us, and we do well, but we must not therefore tie up others to the same strictness. Everything that we take for a rule of practice, must not presently be made a rule of judgment.

Secondly, Others spoke in his favour, and very pertinently urged, How can a man that is a sinner, do such miracles? It seems that even in this council of the ungodly there were some that were capable of a free thought, and were witnesses for Christ, even in the midst of his enemies. The matter of fact was plain, that this was a true miracle, the more it was searched into, the more it was cleared; and this brought his former like works to mind, and gave occasion to speak magnificently of them, *râma yâsin great signs, so many, that to them were made, so evident. And the inference from it is very natural: such things as these could never be done by a man that is a sinner, that is, not by any mere man, in his own name, and by his own power; or rather, not by one that is a cheat or an impostor, and in that sense a sinner; such a one may indeed shew some signs and wondrous works, but not such signs and true wonders as Christ wrought. How could a man produce such divine credentials, if he had not a divine commission? Thus there was a division among them, a schism, so the word is; they clashed in their opinion, a warm debate arose, and the house divided upon it. This God defeats the counsels of his enemies by dividing them; and by such testimonies as these given against the malice of persecutors, and the rubs they meet with, their designs against the church are sometimes rendered ineffectual, and always insubstantial.

3. After their inquiry concerning the cures, we must now observe their inquiry concerning the Author of it. And here observe, (1.) What the man said of him, in answer to their inquiry. They ask him, (v. 17.) What saith thou of him, seeing that he hath opened thine eyes? What doest thou think of his doing this? And what shall we do, to please him? If he should speak slightly of Christ, in answer to the question he is tempted to do, to please them, now that he was in their hands, as his parents had done; if he should say, I know not what to make of him, he may be a conjurer for naught, or some mountebank; they would have triumphed in it. Nothing confirms Christ's enemies in their enmity to him, so much as the very sense of the thing itself; by those that have passed for his friends. But if he should speak honourably of him, they would prosecute him upon their new law, which did not except, no, not his own patient; would make him an example, and so deter others from applying themselves to him for cures, which, though they came cheap from Christ, yet they would make them pay dear for. Or perhaps Christ's friends proposed to have the man's own sentiments concerning his Physician, and were willing to know, since he appeared to be a sensible man, what he thought of him. Note, Those whose eyes Christ has opened, know best what to say of him, and have great reason, upon all occasions, to say well of him. What think we of Christ?

To this question the poor man makes a short, plain, and direct answer: He is a Prophet, he is a man inspired and sent of God to preach, and work miracles, and delivers to the world a message of peace. There had been no prophets among the Jews for three hundred years; yet they did not conclude that they should have no more, for they knew that he was yet to come, who should seal up vision and prophecy. 9. v. 24. It should seem, this man had not any thoughts that he was the Messiah, the great Prophet, of the same rank with the other prophets. The poor blind beggar had a clearer judgment of the thing, perceiving the kingdom of God, and saw him in the eyes of a divine mission, than the masters in Israel, that assumed an authority to judge of prophets.

(2.) What they said of him, in reply to the man's testimony. Having in vain attempted to invalidate the evidence of the fact, and finding that indeed a notable miracle was wrought, and they could not deny it, they renewed their attempt to bittier it, and run it down, and do all they can to shake the man's opinion the man had of him that opened his eyes, and to convince him that he was a bad man. (v. 24.) Give God the glory, we know that this man is a sinner. Two ways this is understood: either, (1.) Be wary of advice, to take heed of ascribing the praise of his cure to a sinful man, but to give it all to God, to whom it was due; thus, under colour of shame on the man, to wound his name and his honour, as those do, who will not worship Christ as God, under pretence of zeal for this great truth, that there is but one God to be worshiped: whereas this is his declared will, that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father; and in confessing that Christ is Lord, we give glory to God the Father. When God makes use of men that are sinners, he is prepared beforehand, as he is prepared to give God the glory, for every creature is that to us as he makes it to be; and yet there is a gratitude owing to the instruments. It was a good word, Give God the praise, but here it was ill used; and there seems to be this further in it, This man is a sinner, a bad man, and therefore give the praise so much the

[2. Or by way of admiration; so some take it;]

"We know (though thou dost not, who hast but lately come, as it were, into a new world) that this man is a sinner, a great impostor; that cheats the country, this we are sure of, therefore give God praise," (as Joshua said to Achan) "by making an ingenious confession of the fraud and collusion which we are confident there is in this matter; in God's name, man, tell the truth. Thus is God's name abused in papal inquisitions, when by oaths, ex officio, they extort accusations of themselves from the inquisitors, and then, from there, from the hierarchy, they base the ground they speak of the Lord Jesus; We know that this man is a sinner, is a man of sin. In which we may observe, First, Their insolence and pride. They would not have it thought, when they asked the man what he thought of him, that they needed information; nay, they knew very well that he is a sinner, and nobody can convince him of the contrary. He had challenged them to their faces, (ch. 8. 46.) to convince him of sin, and they had nothing to say; but now behind his back they speak of him as a malefactor, convicted upon the notorious evidence of the fact. Thus false accusers make up in confidence what is wanting in proof. Secondly, The injury and indignity hereby done to the Lord Jesus. When he became man, he took upon him the form, not only of a servant, but of a sinner, (Rom. 8. 3.) and passed a sentence for all time upon him as a malefactor. Now he was represented as a sinner of the first magnitude, a sinner above all men; and, being made sin for us, he despised even this shame."

4. The debate that arose between the Pharisees and this poor man concerning Christ. They say, He is a sinner; he says, He is a prophet. As it is an encouragement to those who are concerned for the cause of Christ, to hope that it shall never be lost for want of witnesses, when the blind beggar picked up from the way-side, and made a witness for Christ, to the faces of his most impudent enemies; so it is an encouragement to those who are called out to witness for Christ, to find with what prudence and courage this man managed his defence, according to the promise, It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. Though he had never seen Jesus, he had felt his grace, and]

Now in the parley between the Pharisees and this poor man we may observe three steps.

1. He sticks to the certain matter of fact, which they endeavour to shake the evidence of. That which is doubtful, is best resolved into that which is plain, and thereof—

[1. He adheres to that which to himself at least, and to his own satisfaction, was past dispute. (v. 25.)]

"Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not, I will not now stand to dispute, nor need I, the matter is plain, and, though I should altogether hold my peace, would speak for itself;" or, as it might better be rendered, "If he be a sinner, I know it not, I see no reason to say so, but the contrary; for this one thing I know, and can be more sure of than you can boast of which you are so confident of, that whereas I am told one thing, you have no hope of convincing me of another; so say, that he has been a good friend to me, but that he is a prophet; I am both able and bound to speak well of him." Now here, First, He tacitly reprievess their great assurance of the ill character they gave of the blessed Jesus; "You say that you know him to be a sinner; I, who know him as well as you do, cannot give him any such character." Secondly, He brings in a more direct argument, viz. the power and goodness of the holy Jesus, and resists to abuse it. There is no disputing against experience, nor arguing a man out of his senses, here is one that is properly an eye-witness of the power and grace of Christ, though he had never seen him. Note, As Christ's miracles are most valued by those that have felt the want of them, that have been blind, and now see, so the most powerful and durable affections to Christ, think, every one from an experimental knowledge of him, 1 John 1. 1. Acts 4. 20.

He does not here give a nice account of the method of the cure, nor pretend to describe it philosophically, but, in short, Whereas I was blind, now I see. Thus, in the work of grace in the soul, though we cannot tell when, and how, by what instruments, and by what steps and advances, the blessed change was wrought, yet we may take the comfort of it, if we can say, "Whereas I was blind, now I see." I did live a carnal, worldly, sensual life, but, thanks be to God, it is now otherwise with me," Eph. 5. 8.

2. They endeavour to hable and stifle the evidence by a needless repetition of their inquiries into it; (v. 26.) What did he to thee? Have opened he thine eyes? They asked these questions, First, Because they wanted something to say, and would rather speak importunately, than seem to be silenced, or run aground. Thus eager disputants, that resolve they will have the last word, by such vain repetitions, to avoid the shame of being silenced, make themselves accountable for many idle words. Secondly, Because they hoped, by putting the man upon repeating his evidence, to catch him tripping in it, or wavering, and then they would think he had retained it from memory.

(2.) He upbraid them with their obstinate infidelity, and invincible prejudices, and they revile him as a disciple of Jesus, (v. 27—29.) where the man is more bold with them, and they more sharp upon him than before.

1. The man boldly upbraids them with their wilful and unreasonable opposition to the evidence of this miracle. v. 27. He could not gratify them with a repetition of the story, but bravely replied, I have told you already, and ye did not hear, wherefore would ye hear it again, will ye also be his disciples? Some think that he spake seriously, and really expecting that they would be convinced. "He has many disciples, I will be one, will you also come in among them?" Some zealous young Christians see so much reason for religion, that they are ready to think very highly of the gratitude of their mind. But it rather seems to be spoken ironically; "Will ye be his disciples? No, I know you abhor the thoughts of it; why then should ye desire to hear that which will either make you his disciples, or leave you inexusable if ye be not?" Those that wilfully shut their eyes against the light, as these Pharisees here did, First, They make themselves contemptible and base, as these here did, who are so importunate and importunate to hear the conclusion, when they had nothing to object against either of the premises. Secondly, They forfeit all the benefit of further instructions and means of knowledge and conviction: they that have been told once, and would not hear, why should they be told it again? Jer. 31. 9. See Matt. 10. 14. Thirdly, They hereby receive the curse of God in vain. This is implied in the word. (Matt. 7. 23.) That which receiveth me will not; why then would ye hear it again? Only that you may be his accusers and persecutors? Those who will not see cause to embrace Christ, and join with his followers, yet, one would think, should see cause enough not to hate and persecute him and them.

2. For this they scorn and revile him, v. 28. When they could not resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spake, they broke out into a passion, and scolded him, began to call names, and give him ill language. See what Christ's faithful witnesses must expect from the adversaries of his truth and cause; let them come upon all manner of evil to be said of them, Matt. 5. 11. The method commonly taken by unreasonable men, is, to make out with railing what is wanting in truth and reason.

First. They taunted this man for his adherence to Christ as a sinner; as if that were reproach enough, and they could not say worse of him. "We seem to be his disciples, and will leave that preference to thee, and such as thou art." They do what they can to put Christ's religion in an ill name, and to represent the profession of it as a contemptible scandalous character. They reviled him. "The vulgar reads it, malaxerant eum—they cursed him;" and what was their curse? It was this, "He thatareth the Lord is accursed" (saith St. Austin here) "ever be on us and on our children!" If we take our measures of credit and discharge from the sentiment or clamours rather of a blind deluded world, we shall glory in our shame, and be ashamed of our glory. They had no reason to call this man a disciple of Christ, he had neither seen him, nor heard him preach, only he had spoken favourably of a kindness he had done him, and this they could not believe.

Secondly, They gloried in their relation to Moses as their Master; "We are Moses' disciples, and do not either need or desire any other teacher." Note, 1. Carnal professors of religion are very apt to trust to, and be proud of, the dignities and privileges of their profession, while they are strangers to the principles and powers of their religion. These Pharisees had been before boastful of their good parentage, "We are Abraham's seed;" but of our good education, We are Moses' disciples, as if these would save them. 2. It is sad to see how much one part of religion is opposed, under colour of zeal for another part; there was a perfect harmony between Christ and Moses; Moses prepared for Christ, and Christ perfected Moses, so that they might be disciples of Moses, and become the disciples of Christ too; and yet they here put them in opposition, nor could they have persuaded Christ but under the umbrage of the abused name of Moses. Thus they who gain the doctrine of free grace, value themselves as promoters of man's duty, We are Moses' disciples; while, on the other hand, they that cancel the obligation of the law, value themselves as the assertors of free grace, and as if none were the disciples of Jesus, but they; whereas, if we rightly understand the matter, we shall see God's grace and man's duty meet together, and kiss and befriend each other.

Thirdly, They gave some sort of reason for their adhering to Moses against Christ; (v. 2.) We know that God spake unto Moses: as for this fellow, we know not whence he is. But did they not know that among other things which God spake unto Moses, this was one, that they must expect another Prophet, and a further revelation of the mind of God? Yet, with all their boasted advantage, Jesus, presuming to what God said to Moses, did appear, and gave sufficient proofs of his being that Prophet, under pretence of sticking to the old religion and the established church, they not only forsook, but forsaketh, their own mercies. In this argument of their observe.

1. How impertinently they allege, in defence of their enmity to Christ, that which none of his followers ever denied, We know that God spake unto Moses: then why may they not spake unto Moses than to any other of the prophets? what then? God spake unto Moses, and does it therefore follow that Jesus is an impostor? Moses was a prophet, it is true, and I might not Jesus be a prophet too? Moses spake handled of Jesus, (ch. 5. 46.) and Jesus spake handled of Moses; (Luke 16. 29.) they were both faithful in the same house of God. Moses a servant, Christ as a Son; therefore their pleading Moses' divine warrant in opposition to Christ's, was an affect to make as if in nothing people believe it was certain that Jesus was a false Prophet, as that Moses was a true one; whereas they were but titles.

Thus, lastly, they urge their ignorance of Christ, as a reason to justify their contempt of him; Is this fellow? Thus sincerely do they speak of the blessed Jesus, as if they did not think it worth while to charge their memories with a name so inconsiderable; they expressed themselves with as much disdain of the Shepherd of Israel, as if he had not been worthy to be set with the dust of their feet; as for this fellow, this sorry fellow, they know not where he is, he is not of the same men as we, and therefore concluded him a sonere; whereas the title, we know little of, should judge impartially of; but proud and narrow souls will think none good but themselves, and those that are in their interest. It was not long ago, that the Jews had made the contrary to this, an objection against Christ; (ch. 7. 27.) He knoweth the man whence he is, but when Christ comes, no man knoweth whence he is. Thus they could with the greatest assurance either affirm or deny the same thing, according as they saw it would serve their turn. They know not whence he was; and whose fault was that? (1.) It is certain that they ought to have inquired: the Messiah was to appear about this time, and it concerned them to look about them, and examine every indication; but these priests, like those, Jer. 2. 8. said not, Where is the Lord? (2.) It is certain that they might have known, if they had only, by searching the register, that he was born in Bethlehem; but, by inquiring into his doctrine, miracles, and conversation, they might have known that he was sent of God, and had better orders, a better commission, and far better instructions, than any they could give him. See the absurdity of infidelity; men will not know the doctrine of Christ, because they are resolved they will not believe it, and then pretend they do not believe it, because they do not know it. Such ignorance and infidelity, which support one another, aggravate one another. (5.) He reasons with them concerning this matter, and they excommunicate him.

First. He considers at their obstinate infidelity; (v. 36.) not at all dismayed by their frowns, nor shaken by their confidence, he bravely answered, Why, herein is a marvellous thing, the strangest instance of wilful ignorance that ever was heard of among men that pretended to sense, that you know not from whence he is, and yet he has opened mine eyes. Two things he wonders at.

That they should be strangers to a man so famous. He means the Pharisees, and mentions the title of the most certainly be a considerable man, and worth taking notice of; the Pharisees were men of assiduity, had a large correspondence and acquaintance, thought themselves the eyes of the church, and this watchmen; and yet that they should talk, as if they thought it beneath them to take cognizance of such a man as this, and have conversation with him, this is a strange thing indeed. There are many who pass for learned and knowing men, who understand business, and can talk sense in other things, who yet are ignorant, to a wonder, of the doctrine of Christ, who have no concern, no, not so much as a curiosity,

Vol. v. — S H
to acquaint themselves with that which the angels desire to look into.

2. That they should question the divine commission, and undertake, as if of right and unboundedly wrought a divine miracle. When they said, We know not whence he is, they meant, We know not any proof that his document and ministry are from heaven; "Now this is strange," (saith the poor man,) "that the miracle wrought upon me has not convinced you, and put the matter out of doubt ; that you, whose education and studies give you advantages above others, of discerning the things of God, that you should thus shut your eyes against the light." It is a marvelous work, and a wonder, when the wisdom of the wise dunneth perish, (Isa. 29. 14.) that they deny the truth of that which they cannot gainsay the evidence of.

Note, (1.) The unbelief of those who enjoy the means of knowledge and conviction, is indeed a marvelous thing, Mark 6. 6. (2.) Those who have themsehers experienced the power and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and regard the wisdom and power of those who reject him, and, having such good thoughts of him themselves, are amazed that others have no so too.

Had Christ opened the eyes of the Pharisees,
they would not have doubted his being a Prophet.

Secondly, He argues strongly against them, v.
31-33. They had determined concerning Jesus, that he was not of God, (v. 16.) but was a sinner, v.
24. In answer to which the man here proves not only that he was not a sinner, (r. 31.) but that he was of God, v. 33. He argues here, 1. With great knowledge. Though he could not read a letter on the book, he was well acquainted with the scripture and the things of God; he had wanted the sense of words, yet had well improved that of hearing, by which faith cometh; yet that would not have served him, if he had not had an extraordinary presence of God with him, and special aids of his Spirit, upon this occasion. 2. With great zeal for the honour of Christ, whom he could not endure to hear run down, and evil spoken of. 3. With great boldness, and courage, and unawedness, not terrified by the proudest of his adversaries. They that are ambitious of the favours of God, must not be afraid of the frowns of men. See here? (saith Dr. Whitby,) "Of a blind man and unlearned, judging more rightly of the case than that of all the learned council of the Pharisees. Whence we learn that we are not always to be led by the authority of councils, popes, or bishops; and that it is not absurd for men, sometimes, to vary from their opinions; these overseers being sometimes guilty of great over-sights.

Now the man's argument may be reduced into sixm, somewhat like that of David, Ps. 66. 18. 19.
The man determines that David had the revelation of God in his heart, Ps. 51. 12. The present man determines that God had the revelation of God in my heart, God will not hear me; here it is to the same purport, God heareth not sinners; the assumption there is, But verily God hath heard me;
here it is, Verily God hath heard Jesus, he hath been honoured with the doing of that which was never done before; the conclusion there is to the honour of God, Blessed be God; here to the honour of God, Blessed be God; and as the one is (1.) He lays it down for an undoubted truth, that none but good men are the favourites of heaven;

(v. 31.) Now we know, you know it as well as I, that God heareth not sinners, but if any man be a worshipper of God, and does his will, he heareth.
Here, [1.] The assertions rightly understood, are true.
First, Be it spoken to the terror of the wicked,

God heareth not sinners, such sinners as the Pharisees meant, when they said of Christ, He is a sinner, one that, under the umbrage of God's name, advanced the devil's interest. This speaks no discouragement to repeating returning sinners, but to those that go on still in their trespasses, that make their prayers not only consistent with, but subservient to, their sins, as the hypocrites do; God will not hear them, He doth not hear them, but will not hear them.
Nor give an answer of peace to their prayers.

Secondly, Be it spoken to the comfort of the righteous, that if any man be a worshipper of God, does his will, him he heareth. Here is, 1. The complete character of a good man; he is one that worships God and doeth his will; he is constant in his devotions at set times, and regular in his conversation at all times. He is one that makes it his business to glorify his Creator by the solemn ren-unciations of his name, and a sincere obedience to his will and law; both must go together. 2. The un-peasable comfort of such a man; him God hears;
hears his complaints, and relieves him; hears his appeals, and rights him; hears his praises, and accepts them; hears his prayers, and answers them,
Ps. 54. 15.

The application of these truths is very per-tent to prove that he at whose word such a divine power was put forth, as cured one born blind, was not a bad man, but, having manifestly such an interest in the holy God, as that he heard him always,
(Ch. 11. 41, 42.) was certainly a holy one.

(2.) He magnifies the miracle which Christ had wrought, to strengthen the argument the more; (v.
32.) Since the world began, was it not heard, that man opened the eyes of one that was born blind.
This is to shew either, 1. That it was a true miracle, and above the power of nature; it was never heard that any man, by the use of natural means, had cured one that was born blind; no doubt, this man and his parents had been very inquisitive into cases of this nature, whether any such help had been, and could hear of none, which enabled him to speak this with the more assurance. Or, [2.]
That it was an extraordinary miracle, and beyond the precedents of former miracles; neither Moses nor any of the prophets, though they did great things, ever did such things as this; wherein divine power and divine goodness seem to strive which should outshine. Moses wrought miraculous plagues, but Christ wrought miraculous cures. Note, First, The wonders works of the Lord Jesus were such, as the world had never heard of before. Secondly, It becomes those who have received mercy from God, to magnify the mercies they have received, and to speak honourably of them; not that thereby glory may redound to themselves, and they may seem to be extraordinary favourites of heaven, but that God
may have so much the more glory.

(3.) He therefore concludes, If this man were not of God, he could do nothing, nothing extraordinary, nothing beyond the common habits of men. But this man openeth the eyes of one that was born blind, notwithstanding his non-conformity to your traditions in the business of the sabbath-day. Note, What Christ did on earth sufficiently demonstrated what he was in heaven; for if he had or been sent of God, he could not have wrought such miracles.
It is true, the man of sin comes with lying wonders, but not with real miracles; it is like the simu-lant false prophet, that is a pretender, and a cheat, Deut. 18. 21, 22; Jer. 23. 24. Yet the case is so put, as that it would carry with it its own confi-uation, for it is to enforce a temptation to serve other gods, which was to set God against himself. It is true likewise, many wicked people have, in Christ's name, done many wonderful works, which does not prove their wickedness; for they wrought them to be of God, but in his name they were wrought. We may 194 ST. JOHN, IX.

each of us know by this, whether we are of God or no; What do we? What do we for God, for our souls, in working out our salvation; what do we more than others?

[2.] The Pharisees, finding themselves unable either to answer his reasons, or to bear them, fell foul upon him, and with a great deal of pride and passion broke off the discourse, v. 34. Here we are told,

First, What they said; having nothing to reply to his argument, they reflected upon his person, Thou wast altogether born in sin, and dost thou teach us? They take that ill, which they had reason to take kindly, and are cut to the heart with rage, by that which should have pricked them to the heart with repentance.

Observe, 1. How they despised him, and what a severe censure they passed upon him: Thou wast altogether born in sin, as every man is, but together so, wholly corrupt, and bearing about with thee in thy body as well as in thy soul the marks of that corruption; thou wast one whom nature stigmatized. Had he still continued blind, it had been barbarous to upbraid him with it, and from thence to gather that he was more deeply tainted with sin than other people; but it was most unjust to take notice of it, now that the cure had not only failed a blind man, but was not yet completed, but had stigmatized him as a favourite of heaven. Some take it thus; Thou hast been a common beggar, and such are too often common sinners, and thou hast, no doubt, been as bad as any of them; whereas by his discourse he had proved the contrary, and had exculpated a defectine of piety. But when proud imperious Pharisees resolve to run a man down, any thing of this kind will serve; and all things that are to confound them, are to be laid to thy account.

How they disdain to learn of him, or to receive instruction from him; Dost thou teach us? A mighty emphasis must be laid here upon thou and us. What wilt thou, a silly sorry fellow, ignorant and illiterate, that hast not seen the light of the sun a day to an end, a beggar by the way-side, of the very dregs and refuse of the town, wilt thou pretend to teach us, that are the sages of the law and gran- ducés of learning? Or that sittst in Moses' chair and are masters in Israel? Note, Proud men scorn to be taught, especially by their inferiors, whereas we should never think ourselves too old, or too wise, or too good, to learn. Those that have much wealth, would have more; and why not those that have much knowledge? And these are to be valued, by whom we may improve in learning. What a poor excuse was this for the Pharisees' infidelity, that it would be a disparagement to them to be instructed, and informed, and convinced, by such a silly fellow as this.

Secondly, What they did; they cast him out. Some understand it only of a rude and scornful dismissal of him from their council-board; they turned him out of the room by head and shoulders, and perhaps ordered their servants to kick him; they thought it time to send him far enough, when they saw so near, their conclusions: but it seems as- ther to be a judicial act; they excommunicated him; it is likely, with the highest degree of excommunic- ation, they cut him off from being a member of the church of Israel. "This poor man" (says Dr. Lightfoot) "was the first confessor, as John Baptist was the first martyr of the Christian church." There was a law made, that if any confessed Jesus to be the Christ, he should be cast out of the syna- gogues; but this man had only said of Jesus that he was a Prophet, was of God; and yet they stretch the law to bring him under the lash of it, as if he had confessed him to be the Christ. To be justly excommunicated and cast out of a pure church, clavum non - not when the key commits no error, is a very dreadful thing; for what is so bound on earth, is bound in heaven; but to be cast out of a corrupt church, (which it is our duty to go out of,) and that unjustly, though cast out with anathema, and all the bagheur ceremonies of bell, book, and candle, is what we have no reason at all to dread or be aggrieved at. The curse causeless shall not come. If they cast Christ's followers out of their syna- gogues, as he foretells, (ch. 16. 2.) there is no harm done, when they are become synagogues of Satan.

33. Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and when he had found him, he said unto him, Dost thou believe on the Son of God? 36. He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him? 37. And Jesus said unto him, Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee. 38. And he said, Lord, I believe. And he worshipped him.

In these verses, we may observe,

1. The tender care which our Lord Jesus took of this poor man, (v. 35.) When Jesus heard that they had cast him out, (for it is likely the town ran of it, and every body cried out shame upon them,) he had compassion upon him, and went to take him, and seeing him, and looking after him, that he might encourage and comfort him. Because he had to the best of his knowledge, spoken so very well, so bravely, so boldly, in defence of the Lord Jesus. Note, Jesus Christ will be sure to stand by his witnesses, and own those that own him and his truth and ways. Earthly princes neither do, nor can, take cognizance of all that vindicate their own, and their servants, and their friends, for fear of losing them. But Jesus Christ knows and observes all the faithful testimonies we bear to him at any time, and a book of remembrance is written, and it shall redeem not only to our credit hereafter, but our comfort now. 2. Because the Phar- isees had cast him out, and abused him. Beside the common regard which the righteous Judge of the world has to those who suffer wrongfully, (Ps. 105. 6.) there is no particular notice taken of those that suffer in the cause of Christ and for the testimony of a good conscience. Here was one poor man suffering for Christ, and he took care that as his afflictions abounded, his consolations should much more abound. Note, (1.) Though persecutors may exclude good men from their communion, yet they cannot exclude them from communion with Christ, nor put them out of the way of his visits, Happy they who have a Friend that men cannot deprive them of. (2.) Jesus Christ will graciously find and take up those who for his sake are unjustly rejected and cast out by men. He will be a hiding-place to his out-casts, and appear to the joy of these whom their brethren hatred and cast out.

11. The comfortable assurance Christ had with him, wherein he brings him acquainted with the consolation of Israel. He had well improved the knowledge he had, and now Christ gives him further instruction; for he that is faithful in a little, shall be intrusted with more, Matt. 25. 12. 1

1. Our Lord Jesus examines his faith; Dost thou believe on the Son of God? Dost thou give cred- it to the promises of the Messiah? Dost thou ex- pect his coming, and art thou ready to receive and embrace him when he is manifested to thee? This was that faith of the Son of God which they lived by, and they had that faith which is the substance of hope, and the evidence of things hoped for. (1.) The Messiah is here called the Son of God, and so the Jews had learned to call him from the prophecies, Ps. 2. 7.—89. 27. See ch. 1. 49. Then art the Son of God, that is, the true Messiah. They that expected the temporal kingdom of the Mes siah, delighted rather in calling him the Son of David, which gave more countenance to that expectation, Matt. 22. 42. But Christ, that he might give us an idea of his kingdom, as purely spiritual and divine, calls himself the Son of God, and rather Son of man in general, than of David in particular. (2.)
The desires and expectations of the Messiah, which the Old Testament saints had, guided by, and grounded on, a desire to have a Messiah who should satisfy his curiosity with the sight of him, but that he might the more firmly believe in him, and profess his faith, and know whom he had believed.
See Cant. 5. 6, 7.—3. 2, 3. It is Christ only that can direct us to himself. (2.) Others think he did know that this person who talked with him, was Jesus, the same that cured him, whom he believed a great and good physician; but that he did not yet know, and talk with as he was, or was to be, the Son of God, and the ture Messiah. "Lord, I believe there is a Christ to come; thou hast given me bodily sight, tell me, O tell me, who and where this Son of God is."
Christ's question intimated that the Messiah was come, and was now among them, which he presently takes the hint of, and asks, Where is he, Lord?
The question was rational and just: Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him? For how could he believe in one of whom he had not heard; the work of ministers is to tell us who the Son of God is, that we may believe on him, ch. 20. 29.
3. Our Lord Jesus graciously reveals himself to him as that Son of God, on whom he must believe;
(ch. 27.) Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talked with thee; and nearest to thee, not so near as out the Son of God. Behold the Word in us. We do not find that Christ did thus expressly, and in so many words, reveal himself to any other, as to this man here, and to the woman of Samaria. I that speak unto thee am he; he left others to find out by arguments who he was, but to these weak and foolish things of the world he chose to manifest himself, so not to the wise and prudent.
Christ here describes himself to this man by two things, which express his great favour to him.
(1.) Thou hast seen him; and he was much indebed to the Lord Jesus for opening his eyes, that he might see him. Now he was made sensible, more than ever, what an unspeakable mercy it was to be cured of his blindness, that he might see the Son of God, a sight which rejoiced his heart more than that of the sight of the world. Note. The greatest comfort of bodily eyesight, is, its serviceableness to our faith and the interest of our souls. How contentedly might this man have returned to his former blindness, like old Simeon, now that his eyes had seen God's salvation? If we apply it to the opening of the eyes of the mind, it intimates that spiritual sight is of infinite value to our comfort. "Now we are this end, that we might see Christ," 2 Cor. 4. 6. Can we say that by faith we have seen Christ, seen him in his beauty and glory, in his ability and willingness to save, so seen him
as to be satisfied concerning him, to be satisfied in him? Let us give him the praise, who opened our eyes.
(2.) It is he that talketh with thee; and he was indebed to Christ for condescending to do this. He was not only favoured with a sight of Christ, but was admitted into fellowship and communion with him. Great princes are willing to be seen by those whom they will not be safe to talk with. But Christ, by his word and Spirit, talks with those whose desires are toward him, and in talking with them manifests himself to them, as he did to the two disciples, when he talked their hearts warm, Luke 24. 32. Observe, This poor man was solicit-ously inquiring after the Saviour, when at the same time he saw him, and was talking with him. Note, Jesus Christ is often near the souls that seek him than they themselves are aware of. Doubting distians are sometimes saying, Where is the Lord? and fearing that they are cast out from his sight, when at the same time it is he that talks with them, and puts strength into them.
4. The poor man readily entertains this surprising revelation, and, in a transport of joy and wonder, he said, Lord, I believe, and he worshipped him.
(1.) He proceeded in faith in Christ. I believe thee to be the Son of God. He would not dipute any thing that he said, who had shewed such mercy to him, and wrought such a miracle for him, and doubt of the truth of a doctrine which was confirmed by such signs. Believing with the heart, he thus confesses with the mouth; and now the bruised reed was become a cedar.
(2.) He went with Christ to him. He worshipping him, not only gave him the civil respect due to a great man, and the acknowledgments owing to a kind benefactor, but herein gave him divine honour and worshipped him as the Son of God manifested in the flesh. None but God is to be worshipped; so that in worshipping Jesus, he owned him to be God.
Note. True faith will shew itself in a humble adoration of the Lord Jesus. He who believe in him, will see all the reason in the world to worship him.
We never read any more of this man; but, it is very likely, from henceforward he became a constant follower of Christ.
39. And Jesus said, For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind. 40. And some of the Pharisees which were with him heard these words, and said unto him, Are we blind also? 41. Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remains.

Christ having spoken comfort to the poor man that was persecuted, here speaks conviction to his persecutors, a specimen of the distributions of trouble and rest at the great day, 2 Thess. 1. 6, 7. Probably, this was not immediately after his discourse with the man, but he took the next opportunity that offered itself, to address the Pharisees.
1. Here is the account Christ gives of his design in coming into the world; (v. 39.) "For judgment
I am come to order and administer the great affairs of the kingdom of God among men, and am invested with a judicial power in order thereunto, to be executed in conformity to the wise counsels of God, and in pursuance of them." What Christ spake, he spake not as a preacher in the pulpit, but as a king upon the throne, and a judge upon the bench.
His business into the world was great, he came to keep the assizes and general gaol-delivery; he came for judgment, that is, 1. To preach a doctrine and a law which would try men, and effectually discover and distinguish them, and would be completely hit, in all respects, to be the rule of government in all, and of judgment shortly. 2. To make a difference between men, by revealing the thoughts of many hearts, and laying open men's true characters, by this one test, whether they were well or ill affected to him. 3. To change the face of government in his church, to abolish the Jewish ceremony, to take down that fabric, which, though erected for the time by the hand of God himself, yet by tract of time has been corrupted, and by the incurable corruptions of the managers of it was become rotten and dangerous, and to erect a new building by another model, to institute new ordinances and offices, to abrogate Judaism and enact Christianity; for this judgment he came into the world, and it was a great revolution.

This great truth he explains by a metaphor borrowed from the miracle he had lately wrought. That they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind. Such a difference of Christ's coming is often spoken of: to some his gospel is a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death.

(1.) This is applicable to nations and people, that the Gentiles, who had long been destitute of the light of divine revelation, might see it; and the Jews, who had been from the start, and by the incurable corruptions of the managers of it, had become rotten and dangerous, and to erect a new building by another model, to institute new ordinances and offices, to abrogate Judaism and enact Christianity; for this judgment, he came into the world, and great blindness is happened unto Israel, and their eyes are darkened.

(2.) To particular persons. Christ came into the world, [1.] Intentionally and designedly to give sight to them that were spiritually blind; by his word to reveal the object, and by his Spirit to heal the organ, the inward precious souls might be turned from darkness to light. He came for judgment, that is, to set those at liberty from their prison, that were willing to be released, Isa. 51. 1. [2.] Eventually, and in the issue, that those who see, might be made blind; that those who have a high conceit of their own wisdom, and set up in that in contradiction to divine revelation, might be sealed up in ignorance and infidelity. The preaching of the cross was foolishness to those who were in the world, and an infatuation to those, who by wisdom knew not God. Christ came into the world for this judgment, to administer the affairs of a spiritual kingdom seated in men's minds. Whereas in the Jewish church, the blessings and judgments of God's government were mostly temporal, now the method of administration should be changed; and as the good subjects of his kingdom should be blessed with spiritual blessings in heavenly things, as arise from a due illumination of the mind, so the rebels should be punished with spiritual plagues, not war, famine, and pestilence, as formerly, but such as arise from a judicial infatuation, hardness of heart, terror of conscience, strong delusions, vile affections. In this way Christ will judge between cattle and cattle, Ezek. 34. 17.

II. Here is the Pharisees' answer to this. They would have not designed to learn any good from him, but to form evil against him; and they said, Are we blind also? When Christ said that they who saw, should by his coming be made blind, they apprehended that he meant them who were the seers of the people, and valued themselves on their insight and foresight. "Now," say they, "we know that the common people are blind: but are we blind also? What have we done, the doctors, the learned in the law, the great teachers in the schools—are we blind too?" This is scandalum magnatum—a libel on the great. Note, Frequently those that need reproof most, and deserve it best, though they have wit enough to discern a fact one, have not grace enough to hear a just one. These Pharisees took this reproach for a reproach, as those lawyers, Luke 11. 39. "Are we blind also?" Darest thou say that we are blind? Wherefore, what judgment art thou building, or in a foundation, for values, and mulls to it? Note, Nothing fortifies men's corrupt hearts more against the convictions of the world, nor more effectually repels them, than the good opinion, especially if it be a high opinion, which others have of them; as if all that had gained applause with men, must needs obtain acceptance with God, then whatever, is more false and deceitful, for God sees not as man sees by the eye.

III. Here is Christ's answer to this evil, which, if it did not convince them, yet silenced them; If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see, therefore your sin is manifest. They gloried in it, that they were not blind, as the common people, were not so credulous and manageable as they, but would see with their own eyes, having libels, as they thought, sufficient for their own conduct, so they that needed not any body to lead them. This very thing which they gloried in, Christ here tells them, was their shame and ruin. For,

1. If ye were blind, ye should have no sin. (1.) If ye had been really ignorant, your sin had not been so deeply aggravated, nor should ye have had so much sin to answer for, as now ye have. If ye were blind, as the poor Gentiles are, and many of your own poor subjects, from whom ye had taken the key of knowledge, ye should have had comparatively no sin. The times of ignorance God winked at; inscrutable ignorance, though it does not justify sin, excuses it, and lessens the guilt. It will be more tolerable with those that perish for lack of vision, than for those that rebel against the light.

(2.) If ye had been sensible of your own blindness, if when ye would see nothing else, ye could have seen the need of one to lead you, ye would have accepted Christ as your guide, and then ye would have had no sin, ye would have submitted to an evangelical righteousness, and have been put into a justified state. Note, Those that are convinced of their disease, are in a fair way to be cured; but there is not a greater hindrance to the salvation of souls than self-sufficiency.

*But now ye say, We see; now that ye have knowledge, and are instructed out of the law, your sin is highly aggravated; and now that ye have a conceit of that knowledge, and think ye see your way better than any body can show it you, therefore your sin remains, your case is desperate, and your disease incurable. And as those are most blind, who will not see, so their blindness is most dangerous, and to them they do see. No patients are so well managed as those in a frenzy, who say that they are well, and nothing ails them. The sin of those who are self-conniving and self-confident, remains, for they reject the gospel of grace, and therefore the guilt of their sin remains unpardoned, and they forfeit the Spirit of grace, and therefore the power of their sin's remains unbroken. Scour through a man's eye in his own conceit. How vast then the Pharisees say, We see; Those who make hope of a feast, of a publican and a harlot, than of such.

CHAP. X.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Christ's parabolic discourse concerning the marriage of the King, the feast, the feast; the vineyard, and the Shepherd of the sheep, v. 11—18. 2. The various sentiments of people upon it, v. 19—21. 3. The dispute Christ had with the Jews in the temple at the feast of dedication, v. 22—30. 4. His departure into the country therewith, v. 39—44. 1. VERILY, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheep-fold, but climbeth up some other

And again. 21x112] tenances ther. 22x153] my knoweth this with which he spake unto them. 7. Then said Jesus unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. 8. All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers: but the sheep did not hear them. 9. I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture. 10. The thief cometh not, but for to steal, and to kill, and to destroy: I come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly. 11. I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. 12. But he that is an hireling, and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep. 13. The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep. 14. I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. 15. As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father: and I lay down my life for the sheep. 16. And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd. 17. Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. 18. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father.

It is not certain whether this discourse was at the feast of dedication in the winter, (spoken of v. 22.) which may be taken as the date, not only of what follows, but of what goes before; (that which connotes this, is, that Christ, in his discourse there, carries on the metaphor of the sheep, (v. 26, 27.) from whence it seems that that discourse and this were at the same time;) or whether this was a continuation of his parley with the Pharisees, in the close of the foregoing chapter. The Pharisees supported themselves in their opposition to Christ with this principle, that they were the pastors of the church, and that Jesus, having no commission from them, was an intruder and an impostor, and therefore the people were bound in duty to stick to them against him. In opposition to this, Christ here describes who were the false shepherds, and who the true, leaving them to infer what they were.

1. Here is the parable or similitude proposed; (v. 1. 5.) it is borrowed from the custom of that country, in the management of their sheep. Similitudes, used for the illustration of divine truths, should be taken from those things that are most familiar and common, that the things of God be not clouded by that which should clear them. The preface to this discourse is solemn, Verily, verily, I say unto you— Amen, Amen. This vehement asseveration speaks of some certainties, of such weight, as he said; we find Amen doubled in the church's praises and prayers, Ps. 42. 13.—72. 19.—89. 52. If we would have our Amen accepted in heaven, let Christ's Amen be prevailing on earth, his repeated Amen.

In the parable we have,

1. The evidence of a thief and a robber, that comes to do mischief to the flock, and damage to the owner, v. 1. He enters not by the door, as having no lawful cause of entry, but climbs up some other way, at a window, or some breach in the wall. How industrious are wicked people to do mischief! What plots will they lay, what pains will they take, what hazards will they run, in their wicked pursuits? This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of God.

2. There is another that enters by the rightftiil owner, who has a property in the sheep, and a care for them; He enters in by the door, as having authority, (v. 2.) and he comes to do them some good office or other, to bind up that which is broken, and strengthen that which is sick, Ezek. 34. 16. Sheep need man's care, and, in return for it, are serviceable to man; (1 Cor. 9. 7.) they clothe and feed those by whom they are esteemed and fed.

3. The ready entrance that the shepherd finds; (v. 3.) To him the porter openeth. Anciently they had their sheep-folds within the outer gates of their houses, for the greater safety of their flocks, so that none could come to them the right way, but such as the porter opened to, or the master of the house gave the keys to.

4. The care he takes, and the provision he makes for his sheep; The sheep hear his voice, when he speaks familiarly to them, when they come into the fold, as men now do to their dogs and horses; and, which is more, he calls his own sheep by name, so exact is the notice he takes of them, the account he keeps of them; and he leads them out from the fold to the green pastures; and (v. 4, 5.) when he turns them out to graze, he does not drive them, but (such was the custom in those times,) he goes before them, to prevent any mischief or danger that might meet them, and they, being used to it, follow him, and are safe.

5. The strange attendance of the sheep upon the shepherd; They know his voice, so as to discern his mind by it, and to distinguish it from that of a stranger; (for he knows his own, Isa. 53.) and a good stranger they do not follow, but, as suspecting some ill design, will flee from him, not knowing his voice, but that it is not the voice of their own shepherd. This is the parable; we have the key to it, Ezek. 34. 31. Ye my flock are men, and I am your God.

Let us observe something from the parable itself.

(1.) That good men are chiefly compared to sheep. Men, as creatures depending on their Creator, are so compared; and those that are his shepherds, as good men, as new creatures, have the good qualities of sheep, harmless and inoffensive as sheep; meek and quiet, without noise; patient as sheep under the hand both of the shearer and of the butcher: useful and profitable, tame and tractable, to the shepherd, and sociable one with another, and much used in sacrifices.

(2.) The church of God in the world is a sheep-fold, in which the children of God that were scattered abroad, are gathered together, (ch. 11. 32.) and in all the earth there is a good fold, Ezek. 34. 14. See Mic. 2. 12. This fold is well fortified, for God himself is as a wall of fire about it, Zech. 2. 5.

(5.) This sheep-fold lies much exposed to thieves and robbers; crafty seducers that debauch and deceive, and cruel persecutors that destroy and devour,ulous wolves, Acts 20. 29. Thieves who would steal Christ's sheep from him, to sacrifice them to death, and lead their food from them, that they might perish for lack of it. Wolves in sheep's clothing, Matt. 7. 15.

(4.) The great Shepherd of the sheep takes wonderful care of the flock and all that belong to it. God is the great Shepherd, Ps. 23. 1—80. 1. He knows them that are his, calls them by name, marks them for himself, leads them out to fat pastures, makes them both feed and rest there; speaks comfortably to them, guards them by his providence, guides them by his Spirit and word, and goes before them, to set them in the way of his steps.

(5.) The under-shepherds, who are intrusted to feed the flock of God, ought to be careful and faithful in the discharge of that trust; magistrates must defend them, and protect and advance all their secular interests; ministers must serve them in their spiritual interests. The word of God faithfully opened and applied, and with gospel-ordinances duly administered, taking the oversight of them; they must enter by the door of a regular ordination, and to such the porter will open; the Spirit of Christ will set before them an open door, give them authority in the church, and assurance in their own bosoms. They must know the members of their flocks by name, and watch over them; must feed and lay down all bread following him, because they know not his voice. It is dangerous following those in whom we discern not the voice of Christ, and who would draw us from faith in him to fancies concerning him. And they who have experienced the power and efficacy of divine truths upon their souls, and have the savour and relish of them, have a strong sagacity to discover Satan's wiles, and to discern between good and evil.

II. The Jews ignorance of Christ and the meaning of this discourse; (v. 6.) Jesus spake this parable to them, this figurative, but wise, elegant, and instructive discourse, but they understood not what the things were which he spake unto them; were not aware whom he meant by the thieves and robbers, and whom by the good Shepherd. It is the sin and shame of many who hear the word of Christ, that they do not understand it, and they do not because they will not, and because they will misconstrue it. They have no acquaintance with, nor taste of, the things themselves, and therefore do not understand the parables and comparisons with which they are illustrated. The Pharisees had a great conceit of their own knowledge, and could not hear that it should be questioned, and yet they had not sense enough to understand the things that Jesus spake of; they were very incapable. Frequently the greatest pretenders to knowledge are most ignorant in the things of God.

III. Christ's explication of this parable, opening the particulars of it fully. Whatever difficulties there may be in the sayings of the Lord Jesus, we shall find him ready to explain himself, as he be but willing to understand him. We shall find the scriptures to explain another, and the blessed Spirit interpreter to the blessed Jesus.

Christ, in the parable, had distinguished the shepherd from the robber by this, that he enters in by the door. Now, in the explication of the parable, he makes himself to be both the door by which the shepherd enters, and the Shepherd that enters in by the door. Though it may be a solemnism in the oracles to mix names together, and to make Christ have his authority from himself, as he has life in himself; and himself to enter by his own blood, as the door, into the holy place.

1. Christ is the door. This he saith to them who pretended to seek for righteousness, but, like the Solomonites, wearied themselves to find the door, where it was not to be found. He saith it to the Jews, who would be thought God's only shepherds, and to the Pharisees, who would be thought their only shepherds; I am the door of the sheep-fold; the door of the church. (1.) He is a door shut, to keep out thieves and robbers, and such as are not fit to be admitted. The shutting of the door is the securing of the house; and what greater security has the church of God than the interposition of the Lord Jesus, and his body, laying power, and godliness, before it, in all its glory and power? It is a door open, for passage and communication. (2.) By Christ, as the door, we have our first admission into the flock of God, ch. 14. 6. [2.] We go in and out in a religious conversation, assisted by him, accepted in him; walking up and down in his name, Zech. 10. 12. [3.] By him God comes to his church, visits it, and communicates himself to it. [4.] By him, the door of the flock of God is opened into the heavenly kingdom, Matt. 25. 34. More particularly,

First, Christ is the door of the shepherds, so that none who come not in by him, are to be accounted pastors, but (according to the rule laid down, v. 1.) thieves and robbers; (though they pretended to be shepherds;) but the sheik did not hear them. This refers to all those that had the character of shepherds in Israel, whether magistrates or ministers, who were no better than robbers, or mere pretenders to the name of the Messiah, or any other expectations of Israel than what were suggested by their own carnal interest.

Observe, 1. The character given of them; they are thieves and robbers; (v. 8.) all that went before him, not in time, many of them were faithful shepherds, but all that anticipated his commission, and went before he sent them, (Jer. 23. 21.) that assumed a precedence and superiority above him, as the anti-christ is said to do himself, 2 Thess. 2. 3. The Scribes, and Pharisees, and chief priests, all them as many as have come before me, that have endeavoured to forestall my interest, and to prevent my gaining any room in the minds of people, by possessing them with prejudices against me, they are thieves and robbers, and steal those hearts which he has no title to, defrauding the right owner of his property.

They condemned our Saviour as a thief and robber, because he did not come in as the door, nor take out a licence from them; but he shews that they ought to have received their commission from him, and to have been admitted by him, and to have come after him, which because they did not, but stepped before him, they were thieves and robbers. They would not come in as his disciples, and therefore were condemned as usurpers, and the other pretended estates vacated and superseded. Now, Rivals with Christ are not only of his church, however they pretend to be shepherds, but shepherds of shepherds.

2. The care taken to preserve the sheep from them, but the sheep did not hear them. Those that had a true savour of pietæ, that were spiritual and heavenly, and sincerely devoted to God and godliness, could by no means approve of the traditions of the elders, nor relish their broad-slates. God's disciples, without any particular instructions from their Master, made no conscience of eating with unwashed hands, or plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath-day; for nothing is more opposite to true Christianity than Pharisaism is; nor any thing more disrespectful to a soul truly devout than their hypocritical duties.

& 2ndly, Christ is the Door of the sheep; (v. 9.) By me (Acts through me as the door) if any man enter into the fold, as one of the flock, he shall be saved; shall not only be safe from thieves and robbers, but he shall be happy, he shall go in and out.

Here are, 1. Plain directions how to come into the fold; we must come in by Jesus Christ as the door. By faith in him as the great Mediator between God and man, we come into covenant and communion with God. There is no entering into God's church but by coming into Christ's church; nor are any looked upon as members of the kingdom of God among men but those that are willing to submit to the grace and government of the Redeemer. We must enter by the true door of faith (Acts 14. 27.) since the door of innocency is shut against us, and that pass become unpassable, Gen. 3. 24.

2. Precious promises to those that observe this direction:

(1.) They shall be saved hereafter; that is the privilege of their home; these sheep shall be saved from being distressed and impoverished by divine justice; for trespass done, satisfaction being made for the damage by their great Shepherd; saved from being a prey to the roaring lion; they shall be for ever happy.

(2.) In the mean time they shall go in and out, and find pasture; that is the privilege of their way. They shall have their conversation in the world by the grace of Christ, shall be in his fold as a man at his own house, where he has free ingress, egress, and regress. True believers are at home in Christ; when they go out, they are not shut out as strangers, but have liberty to come in again; when they come in, they are not shut in as trespassers, but have liberty to go out. They go out to the field in the morning, they come in to the fold at night; and in both the Shepherd leads and keeps them, and they find pasture and rest in both. They are in the fold in the fold. In public, in private, they have the word of God to converse with, by which their spiritual life is supported and nourished, and out of which their gracious desires are satisfied; they are replenished with the goodness of God's house.

2. Christ is the Shepherd; v. 10, &c. He was prophesied of under the Old Testament as a Shepherd, Isa. 40, 11. Ezek. 34. 12—27. Zech. 13. 7. In the New Testament he is spoken of as the great Shepherd, (Heb. 13. 20.) the chief Shepherd, (1 Pet. 5. 4.) the Shepherd and bishop of our souls, 1 Pet. 2. 25. God, our great owner, the sheep of whose pasture we are by creation, has constituted his Son Jesus to be our Shepherd; and here again and again and again owns the relation. He has all that care of the church, and all that affection that a good shepherd has of his flock; and expects all that attendance and observance from the church, and every believer, that the shepherds in those countries had from their flocks.

(1.) Christ is a Shepherd, and not as the thief, not as that come not in by the door. Observe,

1. The mischiefous design of the thief; (v. 10.) The thief cometh not with any good intent, but to steal and to kill, and to destroy. First, Those whom they steal, whose hearts and affections they steal from Christ and his pastures, they kill and destroy spiritually; for the heretics they privately bring in, are damnable. Deceivers of souls are murderers of souls. The Scripture by keeping it in an unknown tongue, steal away the experiments by making them and altering the property of them, that steal away Christ's ordinances to put their own inventions in the room of them, they kill and destroy; ignorance and idolatry are destructive things. Secondly, Those whom they cannot steal, whom they can neither lead, drive, nor carry away, to himself, they use in Christ's stead sacrifices and massacres to kill and destroy corporally. He that will not suffer himself to be robbed, is in danger to be slain.

[2.] The gracious design of the Shepherd; he is come,

First, To give life to the sheep. In opposition to the design of the thief, which is to kill and destroy, which was the design of the Scribes and Pharisees; Christ saith, I am come among men, 1. That they might have life. He came to put life into the flock, the church in general, which had seemed rather like a valley full of dry bones than like a pasture covered over with flocks. Christ came to vindicate divine truths, to purify divine ordinances, to redress grievances, and to revive dying zeal, to spread them of his flock over the earth, which were hitherto broken, (Exek. 34. 16.) and this to his church is as life: from the dead. He came to give life to particular believers; life is inclusive of all good, and stands in opposition to the death threatened; (Gen. 2. 17.) that we might have life, as a criminal has when he is pardoned, as a sick man when he is cured, a dead man when he is raised, and to make life glorious, and at last glorified. 2. That they might have it more abundantly, πλοεις περιπλοεις. As we read it, it is comparative, that they might have a life more abundant than that which was lost and for feitied by sin; more abundant than that which was promised by the law of Moses, length of days in Canaan; more abundant than could have been expected, or than we are able to ask or think. But it may be construed without anote of comparison, that they might have abundance, or, might have it abundantly.

Christ came to give life and σωτηρία, something more, something better, life with advantage; that in Christ we might not only live, but live comfortably, live plentifully, live and rejoice; life in abundance is eternal life; life without death, or fear of death; life without sin; life without care.

2dly, To give his life for the sheep; and this, that he might give life to them; (v. 11.) The good Shepherd gave his life for the sheep. 1. It is the protectory of every good shepherd to hazard and expose his life for the sheep. Jacob did so, when he would go through such a fatigue to attend them, Gen. 31. 40. So did David, when he slew the lion and bear; and the shepherds. Such a shepherd of souls was St. Paul, who would gladly spend, and be spent, for their service, and counted not his life dear to him, in comparison with their salvation. But, 2. It was the prerogative of the great Shepherd, to give his life to his purchase his flock, (Acts 20. 28.) to satisfy for their trespass, and to shed his blood to wash and cleanse them.

3dly, Christ is a good shepherd, and not as a hireling; there were many that were not shepherds, aiming to kill and destroy the sheep, but passed for shepherds, yet were very careless in the discharge of their duty, and through their neglect the flock was greatly damaged; foolish shepherds, idle shepherds, Zech. 11. 15. 17. In opposition to these,

[1.] Christ here calls himself the good Shepherd, (v. 11.) and again, (v. 14.) he saith, I am that Shepherd, that good Shepherd whom God had pro mixed. Note, Jesus Christ is the best of shepherds, the best in the world to take the oversight of souls, none so skilful, so faithful, so tender, as he, no such feeder and leader, no such protector and healer of souls as he.

[2.] He proves himself so, in opposition to all hirelings, (i. 12-14.) We observe,

He was. The carelessness of the unfaithful shepherd described: (i. 12, 13.) he that is a hireling, that is employed as a servant, and is paid for his pains, whose own the sheep are not, who has neither profit nor loss by them, he sees the wolf coming, or some other danger threatening; and he leaves the sheep to the wolf, for in truth he careth not for them. Here is plain reference to that of the idle shepherd, Zech. 11. 17.

Here is the description of bad shepherds, magistrates and ministers, both their bad principles and their bad practices.

1. Their bad principles, the root of their bad practices. What makes those that have the charge of souls in trying times to betray their trust, and in quiet times to mind it? What makes them false, and attach themselves to the most low, the hirelings, and care not for the sheep. That is, (1.) The wealth of the world is the chief of their good; it is because they are hirelings. They undertook the shepherd's office, as a trade to live and grow rich by, not as an opportunity of serving Christ and doing good. It is the love of money, and of their own bellies, that carries them on in it. Not that there are hirelings, who, while the shepherd sleeps, steal away the flock; but because they are hirelings, and care not for the sheep. That is, (2.) The work of their place is the least of their care; they value not the sheep, are unconcerned in the souls of others, their business is to be their brothers' lords, not their brothers' keepers or helpers; they seek their own things, and do not, like Timothy, naturally care for the state of souls; what can be expected but that they will flee when the wolf comes? He careth not for the sheep, for he is one whose own the sheep are not; in one respect we may say of the best of the under shepherds, that the sheep are not their own, they have some degree of self-seeking in their care of the sheep: (Feed my sheep and my lambs, saith Christ;) but in respect of dearness and affection they should be their own. Paul looked upon those as his own, whom he called his dearly beloved and longed for. Those who do not cordially espouse the church's interests, and make them their own, will not long be faithful to them.

2. Their bad practices, the effect of these bad principles, i. 12. See here, (1.) How basely the hireling deserts his post; when he sees the wolf coming, though then there is most need of him, he leaves the sheep and flees. Note, Those who mind their self more than their duty, are an easy prey to Satan's temptations. (2.) Howfatal the consequences are; the hireling taints the sheep might look to themselves, but it does not prove so, the wolf catches them, and the flock perishes. They have no union or interest in the property in them: (Feed my sheep and my lambs, saith Christ;) but in respect of dearness and affection they should be their own. Paul looked upon those as his own, whom he called his dearly beloved and longed for. Those who do not cordially espouse the church's interests, and make them their own, will not long be faithful to them.

Secondly, See here the grace and tenderness of the good Shepherd, set over against the former, as it was in the prophecy, (Ezek. 34. 21, 22, 23.) I am the good Shepherd. It is matter of comfort to the church and all her friends, that, however she may be damaged and endangered by the treachery and mismanagement of her under officers, the Lord Jesus is, and will be, as he ever has been, the good Shepherd.

Here are two great instances of the shepherd's goodness.

1. His acquainting himself with his flock, with all that belong, or in any wise appertain to his flock, which are of two sorts, both known to him.

[3.] He knows himself, in a sense of the word, of his flock, (x. 14, 15.) as the good shepherd; (v. 4, 5.) I know my sheep, and am known of mine. Note, There is a mutual acquaintance between Christ and true believers: they know one another very well, and knowledge notes affection.

[1.] Christ knows his sheep. He knows with a distinguishing eye who are his sheep, and who are not; he knows them by the marks which God has put upon them, and the goats under their most plausible disguises. He knows with a favourable eye those that in truth are his own sheep; he takes cognizance of their state, concerns himself for them, has a tender and affectionate regard to them, and is continually mindful of them in the intercession he ever lives to make within the veil; he visits them graciously by the Spirit, and has communion with them, he knows them, he approves and accepts of them, as Ps. 1. 6.

2. He is known of them. He observes them with an eye of favour, and they observe him with an eye of faith. Christ's knowing his sheep, is put before their knowing him, for he knew and loved us first; (John 4. 19.) and it is not too much our knowing him as our being known of him, that is our happiness, Gal. 4. 9. Yet it is the character of Christ, as a shepherd, that they know him; know him from all pretenders and intruders; they know his mind, know his voice, know by experience the power of his death. Christ speaks here as if he gloried in being known by his sheep, and thought their respect an honour to him.

Upon this occasion Christ mentions (v. 15.) the mutual acquaintance between his Father and him: As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father. Now this may be considered, either, First, As the ground of the intimate acquaintance and relation which subsist between Christ and believers. The covenant of grace, which is the bond of that relation, is founded in the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son, which we may be sure, stands firm; for the Father and the Son understood the Father, and there could be no mistake which might leave the matter at any uncertainty, or bring it into any hazard. The Lord Jesus knows whom he hath chosen, and is sure of them; (ch. 13. 18.) and they also know whom they have trusted, and are sure of him; (2 Tim. 1. 12.) and the ground of both is the perfect knowledge which the Father and the Son had of one another's mind, when the council of grace was between them both. Or, Secondly, As an apt similitude, illustrating the intimacy that is between Christ and believers: it may be connected with the foregoing words, thus; I know my sheep, and am known of mine, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father; compare ch. 17, 21. 1. As the Father knew the Son, and loved him, and owned him in his sufferings, when he was acquainted with all that was his so Christ knows his sheep, and has a watchful tender eye upon them, will be with them when they are left alone, as he was with him. 2. As the Son knew the Father, loved and obeyed him, and always did those things that pleased him; and confided in him as his God, even when he seemed to forsake him, so believers know Christ with an obediential familiar regard.

[2.] He is acquainted with those that are hereafter to be of his flock; (v. 16.) Other sheep I have, have a right to, and an interest in, which are not of this fold, of the Jewish church, them also I must bring. Observe.

[3.] The eye that Christ had to the poor Gentiles; he had sometimes intimated his special concern for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to them indeed his personal ministry was confined, but, saith he, I have other sheep. Those who in process of time should believe in Christ, and be brought into obedience to him from among the Gentiles, are here called sheep, and he is said to have them, though as yet they are not members of his church, because they were chosen of God, and given to Christ in the councils of divine love from eternity. Christ has a right to many a soul by virtue of the Father’s donation and his own purchase, which he has not yet the possession of; thus he had many people in Corinthus, when as yet it lay in wickedness, Acts 18. 10. Those other sheep I have, saith Christ, I have them on my heart, have them in my mind, as sure to have them as if I had them already.

Now Christ speaks of those other sheep, First, To take off the contempt that was put upon him, as having few followers, as having but a little flock, and therefore, if a good shepherd, yet a poor shepherd; “But,” saith he, “I have more sheep than you see.” Secondly, To take down the pride and vain-glory of the Jews, who thought the Messiah was to be a shepherd of his sheep from among them. “No,” saith Christ, “I have others whom I will set with the lambs of my flock, though you disdain to set them with the dogs of your flock.”

[2.] The purposes and resolves of his grace concerning them; “Them also I must bring, bring home to God, bring into the church, and, in order to that, bring off from their vain conversation, bring them back from their wanderings, as that lost sheep, Luke 15. 5. But why must he bring them? What was the necessity? First, The necessity of their case required it; “I must bring, or they must be left to wander endlessly, for, like sheep, they will never come back of themselves, and no other can or will bring them.” Secondly, The necessity of his own engagements required it; he must bring them, or he would not be faithful to his trust, and true to his undertaking. “They are his, and must be saved, and therefore I must not neglect them nor leave them to perish.” He must in honour bring those whom he was intrusted with.

[3.] The happy effect and consequence of this, in two things. First, “They shall hear my voice. Not only my voice shall be heard among them; whereas they have not heard, and therefore could not believe, now the sound of the gospel shall go to the ends of the earth, it shall be heard by them; I will speak, and give to them to hear.” Faith comes by hearing, and our diligent observance of the voice of being is both a means and an evidence of our being brought to Christ, and to God by him. Secondly, There shall be one fold and one Shepherd. As there is one Shepherd, so there shall be one fold. Both Jews and Gentiles, upon their turning to the faith, and uniting themselves to him, shall be joint and equal sharers in the privileges of it, without distinction. Being united to Christ, they shall unite in him; two sticks shall become one in the hand of the Lord. Note, One Shepherd makes one fold; one Christ makes one church. As the church is one in its constitution, subject to one head, animated by one spirit, and guided by one rule, so the members of his church are to be sought to be one in love and affection, Eph. 4. 3—6.

2. Christ’s offering up himself for his sheep, is another proof of his being a good shepherd, and in this he ye more commended his love, v. 15. 17. 18.

(1.) He declares his purpose of dying for his flock; (v. 15.) I lay down my life for the sheep. He not only ventured his life for them, (in such a case, the hope of saving it may balance the fear of losing it,) but he actually deposited it, and submitted to a necessity of dying for our sins, as a recompense of love, or a purchase-money paid down. Sheep appointed for the slaughter, ready to be sacrificed, were ransomed with the blood of the shepherd. He laid down his life, seeing it, not only for the good of the sheep, but in their stead. Thousands of sheep had been offered in sacrifice for their shepherds, as sin-offerings, but here, by a surprising appearance of love and condescension, he offered himself for the lost sheep. When David, the shepherd of Israel, was himself guilty, and the destroying angel drew his sword against the flock for his sake, with good reason did he plead, These sheep, what evil have they done? Let thy hand be against me, 2 Sam. 24. 17.

But the Son of David was sinless and spotless; and his sheep, what evil have they not done? Yet he saith, Let thine hand be against me. Christ, he seems to refer to that prophecy, Zech 13. 7. Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the flock of my pasture, for sheep. Awise the shepherd of Israel, was himself guilty, and the destroying angel drew his sword against the flock for his sake, with good reason did he plead, These sheep, what evil have they done? Let thy hand be against me, 2 Sam. 24. 17. But the Son of David was sinless and spotless; and his sheep, what evil have they not done? Yet he saith, Let thine hand be against me. Christ, he seems to refer to that prophecy, Zech 13. 7. Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the flock of my pasture, for sheep.

(2.) He takes off the offence of the cross, which to many is a stone of stumbling, by four considerations.

[1.] That his laying down his life for the sheep, was the condition, the performance of which entitled him to the honours and powers of his exalted state; (v. 17.) “Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life. Upon these terms I am, as Mediator, to expect my Father’s acceptance and approbation, and the glory designed me—that I become a sacrifice for the chosen remnant. Not but that, as the Son of God, he was beloved of his Father from eternity, but, as God-man, as Immanuel, he was therefore beloved of the Father, because he undertook to die for the sheep; therefore God’s soul delighted in him as his Elect, because herein he was his faithful Servant; (Isa. 42. 1.) therefore he said, This is my beloved Son. What an instance is this of God’s love to man, that he loved his Son the more for loving us! See what a value Christ puts upon his Father’s love, that, to recommend himself to that, he would lay down his life for the sheep. Did he think God’s love recompense sufficient for all his services and sufferings, and that we think it too little for our’s, and court the smiles of the world to make it up? Therefore doth my Father love me, that is, me, and all that by faith become one with me; me, and the mystical body, because I lay down my life. One’s thought to purchase the life of his Father’s love both to him and us.*

[2.] That his laying down his life was in order to his resuming it; I lay down my life, that I may receive it again. First, This was the effect of his Father’s love, and the first step of his exaltation, the fruit of that love. Because he was God’s holy One, he must not see corruption, Ps. 16. 10. God loved him too well to leave him in the grave. Secondly, This was the end of his love in him, in laying down his life, that he might have an opportunity of declaring himself to be the Son of God with power by his resurrection, Rom. 1. 4. By a divine stratagem (like that before Ai, Josh. 8. 15.) he yielded to death, as if he were smitten before it, that he might the more gloriously conquer death, and triumph over the grave. He laid down a wifled body, that he might resume a glorified one, fit to ascend to the world of spirits; laid down a life adapted to this world, but resumed

* This statement does not appear to be supported by the words of our Lord, or by any part of scripture; a consideration which ought to produce an explicit and general refutation of it, especially as it supplies the adversary of the atonement with materials for abundant and plausible declamation.—Ed.
one adapted to the other, like a corn of wheat, ch. 12. 24.

[3.] That he was perfectly voluntary in his sufferings and death; (v. 18.) "No compulsion or force may life from me against my will, but I freely lay it down of myself, I deliver it as my own act and deed, for I have (which no man has) power to lay it down, and take it again."

First, See here the power of Christ, as the Lord of life, particularly of his own life, which he had in himself.

1. He had power to keep his life against all the world, so that it could not be wrested from him without his own consent. Though Christ's life seems to be taken by storm, yet really it was surrendered, otherwise it had been impregnable, and never taken. The Lord Jesus did not fall into the hands of his persecutors because he could not avoid it, but threw himself into their hands because his hour was come. No man taketh my life from me. This was such a challenge as was never given by the most daring heres.

2. He had power to lay down his life. (1.) He had ability to do it. He could, when he pleased, slip the knot of union between soul and body, and, without any act of violence done to himself, could disengage them from each other: having voluntarily taken up a body, he could voluntarily lay it down again; which appeared when he cried with a loud voice, saying that he gave it up. (2.) He had authority to do it. Though we could find instruments of cruelty, whereby to make an end of our own lives, yet I do possess quo d juris passum—We can do that, and that only, which we can do lawfully; we are not at liberty to do it; but Christ had a sovereign authority to dispose of his own life as he pleased; he was no debtor as we are either to life or death, but perfectly sui juris.

3. He had power to take it again; we have not; our life, once laid down, is as water spilt upon the ground; but Christ, when he laid down his life, still had it within reach, within call, and could resume it again. Parting with it by a voluntary conveyance, he might limit the surrender at pleasure, and he did it with a power of revocation; which was necessary to preserve the intentions of the surrender.

Secondly, See here the grace of Christ; since now he had demanded his life of him by law, and taken it by force, he laid it down of himself for our redemption. He offered himself to be the Saviour; Lo, I am come; and then the necessity of our case calling for it, he offered himself to be a Sacrifice, Here am I, let those go their way, by the which will we are sanctified, Heb. 10. 16. He was both the offerer and the offering, so that his laying down his life was his offering up himself.

[4.] That he did all this by the express order and appointment of his Father, into which he ultimately resolves the whole affair; This commandment have I received of my Father; not such a commandment as made what he did necessary, prior to his own persuasion and undertaking; but this was the law of mediation, which he was willing to have written in his heart, so as to delight in doing the will of God according to it, Ps. 40. 8.

19. There was a division therefore again among the Jews for these sayings. 20. And many of them said, He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him? 21. Others said, These are not the words of him that hath a devil. Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?

We have here an account of the people's different sentiments concerning Christ, on occasion of the foregoing discourse; there was a division, a schism, among them, they differed in their opinions, which threw them into heats and parties. Such a ferment as this they had been in before; (ch. 7. 43—9. 16.) and where there has once been a division, a little thing will give rise to another: this division was occasioned by the sayings of Christ, which, one would think, should rather have united them all in his presence; but they set them at variance, as Christ foresaw, Luke 12. 51. But it is better that men should be divided about the doctrine of Christ, than united in the service of sin, Luke 11. 21. See what the dispute was in particulars.

1. Some upon this occasion were for to make ill of Christ and of his sayings, either openly in the face of the assembly, for his enemies were very importunate, or privately among themselves; they said, He has a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him? 1. They reproach him as a demagogue. The worst of characters is put upon the best of men. He is a distracted man, he raves and is delirious, and no more to be heard, than the rambles of a man in Bedlam. Thus still, if a man preaches seriously and pressingly of another world, he shall be said to talk like an enthusiast; and it is all impromptu to fancy, a heated brain, and a crazed imagination.

2. They ridicule his hearers: Why hear ye him? Why do you so far encourage him, as to take notice of what he says? Note, Satan rushes many, by putting them out of conceit with the word and ordinances, and representing it as a weak and silly thing to attend upon them. Men would not be thus laughed out of their necessary food, and yet suffer themselves thus to be laughed out of what is more necessary. They that hear Christ, and mix faith with what they hear, will soon be able to give a good account why they hear him.

2. Others stood up in defence of him and his discourse; and though the stream ran strong, dared to swim against it; and though perhaps they did not believe on him as the Messiah, yet they could not hear him thus abused.

If they could say no more of him, this they would maintain, that he was a man in his wits, that he had not a devil, that he was neither senseless nor graceless. The absurd and most unreasonable reproaches, that have sometimes been cast upon Christ and his gospel, have excited those to appear for him and it, whereby they have shown a great affection to either. Two things they plead:

1. The excellence of his doctrine: These are not the words of him that hath a devil; they are not idle words; distracted men are not used to talk at this rate. These are not the words of one that is either violently possessed with a devil, or voluntarily in league with the devil. Christianity, if it be the true religion, is certainly the greatest cheat that ever was put upon the world; and if so, it must be of the devil, who is the father of all lies: but it is certain that the doctrine of Christ is no doctrine of devils, for it is levelled directly against the devil's kingdom, and Satan is too subtle to be divided against himself. So much of holiness there is in the words of Christ, that we may conclude they are not the words of one that has a devil, and therefore are the words of one that was sent of God; are not from hell, and therefore cannot be from the devil.

2. The power of his miracles: Can a devil open the eyes of the blind? that is, a man that has a devil. Neither mad men nor bad men use to work miracles. Devils are not such lords of the power of nature, as to be able to work such miracles; nor are they such friends to mankind, as to be willing to work them if they were able. The devil will sooner put out men's eyes than open them. Therefore Jesus had not a devil.
22. And it was at Jerusalem, the feast of the dedication, and it was winter. 23. And Jesus walked in the temple in Solomon's porch. 24. Then came the Jews round about him, and said unto him, How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. 25. Jesus answered them, I told you, and ye believed not: the works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me. 26. But ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. 27. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: 28. And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. 29. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. 30. I and my Father are one. 31. Then the Jews took up stones again to stone him, 32. Jesus answered them, Many good works have I shewed you from my Father; for which of those works do ye stone me? 33. The Jews answered him, saying, For a good work we stone thee not; but for blasphemy; and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God. 34. Jesus answered them, Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? 35. If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken; 36. Say ye of him, whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God? 37. If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. 38. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know, and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him.

We have here another encounter between Christ and the Jews in the temple, in which it is hard to say which is more strange, the gracious words that came out of his mouth, or the spiteful ones that came out of their's.

1. We have here the time when this conference was; It was at the feast of dedication, and it was winter, a feast that was annually observed by consent, in remembrance of the dedication of a new altar, and the purging of the temple, by Judas Maccabaeus, after the temple had been profaned, and the altar defiled; we have the story of it large in the history of the Maccabees; (lib. 1. cap. 4.) we have the prophecy of it, Dan. 8. 13, 14. See more of the feast, 2 Mac. 1. 15. The return of their liberty was to them as life from the dead, and, in remembrance of it, they kept an annual feast on the twenty-fifth day of the month Caslu, about the beginning of December, and seven days after. The celebrating of it was not confined to Jerusalem, as that of the divine feasts was, but every one observed it in his own place, not as a holy time, (it is only a divine institution that can sanctify a day,) but as a good time, as the days of Purim. Esth. 9. 18. Christ forecast to be now at Jerusalem, not in honour of the feast, which did not require his attendance there, but that he might improve those eight days of vacation for good purposes.

21. The place where it was; (v. 23.) Jesus walked in the temple, in Solomon's porch; so called, (Acts 3. 1.) not because built by Solomon, but because built in the same place with that which had borne his name in the first temple, and the name was kept up for the greater reputation of it. Here Christ walked, to observe the proceedings of the great Synod that sat here; (Ps. 82. 1.) he walked to give audience to any that should apply themselves to him, to offer them his service. He walked, as it should seem, for some time alone, as one neglected; walked pensive, in the foresight of the ruin of the temple. Those that have any thing to say to Christ, may find him in the temple, and walk with him there.

3. The conference itself, in which observe,

1. A weighty question put to him by the Jews, v. 24. They came round about him, to tease him; he was waiting for an opportunity to do them a kindness, and they took the opportunity to do him a mischief. Ill-will for good-will is no rare and uncommon return. He could not enjoy himself, no not in the temple, his Father's house, without disturbance. They came about him, as it were, to lay siege to him, and to cast him and like-been, They came about him as if they had a joint and unanimous desire to be satisfied; came as one man, pretending an impartial and incomparably wise inquiry after truth, but intending a general assault upon our Lord Jesus; and they seemed to speak the sense of their nation, as if they were the mouth of all the Jews; How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ.

(1.) They quarrel with him, as if he had unfairly held them in suspense hitherto. The ἑκκολογεῖν—How long dost thou steal away our hearts? or, take away our words? So some read it; basely intimating that what share he had of the people's love and respect, he did not come fairly by it, but by indirect methods, as Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel; and as seducers should be the hearts of the simple, and so draw away disciples after them, Rom. 16. 18. Acts 20. 30. But most interpreters understand it as we do; "How long dost thou keep us in suspense? How long are we kept debating whether thou be the Christ or no, and not able to determine the question?" Now, [1.] It was the effect of their infidelity and powerful prejudices, that after our Lord Jesus had so fully proved himself to be the Christ, they were still in doubt concerning it; this they willingly hesitated about when they might easily have been satisfied. The struggle was between their convictions, which told them he was Christ; and their corruptions, which said No, because he was not such a Christ as they expected. Those who choose to be sceptics, may, if they will, dissemble a weak faith and a confidence. Whose saving arguments may not weigh down the most trifling objections, but the scales may still hang even. [2.] It was an instance of their impudence and presumption, that they laid the blame of their doubting upon Christ himself, as if he made them to doubt by inconsistency with himself, whereas in truth they made themselves doubt by indulging their prejudices; and their speeches and arguments were pleasant, though the fault is not in the object, they are all plain to him that understands, but in the eye. Christ would make us to believe; we make ourselves to doubt.

(2.) They challenge him to give a direct and categorical answer, whether he was the Messiah or no; "If thou be the Christ, as many believe thou art, tell us plainly, not by parables, as, I am the light of the world, and the good Shepherd, and the like, out totoem verbis—in so many words, either that they or his Baptist, that they art not," ch. 1. 20. Now this press ing query of theirs was seemingly good, they pretended to be desirous to know the truth, as if they were ready to embrace it; but it was really bad, and put with an ill design; for if he should tell them plainly that he was the Messiah, they would have this to say presently, These beastly wild beasts, as they had, ch. 8. 13.

11. Christ's answer to this question, in which

1. He justifies himself, as not at all necessary to their infidelity and scepticism; referring them, (1.) To what he had said; I have told you. He had told them that he was the Son of God, the Son of man; that he had life in himself, and that he had authority to execute judgment. And is not this the Christ then? These things he had told them, and that they could not in the least conceive ever so much disguised to our humour. (2.) He refers them to his works, to the example of his life, which was not only perfectly pure, but highly beneficial, and of a piece with his doctrine; and especially to his miracles, which he wrought for the confirmation of his doctrine. It was certain that no man could do those miracles except God were with him, and God would not be with him to attest a forgery.

2. He condemns them for their obstinate unbelief, notwithstanding all the most plain and powerful arguments used to convince them; Ye believed not; and again, Ye believed not. Ye still are what ye always were, obstinate in your unbelief.

But the reason he gives, is very surprising; Ye believed not because ye are not of my sheep: ye believe not me; therefore ye believe not me; nor will you be persuaded of the truth even as much disguised to our humour. (1.) Ye are not disposed to be my followers; you are not of the number of the elect; and your unbelief, if ye persist in it, will be a certain evidence that ye are not. Note, Those to whom God never gives the grace of faith, were never designed for heaven and happiness. What Solomon saith of immortality is true of infidelity; It is a deep ditch, and he that is abhorred of the Lord, shall fall therein, Prov. 22. 14. A man is placed in a bad cause of a good cause by sin and accident. Fides autem est dominum Dei et effectus predestinationis—The not being included among the elect, is not the proper cause of infidelity, but merely the accidental cause. But faith is the gift of God, and the effect of predestination. So Jansenius distinguishes well here.

3. He takes this occasion to describe both the gracious disposition and the happy state of those that are his sheep; for such there are, though they be not.

(1) To convince them that they were not his sheep, he tells them what were the characteristics of his sheep.

1. They hear his voice, (v. 27.) for they know it to be his, (v. 4.) and he has undertaken that they shall hear it, v. 16. They discern it, It is the voice of the shepherd, and one knows by the voice. They know him in it, are in their element when they are sitting at his feet to hear his word. They do according to it, and make his word their rule. Christ will not account these his sheep, that are deaf to his calls, deaf to his charms, Ps. 88. 5.

2. They follow him, they submit to his conduct by a cheerfull obedience to all his commandments, and a pleasant conformity to his Spirit and pattern. The word of command has always been, Follow me. We must eye him as our leader and captain, and tread in his steps, and walk as he walked; follow the prescriptions of his word, the intimations of his providence, and the directions of his Spirit; follow the lamb, the Dier giveth—tje leader of the flock, whithersoever he goes. In vain do we hear his voice if we do not follow him.

(2.) He has undertaken, that it was their great unholiness and misery not to be of Christ's sheep, he here describes the blessed state and ease of those that are which would likewise serve for the support and comfort of his poor despised followers, and keep them from envying the power and grandeur of those that were not of his sheep.

1. Our Lord Jesus takes cognizance of his sheep; They hear my voice, and I know them. He has distinguished these from others. (2.) He has undertaken for their happiness provided is life, suited to his nature. Man has an immortal soul, therefore the happiness promised is eternal life, running parallel with his duration. Life eternal is the felicity and chief good of a soul immortal. Secondly, the manner of conveyance is free; I give it to them; it is not bargained and sold upon a valuable consideration, but given; it is gratuitous. The donor has power to give it. He who is the Fountain of life, and Father of eternity, has authorized Christ to give eternal life, ch. 17. 2. Not I will give it, but I do give it, it is a gift in present. He gives the assurance of it, the pledge and earnest of it, the first fruits and foretastes of it; that spiritual life, which is eternal life begun, heaven in the seed, in the bud, in the embryo.

3. He has undertaken for their security and preservation to this happiness. First, They shall be saved from everlasting perdition. They shall by no means perish for ever; so the words are. As there is an eternal life, so there is an eternal destruction; the soul not annihiliated, but ruined; its being continued, but its comfort and happiness irrecoverably lost. All believers are saved from this; whatever cross they may come under, they shall not come into condemnation. They shall not perish in hell, and they shall not go down to that. Shepherds that have large flocks, often lose some of the sheep and suffer them to perish; but Christ has engaged that none of his sheep shall perish, not one. Secondly, They cannot be kept from their everlasting happiness; it is in reserve, but he that gives it them will preserve them to it.

1. His own power is engaged for them; Neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. A mighty contest is here supposed about these sheep. The Shepherd is so careful of their welfare, that he has them not only within his fold, and under his eye, but in his hand, interested in his special love, and taken under his special protection; (all his saints are in thy hand, Deut. 33. 3.) yet their enemies are so many, that he cannot attempt to pluck them out of his hand; his, whose own they are, and who has delivered them, but they cannot, they shall not, do it. Note, Those are safe, who are in the hands of the Lord Jesus. The saints are preserved in Christ Jesus; and their salvation is not in their own keeping, but in the keeping of a Mediator. The Pharisees and rulers did all they could to frighten the disciples of Christ from him, and by persecuting and threatening them, but Christ saith that they shall not prevail.

2. His Father's power is likewise engaged for their preservation, v. 29. He now appeared in weakness, and, lest his security should therefore be thought insufficient, he brings in his Father as a further security. Observe,

(1.) The power of the Father: My Father is greater than all; greater than all the other friends of the church, all the other shepherds, magistrates, or ministers, and able to do that for them which they cannot do. Those shepherds slumber and sleep, and it will be easy to pluck the sheep out of their hands; but he keeps his flock day and night. He is greater than all the enemies of the church, all the opposition given to her interests, and able to secure all their interests; he is greater than all the combined force of hell and earth. He is greater in wisdom than the old serpent, though noted for subtlety; greater in strength than the great red dragon, though his name be legion, and his title princedoms and powers. The devil and his angels have had many a push, many a pluck for the mastery, but have never yet prevailed; Rev. 12. 7, 8. The Lord on high is mightier than the powers of the air.

(2.) The interest of the Father in the sheep, for the sake of which this power is engaged for them; "It is my Father that gave them me, and he is concerned in honour to uphold his gift." They were given to the Son as a trust to be managed by him, and therefore God will still look after them. All the divine power is engaged for the accomplishment of the divine counsel.

(3.) The safety of the saints inferred from these two. If this be so, then none (neither man nor devil) is able to pluck them out of the Father's hand, not able to deprive them of the grace they have, or to hinder them from the glory that is designed them; not able to put them out of God's protection, nor get them into their own power. Christ had himself experienced the power of his Father upholding and strengthening him, and therefore, as a follower into his hand too. He that secured the glory of the Redeemer, will secure the glory of the redeemed.

Further to corroborate the security, that the sheep of Christ may have strong consolation, he asserts the union of these two undertakers; "I and my Father are one, and have jointly and severally undertaken for the protection of the saints, and their perfection." This speaks more than the harmony, and consent, and good understanding, that were between the Father and the Son in the work of man's redemption, every good man is so far one with God, as to concur with him; therefore it must be meant the oneness of the nature of Father and Son, that they are the same in substance, and equal in power and glory.

The fathers urged this, both against the Sabellians, to prove the distinction and plurality of the persons, that the Father and the Son are two; and against the Arians, to prove the unity of the nature, that these two are one. If we should altogether hold our peace concerning this sense of the words, even the stones which the Jews took up to cast at him would speak it out, for the Jews understood him as hereby making himself God, (v. 33.) and he did not deny it. He proves that none could pluck them out of his hand, because they could not pluck them out of the Father's hand; which had been a considerable argument among his enemies, whether they were not under the dominion of an almighty power with the Father, and, consequently, been one with him in essence and operation.

III. The rage, the outrage, of the Jews against him for this discourse; The Jews took up stones, again, v. 31. It is not the word that is used before, ch. 8. 59. but inimicissim—they carried stones, got stones, and were always ready to throw stones at him, as they did, in stoning malefactors; they threw them to some place at a distance, as it were preparing things for his execution without any judicial process; as if he were convicted of blasphemy upon the notorious evidence of the fact, which needed no further trial. The absurdity of this insult which the Jews offered to Christ, will appear, if we consider, 1. That they had incurred hatred, to sayimetype, and had been acting in stoning malefactors; they ought to have thought that the stone would not stick at some place at a distance, any more than it did when they threw it at him. 2. That when they had made the like attempt before, in another instance of this same occasion, it failed; he escaped through the midst of them; (ch. 8. 59.) yet they repeat their hallowed attempt. Daring sinners will throw stones at heaven, though they return upon their own heads; and will strengthen themselves against the Almighty, though never any hardened themselves against him, and prospered.

IV. Christ's tender expostulation with them upon occasion of this outrage; v. 32. Jesus answered, what they did, for we do not find that they said anything, unless perhaps they stirred up the crowd that they had gathered about him, to join with them, crying, Stone him, stone him, as afterwards, Crucify him, crucify him. When he had answered them with fire from heaven, he mildly replied, Many good works have I shewed you from my Father: for which do ye stone me? Words so very tender, that one would think they should have melted a heart of stone.

In dealing with his enemies he still argued from his works, men evidence what they are by what they do. His good works—scand, excellent, eminent works. Opera extra rem praedicta: it signifies both great works and good works.

1. The divine power of his works convicted them of the most obstinate iniquity. They were works from his Father, so far above the reach and course of nature, as to prove him that did them, sent of God, and acting by commission from him. These works they shewed him, they did them openly before the people, and not in a corner; his works would bear the test, and refer themselves to the testimony of the most inquisitive and impartial spectators. He did not shew his works by candle-light, as they that do them only for show, but he shewed them at noon-day before the world, ch. 18. 20. See Ps. 111. 6. His works so udeniably demonstrated, that they were an incontestable demonstration of the validity of his commission.

2. The divine grace of his works convicted them of the most obstinate ingratitude. They were works he did among them, not only miracles, but miracles not only works of wonder to amaze them, but works of love and kindness to do them good, and so make them good, and endear himself to them. He healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, cast out devils, which were favours, not only to the persons concerned, but to the public; these he had repeated, and multiplied: "Note, for which of these do ye stone me? "Ye cannot say that I have done you any harm, or given you any just provocation; if therefore ye will charge me with what you believe me, it must be for some good work, some good turn done you; tell me for which." Note, (1.) The horrid ingratitude that there is in our sins against God and Jesus Christ, is a great aggravation of them, and makes them appear exceeding sinful. See how God argues to this purpose, Dent. 32. 6. Jer. 2. 5. Mic. 6. 5. (2.) We must not think it strange if we meet with those who will not acknowledge the evidences of our love, and confidence we have for our love, Ps. 33. 12. -4. 9. When he asks, For which of these do ye stone me, as he intimates the abundant satisfaction he had in his own innocence, which gives a man courage in a suffering day, so he puts his persecutors upon considering what was the true reason of their enmity, and asking, as all those should do, that create trouble to their neighbour, Why persecute we him? As Job advises his friends to do, Job 19. 28.

V. Their vindication of the attempt they made upon Christ, and the cause upon which they grounded their persecution, v. 33. What sin will warrant fig-leaves with which to cover itself, when even the bloody persecutors of the Son of God could find something to say for themselves? They could not but see that such enemies to their country, as to persecute him for a good work: For a good work we stone thee not. For indeed they would scarcely allow any of his works to be so. His curing the impotent man, (ch. 5. ) and the blind man, (ch. 9. ) were so far from being acknowledged good services to the town, and meritorious, that they were put upon the score of his crimes, because done on the sabbath-day. But if he had done any good works, they would not own that they stoned him for them, though these were really the things that did most exasperate them, ch. 11. 47. Thus, though most absurd, thy could not be brought to own their absurdities.

2. They would be thought such friends to God and his glory, as to prosecute him for blasphemy; Because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God. (v. 34. ) The pretended zeal for the law, they seem mightily concerned for the honour of the divine majesty, and to be seized with a religious horror at that which they imagined to be a reproach to it. A blasphemer was to be stoned, Lev. 24. 16. This law, they thought, did not only justify, but sanctify, what they attempted, as Acts 26. 8. Note, The vilest practices are often varnished with plausible pretences. As nothing is more courageous than a well-informed conscience, so nothing is more outrageous than a mistaken one. See Isa. 66. 5. ch. 16. 2. (2.) A real enmity to the gospel, on which they could not put a greater affront than by representing Christ as a blasphemer. It is no new thing for the worst of characters to be put upon the best of men, by those that resolve to give them the worst of treatment.

3. The crime laid to his charge is blasphemy, speaking reproachfully and despicably of God. God himself is out of the sinner's reach, and not capable of receiving any real injury; and therefore enmity to God spits its venom at his name, and so shows its ill-will.

2. The proof of the crime; Thou, being a man, makest thyself God. As it is God's glory, that he is God, which he should rob of him of what we make him altogether such a one as ourselves, so is it his glory, that beside him there is no other, which we rob him of when we make ourselves, or any creature, altogether like him.

Now, First, Thus far they were in the right, that what Christ said of himself, amounted to this—that he was God, for he had said that he was one with the Father, and that he would give eternal life; and Christ does not deny it, which he would have done, if it had been a mistaken inference from his words. But, Secondly, They were not mistaken, when they looked upon him as a mere man, when Godhead claimed was a usurpation, and of his own making. They thought it absurd and impious that such a one as he, who appeared in the fashion of a poor, mean, despicable man, should profess himself the Messiah, and entitle himself to the honours confessedly due to the Son of God. Note, 1. These things are the marks of a mere man, and only a made God, as the Socinians, when they charge him with blasphemy, but do effectually prove it upon themselves. 2. He who, being a man, a sinful man, makes himself a god, as the Pope does, who claims divine powers and prerogatives, is, no question, a blasphemer, and that antichrist.

VI. Christ's reply to their accusations of him, (for such their vindication of themselves was,) and his making good those claims which they imputed to him as blasphemies; (v. 34. &c. ) when he proves himself to be no blasphemer, by two arguments.

1. By an argument taken from God's word. He appeals to what was written in their law, that is, in the Old Testament; whoever opposes Christ, he is to be treated as having the scripture on his side. It is written, Ps. 82. 6. 7. and 118. 23. and 24. who is a God, besides me, in the land? and who is the third with me? a living majesty— from the less to the greater. If they were gods, much more am I. Observe,

(1.) How he explains the text; (v. 33. ) He called them gods, to whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken. The word of God's commission came to them, appointing them to their offices, as judges, and therefore they were called gods, Exod. 22. 28. To some the word of God came immediately, as to Moses; to others in the way of an instituted ordinance. Magistrates in a divine institution; and magistrates are God's delegates, and therefore the scripture calleth them gods; and we are sure that the scripture cannot be broken, or broken in upon, or found fault with. Every word of God is right, the very style and language of scripture are unquestionable, and not to be corrected, Matt. 5. 18. (2.) How he applies it. Thus much in general is easily inferred, that they were very rash and unreasonable, who condemned Christ as a blasphemer, only for calling himself the Son of God, when yet they themselves called their rulers so, and therein the scripture warranted them. But the argument goes further; (v. 35. ) If magistrates were called gods, because they were commissioned to administer justice in the nation, say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified, Thou blasphemest? We have here two things concerning the Lord Jesus.

[1.] The honour done him by the Father, which he justly glorifies in; he sanctified him, and sent him into the world. Magistrates were called the sons of God, though the word of God only came to them, and the spirit of government came upon them by measure, as upon Saul; but our Lord Jesus was himself the Word, and had the Spirit without measure; they were constituted for a particular country, city, or nation, but he was sent into the world, vested with a universal authority, as Lord of all; they were sent to, as persons at a distance, he was sent; and so far as he has been from eternity with God. The Father sanctified him, that is, designed him, and set him apart to the office of Mediator, and qualified and fitted him for that office. Sanctifying him is the same with sealing him, ch. 6. 27. Note Whom the Father sends, he sanctifies; whom he designs for holy purposes, he prepares with holy principles and dispositions. The holy God will reward the wily or cunning employ, none but such as he finds or makes holy. The Father's sanctifying and sending him is here vouched as a sufficient warrant for his calling himself the Son of God; for he was a holy thing; he was called the Son of God, Luke 1. 33. See Rom. 1. 4.

[2.] The dishonour done by him by the Jews, which he justly endured,—that they impiately said of him, whom the Father had thus dignified, that he was a blasphemer, because he called himself the Son of God; “Say ye of him so and so? Dare ye say so? Dare ye thus set your mouths against the heavens? Have ye brow and brass enough to tell the God of truth that he lies, or to condemn him that is most just? Look me in the face, and say it if you can, what, say one of the Son of God, should ye speak such things, or that men who have spoken such things, should still be suffered to breathe in God's air. The wickedness of man, and the patience of God, as it were, contain which shall be most wonderful.

2. By an argument taken from his own works, v. 37, 38. In the former he only answered the charge of blasphemy by an argument ad hominem—turning a man's own argument against himself; but he here makes out his own, claims, and proves that he and the Father are one; (v. 37, 38.) If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. Though he might justly have abandoned such blasphemous ratchets as inept, yet he vouchsafes to reason with them.

Observe, (1.) From what he argues—from his works, which he had often vouched as his credentials, and the proofs of his mission. As he proved himself sent of God by the divinity of his works, so we must prove ourselves allied to Christ by the christianity of our's. [1.] The argument is very cogent; for the works he did, were the works of his Father, which the Father only did, and which could not be done in the ordinary course of nature, but only by the extraordinary power of the God of nature. Opera Deo propria—works peculiar to God, and Opera Deo digna—works worthy of God—the works of a divine power. He that can dispense with the laws of nature, repeal, alter, and over-rule them at his pleasure, by his own power, is certainly the sovereign Prince who first instituted and enacted those laws. The miracles which the apostles wrought in his name, confirm this argument, and continued the evidence of it when he was gone. [2.] It is proposed as fairly as it can be desired, and put to a short issue.

First, If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. He does not demand a blind and implicit faith, nor an assent to any divine mission further than he gives proof of. He did by his power, and for the affection of people, nor wicked them by sly insinuations, nor impose upon their credulity by bold assertions, but with the greatest fairness imaginable quitted all demands of their faith, further than he produced warrants for these demands. Christ is no hard master, who expects to reap in assents, where he has not sown in arguments. None shall perish for the disbelief of that which was not proposed to them with sufficient motives of credibility, Infinite Wisdom itself being judge.

Secondly, “But if I do the works of my Father, if I work undeniable miracles for the confirmation of a holy doctrine, though you believe not me, though you are so scrupulous as not to take my word, yet believe the works: believe your own eyes, your own reason, the thing speaks itself plainly enough.” As the invisible things of the Creator are clearly seen by his works of creation and common providence, (Rom. 1. 20.) so the works of the Redeemer were seen by his miracles, and by all his works, both of power and mercy; so that they who were not convinced by these works, were without excuse.

(2.) For what he argues—that ye may know and believe, may believe it intelligently, and with an entire satisfaction, that the Father is in me, and I in him; and his words are, and his works, are so exactly the same. Rom. 30. I and my Father are one. The Father was so in the Son, as that in him dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead, and it was by a divine power that he wrought his miracles; the Son was so in the Father, as that he was perfectly acquainted with the whole of his mind, not by communication, but by consciousness, having lain in his bosom. This we must know, even when God speaks to us by the Bible, searching it out to perfection.) But know and believe it; acknowledging and adoring the depth when we cannot find the bottom.

39. Therefore they sought again to take him; but he escaped out of their hand, 40. And went away again beyond Jordan, into the place where John at first baptized; and there he abode. 41. And many resorted unto him, and said, John did no miracle: but all things that John spake of this man were true. 42. And many believed on him there.

We have here the issue of the conference with the Jews. One would have thought it should have convinced and melted them, but their hearts were hardened. Here we are told, 1. How they attacked him by force. Therefore they sought again to take him, v. 39. Therefore, 1. Because he had fully answered their charge of blasphemy, and wiped off that imputation, so that they could not for shame go on with their attempt to stone him, therefore they contented to seize him, and pro-ceed to an offender against the state. When they were constrained to drop their attempt by a popular tumult, they would try what they could do under colour of a legal process. See Rev. 12, 13. Or, 2. Because he persevered in the same testimony concerning himself, they persisted in their malice against him. What he had said before, he did in effect say again, for the faithful witness never runs from what he has once said; and therefore, having the same provocation, they express the same resentments, and justify their attempt to stone him by another attempt to take him. Such is the temper of a persecuting spirit, and such its politics, male facies, male facies tegere ne fierunt;—to cover one set of bad deeds with another, lest the former should fall through. 3. How he avoided them by flight; not an inglorious retreat, in which there was anything of human infirmity, but a glorious retirement, in which there was much of a divine power. He escaped out of their hands, not by the interpos'd of any friend that helped him; but by his own wisdom he got clear of them; he either drew a veil over himself, or cast a mist before them, or took a secret and partitioned off whose hearts he did not turn. Note, no weapon formed against our Lord Jesus shall prosper, Ps. 2. 5. He escaped, not because he was afraid to suffer but because his hour was not come. And he who knew how to deliver himself, no doubt knew how to deliver the guilty out of temptation, and to make a way for them to escape.

II. How he disposed of himself in his retirement: he went away again beyond Jordan, v. 30. The Bishop of our souls came not to be fixed in one seat, but to go about from place to place, doing good. This great Heiractor was never out of his way, for where there was work to be done. Though Jerusalem was the royal city, yet he made many a kind visit to the country, not only to his own country Galilee, but to other parts, even those that lay most remote beyond Jordan. Now observe,

1. What shelter he found there. He went into a private part of the country, and there he abode; there he found some rest and quietness, when in Jerusalem he could find none. Note, Though persecutors may drive Christ and his gospel out of their own city or country, they cannot drive him or it out of the world. Though Jerusalem was not gathered, nor would be, yet Christ was glorious, and would be. Christ's going now beyond Jordan, was a figure of the taking of the kingdom of God from the Jews, and bringing it to the Gentiles. Christ and his gospel have often found better entertainment among them that lay among the river, the mighty, the noble, 1 Cor. 6. 27.

2. What success he found there. He did not go thither merely for his own security, but to do good there; and therefore he chose to go thither where John at first baptized, (ch. 1. 28.) because there could not but remain some impressions of John's ministry and baptism thereabout, which would dispose them to receive Christ and his doctrine; for it was not so, as if Christ was himself baptized there at Bethabara. Christ came hither now to see what fruit there was of all the pains John Baptisted had taken among them, and what they retained of the things they then heard and received. The event in some measure answered expectation; for we are told,

(1.) That they flocked after him: (v. 41.) Many resorted to him. The return of the means of grace to a place, after they had been some time committed, commonly occasions a great stirring of affections. Some think Christ chose to abide at Bethabara, the house of passage, where the ferry-boats lay, by which they crossed the river Jordan, that the confluence of people thither might give an opportunity of teaching many who would come to hear him when they lay in their way, but who would scarcely go a step out of the road for an opportunity of attending on his word.

(2.) That they resounded in his favour, and sought arguments to induce them to close with him, as much as they at Jerusalem sought objections against him. They said very judiciously, John did no miracle, but all things that John spake of this Man were true. Two things they considered, upon recollecting what they had seen and heard from John, and on Christ's in answer saying, Ch. 16. 22. That Christ far exceeded John Baptist's power, for John did no miracle, but Jesus does many; whence it is easy to infer, that Jesus is greater than John. And if John were so great a prophet, how great then is this Jesus? Christ is best known and acknowledged by such a comparison with others as sets him superlatively above others. Though John came in the spirit and power of Elias, yet he did not work miracles, as Elias did, lest the minds of people should be made to hesitate between him and Jesus; therefore the honour of working miracles was reserved for Jesus, as a flower of his crown, that there might be a sensible demonstration, and an undeniable one, that, though he came after John, yet he was preferred far before him.

[2.] That Christ exactly answered John Baptist's testimony. John not only did us preach to deliver people from Christ, but he said a great deal to direct them to Christ, and to turn them over as apprentices to him, and that came to their minds now; all things that John said of this Man were true, that he should be the Lamb of God, should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. Great things John had said of him, which raised their expectations; so that, through the country, he had been inquiring into his own country to inquire after him, yet, when he came into their's, and brought his gospel to their doors, they acknowledged him as great as John had said he would be. When we get acquainted with Christ, and come to know him experimentally, we find all things that the scripture saith of him, to be true; nor, that the reality exceeds the report, l Kings. 17. 8. They had heard his name, and saw his hearers professed by what they had heard for a rule, and by comparing what they heard them with, what they saw now, they gained a double advantage: for, First, They were confirmed in their belief that John was a prophet, who foretold such things, and spake of the eminency to which this Jesus would arrive, though his beginning was so small. Secondly, They were prepared to believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that he did all things accomplished, which John foretold. By this we see that the success and efficacy of the word preached, are not confined to the life of the preacher, nor do they expire with his breath, but that which seemed as water split upon the ground, may afterward be gathered up again. See Zech. 1. 3. 6.

(3.) That many believed on him there. Believing that he who wrought such miracles, and in whom John's predictions were fulfilled, this man claimed himself to be the Son of God, they gave up themselves to him as his disciples, v. 42. An emphasis is here to be laid, [1.] Upon the persons that believed on him; they were many. While they that received and embraced his doctrine at Jerusalem, were but as the grape-gleanings of the vintage, they that believed on him in the country beyond Jordan, were a full harvest gathered into him. [2.] Upon the place where this was; it was there where John had been preaching and baptizing, and had had great success, there many believed on the Lord Jesus. Where the preaching of the doctrine of repentance has had success, as desired, there the preaching of the doctrine of reconciliation and spiritual grace is most likely to be prosperous. Where John has been acceptable, Jesus will be more acceptable. The jubilant of his death, and their excitement of the multitude, those who in the day of atonement have afflicted their souls for sin.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, we have the history of that illustrious miracle which Christ wrought a little before his death—the raising of Lazarus to life; which is recorded only by this evangelist: for the other three confuse this miracle with what Christ did in Galilee, which was not till some time after. The raising of Lazarus was carried into Jerusalem till the passion-week; whereas John's memoirs relate chiefly to what passed at Jerusalem; this passage therefore was reserved for his son. Some suspect that, when the other evangelists wrote, Lazarus was alive, and it would not well agree, either with his safety or with his humility, to have it recorded till now, when it is supposed he was dead. It is more largely recorded than any of his miracles; in which case it is probable there are many circumstances of it so very instructive, and the miracle of itself so great a proof of Christ's mission, but because it was an earnest of that which was to be the crowning of all other great miracles, it is left to the last. In the tidings sent to our Lord Jesus of the sickness of Lazarus, and his entertainment of those tidings, v. 1., 16. The visit he made to Lazarus's relations when he had heard of his death, and their entertainment of the Lord, v. 17., 32. III. The miracle wrought in the raising of Lazarus from the dead, v. 33., 41. IV. The effect wrought by this miracle upon others, v. 45., 57.
1. Now a certain man was sick, named Lazarus, of Bethany, the town of Mary and her sister Martha. 2. (It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick.) 3. Therefore his sisters sent unto him, saying, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. 4. When Jesus heard that, he said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby. 5. Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. 6. When he had heard therefore that he was sick, he abode two days still in the same place where he was. 7. Then after that saith he to his disciples, let us go into Judea again. 8. His disciples say unto him, Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee; and goest thou thither again? 9. Jesus answered, Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. 10. But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him. 11. These things said he: and after that he saith unto them, Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. 12. Then said his disciples, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. 13. Howbeit Jesus spake of his death; but they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep. 14. Then said Jesus unto them plainly, Lazarus is dead. 15. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye might believe; nevertheless let us go unto him. 16. Then said Thomas, which is called Didymus, unto his fellow-disciples, Let us also go, that we may die with him.

We have, in these verses,

1. A particular account of the parties principally concerned in this story, v. 1, 2. 1. They lived at Bethany, a village not far from Jerusalem, where Christ washed, lodged when he came up to the feasts. It is here called the town of Mary and Martha, that is, the town where they dwelt; as Bethsaida is called the city of Andrew and Peter, ch. 1. 44. For I see no reason to think, as some do, that Martha and Mary were owners of the town, and the rest were their tenants. 2. Here was a brother named Lazarus; his Hebrew name, probably, was Eleazar, and in the Greek language pronounced to it, is made Lazarus. Perhaps, in prospect of this history, our Saviour made use of the name of Lazarus in that parable wherein he designed to set forth the blessedness of the righteous in the bosom of Abraham immediately after death, Luke 16. 22. 3. Here were two sisters, Martha and Mary, who seem to have been the housekeepers, and to have managed the affairs of the family, while perhaps Lazarus lived a retired life, and gave himself to study and contemplation. Here was a decent, happy, well-ordered family, and a family that Christ was very much conversant in, where yet there was neither husband nor wife, (for anguish that appears,) but the house kept by a brother, and his sisters dwelling together in unity. 4. One of the sisters is particularly described to be that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, v. 2. Some think she was that woman that we read of, Luke 7. 37, 38, who had been a sinner, a bad woman. I rather think it refers to that anointing of Christ, which this evangelist relates; (ch. 12. 3.) for the evangelists do never refer one to another, but John frequently refers in one place of his gospel to another. Extraordinary acts of piety and devotion, that come from an honest principle of love to Christ, will not only find acceptance with him, but gain reputation in the church, Matt. 26. 13. This was she whose brother Lazarus was sick; and the sickness of those we love is our affliction. The more friends we have the more frequently we are thus afflicted by sympathy; and the dearer they are, the more grievous it is. The multiplying of our comforts is but the multiplying of our cares and crosses.

II. The tidings that were sent to our Lord Jesus of the sickness of Lazarus, v. 3. His sisters knew where Jesus was, a great way off beyond Jordan, and they sent these tidings to him with the affection which they had with the affection of their family. In which they manifest, 1. The affection and concern they had for their brother. Though, it is likely, his estate would come to them after his death, yet they earnestly desired his life, as they ought to have done. They shewed their love to him now that he was sick, for a brother is born for adversity, and so he is to us. We must weep with our friends when they weep, as well as rejoice with them when they rejoice. 2. The regard they had to the Lord Jesus, whom they were willing to make acquainted with all their concerns, and, like Jephthah, to utter all their words before him. Though God knows all our wants, and grieves, and cares, he will know them from us, and is honoured by our laying them before him.

The message they sent, was very short, not pettitioning, much less prescribing, but barely relating the case with the tender insinuation of a powerful plea, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest, is sick. They do not say, He whom we love, but, He whom thou lovest. Our greatest encouragements in prayer are fetched from God himself, and not from his creatures. They do not say, Lord, behold, he who loveth thee, but, he whom thou lovest; for herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us. Our love to him is not worth speaking of, but his to us can never be enough spoken of. Note, (1.) There are some of the friends and followers of the Lord Jesus, whom he hath a special kindness for above others. Among the twelve there was none whom Jesus loved. (2.) It is no new thing for those whom Christ loves, to be sick; all things come alike to all; bodily distempers correct the corruption, and try the graces, of God's people. (3.) It is a great comfort to us when we are sick, to have these about us that will pray for us. (4.) We have great encouragement in our prayers for those who are sick, if we have ground to hope that they are such as Christ is. (5.) It is a great pleasure to love and pray for those whom we have reason to think Christ loves and cares for.

III. An account how Christ entertained the tidings brought him of the illness of his friend.

1. He prognosticated the event and issue of the sickness, and probably sent it as a message to the sisters of Lazarus by the express, to support them while he was on the other side it came to them. Two things lie prognosticates.

1. This sickness is not unto death; it was mortal, proved fatal, and no doubt but Lazarus was truly dead for four days. But, [1.] That was not the errand upon which this sickness was sent; it came not, as in a common case, to be a summons to the grave, but there was a further intention in it. Had it been sent on that errand, his rising from the dead would have defeated it. [2.] That was not the final effect of this sickness. He died, and yet it might be said he did not die, for "Victimae was decu tur validum per se verecum"—That is not said to be done, which is not done for a perpetuity. Death is an everlasting farewell to this world, it is the way whence we shall not return; and in this sense it was not unto death. The grave was not his long home, his house of eternity. Thus Christ said of the maid whom he proposed to restore to life, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." [3.] That was not the ultimate purpose of this sickness. He died, and yet, however, is not unto death, for it is not unto eternal death. The body's death to this world is the soul's birth into another world; when we or our friends are sick, we make it our principal support, that there is hope of a recovery, but in that we may be disappointed; therefore it is our wisdom to build upon that in which we cannot be disappointed; if they belong to Christ, let the worst come to the worst; he may be raised from the second death, and then it is not so much hurt of the first.

(2.) But it is for the glory of God, that an opportunity may be given for the manifestation of God's glorious power. The afflictions of the saints are designed for the glory of God, that he may have opportunity of shewing them favour; for the sweetest mercies, and the most affecting, are those which are given when all human help is cut off. nor when the darkest dispensations of Providence, they are all for the glory of God, this sickness, this loss, this disappointment, are so; and if God be glorified, we ought to be satisfied, Lev. 10. 3. It was for the glory of God, for it was that the Son of God might be glorified thereby, as it gave him occasion to work that glorious miracle, the raising of him from the dead. It was also, because the man was bony blind, that Christ might have the honour of curing him (John 9. 3.) so Lazarus must be sick and die, that Christ may be glorified as the Lord of life. Let this comfort those whom Christ loves under all their grievances, that the design of them all, is, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby, his wisdom, power, and goodness, glorified in supporting and relieving them; see 2 Cor. 12. 9, 10. For having confirmed the ministers, they had pleaded, Lord, it is he whom thou lovest, and the plea is allowed; (v. 5.) Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus: Thus the claims of faith are ratified in the court of heaven. Now one would think it should follow, When he heard therefore that he was sick, he made all the haste that he could to him; if he loved them, now was a time to shew it by hastening to them, for he knew their immedialy expected him. But he took the contrary way to shew his love; it is not said, He loved them, and yet he lingered; but he loved them, and therefore he lingered; when he heard his friend was sick, instead of coming post to him, he abode two days still in the same place where he was. (1.) He loved them, that is, had a great opinion of Martha and Mary, of their wisdom and grace, of their faith and happy expectation. But he took the contrary way, therefore he deferred coming to them, that he might try them, that their trial might at last be found to praise and honour. (2.) He loved them, that is, he designed to do something great and extraordinary for them, to work such a miracle for their relief as he had not wrought for any of his friends; and therefore he delayed coming to them, that Lazarus might be dead and buried before he came. If Christ had come presently, and cured the sickness of Lazarus, he had done no more than he did for many; if he had raised him to life when newly dead, no more than he had done for some. and, determin their relief so long, he had an opportunity of doing more for him than for any. Note, God hath gracious intentions even in seeming delays, Isa. 54. 7, 8.—19, 14, &c. Christ's friends at Bethany were not out of his thoughts, though, when he heard of their distress, he made no haste to them, when the work of deliverance, temporal or spiritual, public or personal, stands at a stay, it does but stay the time, and every thing is beautiful in his season.

The discourse he had with his disciples, when he was about to go visit his friends at Bethany, v. 7.—16. The conference is so very free and familiar, as to make out what Christ said, I have called you friends, bearing a very apt parallel to the word of the text, which is the fountain of all mercy to those that have often rejected them. Now this may be considered, [1.] As a purpose of his kindness to his friends at Bethany, whose affliction, and all the aggravating circumstances of it, he knew very well, though no more expresses were sent to him; for he was present in spirit, though absent in body. When he knew they were brought to the last extremity, and that they had need of comfort, he sent them a signal of mercy to those that have often rejected them. [2.] As a trial of the courage of the disciples, whether they would venture to follow him thither, where they had so lately been frightened by an attempt upon their Master's life, which they looked upon as an attempt upon their's too. To go to Judah, which was so lately made too hot for them, was a casting that the Lord had withdrawn from his house, or, "Go to Bethany, and Lazarus, and I will stay and take shelter here." no, Let us go. Note, Christ never brings his people into any peril, but he accompanies them in it: and is with them, even then when they walk through the valley of the shadow of death.

(2.) Their objection against this journey: (v. 8.) Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee, and great trouble thou art again? Here, [1.] They remind him of the danger he had been in there, not long since. Christ's disciples are apt to make a greater matter of sufferings than their Master does, and to remember injuries longer. He had put up the affright, it was over and gone, and forgotten, but his disciples could not forget it; of late, in so much, as if it were this very day, they sought to stone thee. Though it was at least two months ago, the remembrance of it the thoughts had in their minds. [2.] They marvel that he will go thither again. "Will thou favour those with thy presence, that have expelled thee out of their coasts?" Christ's ways in passing by offences are above our ways. "Will thou expose thyself amongst a people that are so desperately enraged against thee? Go not thither again, where thou hast been so ill used." Here the greatly shewed great care for their Master's safety. Peter did, as he said, Master, shew thyself; had Christ been minded to shift off suffering, he did not want friends to persuade him to it; but he had opened his mouth to the Lord, and he would not, he could not, go back. Yet while the disciples shew a confidence in him, they shew a distrust in God; for the time, First, A distrust of his power; as if he could not secure both himself and them now in Judea as well as he had done formerly. Is his arm wrenched short? When we are solicitous for the interests of Christ’s church and kingdom in the world, we must yet rest satisfied in the wisdom and power of the Lord Jesus, who knows how to secure a flock of sheep from the craft of the world. A secret fear of suffering themselves; for they count upon that if he suffer. When our own private interests happen to run in the same channel with the public, we are apt to think ourselves zealous for the Lord of hosts, when really we are only zealous for our own wealth, credit, ease, and safety, and seek our own things, under colour of seeking the things of Christ; we have therefore need nicely to distinguish upon our principles.

(2.) Christ’s answer to this objection; (v. 9, 10.) Are there not twelve hours in the day? The Jews divided every day into twelve hours, and made their hours longer or shorter, according as the days were, so that an hour with them was the twelfth part of the time between sun and sun; so some. Or, they lay their hands upon them with such slowness that there were nearer twelve hours long than ours. The Divine Providence has given us day-light to work by, and lengthens it out to a competent time; and reckoning the year round, every country has just as much daylight as night, and so much more as the twilight amount to. Man’s life is a day, this day is divided into divers ages, states, and opportunities, as into hours shorter or longer, as God has appointed; the consideration of this should make us not only very busy, as to the work of life, (if there were twelve hours in the day, each of them ought to be filled up with duty, and none of them trifled away,) but also very easy as to the perils of life; our day shall be lengthened out till our work be done, and our testimony finished. This Christ applies to his case, and shows why he must go to Judea, because he had a clear call to go. For the opening of this,

First, He shews the comfort and satisfaction which a man has in his own mind while he keeps in the way of his duty, as it is in general prescribed by the word of God, and particularly determined by the providence of God; If any man walk in the day, he stumbles not; that is, if a man keep close to his duty, and walks uprightly, and set God as his rule, with an impartial respect to all God’s commandments, he does not hesitate in his own mind, but, walking uprightness, walks surely, and with a holy confidence. As he that walks in the day, stumbles not, but goes on steadily and cheerfully in his way, because he sees the light of this world, and by it sees his way before him, so a good man, without an external security or signification, relies upon the word of God as his rule, and regards the glory of God as his end, because he sees those two great lights, and keeps his eye upon them; thus he is furnished with a faithful guide in all his doubts, and a powerful guard in all his dangers, Gal. 6. 4. Ps. 119. 6. Christ, wherever he went, walked in the day, and so shall we, if we follow his steps.

Secondly, The time of the day is m., who walks not according to this rule; (v. 16.) If a man walk in the night, he stumbles; that is, if a man walk in the way of his heart, and the sight of his eyes, and according to the course of this world, if he consult his own carnal considerations more than the will and glory of God, he falls into temptations and snares, is liable to great uncasefulness and frightful apprehensions; trembles at the shaking of a leaf, and flees when none pursues: while an upright man laughs at the shaking of the spear, and stands un-daunted when ten thousand invade. See Isa. 33. 11—16. He stumbles, because there is no light in him, there is no rule by which he can direct his course, which light about us is to our natural actions. He has not a good principle within; he is not sincere; his eye is evil. Thus Christ not only justifies his purpose of going into Judea, but encourages his disciples to go along with him, and fear no evil. 2. The death of Lazarus is here discoursed of between Christ and his disciples, v. 11—16. Where what?

(1.) The notice Christ gave his disciples of the death of Lazarus, and an intimation that his business into Judea was to look after him, v. 11. After he had prepared his disciples for this dangerous march into an enemy’s country, he then gives them,

[1.] Plain intelligence of the death of Lazarus, though he had received no notice of it: Our friend seeketh. See how here Christ calls a believer, and a believer’s death. First, He calls a believer his friend; our friend Lazarus. Note, 1. There is a covenant of friendship between Christ and believers, and a friendly affection and communion pursuant to it, which our Lord Jesus will own and not be ashamed of. His secret is with the righteous. 2. Those whom Christ is pleased to own as his friends, all his disciples should take care and set themselves to watch the friends of Christ as Lazarus as their common friend; Our friend d. 3. Death itself does not break the bond of friendship between Christ and a believer. Lazarus is dead, and yet he is still our friend. Secondly, he calls the death of a believer a sleep; he sleepeth. It is good to call death by such names and titles as will help to make it more familiar and less formidable to us. The death of Lazarus was in a particular sense a sleep, that of Lazarus, his daughter, because they were to be raised again speedily; and since we are sure to rise again at last, why should that make any great difference? And why should not the believing hope of that resurrection to eternal life, make it as easy to us to put off the body and die, as it is to put off our clothes and go to sleep? A good christian, when he dies, does but sleep; he rests from the labours of the day past, and is refreshing himself for the next morning. Nay, herein death has the advantage of sleep, that sleep is only the parenthesis, but death is the period, of our cares and toils. The soul does not sleep, but becomes more active; the body sleeps without any assist, without any terror; not discomposed nor disturbed. The believer who dies to this world, is not only freed from the weight and shackles of a criminal reserved for execution, but to the godly it is a bed, and all its bands as the soft and downy fettens of an easy quiet sleep. Though the body corrupt, it will rise in the morning as if it had never seen corruption; it is but putting off our clothes to be mended and trimmed up for the marriage-day, the coronation-day, to rise again glorious. See Isa. 25. 5. 4. Th. 3. 14. The Greeks called their burying-places, dormitories—εκατάσπαρσια.

[2.] Particular intimations of his favourable intentions concerning Lazarus; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. He could have done it, and yet have said where he was; he that recovered at a distance one dying, (ch. 4. 50.) could have raised and discharged the affair. He goes to anoint his body upon the miracle, to work it by the grave side; I go, to awake him. As sleep is a resemblance of death, so a man’s waking out of sleep when he is called, especially when he is called by his own name, is an emblem of the resurrection; (Job 14. 13.) Then shall thou call. Christ had no sooner said, Our friend sleeps, but presently he adds, I go, that I may awake him. When Christ tells his people at any time how bad the cause is, he lets them know in the same breath how easily, how quickly, he can mend it. Christ's telling his disciples that this was his business to Judea, might help to take off their fear of going with him thither; he did not go upon a public errand to the temple, but a private visit, which would not so much expose him and them; and besides, it was to do a kindness to a family they were all obliged to; see John 11:41.

(2.) Their mistake of the meaning of this notice, and the blunder they made about it; (v. 12, 13.) They said, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. This speaks,

(1.) Some concern they had for their friend Lazarus, they hoped he would recover; z'w'v; ταράξατε - He shall be saved from dying at this time. Probably, their concern was increased upon the news of his illness, that one of the most threatening symptoms was he was not, that he was restless, and could not get any sleep; and now that they heard he slept, they concluded the fever was gone off, and the worst was past. Sleep is often nature's physic, and reviving to its weak and weary powers. This is true of the sleep of death; if a good christian so sleep, he shall do well, better than he did here, and better than he does himself; for hereby they insinuate that it was now needless for him to go to him, and expose himself and them. If he sleep, he will be quickly well, and we may stay where we are. Thus we are willing to hope that that good work which we are called to do, will do itself, or will be done by some other hand, if there be peril in the doing of it. This mistake of the go and see him; Tv'c; gl; for: our Lord; Jesus spoke of his death. See here, First, How dull of understanding Christ's disciples as yet were. Let us not therefore condemn all those for heretics, who mistake the sense of some of Christ's sayings. It is not good to aggravate our brethren's mistakes; yet this was a gross one, for it had easily been prevented, if they had remembered how frequently death is called a sleep in the Old Testament. They should have considered Christ when he spoke of the resurrection-language. Besides, it would sound odd for their master to undertake a journey of two or three days, only to awake a friend out of a natural sleep, which any one else might awake him out of. What Christ undertakes to do, we may be sure, is something great and uncommon, and a work worthy of himself. Secondly, How carefully the evangelist goes upon Christ's words, and carefully we must trace those that speak in an unknown tongue, or use similitudes, should learn hence to explain themselves, and pray that they may interpret, to prevent mistakes.

(3.) The plain and express declaration which Jesus made to them of the death of Lazarus, and his resolution to go to Bethany, v. 14, 15.

(1.) He gives them notice of the death of Lazarus; what he had before said darkly, he now says plainly; and without a figure; Lazarus is dead.

Christ takes cognizance of the death of his saints, for it is precious in his sight, (Ps. 116, 13.) and he is not pleased if we do not consider it, and lay it to heart. See what a compassionate teacher Christ is, and how he condescends to those that are out of the way, and by his subsequent savings and doings explains the difficulties of what went before.

(2.) He gives them the reason why he had delayed; he had brotherly love for his disciples makes that I was not there. If he had been there time enough, he would have healed his disease and prevented his death, which would have been much for the comfort of Lazarus's friends; but then his disciples would have seen no further proof of his power than what they had often seen and, consequence, their faith had received no improvement; but now that he went and raised him from the dead, as there were many brought to believe on him, who before did not; (v. 43.) so there was much done toward the perfecting of what was lacking in the faith of those that did, which Christ aimed at; to the intent that ye may believe.

(3.) He resolves now to go to Bethany, and take his disciples along with him; Let us go into him, Not, "Let us go to his sisters, to comfort them," which is the utmost we can be bow, but we go to him; for Christ can show wonders to the dead. Death, which will separate us from all our other friends, and cut us off from correspondence with them, cannot separate us from the love of Christ, nor put us out of the reach of his calls; as he will maintain his covenant with the dead, so he can make visits to the dead. Lazarus is dead, but let us go to Bethany, which was a swarm; he said to his fellow-disciples, who, probably, looked with fear and concern upon one another, when Christ had said so positively, Let us go to him; he said very courageously, Let us also go, that we may die with him. With him, that is,

(1.) With Lazarus, who was now dead; so we take it. Lazarus was a dear and losing friend both to Christ and his disciples, and a particular intimacy with him. Now if he be dead, saith he, let us even go and die with him. For, First, "If we survive, we know not how to live without him." Probably, Lazarus had done them many good offices, sheltered them, and provided for them, and been to them instead of eyes; and now that he was gone, they had no man like minded, and Therefore, saith he, we have as good die with him. Secondly, we must die with him. Our lives bound up in the lives of some that were dear to us; but God will teach us to live, and to live comfortably, upon himself, when these are gone, whom we thought we could not have lived without. But that is not all. Secondly, If we die, we hope to be happy with him. Such a firm belief he has of a happiness on the other side death, and such great hope that he has of a face of Jesus, that he is willing they should all go and die with him. It is better to die, and going with our christian friends to that world which is enriched by their removal to it, than stay behind in a world that is impoverished by their departure out of it. The more of our friends are translated hence, the fewer cords we have to bind us to this earth, and the more to draw our hearts henceward. How pleasantly do the thoughts present of dying, as if we were but undressing and going to bed.

(2.) Let us go and die with our Master, who is now exposing himself to death by venturing into Judea; and so I rather think it is meant. If he will go into danger, let us also go and take our lot with him, according to the command we received, Follow me. Thomas knew so much of the malice of the Jews against him, and their intention to kill him that he could not, therefore, or else he saw that it was no foreign supposition that he was now going to die. And now Thomas discovers, First, A gracious readiness to die with Christ himself, fleeing from strong affections to him, through his faith was weak, as appeared afterward, ch. 14. 50-20. 23. When their Messiah] I will die, (v. 17.) Second, A zealous desire to help his fellow-disciples into the same frame; Let us go, and all, and die with him; if they stone him, let them stone us, who would desire to survive such a Master? Thus, in difficult times, Christians should animate one another. We may each of us say, Let us die with him. Note. The consideration of the dying of the Lord Jesus should make us willing to die whenever God calls for us.

17. Then when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already. 18. Now Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off: 19. And many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother. 20. Then Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him: but Mary sat still in the house. 21. Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. 22. But I know, that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee. 23. Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. 24. Martha saith unto him, I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day. 25. Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection, and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: 26. And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believe thou this? 27. She saith unto him, Yea, Lord: I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. 28. And when she had so said, she went out, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is come, and calleth for thee. 29. As soon as she heard that, she arose quickly, and came unto him. 30. Now Jesus was not yet come into the town, but was in that place where Martha met him. 31. The Jews then which were with her in the house, and comforted her, when they saw Mary, that she rose up hastily and went out, followed her, saying, she goeth unto the grave to weep there. 32. Then when Mary was come where Jesus was, and saw him, she fell down at his feet saying unto him, Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.

The matter being determined, that Christ will go to Judea, and his disciples with him, they address themselves to their journey; in this journey some passages happened, which the other evangelists record, as the healing of a blind man at Jericho, and the conversion of Zacchæus. We must not reckon ourselves out of our way, while we are in the way of doing good; nor he so intent upon one good office as to neglect another.

At length, he comes near to Bethany, which is said to be about fifteen furlongs off from Jerusalem, about two measured miles, v. 18. Notice is taken of this, that this miracle was in effect wrought in Jerusalem, and so was put to her score. Christ's miracles in Galilee were more numerous, but those in or near Jerusalem were more illustrious; there was healed one that had been diseased thirty-eight years, another that had been blind from his birth, and raised one that had been dead four days. To Bethany Christ came, and observed, When he had come near, there met him ten lepers, who, as he sat in the house, called, and desired him that he would shew them their bodies. When he had been last with them, it is probable that he left them well, in health and joy; but when we part from our friends, (though Christ knows,) we know not what changes may affect us or them before we meet again.

1. He found his friend Lazarus in the grave, v. 17. When he came near, he was troubled, and forsook the company, and coming near to the tomb, he wept at the sight of the mourners. He was not troubled at the tidings of his sickness, but he wept at the sight of the mourners, because his friends were there in grief. Martha and Mary were almost swallowed up with sorrow for the death of their brother, which is intimated where it is said, that many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary, to comfort them. Note. (1.) Ordinarily, where death is, there are mourners especially when those that were agreeable and amiable to their relations, and serviceable to their generation, are taken away. The house where death is, is called the house of mourning, Eccl. 7. 2. When man goes to his long home, the mourners go about the streets, (Ecc. 12. 5.) or rather sit alone, and keep silence. Here was Martha's house, a house where the fear of God was, and on which his blessing rested; yet made a house of mourning. Grace will keep sorrow from the heart, (ch. 14. 1.) not from the house. (2.) Where there are mourners, there ought to be comforters. It is a duty we owe to those that are in sorrow, to mourn with them, and to comfort them; and our mourning with them will be some comfort to them. When we are under the present impressions of grief, we are apt to forget those things which would minister comfort to us, and therefore have need of remembrancers. It is a mercy and a blessing when we are in sorrow, and our duty to be such to them who are in sorrow. The Jewish doctors laid great stress upon this, obliging their disciples to make conscience of comforting the mourners after the burial of the dead. They comforted them concerning their brother, by speaking to them of him, not only of the good name he left behind, but of the happy state he was gone to. When godly relations and friends are taken from us, what have we to be afflicted concerning ourselves, who are left behind, and miss them, we have reason to be comforted concerning them who are gone before us to a happiness where they have no miss of us. This visit which the Jews made to Martha and Mary, is an evidence that they were persons of distinction, and made a figure; as also that they behaved with great civility, to all who might be followers of Christ, yet those who had no respect for him, were civil to them. There was also a providence in that, that so many Jews, Jewish ladies, it is probable, should come together, just at this time, to comfort the mourners, that they might be unexceptionable witnesses of the miracle, and see what miserable comforters they were, in comparison with Christ. Christ did not usually send for witnesses to his miracles, and yet if none were by but relations, it would have been excepted against; therefore God's counsel so ordered it, that those should come together accidentally, to hear their testimony to it, that all impiety might stop her mouth.

II. What passed between him and his surviving friends will now come to our view. He defers his visits for a time, they are thereby made the more acceptable, much the more welcome; so it was here. His departures endear his returns, and his absence teaches us how to value his presence.

1. We have here the interview between Jesus and Martha; she went and met him, v. 20.

(1.) It should seem that Martha was earnestly engaged in household affairs, and importuned for it. Either she had sent out messengers, to bring her tidings of his first approach, or she had often asked, Sæc ge him whom my soul loveth? So that the first who discovered him, ran to her with the welcome news. However it was, she heard of his coming before he was come. She had waited long, and often asked, Is he come? and could hear no tidings of him; but long looked for came at last. At the end the vision will speak, and not be.

(2.) Martha, when the good news was brought that Jesus was coming, threw all aside, and went and met him, in token of a most affectionate welcome. She waved all ceremony and compliment to the Jews who came to visit her, and hastened to go and meet Jesus. Note, When God by his grace or providence discovers to us a sense of mercy and comfort, we should go forth by faith, hope, and prayer to meet him. Some suggest that Martha went out of the town to meet Jesus, to let him know that there were several Jews in the house, who were no friends to him, that if he pleased he might keep out of the way of them.

(3.) When Martha went to meet Jesus, Mary sat still in the house. Some think that she did hear the tidings, being in her withdrawing-room, receiving visits of condolence, while Martha, who was busied in the household-affairs, had early notice of it. Perhaps Martha would not tell her sister that Christ was coming, being ambitious of the honour of receiving him first. Sineu est præsidium clama fratrum clam parentibus at Christum sese conferre. Ithy præsidium conducte us to Christ, while bre- •he and parents know we are doing Maldonat. in locum. Others think that she did hear that Christ was come, but was so overwhelmed with sorrow, that she did not care for stirring, choosing rather to indulge her sorrow, and to sit pering upon her affliction, and saying, I do well to mourn. Comparing this story with that, Luke 10. 38, 39, &c., we may observe the different temperers of these two sisters, and the temptations and advantages of each. Martha's natural temper was active and busy, she loved to be here and there and at the end of every thing; and this had been a snare to her, when by it she was not only careful and cumbered about many things, but hindered from the exercises of devotion; but now in a day of affliction this active temper did her a kindness, kept the grief from her heart, and made her forward to meet Christ, who soon received comfort from him the sooner. On the other hand, Mary's natural temper was contemplative and reserved; this had been formerly an advantage to her, when it set her at Christ's feet, to hear his word, and enabled her there to attend upon him without those distractions which Martha was cumbered with: but now in the day of affliction that same temper proved a snare to her, and made her sit down in her grief, and disposed her to melancholy; but Mary sat still in the house. See here how much it will be our wisdom carefully to watch against the temptations, and improve the advantages, of our natural temper.

Here is fully related the discourse between Christ and Martha.

[1.] Martha's address to Christ, v. 21, 22.

First, She complains of Christ's long absence and delay. She said it, not only with grief for the death of her brother, but some resentment of the seeming unkindness of Christ, to have let him be buried, when there had been no time to have brought him back; my brother had been here, my brother had not died. Here is, 1. Some evidence of faith. She believed Christ's power, that, though her brother's sickness was very grievous, yet he could have cured it, and so have prevented his death; she believed his word, that, if he had but seen Lazarus in his extreme illness, and his dear relations all in tears about him, he would have had compassion on him, and his power and love would have been sufficient to rescue him from death, and for his compassions fail not. But, 2. Here are sad instances of unbelief. Her faith was true, but weak as a bruised reed, for she limits the power of Christ, in saying, If thou hadst been here; whereas she ought to have known that Christ could cure at a distance, and that his gracious operations were not limited to his bodily presence. She reflects likewise upon the wisdom and kindness of Christ, that he did not hasten to them when they sent for him, as if he had not timed his business well, and now might as well have stayed away, and not have come at all, as to come too late; and as for any help now, she can scarcely entertain the thought of it.

Secondly, Yet she corrects and comforts herself with the thoughts of the prevailing interest Christ had in her brother. She knew she had been a student, and a hearer of his Master, and for suggesting that he comes too late; for I know that even now, despite as the case is, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee. Observe, 1. How willing her hope was. Though she has not courage to ask of Jesus that he should raise him to life again, there having been no precedent as yet of any one raised to life, that had been so long dead, yet, like a modest petitioner, she humbly presses the case to the wise and compassionate consideration of the Lord Jesus. When we know not what in particular to ask or expect, let us in general refer ourselves to God, let him do as seemeth him good. Judicis sui est non preces, judicis enim—leave it to thy judgment, not to my petition. Aug. in locum. When we know not what to pray for: it is our comfort and to our advantage to let God know what to ask for, and is always heard. 2. How weak her faith was. She should have said, "Lord, thou canst do whatsoever thou wilt," but she only says, "Thou canst obtain whatsoever thou prayest for;" she had forgotten that the Son has life in himself, that he wrought miracles by his own power. Yet both these considerations must be taken in for the encouragement of our faith and hopes, and neither excluded; the dominion Christ has on earth, and his interest and intercession in heaven. He has in the one hand the golden sceptre, and in the other the golden censer; his power always predominant, his intercession always prevalent.

[2.] The comfortable word which Christ gave to Martha, in answer to her partial address, v. 23.

Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again.

Martha, in her complaint, looked back, reflecting with regret, that Christ was not there, for then, thinks she, my brother had been now alive; we are apt, in such cases, to add to our own trouble, by fancying what might have been. "If such a method had been taken, such a physician employed, my friend had not died," which is more than we know; but what good does this do, when God's will is done, and our business is to submit to him? Christ directs Martha, and us in her, to look forward, and to think what shall be, for that is a certainty, and yields sure comfort: Thy brother shall rise again.

First, This was true of Lazarus in a sense pecu-

lier to him, he was now presently to be raised; but Christ speaks of it in general as a thing to be done, not which he himself would do, so firmly did our Lord Jesus speak of what he did. He also expresses it ambiguously, leaving her uncertain at first, whether he would raise her presently, or not till the last day, that he might try her faith and patience.

Secondly, It is applicable to all the saints, and their resurrection at the last day. Note, It is matter of comfort to us, when we have buried our godly friends and relations, to think that they shall rise again. As the soul at death is not lost, but gone before, so the body is not lost, but laid up. Think you hear Christ saying, "Thy parent, thy child, thy yoke-fellow, shall rise again; these dry bones shall live." Note, both the faith which Martha mixed with this word, and the unbelief mixed with this faith, v. 24.

First, She accounted it a faithful saying, that he shall rise again at the last day. Though the doctrine of the resurrection was to have its full proof from Christ's resurrection, yet, as it was already revealed, she firmly believed it, Acts 24. 15. 1. That there shall be a last day, with which all the days of time shall be numbered, Ps. 90. 3. That day shall be a general resurrection at that day, when the earth and sea shall give up their dead. 3. That there shall be a particular resurrection of each one. "I know that I shall rise again, and this and the other relation that was dear to me." As bone shall return to his bone in that day, so friend to his friend."

Secondly, Yet she seems to think this saying not so well, than those all others that were really true. "I know he shall rise again at the last day; but what are we the better for that now?" As if the comforts of the resurrection to eternal life were not worth speaking of, or yielded not satisfaction sufficient to balance her affliction. See our weakness and folly, that we suffer present sensible things to make a deeper impression upon us, both of grief and joy, than those all others that are the objects of faith. I know that he shall rise again at the last day; and is not that enough? She seems not to think it is. Thus, by our discontent under present crosses, we greatly undervalue our future hopes, and put a slight upon them, as not worth regarding.

[4.] The further instruction and encouragement which Jesus Christ gave her; for he will not quench the flame of faith, but break it into kindling wood. He said to her, I am the Resurrection and the Life; v. 25, 26. Two things Christ possesses her with the belief of, in reference to the present distress; and they are the things which our faith must fasten upon in the like cases.

First, The power of Christ, his sovereign power; I am the Resurrection and the Life, the Fountain of eternal life. The Head and Author of the resurrection, Martha believed that at his prayer God would give any thing, but he would have her know that by his word he could work any thing. Martha believed a resurrection at the last day, Christ tells her that he had that power lodged in his own hand, that the dead were to hear his voice, ch. 5. 25, 26. for Christ was the resurrection, and the Life. Note, It is an unspeakable comfort to all good christians, that Jesus Christ is the Resurrection and the Life, and will be so to them. Resurrection is a return to life, Christ is the author of that return, and of that life to which it is a return. We look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, and Christ is both; the author and principle of both, and the ground of our hope of both.

Secondly, The promises of the new covenant, which give us further ground of hope that we shall live. Observe, 1. To whom these promises are made—to them that believe in Jesus Christ, to them that consent, and confide in Jesus Christ, as the only Mediator of reconciliation and communion between God and man; that receive the record God has given in his word concerning his Son, sincerely comply with it, and answer all the great intentions of it. The condition of the latter promise is thus expressed, Whoever liveth, and believeth in me, which may be rendered, (1.) Of natural life; Whoever lives in this world, whether he be Jew or Gentile, wherever he lives, if he believes in Christ, he shall live by him. Yet it limits the time, Whoever, during life, while he is here in this state of probation, believeth in me, shall be happy in me, but after death it will be too late. Whoever lives and believeth, lives in the truth (Gal. 5. 20.) hath a faith that will be a conversation. Or, (2.) Of spiritual life: He that believes and believeth, is he that by faith is born again to a heavenly and divine life, to whom to live is Christ—that makes Christ the life of his soul.

2. What the promises are; (v. 25.) Though he die, yet shall he live, nav., (v. 26.) he shall never die. Man consists of body and soul, and provision is made for both.

(1.) For the body, here is the promise of a blessed resurrection. Though the body he dead because of sin, (there is no remedy but it will die,) yet it shall live again, though he were dead. All the difficulties that attend the state of the dead, are here overlooked, and made nothing of. Though the sentence of death was just, though the effects of death be dismal, though we are long in the grave, it is a contradiction, not to believe that dead and buried, dead and putrefied, though the scattered dust be so mixed with common dust, that no art of man can distinguish, much less separate them, put the case as strongly as you will, on that side, yet we are sure that he shall live again; the body shall be raised a glorious body.

(2.) For the soul, here is the promise of a blessed immortality. He that believeth, and believeth, who, being united to Christ by faith, lives spiritually by virtue of that union, he shall never die. That spiritual life shall never be extinguished, but perfected in eternal life. As the soul, being in its nature spiritual, is therefore immortal; so if by faith it live a spiritual life, consonant to its nature, its felicity shall be immortal too. It shall never die, shall never be extinguished, shall never be wanting in the soul. Nor is there any intermission or interruption of its life, as there is of the life of the body. The mortality of the body shall at length be swallowed up of life; but the life of the soul, the believing soul, shall be immediately at death swallowed up of immortality. He shall not die, is no idea, for ever—Non morietur in aeternum; so Cyprian quotes it. The body shall not be for ever dead in the grave; it dies (like the two witnesses) but for a time, times, and the division of time; and when time shall be no more, and all the divisions of it shall be numbered and finished, a spirit of life from God shall enter into it. But that is not all; the soul shall not die that death which is for ever, shall not die eternally. Blessed, and holy, that is, Blessed and happy, is he, that by faith hath entered into this life forever. Thus Christ makes the man, who is that Resurrection; for in such the second death, which is a death for ever, shall have no power; see ch. 6. 40.

Christ asks her, "Believeth thou this? Canst thou assent to it with application? Canst thou take my word for it?" Note, When we have read or heard the word of Christ concerning the great things of the other world, we should seriously put it to ourselves, "Do we believe this, this truth in particular, this which is attended with so many difficulties, this which is suited to my case? Does my belief of it realize it to me, and give my soul an assurance of it, that I can say, not only this I believe, but thus I believe it." Martha was dozing upon his breast's being to go to life in this world; before Christ gave her hopes of that, he directed her thoughts to another life, another world: "No matter for that, but believe thou this that I tell thee concerning the future state." The crosses and comforts of this present time would not make that impression upon us that they do, if we did but believe the things of eternity as we ought.

(1.) Martha's unsignined assent yielded to what Christ said, v. 27. We have here Martha's creed, the good confession she witnessed, the same with that for which Peter was commanded, (Matt. 16. 16, 17.) and it is the conclusion of the whole matter.

First. Here is the guide of her faith, and that is, the word of Christ; without any alteration, exception, or proviso, she takes it entire as Christ had said it.

own pain, and to say, We do well to be passionate in our grief, even unto death; we are apt to fasten upon those things that aggravate the affliction, and what good does it do us, when it is our duty to reconcile ourselves to the will of God in it? Why should mourners go to the grave, to weep there, when they sorrow not as those that have no hope? Affliction of itself is greater than the grief that is in it. 38. That is the wisdom and duty of comforters; and that is, to prevent as much as may be, in those who grieve inordinately, the revival of the sorrow, and to divert it. Those Jews that followed Mary, were thereby led to Christ, and became the witnesses of one of his most glorious miracles. It is good clearing to Christ's friends in their sorrows, for they have a keener sense of it. Those that have a greater language in their miseries than Martha, and knew what fastened upon her heart, may have an holy and pleasing voice, in the ears of Christ, no rhetoric like that.

33. When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled. 34. And said, Where have ye laid him? They said unto him, Lord, come and see. 35. Jesus wept. 36. Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him! 37. And some of them said, Could not this man, which opened the eyes of the blind, have caused that even this man should not have died? 38. Jesus therefore again groaning in himself cometh to the grave. It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. 39. Jesus said, Take ye away the stone. Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, Lord, by this time he stinketh: for if thou hadst been here, I mean dead for four days. 40. Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God? 41. Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. 42. And I knew that thou heardest me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me. 43. And when he thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. 44. And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes: and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go. Here we have,

I. Christ's tender sympathy with his afflicted friends, and the share he took to himself in their sorrows, which appeared three ways.

[32] Her address is very pathetic; Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Christ's delay was designed for the best, and proved so; yet both the sisters very indecently cast the same in his teeth, and in effect charge him with the death of their brother. This repeated challenge he might justly have resumed; might have told them he had sought them else to do them to his beck, and to attend them; he must come when his business would permit him: but not a word of this; he considered the circumstances of their affliction, and that losers think they may have leave to speak; an therefore overlooked the rudeness of this welcome, and gave us an example of mildness and meekness in such cases. Mary added no more, as Martha did; but it appears by what follows, that what she said short in words, she made up in tears; she said less than Martha, but wept more; and tears of devout affectation, that beguiled the hearing voice, in the ears of Christ, no rhetoric like that.

[33] Holme's sermons.

[34] Cant. 11. 15.

[35] The inward groans and troubles of his spirit, v. 35. Jesus saith to Mary weeping for the loss of a loving brother, and the Jews that came with her, weeping for the loss of a good neighbour and friend; when he saw what a place of weepers, a Beechim, this was, he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled. See here,

(1.) The griefs of the sons of men represented in the tears of Mary and her friends. What an eminent instance of this is, the case of Lazarus. Nature itself teaches us to weep over our dear relations, when they are removed by death: Providence thereby calls to weeping and mourning. It is probable that Lazarus's estate devolved upon his sisters, and was a considerable addition to their fortunes; and in such a case, people say now-a-days, though they cannot wish their relations dead, (that is, they do not say they do,) yet, if they were dead, they would not wish them alive again; but these sisters, whatever they got by their brother's death, heartily wished him alive again. Religion teaches as likewise to weep with them that weep, as these Jews here with Mary, considering that we ourselves also are in the body. They that truly love their friends, will share with them in their joys and griefs; for what is friendship, but a communication of affections? Job 16:5.

(2) The grace of the Son of God, and his compassion toward those that are in misery. In all their afflictions he is afflicted, Isa. 63:9. Judg. 10:16. When Christ saw them all in tears, [1] He groaned in the spirit. He suffered himself to be tempted, (as we are when we are disturbed by some great affliction,) yet without an joy. This was an expression, either, First, Of his displeasure at the inordinate grief of those about him, as Mark 3:39. "Why make ye this ado, and weep?" But in his heart is here; does this become those that believe a God, a heaven, and another world? Or, Secondly, Of his resentment of the calamitous state of human life, and the power of death, which fallen man is subject to; being now to make a vigorous attack upon death and the grave, he thus stirred up himself to the encounter, put on the garments of vengeance, and his fury it upheld him; and that he might be an example to others. Tears are the outcome of our grievances, and the cure of our griefs, he was pleased to make himself sensible of the weight of them, and under the burden of them he now groaned in spirit. Or, Thirdly, It was an expression of his kind sympathy with his friends that were in sorrow. Here were the sounding of the bowels, and the mercies, which the afflicted church so earnestly solicits, Isa. 63:15. Christ not only seemed concerned, but he was moved in soul, the human heart was inwardly and sincerely affected with the case. David's pretended friends counterfeited sympathy, to disguise their enmity: (Ps. 11.6.) but we must learn of Christ to have our love and sympathy without dissimulation. Christ's was a deep and hearty sigh. [2] He was troubled. He troubled himself; so the phrase is, very significantly. He had all the particulars and indications of the human nature, for in all things he must be like to his brethren; but he had a perfect command of them, so that they were never up, but when and as they were called; he was never troubled, but when he troubled himself; as he saw cause; he often composed himself to trouble, but was never discomposed or disordered by it; he was voluntary both in his passion and in his compassion; he had power to lay down his grief, and to rise up out of it. What in him? Or concern for them appeared by his kind inquiry after the poor remains of his deceased friend, [v. 34.] Where have ye laid him? He knew where he was laid, and yet asks, because, (1.) He would thus express himself as a man, even then when he was going to exert the power of a God. Being found in fashion as a man, he accommodates himself to the way and manner of the sons of men; and next, (2.) To know whether he could be concerned for himself if he were, saith Austin here. (2.) He inquired where the grave was, lest, if he had gone straight to it of his own knowledge, the unbelieving Jews should hence have taken occasion to suspect a collusion between him and Lazarus, and a trick in the case. Many expositors observe this from Chrysostom. (3.) He would thus divert the grief of his mourning friends, by raising their expectations of something greater, and better, than the material, or corporeal life. He was to engage them with an address of condolence, to mingle a few fruitless insignificant tears with your's; no, I have other work to do; come, let us adjourn to the grave, and go about our business there. Note, A serious address to our work is the best remedy against inordinate grief. (4.) He would hereby intimate to us the special care he takes of the bodies of the saints, while they lie in the grave; he takes notice where they are laid, and will look after them, there is not only a covenant with the dust, but a guard upon it.

3. It appeared by his tears. Those about him did not tell him where the body was buried, but desired him to come and see, and led him directly to the grave, that his eye might yet more effect his heart with the case of Lazarus. This is the way also, as if he had been following the corpse thither, Jesus wept, v. 35. A very short verse, but it afford many useful instructions. (1) That Jesus Christ was really and truly Man, and partake with the children, not only of flesh and blood, but of a human soul susceptible of the impressions of joy, and grief, and other affections. Christ gave this proof of his humanity in his own case; that; when a man, he could weep, and, as one merciful, he would weep, before he gave this proof of his divinity. (2) That he was a man, of sorrow, and acquainted with grief, as was foretold, Isa. 53:2. We never read that he laughed, but more than once we have him in tears. Thus he shews not only that a memorable state will consist with the love of God, but who they saw to the Spirit, must sow in tears, and shall reap with joy; for he is the first that is a sower, and makes them most to resemble Christ. It is a relief to those who are in sorrow, to have their friends sympathize with them, especially such a friend as the Lord Jesus.

Different constructions were put upon Christ's weeping.

[1.] Some made a kind and candid interpretation of it, and what was very natural; (v. 36.) Then said the Jews, Indeed this man was a benefactor. They seemed to wonder that he should have so strong an affection for one whom he was not related to, and whom he had not had any long acquaintance with, for Christ spent most of his time in Galilee, a great way from Lazarus. It becomes us, according to this example of Christ, to shew our love to our friends, both living and dying. We must sorrow for our brethren that sleep in Jesus, though they, said him of life, though not void of hope; as the devout men that buried Stephen, Acts 8.2. Though our tears profit not the dead, they embalm their memory. These tears were indications of his particular love to Lazarus, but he has given proofs no less evident of his love to all the saints, in that he died for them. When he only dropped a tear over Lazarus, they said, See how he loved him. Much more reason have we to weep for those whom he laid down his life; So he loved us. Greater love has no man than this.

[2.] Others made a peevish unfair reflection upon it, as if these tears bespoke his inability to help his friend; (v. 37.) Could not this man, that opened the eyes of the blind, have prevented the death of Lazarus? Here it is slily insinuated, First, That the death of Lazarus being, (as it seemed by his tears) a great grief to him, if he could have prevented it he would, and therefore because he did not, he inclines to think that he could not, as when he was dying, they concluded that he could not, because he did not, save himself, and come down from the cross; not considering that divine power is always directed in its operations by divine wisdom, not merely according to his will, but according to the counsel of his will, wherein it becomes us to acquiesce. If Christ's friends, whom he knew, dye; if it is the will of, whom he receiveth, if he pleaseth, and is afflicted; we cannot dispute it to any defect, either in his power or love, but conclude that it is because he sees it for the best. Secondly, That therefore it might justly be questioned, whether he did indeed open the eyes of the blind, that is, whether it was not a sham. His not working this miracle, they thought enough to invalidate the former; at least, it should seem that he had a limited power, and therefore not a divine one.
Christ soon convinced these whisperers, by raising Lazarus from the dead, which was the greater work, that he could have prevented his death, but therefore did not, because he would glorify himself the more.

II. Christ's approach to the grave, and the preparation that was made for working this miracle.

1. Christ repeats his groans, upon his coming near the grave; (v. 38.) Again groaning in himself, he cometh unto the grave. The Jews were alarmed at the unbelief of those, who spake doubtingly of his power, and blamed him for not preventing the death of Lazarus; he was grieved for the hardness of their hearts. He never groaned so much for his own pains and sufferings as for the sins and follies of men, particularly Jerusalem's, Matt. xxviii. 37. (2.) Being affected with the fresh lamentations, which, it is likely the mourning sisters made, when they came near the grave, more passionately and pathetically than before, his tender spirit was sensibly touched with their wailings. (3.) Some think that he groaned in spirit, because, to gratify the desire of his friends, he was to bring Lazarus again into this sinful troublesome world, from that rest into which he was newly entered; it would be a kindness to Mary and Martha, but it would be to him like thrusting one out to a stormy sea again, when they were newly got into a safe and quiet haven. If Lazarus had been let alone, Christ would quickly have gone to him into the other world; but, being restored to life, Christ quickly left him behind in this world. (4.) Christ groaned as one that would affect himself with the calamitous state of the human nature, as subject to death, from which he was now about to remove Lazarus. Thus he stirred up himself to take hold on God in the prayer he was to make, that he might offer it up with strong crying, Heb. 5. 7. Ministers, when they are sent by the preaching of the gospel to raise dead souls, should be much affected with the deplorable condition of those they preach to, and pray for, and groan in themselves to think of it.

2. The grave is here described, wherein Lazarus lay; it was a cave, and a stone lay upon it. The graves of the common people, probably, were digged as our's are; but persons of distinction were, as with us, interred in vaults; so Lazarus was, and such was the sepulchre in which Christ was buried. Probably, this fashion was kept up among the Jews, in imitation of the patriarchs, who buried their dead in the cave of Machpelah, Gen. 23. This care taken of the dead bodies of their friends, and their expectation of their resurrection; they reckoned the solemnity of the funeral ended, when the stone was rolled to the grave, or, as here, laid upon it, like that on the mouth of the den into which Daniel was cast, (Dan. 6. 17.) that the purpose might not be changed; intimating that the dead are separated from the living, and gone the way whence they came, as the heathens said, Ps. 94. 10. This is the grave-stone, with an inscription upon it, which the Greeks called μνημείον— a memorandum, because it is both a memorial of the dead, and a memento to the living, putting them in remembrance of that which we are all concerned to remember. It is called by the Latins, Monumentum, a monument, because it gives a monument.

3. Orders are given to remove the stone, (v. 39.) Take ye away the stone. He would have this stone removed, that all the standers-by might see the body lie dead in the sepulchre; and that way might be made for its coming out, and it might appear to be a true body, and not a ghost or spectre. He would have some of the servants to remove it, that they might be witnesses, by the smell of the putrefaction of the body, and that therefore it was truly dead. It is a good step toward the raising of a soul to spiritual life when the stone is taken away, when prejudices are removed and got over, and way made for the word to the heart, that it may do its work there, and say what it has to say. *

4. An objection made by Martha against the opening of the grave, Lord, by this time he stinketh, or, is become noisome, for he has been dead four days, τεταίρετος @ τι πανί, quidquam autem est, he is four days old in the other world; a citizen and inhabitant of the grave, and in a state of corruption there. Probably, Martha perceived the body to smell, as they were removing the stone, and therefore cried out thus.

(1.) It is easy from hence to observe the nature of human bodies; four days is but a little while, yet what a great change will that make with the body of man, if it be but so long without food, much more if so long without life! Dead bodies, (saith Dr. Hammond,) after a revolution of the humours, which is completed in seventy-two hours, naturally tend to putrefaction; and the Jews say, that by the fourth day after death, the body is so altered, that one cannot be sure it is such a person, so Maimonides in Lightfoot. Therefore Christ rose the third day, because he was not to see corruption.

(2.) It is not so easy to say what was Martha's design in saying this. (1.) Some think it was to bring forth a reproof to Christ, that he did not trenches, and such a speech teaches to the dead body; now that it began to putrefy, she did not care it should be thus publicly shewn, and made a spectacle of. (2.) Others think that she said it out of a concern for Christ, lest the smell of the dead body should be offensive to him. That which is very noisome, is compared to an open sepulchre, Ps. 3. 9. If there were any thing noisome, she would not have her Master near it; but he was none of those tender and delicate ones, that cannot bear an ill smell; if he had, he would not have visited the world of mankind, which sin had made a perfect dunghill, altogether noisome, Ps. 14. 3. [3.] It should seem by Christ's answer, that it was the language of her unbelief and distrust; "Lord, it is too late now to attempt any kindness to him, his body begins to rot, and it is impossible that this putrid carcasse should live." She gives up his case as helpless and hopeless, there having been no in stances, either of late or formerly, of any raised to life after they had begun to see corruption. When our bones are dried, we are ready to say, Our hope is lost. Yet this distrustful word of her's, served to make the miracle both the more evident and the more illustrious, by this it appeared that he was indeed raised from the dead; nor is it to be expected, through the posture of a dead body might be counterfeited, the smell could not. Her suggesting that it could not be done, puts the more honour upon him that did it.

5. The gentle reproof Christ gave to Martha for the weakness of her faith; (v. 40.) Said I unto thee, that if thou wouldst believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God? This word of his to her was not to prove, that it was true; for he said, when she had said, (v. 27.) Lord, I believe; and it is enough that it is recorded here, where it is repeated. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus has given us all the assurances imaginable, that a sincere faith shall at length be crowned with a blessed vision; "If thou believe, thou shalt see God's glorious appearances for thee in this world, and to thee in the other world." (2.) We should therefore, when with Christ's word and work, his power and faithfulness, we shall see the glory of God, and be happy in the sight. (2.) We have need to be often reminded of these sure mercies with which our Lord Jesus has encouraged us. Christ does not give a direct answer to what Martha had said, nor any particular promise of what he would do, but orders her to keep hold of the general assurances he had already given; Only believe. We are apt to forget what Christ has spoken, and need him to put us in mind of it by his Spirit; "Said I not unto thee so and so? And dost thou then think that he will ever say it?"

6. The opening of the grave in obedience to Christ's order, notwithstanding Martha's objection; (v. 41.) Then they took away the stone. Then, when Martha was satisfied, and had waved her objection, they said, let Christ take his own way, and not prescribe, but subscribe, to him. They took away the stone, and that was all they could do, Christ only could give life. What man can do is but to prepare the way of the Lord, to fill the valleys, and level the hills, and, as here, to take away the stone.

III. The miracle itself wrought. The spectators amazed by the rolling away of the stone, gathered about the grave, not to commit dust to dust, earth to earth, but to receive dust from the dust, and earth from the earth again; and their expectations being raised, our Lord Jesus addresses himself to his work.

1. He applies himself to his living Father in heaven, so he had called him, (ch. 6. 57.) and so eyes him here.

2. The gesture he used was very significant; He lifted up his eyes, an outward expression of the elevation of his mind; and to shew them who stood by from whence he derived his power; also to set us an example: this outward sign is hereby recommended to our practice; see ch. 17. 1. Look how they will answer it, who profanely ridicule it; but that which is especially charged upon us hereby, is, to lift up our hearts to God in the heavenly prayer, and desire the assurance of his power, but the assent of the soul to God, and the directing of its affections and motions heavenward? He lifted up his eyes, as looking above, looking beyond the grave where Lazarus lay, and overlooking all the difficulties that arose from thence, that he might have his eyes fixed upon the divine omnipotence; to teach us to do as Abraham, who considered not his own body nor his soul, nor the deliverance of Sarah's womb, never took those into his thoughts, and so gained such a degree of faith, as not to stagger at the promise, Rom. 4. 20. (2.) His address to God was with great assurance, and such a confidence as became him; Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. He has here taught us, by his own example, [1.] In prayer to call God Father, and to draw nigh to him as children to a father, in such an undertakings; he neither sought, nor asked, nor obtained, with a holy boldness. [2.] In our prayers to prase him, and when we come to beg for further mercy, thankfully to acknowledge former favours. Thank-givings, which speak God's glory, not our own, like the Pharisee's God, I thank thee, are decent forms into which to put our supplications.

But our Saviour's thanksgiving here was intended to express the unshaken assurance he had of the effects of this miracle, which he had in his own power to do in concurrence with his Father; "Father, I thank thee, that my will and thine are in this matter, as always, the same." Elisha and Elisha raised the dead, as servants, by entreaty; but Christ, as a Son, by authority, having life in himself, and power to quicken whom he would, and he speaks of this as his own act; (v. 11.) I go, that I may command him, as if he had obtained by prayer, for his Father heard him; probably, he put up the prayer for it when he groaned in spirit, once and again, (v. 36, 38.) in a mental prayer, with groanings which could not be uttered.

Now Christ speaks of this miracle as an answer to prayer. First, Because he would thus humble himself, though he were a Son, yet learned he this obedience; to ob and receive. His mediatorial crown was granted him upon request, though it is of right, Ps. 2. 8. and ch. 17. 5. He prays for the glory he had before the world, thegl, having never forfeited it, he might have demanded it. Secondly, because he was pleased thus to honour prayer, marking it the key wherewith even he unlocked the treasures of divine power and grace. Thus he would teach us in prayer, by the lively exercise of faith, to enter into the holiest.

Now Christ being assured that his prayer was answered,

1. He professes his thankful acceptance of this answer, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. Though the miracle was not yet wrought, yet the prayer was answered, and he triumphs before the victory. No other can pretend to such an assurance as Christ had; yet we may by faith in the promise have a perfect assurance of that, for which the Father may rejoice in that prospect, and give God thanks for it. In David's devotions, the same Psalm which begins with prayer for a mercy, closes with thank-givings for it.

Note. (1.) Mercies, to answer to prayer, ought in a special manner to be acknowledged with thankfulness. Beside the grant of the mercy itself, we are to value it as a great favour from God, and to shew that we are sensible of it, as what he had done for us; and this will be a peculiar testimony of our faith and love to God.

2. He professes his cheerful assurance of ready answers at any time, (v. 42.) And I know that thou hearest me always. Let none think that this was some uncommon favour granted him now, such as he never had before, nor should ever have again; no, he had the same divine power going along with him in his whole undertaking, and undertook nothing but what he knew to be agreeable to the counsel of God's will. I gave thanks! (saith he) "for being heard in this, because I am sure to be heard in every thing." See here, (1.) The interest on Lord Jesus had in heaven, the Father heard him always, he had access to the Father upon every occasion, and success with him in every errand. And we may be sure that his interest is not the less for his going to heaven, which may encourage us to depend upon his intercession, and put all our petitions into his hand, for his answer always depends. (2.) The confidence he had of that interest; I knew it. He did not in the least hesitate or doubt concerning it, but had an entire satisfaction in his own mind of the Father's compliance in him, and concurrence with him in every thing. We cannot have such a particular assurance as he had; but this we know, that whatsoever we ask according to his will, he heareth us, 1 John 5. 14, 15.

But why should Christ give us this peculiar intimation of his obtaining this miracle by prayer? He adds, It is because of the people which stand by, that they may believe that thou hast sent me, for prayer may preach.

[1.] It was to obviate the objections of his enemies, and their reflections. It was blasphemously suggested by the Pharisees, and their creatures, that he wrought his miracles by the devil; even before the event, he openly made his address to God, using prayers, and not ceremonies, not meritorious and matterious, as they did, that used familiar prayers, (Isa. 8. 19.) but with elevated eyes and voice, praying his communication with Heaven, and dependence on Heaven.

[2.] It was to corroborate the faith of those that were well inclined to him; that they might have the assurance that thou hast sent me, not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. Moses, to shew that God sent him, made the earth open and swallow men up; (Num. 16
ST. JOHN, XI.

29, 30.) Elijah, to show that God sent him, made fire come from heaven, and devour men; for the law was a dispensation of terror and death: but Christ proves his mission by raising to life one that was dead. Some give this sense; had Christ declared his doing it freely by his own power, some of his work-disciples, who as yet understood not his divine nature, would have thought that he took too much upon him, and have been stilled at it; these babes could not bear that strong meat, therefore he chooses to speak of his power as received and derived; he speaks self-deniingly of himself, that he might speak the more plainly to us. Now in respect ad suam dignitatem aut etiam nostram salutem—In what he said, he consulted so much his dignity as our salvation. Januarius.

2. He now applies himself to his dead friend in the earth. He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. He could have raised Lazarus by a silent exerting of his power and will, and the indiscernible operations of the Spirit of life: but he did it by a call, a loud call.

(1.) To be significant of the power then put forth for the raising of Lazarus, how he created this new thing; he spoke, and it was done. He cried aloud, to signify the greatness of the work, and of the power employed in it, and to excite himself as it were to this attack upon the gates of death, as soldiers engage with a shout. Speaking to Lazarus, it was peculiarly throne, voice, or. [1.] The soul of Lazarus, which was to be called up, was asleep, and we usually speak loud, when we awaken any out of sleep. He cried with a loud voice, that the scripture might be fulfilled, (Isa. 14. 12.) Have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth.

(2.) To be typical of other works of wonder, and particularly other resurrections, which the power of Christ was to effect. This loud call was a figure. [1.] Of the gospel-call, by which dead souls were to be brought out of the grave of sin, which resurrection Christ had formerly spoken of, (ch. 5. 25.) and of the words, the meaning of it; (ch. 6. 53.) and now he gives a specimen of it. By his word, he saith to souls, Live, yea, he saith to them, Live, Ezek. 16. 6. Arise from the dead, Eph. 5. 14. The spirit of life from God entered into those that had been dead and dry bones, when Ezekiel prophesied over them, Ezek. 37. 10. They who infer from the commands of the word, to turn and live, that man has a power of his own to convert and regenerate himself, might as well infer from this call to Lazarus, that he had a power to raise himself to life.

[2.] Of the sound of the archangel's trumpet at the last day, with which they shall sleep in the dust, shall be awaked, and summoned before the great tribunal. When Christ shall descend with a shout, a call, or command, like this here, Come forth. See 1 Thess. 5. 2.) He call both to the heavens for their souls, and to the earth for their bodies, that he may judge his people. This loud call here was but short, yet mighty through God to the battering down of the strong-holds of the grave.

First, He calls him by name, Lazarus, as we call those by their names, whom we would awake out of a fast sleep. God said to Moses, as a mark of his favour, I know thee by name. The naming of him intimates that the same individual person that died, shall rise again at the last day. He that calls the stars by their names, can distinguish by name his stars that are in the dust of the earth, and will lose none of them.

Secondly, He calls him out of the grave, speaking to him as if he were already alive, and had nothing to do but to come out of his grave. He does not say unto him, Live, for he himself must give life, but he saith to him, Move, for when by the grace of Christ we live spiritually, we must stir up ourselves to move; the grace of sin and this world was place for those whom Christ has quickened, and therefore they must come forth.

Thirdly, The event was according to the intention; he that was dead came forth, v. 44. Power went along with the word of Christ, to reanimate the soul and body of Lazarus, and then he came forth. The miracle is described, not by its invisible springs to make men believe, but by its visible effects to confirm our faith. Do any ask where the soul of Lazarus was during the four days of its separation? We are not told, but have reason to think it was in Paradise, in joy and felicity; but you will say, Was it not then really an unkindness to it, to return it into the prison of the body? And if it were, yet, being for the honour of Christ, and the serving of the interests of his kingdom, it was no more an injury to him than it was to St. Paul to continue in the flesh, when he knew that to depart to Christ, was so much better. If any ask whether Lazarus after he was raised, could give an account or description of his soul's removal out of the body or return to it, or what he saw in the other world, I suppose, both those changes were so unaccountable to himself, that he must be at a loss how to answer. Whether in that state of the body, I cannot tell; and of what he saw and heard, it was not lawful, or possible, to express it.

In a world of sense we cannot frame to ourselves, much less communicate to others, any adequate ideas of the world of spirits, and the affairs of that world; let us not covet to be wise above what is written, and this is all that is written concerning the resurrection of that Lazarus, he that was dead came forth.

Some have observed, that though we read of many who were raised from the dead, who, no doubt, conversed familiarly with men afterward, yet the scripture has not recorded one word spoken by any of them, except by our Lord Jesus only. This miracle was wrought, 1. Speedily. Nothing intervenes between the command, Come forth, and the effect of that command, no time or difficulty; it was now done; let there be life, and there was life. Thus the change in the resurrection will be in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, 1 Cor. 15. 52. The almighty power that can do it, can do it in an instant; Then shalt thou call, and I will answer; will come at the call, as Lazarus, Here am I. 2. Perfect. He was so thoroughly revived that he got up out of his grave, as strongly as ever he got up out of his bed; and returned not only to life, but health. He was not raised to serve a present turn, but to live as other men. 3. With this additional miracle, (as some reckon it,) that he came out of his grave, though he was fettered with his grave-clothes, with which he was bound hand and foot, and his face bound about with a napkin; which the Jews did to him, that Lazarus, he that was dead came forth in the same dress wherein he was buried, that it might appear that it was he himself, and not another, and that he was not only alive, but strong, and able to walk, after a sort, even in his grave-clothes. The binding of his face with a napkin, proved that he had been really dead, for otherwise, in less than so many days' time, that would have smothered him, but the binders were, to unbinding him, would and handle him, and see him, that it was he himself, and so be witnesses of the miracle. Now see here, (1.) How little we carry with us, when we leave the world—only a winding-sheet and a coffin; there is no change of raiment in the grave, nothing but a single suit of grave clothes. (2.) What condition we shall be in, in the grave. What wisdom or device can there be, where the eyes are dead-winked, or what working, where the hands and feet are lettered?
And so it will be in the grave, whither we are going. Lazarus being come forth, hampered and enwrapped with his grave-clothes, we may well imagine that those about the grave were exceedingly surprised and frightened at it; we should be so if we should see a dead body rise; but Christ, to make the thing familiar, sets them to work; "Loose him, shaken his grave-clothes, that they may serve for day-clothes till he comes to his house; and then he will go himself so clad, without guide or supporter to his own house." As in the Old Testament, the translations of Emolb and Elias were sensible demonstrations of an invisible and future state, the one about the middle of the patriarchal age, the other of the Masonic economy; so the resurrection of Lazarus was in the New Testament designed for the confirmation of the doctrine of the resurrection.

45. Then many of the Jews which came to Mary, and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him. 46. But some of them went their ways to the Pharisees,
and told them what things Jesus had done.
47. Then gathered the chief priests and the Pharisees a council, and said, What do we!
For this man doth many miracles. 48. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him: and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation.
49. And one of them, named Caiaphas, being the High-Priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all, 50. Nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. 51. And this spake he not of himself: but being High-Priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation: 52. And not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad. 53. Then from that day forth they took counsel together for to put him to death. 54. Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews; but went thence into a country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples. 55. And the Jews’ passover was high at hand: and many went out of the country up to Jerusalem before the passover, to purify themselves. 56. Then sought they for Jesus, and spake among themselves, as they stood in the temple, What think ye, that he will not come to the feast? 57. Now both the chief priests and the Pharisees had given a commandment, that, if any man knew where he were, he should shew it, that they might take him.

We have here an account of the consequences of this glorious miracle, which were as usual; to some it was a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death.

1. Some were invited by it, and induced to believe.
Many of the Jews, when they saw the things that Jesus did, believed on him; and, well they might, for he was an inhabitant of their city, and might be,
and yet excel the conviction of them, by calling in question the matter of fact; but now that they had themselves seen this done, their minds was conqueréd, and they yielded at last. But blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed. The more we see of Christ, the more cause we shall see to love him, and confide in him; these were some of these Jews that came to Mary to comfort her. And while we are doing good offices to others, we put ourselves in the way of receiving favours from God, and have opportunities of getting good when we are doing good.

11. Others were irritated by it, and hardened in their unbelief.
1. The informers were so; (r. 46.) Some of them, who were eye-witnesses of the miracle, were so far from being convinced, that they went to the Pharisees, whom they knew to be his implacable enemies, told them what things Jesus had done; not merely as a matter of news worthy their notice, much less as an inducement to them to think more favourably of Christ, but with a spiteful design to excite these who needed no spur, the more vigorously to prosecute him. Here is a strange instance, (1.) Of a most obstinate infidelity, refusing to yield to the evidence of their own eyes; (2.) Of a most obstinate stupiditv, they think they could not imagine how they could evade the force of this evidence, but that the see of this world had blinded their minds. (2.) Of a most inveterate enmity. If they would not be satisfied that he was to be believed in as the Christ, yet one would think they should have been satisfied, and persuaded not to perse-uate him; but if the water be not sufficient to quench the fire, it will inflame it. The Jews told what Jesus had done; and told no more than what was true; but the malice gave a tincture of diabolism to their information equal to that of the false: perception of what is true is as bad as forging what is false.

2. The judges, the leaders, the blind leaders, of the people were no less exasperated by the report made to them, than they were to what they did.
And this council is called and held. Then gathered the chief priests, and Pharisees a coun-icl, as was foretold, (Ps. 2. 2.) The rulers take council together against the Lord. Consults of the Sanhedrim were intended for the public good, but here, under colour of that, the greatest injury and mis-chance are done to the people. The things that belong to the nation’s peace, were hid from the eyes of the wise men of old, but are plain to them. This council was called, not only for joint advice, but for mutual irritation; that is, iron sharpenes iron, and as corals are to burning coals, and wood to fire, so they might exasperate and inflame one another with enmity and rage against Christ and his doctrine.

(2.) The case is proposed, and shewed to be weighty; and of mighty consequence.

1. The matter to be debated, was, what course to take with those who were creditors of his interest; they said, What do we? For the Man doth many miracles. The information given about the raising of Lazarus, was produced, and the men, brethren, and fathers are called in to help as soliciously as if a formidable enemy had been with an army in the bowels of their country. First, They own the truth of Christ’s miracles, and that he had wrought many of them; they are therefore witnesses against themselves, for they acknowledged his dece-
2. Incidents, and yet denied his commission.

Secondary
They consider what was to be done, and chide themselves that they had not done something sooner, effectually to crush him. They do not take it at all into their consideration, whether they should not receive him and make him as the Messiah, though they professed to expect him, and Jesus gave pregnant proofs of his being so; but they take it for granted that he is an enemy, and as such is to be run down. "What do we? Have we no care to support our church? Is it nothing to us that a doctrine, so destructive to our interest, spreads thus? Shall we take it for granted that we have got the sentiments of the people? Shall we see our authority brought into contempt, and the craft by which we get our living ruined, and not bestir ourselves? What have we been doing all this while? And what are we now thinking of? Shall we be always talking, and bring nothing to pass?"

(2.) That which made this matter weighty, was that all they apprehended their church and nation to be in from the Romans, (v. 48.) "If we do not silence him, and take him off, all men will believe on him; and this being the setting up of a new king, the Romans will take umbrage at it, and will come with an army, and take away our place and nation, and therefore it is no time to trifle." See what an opinion they have, of the high merit and power. They speak as if they thought Christ's progress and success in his work depended upon their connivance, as if he could not go on to work miracles, and make disciples, unless they let him alone; as if it were in their power to conquer him who had conquered death, or as if they could fight against God, and prosper. But he that sits in heaven, laughs at the fond conceit which important malice has of its own omnipotence.

Secondly, Of their own policies. They fancy themselves to be men of mighty insight and foresight, and great sagacity in their moral prognostications.

1. They take on them to prophesy that, in a little time, if he have liberty to go on, all men will believe on him; hereby owning, when it was to serve their purpose, that his doctrine and miracles had a very convincing power in them, such as could not be resisted, but that all men would become his proselytes and votaries; thus do they now make his interest formidable, though, to serve another turn, these same men strove to make it contemptible; (ch. 7. 48.) Have any of the rulers believed on him? This was the thing they were afraid of, that men would believe on him and then all their measures were broke. Note, The abuse of the gospel is the terror of its adversaries; if souls be saved, they are undone.

2. They foretell that if the generality of the nation be drawn after him, the rage of the Romans will be drawn upon them. They will come and take away our place; the country in general, especially Jerusalem, or the temple, the holy place, and their places of power and trust. Now it was true that the Romans had a very jealous eye upon them, and knew they wanted nothing but power and opportunity to shake off their yoke. It was likewise true that if the Romans should pour an army in upon them, it would be very hard for them to make any head against it; yet here appeared a considerable reflection, that the Romans, though they were the priests of the Lord, if they had not by their wickedness forfeited their interest in God and all good men. Had they kept their integrity, they need not have to fear the Romans; but they speak like a despised people, as the men of Judah, when they basely said to Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines rule over us? (Judg. 15. 11.) When men lose their piety, they lose their courage.

But, (1.) It was false that there was any danger of the Romans being irritated against their nation by the progress of Christ's gospel, for it was no way to be instrumental to that; but it was beneficial. The Romans had no jealousy at all of his growing interest, for he taught men to give tribute to Caesar, and not to resist evil, but take up the cross. The Roman governor, at his trial, could find no fault in him. There was more danger of the Romans being incensed against the Jewish nation by the priests than by Christ. Note, Pretended fears are often the course of the most fatal enemies.

(2.) Had there really been some danger of displeasing the Romans by tolerating Christ's preaching, yet that would not justify their hatred and persecuting a good man. Note, [1.] The enemies of Christ and his gospel have often coloured their enmity with a seeming care for the public good and the common safety, and, in order to that, have branded his prophets and ministers as trouble-makers, as the Jews, and men that turn the world upside down. [2.] Carnal policy commonly sets up reasons of state, in opposition to rules of justice. When men are concerned for their own wealth and safety more than for truth and duty, it is wisdom from beneath, which is earthly, sensual, and devilish. But see what was the issue; they pretended to be afraid that the progress of Christ's gospel would bring desolation upon them by the Romans, and therefore, right or wrong, set themselves against it; but it proved that their persecuting of the gospel, brought upon them that which they feared, filled up the measure of their iniquity, and the Romans came and took away their place and nation, and their place knew them no more. Note, That calamity which we seek to escape by sin, we take the most effectual course to bring upon our own heads; and they who think by opposing Christ's kingdom to secure or advance their own secular interest, will find Jerusalem a more burthensome stone than they think it is. Zech. 12. 3. The fear of the wicked it shall come upon them.

(3.) Caiphas makes this malicious but mystical speech in the council, upon this occasion.

[1.] The malice of it appears evident at first view, v. 49, 50. He, being the High-Priest, and so, president of the council, took upon him to decide the matter before it was debated: "You know nothing at all, your hesitating betrays your ignorance, for it is not a thing that will bear a dispute, it is soon determined, if you consider that received maxim, That it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people."

First, The counsellor was Caiphas, who was High-Priest that same year. The high-priesthood was by the divine appointment settled upon the heir male of the house of Aaron, for and during the term of his natural life, and then to his heir male, but in those degenerate times it was become, though not an annual change, like a continual, but a frequent change, as they seemed make an interest with the Roman powers. Now it happened that this year Caiphas wore the mitre.

Secondly, The drift of the advice was, in short, this, That some way or other must be found out to put Jesus to death. We have reason to think that they strongly suspected him to be indeed the Messiah; but his denial was not so fatal to their opposing his pretended national and secular interest, and his design did so thwart their notions of the Messiah's kingdom, that they resolve, be he who he will, he must be put to death. Caiphas does not say, Let him be silenced, imprisoned, banished, though that is sufficient for the restraint of one they thought dangerous; but die he must. Note, Those that have set themselves against christianity, have commonly destitute of selves of humanity, and been infamous for cruelty.
Thirdly, This is plausibly insinuated, with all the subtility as well as malice of the old serpent.

1. He suggests his own sagacity, which we must suppose him as High-Priest to excel in, though the Uriah and Thathanum were long since lost. How scornfully does he say, "I know nothing, who are more wise than I?" Nay, Socrates and Plato, he says, are often run down with a high hand. Truth is fallen in the streets, and, when it is down, down with it; and equity cannot enter, and, when it is out, out with it, Isa. 59. 14.

2. He insists upon a maxim in politics, That the welfare of communities is to be preferred before that of particular persons. It is expedient for us as priests, whose all lies at stake, that one man die for the people. Thus far it holds true, that it is expedient, and more than so, it is truly honourable, for a man to hazard his life in the service of his country; (Phil. 2. 17. 1 John 3. 16.) but to put an innocent man to death under colour of consulting the public safety, is the devil's politics. Calaphas craftily insinuates that the greatest and best man, though majesty and glory in the person of our individual, is minor univers.—less than the common mean, and ought to think his life well spent, may well lost, to save his country from ruin. But what is this to the murdering of one that was evidently a great blessing, under pretence of preventing an imaginary mischief to the country? The case ought to have been put thus: Was it expedient for them to bring upon themselves and upon their nation the guilt of blood, a prophet's blood, for the securing of their civil interests from a danger which they had no just reason to be afraid of? Was it expedient for them to drive God and their glory from them, rather than venture the Romans' displeasure, who could do them no harm if they had God on their side? Note, Carnal policy, which steers only by secular considerations, while it thinks to save all by sin, ruins all at last.

2. The mystery was in this counsel of Caiaphas, does not appear at first view, but the evangelist leads us into it: (v. 51, 52.) This stroke he not of himself, it was not only the language of his own enmity and policy, but in these words he prophesies, though he himself was not aware of it, That Jesus should die for that nation. Here is a precious comment upon a pithy expression; the counsel of cursed Caiaphas so construed as to fall in with the counsels of the blessed God. Calaphas seems to give us the most favorable construction upon men's words and actions that they will hear; but piety teaches us to make a good improvement of them, contrary to that which they were intended for. If wicked men in what they do against us, are God's hand to humble and reform us, why may they not in what they say against us be God's mouth to instruct and comfort us? But Caiaphas, his craven spirit, has given us the most favorable construction upon men's words and actions that they will hear; but piety teaches us to make a good improvement of them, contrary to that which they were intended for. If wicked men in what they do against us, are God's hand to humble and reform us, why may they not in what they say against us be God's mouth to instruct and comfort us?

First, He explains what he said, and shows how it not only was, but was intended to be, accommodated to an excellent purpose. He did not speak it of himself; as it was an intimation to strip the counsel against Christ, he spoke it of himself, or the devil rather; but as it was an invariable, declaring it if the purpose and design of God by the punishment of the High-Priest, to save God's spiritual Israel from sin and death, he did not speak it of himself, for he knew nothing at the matter, the word not so much, neither did he heart think so, for nothing was in his heart but to destroy and cut off, Isa. 10. 7.

1. He prophesied, and those that prophesied, in their prophecying, did not speak of themselves. But what God and Caiaphas did foretell for the High-Priest, is this, the original of all his coming, that is, that he was to be the seed from whom should spring the Saviour of the world. Now, in what manner was it to be accomplished? Note, (1.) God can, and often does, make wicked men instruments to serve his own purposes, even contrary to their own intentions. For, in saving grace, he would have it done by them, and not by such as are commonly regarded as in the way of grace, and they who are unworthy of the blessing of grace. (2.) Words of prophecy in the mouth of wicked men are no infallible evidence of a principle of grace in the heart. Lord, Lord, have we not pro-

2. He prophesied, being High-Priest that year; not that his being High-Priest did at all dispose or qualify him to be a prophet; we cannot suppose the pontifical office to have first inspired with prophecy that condition: But, from the practice of the High-Priest, and the purpose of God in this dispensation, he was appointed, being High-Priest, and therefore in a sort of eminence in the conclave, God was pleased to put this significant word into his mouth rather than into the mouth of any other, that it might be the more observed, or the non-observance of it the more aggravated. The apothegms of great men have been thought worthy of special regard; Adven murmur is a law of the land; therefore this divine sentence was not to be put into the lips of the High-Priest, that even out of his mouth this word might be established. That Christ died for the good of the nation, and not for any unrighteousness in his hands. He happened to be High-Priest that year which was fixed to be the year of the redemption, when Messiah the Prince must be cut off, but not for himself, (Dan. 9. 26.) and he must own, This year, that year, was the year of the year of the redemption, and yet it was not for himself. In the year 28, there was a great expectation of salvation from the Messiah, who is the prince of the city of David. The Jews of that city, which Caiaphas was now projecting, proved the sum of that interest in the nation, which he intended should be the security and establishment of it, for it brought wrath upon them to the uttermost; but it proved the advancement of that interest which he hoped it would have been the run of, for Christ, being lifted up from the earth, drew all men unto him. It is a great thing that is here prophesied; That Jesus should die, die for others, not only for their good, but in their stead; die for that nation, for they had the first offer made them of salvation by his death. If the whole nation of the Jews had unanimously believed in Christ, and received his gospel, they had been saved; but it was the case with all other nations, as a result of their grievances. The fountain was first opened to the house of David, Zech. 13. 1. He so died for that nation, as that the whole nation should not perish, but that a remnant should be saved, Rom. 11. 5.

2. Secondly, The evangelist enlarges upon this word of Capharua, (v. 52.) not for that nation only, but a light thing for the Son of God to go through so vast an undertaking, only to restore the preserved of the nation of Israel, (Acts 2. 39.) that feared God, (Acts 10. 2.) and worshipped him, (Acts 17. 4.) proselytes of the gate, who served the God of Abraham, but submitted not to the ceremonial law of Moses; persons that had a savour of natural religion, but were dispersed in the nations, had no solemn assemblies of their own, nor any peculiar profession to unite in, or distinguish themselves by. Now Christ died, to incorporate these in one great society, to be denominated from him, and governed by him; and this was the setting up of a standard, to which all that had a regard to God and a concern for their souls, might have recourse, and under which they might call themselves. (2.) Others take in with these all that belong to the election of grace, who are called the children of God, though not yet born, because they are predestinated to the adoption of children, Eph. 1. 5. Now these are scattered abroad in several places of the earth, out of all kindreds and tongues, (Rev. 7. 9.) and in several parts of the churches, to the end of time; who are those that fear him throughout all generations, to all those he had an eye in the atonement he made by his blood; as he prayed, so he died, for all that should believe on him.

3. The purpose and intention of his death concerning those persons; he died to gather them in, who wandered; and to gather them together in one, who were scattered; yea, to the end of time; who were at a distance from him, and to unite them in him, who were at a distance from each other.

Christ's dying is,

(1.) The great attractice of our hearts; for this end he is lifted up, to draw men to him. The conversion of souls is the gathering of them in to Christ as their ruler and refuge, as the doves to their window. Thus the Holy Ghost, Ch. 11. 10. He chased them to himself, and the gift of the Holy Ghost for them; his love in dying for us is the great loadstone of our love.

(2.) The great centre of our unity. He gathers them together in one, Eph. 1. 10. They are one with him, one body, one spirit, and one with each other, in him. All the saints in all places and ages meet in Christ, as all the members in the head, and all the branches in the root. Christ by the merit of his death recommended all the saints in one to the grace and favour of God; (Heb. 2. 11—12.) and by the motive of his death recommended them all severally to the love and affection one of another, ch. 13. 34.

4. The result of this debate is a resolve of the council to put Jesus to death; (v. 53.) From that day they took counsel together, to put him to death. They now understand one another's minds, and so each was fixed in his own, that Jesus must die; and, it should seem, a committee was appointed to sit, de die in diem, to think over the matter, and prepare plans for it, and to receive proposals for the effecting of it. Note, The wickedness of the wicked ripens by degrees, James 1. 15. Ezek. 7. 10.

Two considerable advances were now made in their accursed design against Christ. [1.] What before they had thought of severally, now they jointly concurred in, and so strengthened the hands of those which was the case in this before, sects and parties, with the greater assurance. Ill men contrive and encourage themselves and one another in ill practices, by comparing notes; men of corrupt minds bless themselves, when they find others of the same mind: then the wickedness which before seemed impracticable, appears not only possible, but easy to be effected, vis una forte—vires, when united, their strength is augmented. Many that which otherwise would have been done, but hastened a colour for, now they are furnished with a plausible pretence to justify themselves in, which will serve, if not to take off the guilt, (that is the least of their care,) yet to take off the odium, and so satisfy, if not the personal, yet the political conscience, as some subtly distinguish. Many will go on very seriously in doing an ill thing, as long as they have but something to say in excuse for it. Now this resolution of theirs, to put him to death, right or wrong, shews that all the formality of a trial, which they afterwards brought him upon, was but show and grimace, they were before determined what to do.

[5.] Christ hereupon ascended, knowing very well what was the vote of their close cabal, v. 54. [1.] He suspended his public appearances; he walked no more openly among the Jews, among the inhabitants of Judea, who were properly called Jews, especially those at Jerusalem: περπαταμε—v he did not walk up and down among them, did not go from place to place, preaching and working miracles with the freedom and openness that he had done, but while he staid in Judea, he was there incognito. Thus the chief priests put the Light of Israel under a covert. [2.] He withdrew into an obscure part of the country, so obscure, that the name of the town he retired to, is scarcely met with any where else. He went to a country near the wilderness, as if he were driven out from among men, or rather wishing, with Jeremiah, that he might have in the wilderness a lodging-place of outcasts, Jer. 2. 2. He entered into the wilderness of Judah, called Mount Hermon, (1 Chron. 4. 31.) which was a noted mountain, that is, Bethlehem, where he was born, and which bordered upon the wilderness of Judah; others think Ephraim, or Ephraim, mentioned 2 Chron. 13. 19. Thither his disciples went with him; neither would they leave him in solitude, nor would he leave them in danger. There he continued, διατρήσατο there he conversed, he knew how to improve this time while he could, and to shew himself; but he had not an opportunity of preaching publicly. He conversed with his disciples, which were his family, when he was forced from the temple, and his Saviour, or discourses there, no doubt, were very edifying. We must do the good we can, when we cannot do the good we would.

But why would Christ ascend now? It was not because he either feared the power of his enemies, or distrusted his own power; he had many ways to save himself, and was neither averse to suffering nor unprepared for it; but he retired, First, To put a mark of his displeasure upon Jerusalem and the people of the Jews. They rejected him and his gospel, justly therefore did he remove himself and his gospel from them. The Prince of teachers was now removed into a corner, (Isa. 53. 26,) there was no voice of him, and it was not of man, that thick darkness which was shortly to come upon Jerusalem, because she knew not the day of her visitation. Secundly, To render the cruelty of his enemies against him the more inexcusable. If that which was grievous to them, and thought dangerous to the public, was, his public appearance, he would try whether their anger would be turned away by his being absent, and whether it was not better to be absent than his Lord. Fourthly, His retirement, for a while, was to make his return into Jerusalem, when his hour was come, the more remarkable and illustrious. This swelling the acclamations of joy with which his well-wishers welcomed him at his next public appearance, when he rode triumphantly into the city.

[6.] The strict inquiry made for him during his return, v. 33-37.

First, The occasion of it was the approach of the passover, at which they expected his presence, according to custom; (v. 33.) The Jews’ passover was nigh at hand, a festival which shone bright in their calendar, and which there was great expectation of for some time before; this was Christ’s fourth and last passover, since he entered upon his public ministry, yet it might truly be said, (as 2 Chron. 35. 18.) There never was such a passover in Israel, for in it Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us. Now the passover being at hand, many went out of all parts of the country to Jerusalem, to purify themselves. This was either, First, A necessary purification of those who had contracted any ceremonial pollution; they came to be sprinkled with the water of purification, and to perform the other rites of cleansing, to fit them for the feast, or, it might be, to purify the passover in their uncleanliness, Num. 9. 6. Thus, before our gospel-passover, we must renew our repentance, and faith, wash in the blood of Christ, and commit God’s name. Or, Secondly, A voluntary purification, or self-sequestration, by fasting and prayer, and other religious exercises, which many that were more devout than their neighbours, spent some time in before the passover, and chose to do it. And in the_num. 12. 15. this was his privilege, he might see his temple-service. Thus we must by solemn preparation set bounds about the mount on which we expect to meet with God.

[2.] The inquiry was very solicitous: They said, What think ye, that he will not come to the feast? v. 56.

First, Some think that this was said by them who wished well to him, and expected his coming, that the nearer he drew nearer, and the nearer approach, the more they might see the signs of his kingdom. They who came early out of the country, that they might purify themselves, were very desirous to meet with Christ, and perhaps came up the sooner with that expectation, and therefore as they stood in the temple, the place of their purification, they inquired what news of Christ? Could any body give them hopes of seeing him? If there were those, and those of the most devout people, and best affected to religion, who showed it is respect to Christ, it was a check to the vanity of the chief priests, and a witness against them.

Secondly, It should rather seem that they were his enemies, who made this inquiry after him, who wished for an opportunity to lay hands on him. They, seeing the town begin to fill with devout people and many from every country, wondered they did not find him among them, and, in order to be able to assist them that came to purify themselves, according to the duty of their place, they were plotting against Christ. How miserably degenerate was the Jewish church, when the priests of the Lord were become like the priests of the calves, a snare on Mizpeh, and a net spread upon Tabor, and were found to make mockery; (Hos. 3. 1, 2.) when, instead of being anxious to purify themselves, they were themselves secured with the leprosy of the worst malice. Their asking, What think ye? If he will not come up to the feast? implies, 1. An invincible reflection upon Christ, as if he would omit his attendance on the feast of the Lord, for fear of exposing himself. If others, through religiosity, be absent, they are not unmoved upon; but if Christ were to absent himself, they would shew it, that he might be taken, probably promising a reward to any that would discover him, and imposing a penalty on such as harboured him. So that hereby he was represented to the people as an obscure, dangerous man, an outcast, whom any one may have a blow at. Saul issued out such a proclamation for apprehending of David, and Abih of Elijah. See, First, How intense they were upon the apprehension of those, and how intendfully they laboured in it; now at a time when they had no care of religion and the duty of their function, they would have found themselves something else to do. Secondly, How willing they were to involve others in the guilt with them; if any man were capable of betraying Christ, they would have him think himself bound to do it. Thus was the interest they had in the people abused to the worst purposes. Note, It is an hereditary vice, the sins of wicked rulers, that they commonly make those that are under their governments agents of their unrighteousness. But, notwithstanding this proclamation, though doubtless many knew where he was, yet such was his interest in the affections of some, and such God’s hold of the consciences of others, that he continued undiscovered, for the Lord hid him.

CHAP. XII.

IT was a melancholy account which we had in the close of the foregoing chapter, of the regrets by which the people of Jesus, when the Scribes and Pharisees proclaimed him to be a teacher to their church, and put upon him all the marks of ignorance they could; but the story of this chapter balances that, by giving us an account of his appearing to the village of Emmaus, the Redemmer, notwithstanding all that seemed thrown upon him. Thus the one was over and above the other, in what honours were bestowed on him at the end of our Lord’s days, even in the depth of his humiliation. Mary did hair
Jesus six days before the passover came to Bethany, where Lazarus was which had been dead, whom he raised from the dead. 2. There they made him a supper; and Martha served: but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him. 3. Then took Mary a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair; and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. 4. Then sat with one of his disciples, Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, which should betray him, 5. Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? 6. This he said, not that he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and had the bag, and bare what was put therein. 7. Then said Jesus. Let her alone; against the day of my burying hath she kept this. 8. For the poor always ye have with you; but me ye have not always. 9. Much people of the Jews therefore knew that he was there: and they came not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he had raised from the dead. 10. But the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death; 11. Because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus.

In these verses, we have,

1. The kind visit our Lord Jesus made to his friends at Bethany, v. 1. He came up out of the country, six days before the passover, and took up at Bethany, a town that, according to the computation of our metropolis, lay so near Jerusalem, as to be within the bills of mortality. He lodged here with his friend Lazarus, whom he had lately raised from the dead. His coming to Bethany now, may be considered for the following reasons.

1. As a preface to the passover he intended to celebrate, to which relation is had in the date of the time; six days before the passover. Devent men set time apart before, to prepare themselves for that solemnity, and thus it became our Lord Jesus to fulfill all righteousness. And thus he has set us an example of solemn self-sequestration, before the solemnities of the gospel-passover; let us hear the voice crying, Prepare ye the way of the Lord.

2. As a voluntary exposing of himself to the fury of his enemies; now that his hour was at hand, he came within their reach, and freely offered himself to them, though he had showed them how easily he could evade all their snares. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus was voluntary in his sufferings; his life was not forced from him, but resigned; (2.) The strength of his persecutors could not overpower him, so their subtlety could not surprise him, but he died, because he would. (2.) As there is a time when we are allowed to suffer for our own good, so there is a time when we are called to jeopard our lives in the cause of God, as St. Paul, when he went bound in the Spirit to Jerusalem.

3. As an instance of his kindness to his friends at Bethany, whom he loved, and from whom he was shortly to be taken away. This was a farewell visit: he came to take leave of them, and to leave them with comfort. For comfort is always that which is that was approaching. Note, Though Christ departed for a time from his people, he will give them intimations that he parts in love, and not in anger. Bethany is here described to be the town where Lazarus was, whom he raised from the dead. That miracle, wrought here, put a new honour upon the place, and made it remarkable. Christ came hither to observe what improvement was made of that miracle; for where Christ works wonders, and shews signal favours, he looks after them, to see whether the intention of them be answered. Where he has sown plentifully, he observes whether it comes up again.

11. The kind entertainment which his friends there gave him; they made him a supper, (v. 2.) a great supper, (v. 3.) It is queried whether this was the same with that which is recorded, Matt. 26. 6, &c. in the house of Simon; most think that they were; for the substance of the story and many of the circumstances agree; but that comes in after what was said two days before the passover, whereas this was done six days before; nor is it likely that Martha should serve in any house but her own; and therefore I incline with Dr. Lightfoot to think there were different suppers, one on the third day of the passover week, but this the seventh day of the week before, being the Jewish sabbath, the night before he rode in triumph into Jerusalem; that in the house of Simon, this of Lazarus; these two being the most public and solemn entertainments given him in Bethany. Mary grace them both with this token of her respect; and what she did of her own, but this she spent, but a pound of it, (v. 3.) she used that second time, when she poured it all out, Mark 14. 3.

Let us see the account of this entertainment.

1. They made him a supper; for with them, or ordinarily, supper was the best meal. This they did in token of their respect and gratitude, for a feast is made for friendship; and that they might have an opportunity of free and pleasant conversation with him, for a feast is made for fellowship. Perhaps in allusion to this and the like entertainments given to Christ in the days of his flesh, it is that he promises to such as open the door of their hearts to him, that he will supply them, Rev. 3. 20.

2. Martha served; she herself waited at table, in token of her great respect to the Master; though a custom of some quality, she did not think it below her to serve, when Christ sat at meat; nor should we think it a dishonour or disparagement to us, to stoop to any service whereby Christ may be honoured. Christ had formerly reproved Martha for being troubled with much serving. But she did not therefore leave off serving, as some, who, when they are reproved for one extreme, proceed on to another, and their case is but another form of the same unbelief, but within hearing of Christ's gracious words, reckoning those happy, who, as the queen of Sheba said concerning Solomon's servants, stood continually before him, to hear his wisdom; better be a waiter at Christ's table, than a guest at the table of a prince.

3. Lazarus was one of them that sat at meat. It proved the truth of his resurrection, as it did of Christ's, that there were those who did eat and drink with him, Acts 10, 41. Lazarus did not retire into a wilderness after his resurrection, as if, when he had made a visit to the other world, he must ever after be a hermit in this; no, he conversed familiarly with people, as others did. He sat at meat, as a monument of the miracle Christ had wrought. Those whom Christ has raised up to a spiritual life, are made test together with him. See Eph. 2, 3, 6.

111. The particular respect which Mary showed him, above the rest, in anointing his feet with sweet and precious oil, for this showed she was, as she had found of ointment of a very precious and pure nature, and of natural oil, which probably, she had by her for her own use; but the death and resurrection of her brother had quite weaned her from the use of all such things, and with this she anointed the feet of Jesus, and, as a further token of her reverence for him, and negligence of herself, she wiped them with her hair, and this was taken notice of by all that were present, for the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. See Prov. 31, 16.

Doubtless, she intended this as a token of her love to Christ, who had given real tokens of his love to her and her family; and thus she studies what she shall render. Now by this her love to Christ appears to have been,

1. A generous love; so far from sparing necessary charity in his behalf, she is as ingenuous as a child, and, for an occasion of expense in religion, she must or are to avoid it. If she had any thing more valuable than another, that must be brought out for the honour of Christ. Note, Those who love Christ truly, love him so much better than this world, as to be willing to lay out the best they have for him.

2. A condescending love; she not only bestowed her ointment upon Christ, but poured it upon him with her own hands, which was a mighty undertaking, as this love, faith in Jesus as the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed, who, being both Priest and King, was anointed as Aaron and David were. Note, God's Anointed should be our Anointed. Has God poured on him the oil of gladness above his fellows? Let us pour on him the ointment of our best affections above all competitors. By consenting to Christ as our King, we must comply with God's designs, appointing him our Head, whom he has appointed, Hos. 1, 11.

The filling of the house with the pleasant smell of the ointment may intimate to us, (1.) That those who entertain Christ in their hearts and houses, bring a sweet smell into them, for his presence brings with it an ointment and perfume which rejoice the heart. (2.) Honours done to Christ are comforts to all his friends, and followers, the more to God and good men an offering of a sweet smelling savour.

IV. Judas's dislike of Mary's compliment, or token of her respect to Christ, ver. 4, 5, where observe,

1. The person that carped at it, was Judas, one of his disciples; not one of their nature, but only one of their number. It is possible for the worst of men to lurk under the disguise of the best profession; and there are many who pretend to stand in relation to Christ, who really have no kindness for him. Judas was an apostle, a preacher of the gospel, and yet one that discouraged and checked this instance of pious affection and devotion. Note, It is sad to see the life of religion and holy zeal frozen upon and discomfitted of such as are children by their offer to ass and encumber it. But this was he that should have born Christ. Note, A covenant of love to Christ, and a secret contempt of his piety, when they appear in professors of religion, are sad presages of a bad apostasy. We perceive, in lesser instances of worldliness, how every person is to be ready for a closure with greater temptations.

2. The pretence with which he covered his dislike; (v. 7.) "Why was not this ointment, since it was designed for a precious use, sold for three hundred pence," (which is the like, or our money, "and given to the poor?" Here's, (1.) A full requital, which God may make to the poor and humble, in the punishment and plea of the prophet, for Satan traducing his servant in an upright light. (2.) How is worldly wisdom passing censure upon Jesus zeal, as a mark of impudence and dissimulation. Those who value themselves upon their secular faded, and undervalue others for their serious piety, have more in them of the spirit of Judas than they would be thought to have. (3.) Here is charity to the poor in true colour for exposing a piece of part to Christ, and secretly making a mock for covetousness. Many excuse themselves from laying out in charity, under pretence of laying it up for charity; whereas if the clouds be full of rain, they will empty themselves. Judas asked, Why was it not given to the poor? To which it is easy to answer, Because it was better bestowed upon the Lord Jesus. Note, We must not conclude that those do despise the poor who take such an exception at the bestowal of our charitable largess, and just as we would have them; as if everything must be adjudged imprudent and unright, which does not take its measures from us and our sentiments. Proud men think all ill-advised who do not advise with them.

3. The detection and discovery of Judas's hypocrisy herein, ver. 6. Here is the evangelist's remark upon him, by the direction of him who advised him. Thus he said, not that he cared for the poor, as he pretended, but because he was a thief, and had the bag.

(1.) It did not come from a principle of charity, not that he cared for the poor. He had no compassion towards them, no concern for them; what were the poor to him any further than he might serve his own ends by them. Thus, as is common with sinners, he was so far from the heart. Thus he said, not that he cared for the poor, as he pretended, but because he was a thief, and had the bag.

(2.) It did come from a principle of covetousness. The truth of the matter was, this ointment being designed for his Master, he would rather have had it in money, to be put in the common stock which he was entrusted with, and then he knew what to do with it. Observe,

(1.) Judas was treasurer of Christ's household, whence some think he was called Iscariot, the bag-house.

(2.) See what estate Jesus and his disciples had of her among, it was but little, they had neither farm nor merchandise, not even a common storehouse, only a bag; or, as some think, the word signifies, box, or coffre, wherein they kept just enough for their subsistence, giving the surplus, if any were, at the poor; this they carried about with them; but, however, they went not about saying, Oft with my property about me. This bag was supplied by the contributions of good people, and the Master and his disciples had all in common; let this lessen our esteem of worldly wealth, and dealings, and the punisheth of state and ceremony, and reconcile us to a mean and despicable way of living, if that be our lot; that it was our Master's lot; for our sakes he became poor. [2.] See who was the steward of the little they had: it was Judas, he was purse-bearer. It was his office to receive and pay, and we do not find that he gave any account. He was appointed to this office, either, First, Because he was the least and lowest of all the disciples: it was not Peter or John that was made steward, (though it was a place of trust and profit,) but Judas, the meanest of them. Note, Secular employments, as those that are popular, so they are a damnation, to a minister of the gospel; see 1 Cor. 6. 4. The prime-ministers of state in Christ's kingdom refused to be concerned in the revenue, Acts 6. 2. Secondly, Because he was destitute of the place. He loved in his heart to be fingering money, and therefore had the money-bag committed to him, either, 1. As a kindness, to please him, and thereby oblige him to be true to his Master. Subjects are sometimes disaffected to the government, because disappointed of their preferment; but Judas has no cause to complain of that; the bag he chose, and the bag he had. Or, 2. In judgment upon him, to punish him for his secret wickedness; that was put into his hands, which would be a snare and trap to him. Note, Strong inclinations to sin within, are often justly punished with strong temptations to sin without. Witness David, who was brought into the greatest weakness, to be brought into the greatest fraud of it, for at the best we are but stewards of it; and it was Judas, one of an ill character, and born to be hanged, (pardon the expression,) that was steward of the bag; the prosperity of fools destroys them.

(2.) Being trusted with the bag, he was a thief, he had a dishonest disposition. The reigning love of money is deceitful, and much as anger and revenge are heart-murder. Or, perhaps, he had been really guilty of embezzling his Master's stores, and converting that to his own use, which was given to the public stock. And some conjecture, that he was now contriving to fill his pockets, and then run away and leave his Master, having heard him speak so much of troubles approaching, which he could by no means reconcile himself to. Note, They to whom the management and disposition of public funds is committed, have need to be governed by steady principles of justice and honesty, that no blot cleave to their hands; for though some make a jest of cheating the government, or the church, or the country, if cheating be thriving, and communities being more considerable than particular persons, if robbing of them be the greater sin, the guilt of theft and the portion of thieves will be found no jesting matter. Judas, who had betrayed his trust, soon after betrayed his Master.

V. Christ's justification of what Mary did; (v. 7, 8.) Let her alone. Hereby he intimated, 1. His acceptance of her kindness. Though he was perfectly mortified to all the delights of sense, yet, as it was a token of her good-will, he signified himself well-pleased with it. 2. His care that she should not be defiled in it; Pardon her, so it may be read; "excuse her this, being an error of her love." Note, Christ would not have then censured or discouraged, who sincerely design to please him, though in their honest endeavours there be not all the discretion that may be, Rom. 14. 3. Though we would not do as they do, yet let them alone. For Mary's justification.

(2.) Christ puts a favourable construction upon what Mary did, as far as it went; it was not done of envy; Against the day of my burying she has kept this. Or, She has reserved this for the day of my embalming; so Dr. Hammond. You do not grudge the ointment used for the embalming of your dead friends, nor say that it should be sold, and given to the poor. Now this anointing either was so intended, or at least may be so interpreted; for the day of my burying is now at hand, in which she has anointed a body that is about to be laid in the earth. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus thought it much and of value of his own death and burial; it would be given to us to do so too. (2.) Providence does often so open a door of opportunity to good Christians, and the Spirit of grace does so open their hearts, that the expressions of their pious zeal prove to be more reasonable, and more beautiful, than any foresight of their own time and place could make them. (3.) The grace of Christ puts kind commands, and not irksome orders, into the hands of good people, and not only makes the best of what is amiss, but makes the most of what is good.

(2.) He gives a sufficient answer to Judas's objection, v. 8. [1.] It is so ordered in the kingdom of Providence, that the poor we have always with us, some or other that are proper objects of charity; (Deut. 15. 11.) such there will be as long as there are in this lapsed state of mankind so much folly and so much affliction. [2.] It is so ordered in the kingdom of grace, that the church should not always have the bodily presence of Jesus Christ: "Ale ye have not always, but only now for a little time." Note, We need wisdom when two duties come in competition, to know which to give the preference to, which must be determined by the circumstances. Our short time here is not improved, and these opportunities first and most valuable; it was highly to be of the shortest continuance, and which we see most speedily hastening away. That good duty which may be done at any time, ought to give way to that which cannot be done but just now.

VI. The public notice which was taken of our Lord Jesus here at this supper in Bethany; (v. 9.) Much people of the Jesus knew that he was there, for he was the talk of the town, and the more so, because of their master, the more because he had lately absconded, and now broke out as the sun from behind a dark cloud.

1. They came to see Jesus, whose name was very much greatened, and made considerable by the late miracle he had wrought in raising Lazarus. They came, not to hear him, but to gratify their curiosity with a sight of him here at Bethany, hearing he would appear there, and was to be the guest of Abraham. The news of his coming was probably spread among the multitude, who now came thither; the more because he had lately absconded, and now broke out as the sun from behind a dark cloud.

2. They came to see Lazarus and Christ together, which was a very inviting sight. Some came for the confirmation of their faith in Christ, to have the story perhaps from Lazarus's own mouth. Others came only for the gratifying of their curiosity, that they might say they had seen a man who had been dead and was come to life again, and that Lazarus served for a show, these holy-days to those, who, like the Athenians, spent their time in talking and hearing new things. Perhaps some came to put curious questions to Lazarus about the state of the dead, to ask what news from the other world; we ourselves have sometimes said, it may be, We would have gone a great way for one hour's discourse with Lazarus. But there was another reason of so many coming, that we are really probable that Lazarus was silent, and gave us no account of his voyage; however, the scripture is silent, and gives us no account of it; and we must not covet to be wise above what is written. But our Lord Jesus was present, who was a much fitter person for them to apply to than Lazarus; for he was then at Mount Moriah, and the apostles were not yet aware of his mission. He desired them not what they tell us concerning another world, neither should we be persuaded though Lazarus rose from the dead. We have a more sure word of prophecy.

VII. The indignation of the chief priests at the growing interest of our Lord Jesus, and their plot to crush it; (c. 10, 11.) They consulted (or decreed) how they might put Lazarus to death also, that no man might believe in him, (of what was done to him, not of anything he said or did,) many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus. Here observe,

1. How vain and unsuccessful their attempts against Christ had hitherto been. They had done all they could to antagonize the people from him, and exasperate them against him, and yet many of the Jews, their neighbours, their creatures, their admirers, were so overcome by the convincing evidence of Christ's miracles, that they went away from the interest and party of the priests; went off from obedience to their tyranny, and believed on Jesus. And it was by reason of Lazarus; his resurrection put life into their faith, and convinced them that this Jesus was undoubtedly the Messiah, and had life in himself, and power to give life. This miracle confirmed them in the belief of his other miracles, which they had heard he wrought in Galilee; what was impossible to him that could raise the dead?

2. How absurd and unreasonable this day's vote was—that Lazarus must be put to death. This is an instance of the most brutish rage that could be; they were like a wild bull in a net, full of fury, and laving about them without any consideration. It was a sign that they neither feared God, nor respected any thing above nature.

1. If they had feared God, they would not have done such an act of defiance to him. God will have Lazarus to live by miracle, and they will have him to die by malice. They cry, Away with such a fellow, it is not fit he should live; when God had so lately sent him back to the earth, declaring it highly fit he should live; what was this but walking contrary to God? They would put Lazarus to death, and to this purpose have they joined, if they could contend with God, and try titles with the King of kings. Who has the keys of death and the grave, he or they? O sola militia! Christus qui suscitare putat mortuorum, non forsitan oritur—Blind malice, to suppose that Christ, who could raise one that had died a natural death, could not raise one that had been slain! One, in her. Lazarus is singled out to be the object of their special hatred, because God has distinguished him by the tokens of his peculiar love, as if they had made a league offensive and defensive with death and hell, and resolved to be severe upon all deserters. One would think that they should rather have consulted how they might have joined in friendship with Lazarus and his family, and by their mediation have reconciled themselves to this Jesus whom they had persecuted; but the God of this world had blinded their minds.

2. If they had regarded man, they would not have done such an act of injustice to Lazarus, an innocent man, to whose charge they could not pretend to lay any crime. What bands are strong enough to hold those who can so easily break through the most sacred ties of common justice, and violate the maxims which even nature itself teaches? But the support of their own tyranny and superstition was thought sufficient, as in the church of Rome, not only to justify, but to consecrate the greatest villanies, and make them meritorious.

12. On the next day much people that were come to the feast, when they heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, 13. Took branches of palm-trees, and went forth to meet him, and cried, Hosanna; blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord. 14. And Jesus, when he had found a young ass, sat thereon; as it is written. 15. I am not daugh ter of Sion; behold, thy King cometh, sitting on an ass's colt. 16. These things understood not his disciples at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then they remembered that these things were written of him, and that they had done these things unto him. 17. The people therefore that was with him, when he called Lazarus out of his grave, and raised him from the dead, bare record. 18. For this came the people also met him, for that they heard that he had done this miracle. 19. The Pharisees therefore said among themselves, Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? Behold, the world is gone after him.

This story of Christ's riding in triumph to Jerusalem is recorded by all the evangelists, as worthy of special remark; and in it we may observe,

1. The respects that were paid to our Lord Jesus by the common people; v. 12, 13. where we are told, How they were that paid him these respects; much people, et cetera—\"a great crowd of them\" that came up to the feast; not the inhabitants of Jerusalem, but the country people that came in remote parts to worship at the feast; the outer temple of the Lord, the farther from the Lord of the temple. They were such as came out to the feast. (1.) Perhaps they had been Christ's hearers in the country, and great admirers of him there, and therefore were forward to testify their respects to him, when they knew him to be Christ. Note, Those that have a true value and veneration for Christ will neither be ashamed nor afraid to own him before men, in any instance whereby they may do him honor. (2.) Perhaps they were those more devout Jews that came up to the feast some time before, to purify themselves, that were more inclined to religion than their neighbours, and those were they that were so forward to honour Christ. Note, The more regard men have to God and religion in general, the better disposed they will be to entertain Christ and his religion, which is not destructive, but profitable to all previous discoveries and instigations. They were not the rulers, or the great men, that went out to meet Christ, but the commonalty; some would have called them a mob, a rabble; but Christ has chose, the weak and foolish things, (1 Cor. 1. 27.) and is honored more by the multitude, than by the magnificence of his followers; for he values men by their souls, not their names and titles of honor.

2. On what occasion they did it; They heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem. They had inquired for him, (ch. 11. 53, 54.) \"Will he not come up to the feast?\" And now they hear he is coming; for note that seek Christ, seek in vain. Now when they heard he was coming, they desired to give him an acceptable reception. Note, Titles of the approach of Christ, and his kingdom should awaken us to consider what is the work of the day, that it may be done in the day. Israel must prepare to meet their God; (Amos 4. 12.) and the virgins to meet the bridegroom.

3. In what way they expressed their respects; they had not the keys of the city to present him, nor the sword or badge to carry before him, none of the city-musick to compliment him with, but such as they had given him; and even this despicable crowd was a faint resemblance of that glorious company which John saw, before the throne, and before the Lamb, Rev. 7. 9, 10. Though these were not before the throne, they were before the Lamb, the paschal Lamb, who, according to the usual custom, followed the feast, was set apart to be sacrificed for us. There it is said of that celestial choir,

(1.) That they had palms in their hands, and so, had these branches of palm-trees. The palm-tree has ever been an emblem of victory and triumph; Cicero calls one that had won many prizes Palmarum palmarum hominis — a man of many palms. Christ was now by his death to conquer principalities and powers, and therefore it was fit that he should have the victor's palm borne before him; though he was but girding on the harness, yet he could boast as though he had put it off. But this was not all; the carrying of palm-branches was part of the ceremony of the feast of tabernacles, (Lev. 23. 40. Num. 8. 15.) and the using of this palmarum, or palm-branches, was so exclusively of Lord Jesus, intimates that all the feasts pointed at his gospel, had their accomplishment in it, and particularly that of the feast of tabernacles, Zech. 14. 16.

(2.) That they cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God; (Rev. 7. 10.) so did these here, they shouted before him, as is usual in popular welcomes. I have, blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord: and Hosanna signifies salvation. It is fetched from Ps. 118. 25, 26. See how well acquainted these common people were with the scripture, and how pertinently they apply it to the Messiah. High thoughts of Christ will be best expressed in scripture words. Now in their acclamations,

[1.] They acknowledge our Lord Jesus to be the King of Israel, that comes in the name of the Lord. Though he went now in poverty and disgrace, yet, contrary to the notions their scribes had given them of the Messiah, they own him to be a King, which speaks both his dignity and honour, which we must adore; and his dominion and power, which we must submit to. They own him to be, First, A rightful King, coming in the name of the Lord, (Ps. 110.) sent of God, not only as a prophet, but as a king. Secondly, The promised and long-expected King, Messiah, the Prince, for he is King of Israel. According to the light they had, they proclaimed him King of Israel in the streets of Jerusalem; and they themselves being Israelites, hereby they avouched him for their King.

The people, who truly wish well to his kingdom, that is the meaning of hosanna; let the King of Israel prosper, as when Solomon was crowned, they cried, God save King Solomon, 1 Kings 1. 39. In crying hosanna they praved for three things. First, That his kingdom might come, in the light and knowledge of it, and in the power and efficiency of it. God speed the gospel-plough. Secondly, That it might conquer, over everything of opposition, Rev. 6. 17. Thirdly, That it might come with prosperity. Let the king live for ever; though his kingdom may be disturbed, let it never be destroyed, Ps. 72. 17, 18.

[2.] They bid him welcome into Jerusalem:

"Welcome is he that cometh; we are heartily glad to see him; come in, thou blessed of the Lord; and well may we attend him with our blessings, who meets us with his." This welcome is like that, (Ps. 24. 7, 9.) Lift up your heads, O ye gates. Thus must every one of us bid Christ welcome into our hearts, that is, we must praise him, and be well pleased in him. As we should be highly pleased with the being and attributes of God, and his relation to us, so we should be with the person and offices of the Lord Jesus, and his mediation between us and God. Faith saith, Blessed is he that cometh.

11. The posture Christ put himself into for the receiving of the respect's that were paid him; (v. 14.) When he had found or procure, a young ass, he sat thereon; it was but a poor sort of figure he made, he alone upon an ass, and a crowd of people following him, showing Hosanna, and saying, Hosanna! which was a sort of pageantry to be shewn publicly among them and us, and God. Faith saith, Blessed is he that cometh.

1. This was much more of state than he used to take, he used to travel on foot, but now was mounted. Though his followers should be willing to take up with mean things, and not affect any thing that looks like grandeur, yet it is allowed them to use the sevice of the inferior creatures, according as God in his providence gives particular possession of that over which, by his covenant with Noah and his sons, he has given to man a general dominion.

2. Yet it was much less of state than the great ones of the world usually take. If he would have made a public entry, according to the state of a man of high degree, he should have rode in a chariot like that of Solomon's (2 Cor. 10.) with pillars of silver, the bottom of gold, and the covering of purple. But being only to be the beginning of the kingdom of this world, to be introduced thus was rather a disapparagement than any honour to the King of Israel, for it seemed as if he would look great, and knew not how. His kingdom was not of this world, and therefore came not with outward pomp. He was now humbling himself, but in his exalted state John sees him in a vision on a white horse, with a bow and crown.

III. The fulfilling of the scripture in this, As it is written, Fear not, daughter of Zion, v. 15. This is quoted from Zech. 9. 9. To him bare all the prophets witness, and particularly to this concerning him. It was first foretold that Zion's King should come, should come thus, sitting on an ass's colt; even this minute circumstance was foretold, and Christ took care it should be punctually fulfilled. (1.) Christ is Zion's King: the holy hill of Zion was of old destined to be the metropolis or royal city of the Messiah. (2.) Zion's King does and will look after her, and come to her; though for a short time he retires, in due time he returns. (3.) Though he comes but slowly, (an ass is slow-paced,) yet he comes surely, and with such expressions of humility and condescension as greatly encourage addresses and expectations of his loyal subjects. Humble suppliants may reach to speak with him. If this be a disapparagement to Zion, that her King appears in no greater state or strength, let her know that though he comes to her, riding on an ass's colt, yet he goes forth against her enemies, riding on the heavens for her help, Ps. 110. 4, 5.

1. The daughter of Zion is therefore called upon to behold her King, to take notice of him and his approaches; behold, and wonder, for he cometh with observation, though not with outward show. Cant. 3. 11. Fear not. In the preface, Zion is bid to rejoice greatly, and to shout, but here it is rendered, Fear not. Unbending fears are enemies to spiritual joys; if they be cured, if they be conquered, joy will come in the front of it. Christ both bid us cheer his people, to silence their fears. If the case be so, that we cannot reach to the exultations of joy, yet we should labour to get from under the oppressions of fear. Rejoice greatly, at least, fear not.

IV. The remark made by the evangelist in the disciples' understanding of this; (v. 16.) They understood not at first why Christ did this, and how the scripture was fulfilled; but when Jesus was glorified, and thereupon the Spirit poured out, then they remembered that these things were written of him in the Old Testament, and that they and others had, in pursuance thereof, done and written, would.

1. See here the imperfection of the disciples now in their infant state; even they understood not these things at first; did not consider, when they fetched him the ass, and set him thereon, that they were performing the ceremony of the inauguration of Zedon's King. Now observe, (1.) The scripture is often fulfilled by the agency of those who have not themselves an eye to the scripture, in what they do, Isa. 44: 4. (2.) They were ignorant both in the word and providence of God, which the disciples themselves do not at first understand: not at their first acquaintance with the things of God, while they see men as trees walking; not at the first proposal of the things to their view and consideration. That which afterward is clear, at first was dark and doubtful. (3.) It well becomes the disciples of Christ, when they are grown up to maturity in knowledge, frequently to reflect upon the follies and weakness of their first beginning, that free grace may have the glory of their proficiency; and they may have compassion on the ignorant. When I was a child, I spake as a child.

2. See here the improvement of the disciples in their adult state. Though they had been children, they were not always so, but went on to perfection.

Observe, (1.) When they understood it; when Jesus was glorified; for, [1] Till then they did not rightly apprehend the nature of his kingdom, but expected it to appear in external pomp and power, and therefore knew not how to apply the scriptures which spake of it to so mean an appearance. Note, The right understanding of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, of its powers, glory, and the things which prevent our misinterpreting and misapplying of the scriptures that speak of it, [2] Till then the Spirit was not poured out, who was to lead them into all truth. Note, the disciples of Christ are enabled to understand the scriptures by the same Spirit that indited the scriptures. The Spirit of revelation is to all the saints a Spirit of wisdom, Eph. 1: 17, 18.

(2.) In what way; they compared that prophecy with the event, and put them together, that they might mutually receive light from each other, and so they came to understand both. Then remembered they that these things were written of him by the prophets, consentant to which they were done to him. Note, such an admirable harmony there is between the word and works of God, that the remembrance of what is written, will enable us to understand what is done; and the observation of what is done, will help us to understand what is written. As we have heard, so have we seen. The scripture is every day in the fulfilling.

V. The reason which induced the people to pay this respect to our Lord Jesus upon his coming into Jerusalem, though the government was so much set against him, was because of that illustrious miracle of raising Lazarus.

1. See here what advantage a sinner may have of this miracle; no doubt, the city rang of it, the report of it was in all people's mouths. But they who considered it as a proof of Christ's mission, and a ground of their faith in him, that they might be well satisfied of the matter of fact, traced the report to those who were eye-witnesses of it. And they might know the certainty of it by the utmost evidence the thing was capable of. The proof therefore that stood by when he called Lazarus out of his grave, being found out and examined, bare record, ver. 17. They unanimously averred the thing to be true, beyond dispute or contradiction, and were ready, if called to it, to depose it upon oath, for so much is implied in the word ἀμαρτέων. Note, The truth of Christ's miracles was evidenced by incon- testable proofs. It is probable that these who had seen this miracle, did not only assert it to those who asked them; but published it, as he motioned that they might add to the triumphs of this solemn day, when Christ's coming in new from Bethany, where it was done, would put them in mind of it. Note, They who wish well to Christ's kingdom, should be forward to proclaim what they know, that may redound to his honour.

2. What improvement they made of it; and what influence it had upon them. For this cause, as much as any other, the people believed on him. Some, out of curiosity, were desirous to see one that had done such a wonderful work. Many aged sennas he had preached in Jerusalem, which drew not such crowds after him as this one miracle did. But, (2.) Others, out of conscience, studied to do him honour, as one sent of God. This miracle was reserved for one of the last, that it might confirm those which went before; and might gain him this honour just before his sufferings; Christ's works were all not only well done (Mark 7: 37.) but well timed.

VI. The indignation of the Pharisees at all this; some of them, probably, saw, and they all soon heard of Christ's public entry. The committee, appointed to find out expediency to crush him, found their advice was retched, and they were constrained to retire into privacy, and that he would soon be forgotten in Jerusalem; but they now rage and fret when they see they imagined but a tru-e thing.

1. They own that they had got no ground against him; it was plainly to be perceived that they fire-routed nothing. They could not, with all their insinuations, alienate the people's affections from him, nor with their menaces restrain them from showing their affection to him. Note, the people who approve Christ, and fight against his kingdom, will be made to perceive that they prevail nothing. God will accomplish his own purposes, in spite of them, and the little efforts of their impotent malice. Ye prevail nothing, saith the Lord, we firseth nothing. Note, There is nothing got by opposing Christ.

2. They own that he had got ground; The world is gone after him; there is a vast crowd attending him, a world of people; an hyperbole common in most languages. Yet here, like Caiaphas, were they aware, they prophesied that the world would go after him; some of all sorts, some from all parts; nations shall be discipled. But to what in tent was this said? (1.) Thus they express their own vexation at the growth of his interest; their envy makes them fret. If the horn of the righteous be exalted with honor, the wicked one is exalted and is grieved. (Ps. 112: 9, 10.) Considering how great these Pharisees were, and what abundance of respect was paid them, one would think they needed not grudge Christ so inconsiderable a piece of honour as was now done him; but proud men would monopolize honor, and have none share with them, like Haman. (2.) Thus they exult themselves, and one another, to the tone of their own war against Christ. As if they should say, "Dallying and delaying thus will never do. We must take some other and more effectual course, to put a stop to this infection; it is time to try our utmost skill and force before the grievance grows past redress." Thus the enemies of religion are made more resolute and active by being baffled; and shall its friends be disheartened with every disappointment, who know its cause is righteous, and will at last be victorious?}

20. And there were certain Grecians among them that came up to worship at the feast: 21. The same came therefore to Philip, which was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and desired him, saying, Sir, we would see Jesus. 22. Philip cometh and telleth Andrew: and again Andrew and Philip tell Jesus. 23. And Jesus answered them, saying, The hour is come, when the Son of man should be glorified. 24. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. 25. He that loveth his life shall lose it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. 26. If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be: if any man serve me, him will I make a prince among my disciples.

Honour is here done to Christ by certain Greeks that inquired for him with respect. We are not told what day of Christ's last week this was, probably not the same day he rode into Jerusalem, (for that day was taken up in public work,) but a day or two after.

1. We are told who they were that did this honour to our Lord Jesus; certain Greeks among the people, who came up to worship at the feast, v. 20. Some think they were Jews of the dispersion, some of the twelve tribes that were scattered among the Gentiles, and were called Greeks, Hellenist Jews; but others think they were Gentiles, those whom they called proselytes of the gate, such as the eunuch and Cornelius. Pure natural religion met with the best assistance among the Jews, and therefore those among the Gentiles who were piously inclined, joined with them in their solemn meetings, as far as was allowed them. There were devout worshippers of the true God, even among them that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel. It was in the latter ages of the Jewish church, that there was this flocking of the Gentiles to the temple at Jerusalem; a happy presage of the taking down of the partition-wall between Jews and Gentiles. The forbidding of the Gentiles, the despising of their religion, and such like, were necessary, for that which was foreign from the Gentile, (which was done by Eleazar the son of Ananias, the High-Priest,) Josephus saith, was one of those things that brought the Romans upon them, De Bello Jud. lib. 2. cap. 30. Though these Greeks, if uncircumcised, were not admitted to eat the passover, yet they came to worship at the feast. We must thankfully use the privileges we have, though the appetites of some rest from which we are shut out.

11. What was the honour they did him; they desired to be acquainted with him, v. 21. Being come to worship at the feast, they desired to make the best use they could of their time, and therefore applied themselves to Philip, desiring that he would put them in a way to get some personal converse with the Lord Jesus.

12. They may be others to see Christ, they were industrious in the use of proper means. They did not conclude it impossible, because he was so much crowded, to get to speak with him, nor rest in bare wishes, but resolved to try what could be done. Note, They that would have the knowledge of Christ, must seek it.

2. They made their application to Philip, one of his disciples. Some think that they had acquaintance with him formerly, and that they lived near Bethsaida in Galilee of the Gentiles; and then it teaches us that we should improve our acquaintance with good people, for our increase in the knowledge of Christ. It is good to know those who know the Lord. But if these Greeks had been near Galilee, it is probable that they would have attended Christ there where he mostly resided; therefore I think that they applied themselves to him, only because they saw him a close follower of Christ, and he was the first man they could get to speak with. This was an instance of the general desire of the Gentiles, that they made an interest with one of his disciples for an opportunity to converse with him; a sign that they looked upon him as some great one, though he appeared mean. Those that would see Jesus by faith now that he is in heaven, must apply themselves to his ministers, whom he has appointed for this purpose, to guide poor souls in their inquiries after him. People may come to see our Anointed Lord.

The bringing of these Greeks to the knowledge of Christ by the means of Philip, signified the agency of the apostles, and the use made of their ministry in the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith, and the discipling of the nations.

3. Their address to Philip was in short this, Sir, we would see Jesus. They gave him a title of respect, as one worthy of honour, because he was in relation to Christ. Their business is, they would see Jesus; not only see his face, that they might be able to say, when they came home, that they had seen one that was so much talked of; it is probable that they had seen him when he appeared publicly; but they would have some free conversation with him, and be taught by him, which it was no easy thing to find him, take leisure for, his hands were so full of public work. Now that they were come to worship at the feast, they would see Jesus. Note, In our attentances upon holy ordinances, and particularly the gospel-passover, the great desire of our souls should be to see Jesus; to have our acquaintance with him increased, our dependence on him encouraged, our conformity to him carried on, to have him nearer, to keep up communication with him, and derive communications of grace from him: we miss of our end in coming, if we do not see Jesus.

4. Here is the report which Philip made of this to his Master, v. 22. He tells Andrew, who was of Bethsaida likewise; and was a senior fellow in the college of the apostles, contemporary with Peter, and consults him what was to be done; whether he thought the motion would be acceptable or no, because Christ was not there, and had not yet sent but to the house of Israel. They agree that it must be made; but then he would have Andrew go along with him, remembering the favourable acceptance Christ had promised them, in case two of them should agree touching any thing they should ask, Matt. 18. 19. Note, Christ's ministers should be helpful to one another, and concur in helping one another; but Philip tells Andrew, if you should see him, you must recom mend the matter, and desire communications of grace from him; for we read (v. 29.) of the people that stood by; but he was seldom alone.

111. Christ's acceptance of this honour done him, signified by what he said to the people hereupon, (v. 23, &c.) where he foretells both the honour which he knew they should have, v. 25, 26, and the honour which they should have that followed him, v. 25, 26. This was intended for the direction and encouragement of these Greeks, and all others that desired acquaintance with him.

1. He foresees that plentiful harvest in the conversion of the Gentiles, which this was as it were the first-fruits of, v. 23. Christ said to these two disciples, who spake a good word for those Greeks, but doubted whether they should speed or no, The hour is come, when the Son of man shall be glorified, by the accession of the Gentiles to the church, in order to that he must be rejected of the Jews. Observe,

(1.) The end designed hereby, and that is the glorifying of the Redeemer: "And is it so? Do the Gentiles begin to inquire after me? Does the morning star appear to the gloom of the believer's heart, which knows its place and time too, does that begin to take hold of the ends of the earth? Then the hour is come for the glorifying of the Son of man." This was no surprise to Christ, but a paradox to those about him. Note, [1.] The calling, the effectual calling, of the Gentiles into the church of God, greatly redounded to the glory of the Son of man. The glorifying of the redeemer, was the magnifying of the Redeemer. [2.] There was a time, a set time, an hour, a certain hour, for the glorifying of the Son of man, which did come at last, when the days of his humiliation were numbered and finished, and he speaks of the approach of it with exultation and triumph; The hour is come. (2.) The strange way in which this end was to be attained, and that by the death of Christ, intimated in that similitude; (v. 21.) "Teribly, verily, I say unto you, to whom I have spoken of my death and sufferings, that except a corn of wheat fall, not only to, but into, the ground, and die, and be buried and lost, it abideth alone, and you never see any more of it; but if it die according to the course of nature, (otherwise it would be a miracle,) it bringeth forth much fruit; God giving to every one a soul unto death, else he cannot divide a portion with the great, Isa. 33. 12. He shall have a seed given him, but he must shed his blood, to purchase them and purify them, must win them and wear them. It was necessary likewise, as a qualification for that glory, which he was to have by the accession of multitudes to his church; for if he had not by his sufferings made satisfaction for sin, and so brought in an evening of righteousness, he had not been sufficiently provided for the entertainment and restitute of those that should come to him, and therefore must abide alone. [2.] The advantage of Christ's humiliation illustrated. He fell to the ground in his incarnation, seemed to be buried alive in this earth, so much was his glory veiled; but that was not all, he died, this immortal Seed submitted to the laws of mortality, he lay in the grave like seed under the clods; but as the seed comes up again green, and fresh, and flourishing, and with a great increase, so one dying Christ gathered to himself thousands of living Christians, and he became their Root. The salvation of souls hitherto, and henceforward to the end of time, is all owing to the dying of this Corn of wheat. Hereby the Father and Son are glorified, the church is replenished, the mystical body kept up, and will at length be completed; and when time shall be no more, the Captain of our salvation, bringing many sons to glory by the virtue of his death, and being so made perfect by sufferings, shall be celebrated for ever with the admiring praises of saints and angels, Heb. 2. 10-13. 2. He foretells and promises an abundant recompense to them that should cordially embrace him and his gospel, and he shows that it would make it appear that they do so, by their faithfulness in suffering for him, or in serving him. (1.) In suffering for him, (v. 23.) He that loves his life better than Christ, shall lose it; but he that hates his life in this world, and prefers the favour of God and an interest in Christ before it, shall keep it unto life eternal. This doctrine Christ much insisted on, it being the great design of his religion to wean us from this world, by setting before us another world. [1.] See here the fatal consequence of an inordinate love of life; many a man hags himself to death, and loses his life by over-valuing it. He that so loves his animal life, as to indulge his appetite, and make provision for the flesh, to satisfy the lusts thereof, shall thereby shorten his days, shall lose the life he is so fond of, and another infinitely better. He that is so much in love with the life of the body, and the ornaments and delights of it, as, for fear of exposing it or them, to deny Christ, shall have it, lose a real happiness in the other world, while he thinks to secure an imaginary one in this. Skin for skin a man may give for his life, and make a good bargain, but he that gives his soul, his God, his heaven for it, buys life too dear, and is guilty of his folly who sold a birthright for a mess of pottage. [2.] See also the blessed recompense of a holy contempt of life. He that so hates the life of the body, as to venture that for the preserving of the life of his soul, shall find both, with unspeakable advantage, in eternal life. Note, First, It is required of the disciples of Christ, that they value their life in another world; a life in this world supposes a life in the other world, and the lesser is less than the greater. Our life in this world includes all the enjoyments of our present state, riches, honours, pleasures, and long life in the possession of them; these we must hate, that is, despise them as vain and insufficient to make us happy, dread the temptations that are in them, and cheerfully part with them whenever they come in competition with the service of Christ, Acts 20. 24.—21. 15. Rev. 12. 11. See here much of the power of godliness, that it conquers the strongest natural affections, and removes the mystery of godliness—that it is the greatest wisdom, and yet makes men hate their own lives. Secondly, Those who, in love to Christ, hate their own lives, this shall be abundantly compensated in the resurrection of the just. He that hateth his life, shall keep it; he puts it into the hands of Christ to do with it as he likes; he is kept in the life of godliness with great gain and an improvement as the heavenly life can make of the earthly one. (2.) In serving him; (v. 26.) If any man profess to serve me, let him follow me, as a servant his master; and where I am, he shall be also; where I will be, there let my servant be: so some read it, as part of the duty. There let him be, to attend upon me; we read it as part of the promise, There shall he be in happiness with me. And lost this should seem a small matter, he adds, If any man serve me, him will I my Father honour; and that is enough, more than enough. The Greeks desired to see Jesus; (v. 21.) but Christ lets them know that it was not enough to see him, they must serve him. He did not come into the world, to be a show for us to gaze at, but a King to be ruled by. And he saith this for the encouragement of those who inquired after him, to become his servants. In taking servants, it is usual to fix both the work and the wages; Christ does both here. [1.] Here is the work which Christ expects from his servants; and it is very easy and reasonable, and such as becomes them. First, Let them attend their Master's motions; If any man serve me, let him follow me. Christians must follow Christ, follow his methods and prescriptions, do the things that he saith; follow his example and pattern, walk as he also walked; follow his conduct, by his providence and Spirit. We must go whither he leads us, and in the way he leads us; must follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes before us. "If any man serve me, if he put himself into that relation to me, let him apply himself to the business of my service, and be always ready at my call." Or, "If any man do indeed serve me, let him make an open and public profession of his relation to me, by following me, as the servant owns his master by following him in the streets."

Secondly, Let them attend their master's repose; Where I am, there let my servant be, to wait upon me. Christ is where his church is, in the assemblies of his saints, where his ordinances are administered; and there let his servants be, to present themselves before him, and carry to him their duties and offices. "Where I am to be in heaven, whither I am now going, there let the thoughts and affections of my servants be, let them letter their conversation be, where Christ sitteth," Col. 3. 1, 2.

[2.] Here are the wages which Christ promises to his servants; and they are very rich and noble. First, They shall be happy with him; Where I am, there shall also my servant be. To be with him, when he was here in poverty and disgrace, would seem but poor preference, and therefore, doubtless, he means being with him in paradise, sitting with him at his table above, on his throne there: it is the happiness of heaven to be with Christ there, ch. 17. 24. Christ speaks of heaven's happiness as if he were already in it, Where I am; because he was sure of it, and near to it, and it was still upon his heart, and in his discourse, but far beyond what such worthless worms of the earth could expect to receive. The rewarder is God himself, who takes the services done to the Lord Jesus as done to himself. The reward is honour, true lasting honour, the highest honour; it is the honour that comes from God. It is said, (Prov. 27. 18.) He that waits on his master, (humbly and diligently,) shall be honoured. Those that wait on Christ, God will put honour upon, such as those that stand under a veil. They that serve Christ, must humble themselves, and are commonly vilified by the world, in recompence of both which they shall be exalted in due time. Thus far Christ's discourse has reference to those Greeks who desired to see him, encouraging them to serve him; what became of these Greeks, we are not told, but are willing to hope that they who thus asked the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward, found it, and walked in it.

27. Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say! Father, save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour. 28. Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. 29. The people therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to him. 30. Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. 31. Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. 32. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. 33. This he said, signifying what death he should die. 34. The people answered him, We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever: and how sayest thou, The Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man? 35. Then Jesus said unto them, Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. 36. While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light. These things spake Jesus, and departed, and did hide himself from them.

Honour is here done to Christ by his Father, in a voice from heaven, occasioned by the following part of his discourse, and which gave occasion to a farther conference with the people. In these verses, we have,

1. Christ's address to his Father, upon occasion of the trouble which seized his spirit at this time; (v. 27.) Now is my soul troubled. A strange word to come from Christ's mouth, and at this time surpassing all expectation, it comes in the midst of divers pleasant prospects, in which, one would think, he should have said, Now is my soul pleased. Note, Trouble of soul sometimes follows after great enlargements of spirit. In this world of mixture and change we must expect damps upon our joy, and the highest degree of comfort to be the next degree to trouble. When Paul had been in the third heaven, he had a thence to the bush. Observe,

1. Christ's dread of his approaching sufferings; Now is my soul troubled. Now the black and dismal scene began, now were the first throes of the travail of his soul, now his agony began, his soul began to be exceeding sorrowful. Note, (1.) The sin of our souls was the trouble of Christ's soul, when he undertook to redeem and save us, and to make his soul an offering for our sins. (2.) The trouble of his soul was designed to effect the troubles of his church; for, after this, he said to his disciples, (ch. 14. 1.) "Let not your hearts be troubled; why should your's be troubled and mine too?" Our Lord Jesus went on cheerfully in his work, in prospect of the joy set before him, and yet submitted to a trouble of soul. Holy mourning is consistent with spiritual joy, and the way to eternal joy. Christ was now troubled, now in sorrow, now in fear, now for a season; but it would not be so always, it would not be so long. The same is the comfort of Christians in their troubles. They are but for a moment, and will be turned into joy.

2. The strain he seems to be in, hereupon, intimated in those words, And what shall I say? This does not speak him consulting with any other, as if he asked advice, but considering with himself what was first to be said now. When our souls are troubled, we must take heed of speaking unadvisedly, but debate with ourselves what we shall say. Christ speaks like one at a loss, as if what he should choose he wot not. There was a struggle between the work he had taken upon him, which required sufferings, and the nature he had taken upon him, which dreaded them; between these two he here passes with, What shall I say? He looked, and there was none to help, which put him to a stand. Calvin observes this as a great instance of Christ's humiliation, that he should speak thus like one at a loss. Quo se magis examinavit gloria Domini, quo luciditiae habebam ergo nos amores speciem—The more en-
How this answer was given—by a voice from heaven. The Jews speak much of a Bath-kol—the daughter of a voice, as one of those divine manners by which God in time past spake to the prophets; but we do not find any mention of his speaking thus to any but to our Lord Jesus; it was at some event which was never observed for him; (Matt. 3. 17—17. 5) and here, probably, this audible voice was introduced by some visible appearance, either of light or darkness, for both have been used as vehicles of the divine glory.

2. What the answer was—it was an express return to that petition, Father, glorify thy name. I have glorified it already, and I will glorify it yet again. When the Father, hallowed be thy name, is a context to us, that it is an answered prayer; answered to Christ here, and in him, to all time behoves. (1.) The name of God had been glorified in the life of Christ, in his doctrine and miracles, and all the examples he gave of holiness and goodness. (2.) It should be further glorified in the death and sufferings of Christ: his wisdom and power, his justice and holiness, his truth and goodness, were greatly glorified; the demands of a broken law were fully answered, the affront done to God’s government satisfied for, and God accepted the satisfaction, and declared himself well pleased. What God has done for the glorifying of his own name, is an encouragement to us to expect what he will yet further do. He that has procured all the perfection of his name, is able to glorify it to all time.

III. The opinion of the scribes concerning this voice, v. 29. We may hope there were some among them, whose minds were so well prepared to receive a divine revelation, that they understood what was said, and they bare record of it. But notice is here taken of the perverse suspicion of the multitude; some of them said that it thundered, others, who heard nothing, to make show, that there was only an immediate intelligible voice, said that certainly it was an angel spoke to him. Now this shows, 1. That it was not a voice, even in the judgment of the seer; that were not at all well affected to him. 2. That they were both too much to admit so plain a proof of Christ’s divine mission. They would rather say that it was this, or that, or any thing, than that God spake to him in answer to his prayer; and yet, if it thundered with audible sound, as is said here, (v. 5.) 20. that God’s voice? Or, if angs speak to him, are not they God’s messengers? But thus God speaks once, yea twice, and man perceives it not.

IV. The accent which our Saviour himself gives of this voice.

1. Why it was sent; (v. 56.) “It came not because of me, nor merely for my encouragement and satisfaction,” (then it might have been whispered in his ear privately.) “But for your sakes.” (1.) “That all you who heard it, may believe that the Father hath sent me.” What is said from heaven concerning our Lord Jesus, and the glorifying of the Father in him, is said for our sakes, that we might be brought to submit to him, and rest upon him. (2.) “That you, my disciples, who are to follow me in sufferings, may therein be comforted with the same comforts that he carries on.” Let this encouragement enter into place with life itself for his sake, if they are called to it, that it should redound to the honour of God. Notice, The promises and supports granted to our Lord Jesus in his sufferings, were intended for our sakes. For our sakes he sanctified himself, and comforted himself.

2. What was the meaning of it. He that lay in the Father’s bosom, knew his voice, and what was the meaning of it; and two things God intended, when he said that he would glorify his own name. (1.) That by the death of Christ, Satan should be conquered; (v. 31.) Now is the judgment. He speaks with a divine exaltation and triumph. “Now the year of my redeemed is come, and the time prevised for the breaking of the serpent’s head, and giving a total rent to the powers of darkness; now for the glorious achievement is just now, that the work is to be done, which has been so long thought of it the divine counsels, so long talked of in the written word, which has been so much the hope of saints, and the dread of devils.” The matter of the [1.] That now is the judgment of this world;

[2.] That by the death of Christ souls shall be converted, and that will be the casting out of Satan; (v. 32.) If I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me. Where observe two things,

[1.] The great design of our Lord Jesus, which was to draw all men to him, not the Jews only who had been long in profession a people near to God, but the Gentiles also, who had been afar off; for he was to be the desire of all nations, (Hag. 2. 7.) and to him must the gathering of the people be.
The which his enemies dreamed, was, that the world would go after him, and he would draw them to him, notwithstanding their opposition. Observe here how Christ himself is all in all in the conversion of a soul. First, It is Christ that draws; I

[2.] The strange method he took to accomplish his design by being lifted up from the earth. What he meant by that, to prevent mistake, we are told;

[v. 33.] This he spake, signifying by what death he should die, the death of the cross, though they had designed, and attempted to stone him to death. He that was crucified, was first nailed to the cross, and then lifted up upon it. He was lifted up as a spectacle to the world; lifted up between heaven and earth, as unworthy of either; yet the word here used is not lifted up, but hanged, which is the

—If I be exalted: he reckoned his sufferings his honour. Whatever death we die, if we die in Christ, we shall be lifted up out of this dungeon, this den of lions, into the regions of light and love. We should learn of our Master to speak of dying with a holy pleasantry, and to say, “We shall then be lifted up.”

Now Christ’s drawing all men to him, followed his being lifted up from the earth. First, It followed after it in time. The great increase of the church was after the death of Christ; while Christ lived,
we read of thousands at a sermon miraculously fed,
but it was after his death that we read of thousands at a sermon added to the church which should be saved. Israel began to multiply in Egypt after the death of Joseph. Secondly, It followed upon it as a force in Christ’s resurrection. The covenant of a benefic virtue and efficacy in the death of Christ to draw souls to him. The cross of Christ, though to some a stumbling-stone, to others is a load-stone. Some make it an allusion to the drawing of fish into a net; the lifting up of Christ was as the spreading of the net; (Matt. 13. 47. 48.) or to the setting up of a standard, which draws soldiers together; or rather, it refers to the lifting up of the brazen serpent in serpent’s head, Gen. 3. 15. When his oracles were silenced, his temples forsaken, his idols famished, and the kingdoms of the world become Christ’s kingdoms, then was the prince of this world cast out, as appears by comparing this with John’s vision, (Rev. 12. 8—11.) where it is said to be done by the blood of the Lamb. Christ’s frequent casting of devils out of the bodies of people, was an indication of the great design of his whole undertaking. Observ, With what assurance Christ here speaks of the victory over Satan; it is as good as done, and can with safety be described as accomplished.

[1.] That now is the judgment of Christ. We never can think of that more clearly than when we consider the powerful discourses Christ spake, as is now upon the turning point, this is the critical day, upon which the trembling scale will turn for life or death, to all mankind; all that are not recovered by this, will be left helpless and hopeless. Or, rather, it is a law term, as we take it; “Now judgment is entered, in order to the taking out of execution against the prince of this world.”

Note, The death of Christ was the judgment of this world. First, It is a judgment of discovery and distinction—judicium discretions; so Austin. Now is the trial of this world, for men shall have their character according as the cross of Christ is to them; to some it is foolishness and a stumbling-block, to others it is the wisdom and power of God; of which there was a figure in the two thieves that were crucified with him. By this we judge what the thoughts of the world are of Christ. Secondly, It is a judgment of favour and absolution to the chosen ones that are in the world.

Christ upon the cross interposed between a righteous
God and a guilty world as a Sacrifice for sin and a Surety for sinners, so that when he was judged, and iniquity laid upon him, and he was wounded for our transgressions, it was as it were the judgment of this world, for an everlasting righteousness was thereby brought in, not for Jews only, but the whole world, 1 John 2. 1, 2. Dan. 9. 24. Thirdly, It is a judgment of condemnation given against the powers of darkness; see ch. 16. 11. Judgment is put for vindication and deliverance, the asserting of an invaded right. At the death of Christ there was a famous trial between Christ and Satan, the serpent and the promised seed; the trial was for the world, and the lordship of it; the devil had long been sway among the children of men, time out of mind;
he now pleads prescription, grounding his claim also upon the forfeiture incurred by sin. We find him willing to have come to a composition; (Luke 4. 6, 7.) he would have given the kingdoms of this world to Christ, provided he would hold them by, force, and under him; but Christ would try it out with him; by dying he takes off the forfeiture to divine justice, and then fairly disputes the title, and recovereth it in the court of heaven. Satan’s dominion is declared to be an usurpation, and the world adjudged to the Lord Jesus as his right, Ps. 2. 6, 8.
The judgment of this world is, that it belongs to Christ, and not to Satan; to Christ therefore let us all turn tenants.

[3.] That now is the prince of this world cast out.

First, It is the devil that is here called the prince of this world, because he rules over the men of the world by the things of the world; he is the ruler of the darkness of this world, that is, of this dark world, of those in it that walk in darkness, 2 Cor. 4. 4. Eph.
6. 12.

Secondly, He is said to be cast out, to be now cast out; for whatever had been done hitherto towards weakening of the devil’s kingdom, was done in the virtue of a Christ to come, and therefore is said to be done now. Christ reconciling the world to God by the merit of his death, broke the power of death, and cast out Satan as a destroyer; Christ, reducing the world to God by the doctrine of his cross, broke the power of sin, and cast out Satan as a destroyer.
The bruising of his heel was the breaking of the the wilderness, which drew all those to it that were stung with fiery serpents, as soon as ever it was known that it was lifted up, and there was healing virtue in it. O! what flocking was there to it! So there was to Christ, when salvation through him was promised to all nations; see ch. 3. 14. Perhaps it has some reference to the posture in which Cain was crucified, with his arms stretched out, to invite all to him, and embrace all that come. They that put Christ to that ignominious death, thought to drive all men from him; but the devil was outrun in his own bow. Out of the eater came forth meat.

V. The people's exception against what he said, and their cavil at it, v. 34. Though they had heard the voice from heaven, and the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth, yet they object, and pick quarrels with him. Christ had called himself, the Son of man, (v. 22.) which they knew to be one of the titles of the Messiah, Dan. 7. 13. He had also said, that the Son of man must be lifted up, which they understood of his dying, and, probably, he explained himself so; and some think repeated what he said to Nicodemus, (ch. 3. 14.) So must the Son of man be lifted up. Now against this,
1. They alleged those scriptures of the Old Testament which speak of the perpetuity of the Mesi-ach, that he should be so far from being cut off in the midst of his days, that he should be a Priest for ever, (Ps. 110. 4.) and a King for ever, (Ps. 89. 29, 35.) the length of days, and as much as days, and ever, and his years as the generation, (Ps. 69. 6.) from all this they inferred that the Messiah should not die. Thus great knowledge in the letter, of the scripture, if the heart be unsearched, is capable of being abused to serve the cause of iniquity, and to fight against Christianity with its own wea-pens. Their perverseness in opposing this to what Jesus had said, will appear, if we consider, (1.) That, when they ventured the scripture to prove that the Messiah abideth for ever, they took no notice of those texts which speak of the Messiah's death and sufferings: they had heard out of the law, that Mesiah abideth for ever; and had they never heard out of the law, that Messiah shall be cut off, (Dan.
9. 26.) and that he shall pour out his soul unto death, (Isa. 53. 12.) and particularly, that his hands and his feet were mingled with the slain, (ch. 26.)
they make so strange of the lifting up of the Son of man? Note. We often run into great mistakes, and then defend them with scripture-arguments, by putting things asunder, which God in his word has put together; and opposing one truth, under pretence of supporting another. We have heard out of the gospel, that which excites free grace, we have heard also that which enjoin duty, and we must cordially embrace both, and not separate them, or set them at variance. (2.) That, when they opposed what Christ said concerning the sufferings of the Son of man, they took no notice of what he had said concerning his glory and exaltation. They had heard out of the law, that Christ abideth for ever;
and had they not heard our Lord Jesus say that he should be glorified, that he should bring in such fruit, and draw all men to him? Had he not, just previous to his ascension, delivered to his followers, which supposed his abiding for ever? But this they overlook. Thus unfair disputants oppose some parts of the opinion of an adversary, which, if they would but take entire, they could not but subscribe to;
and in the doctrine of Christ there are paradoxes, which to men of corrupt minds are stones of stumbling—as Christ crucified, and yet glorified; lifted up, and yet dung. (2.) That by the Son of man they understand him in the highest and greatest sense, as the Prophet, Priest, and King; and that they are caviling with him, that he should go about to propagate his salvation, while he had a kingdom. (3.) That he should be crucified, and yet glorified: lifted up, and yet taken down. (4.) That he should be lifted up, and at the same time be wasted and cut off. These are the arguments by which they oppose what he said concerning his sufferings. Now, (1.) The privilege and advantage they enjoyed in having Christ and his gospel among them, with the shortness and uncertainty of their enjoyment of it, made that a little while to them in the light
with you, Christ and his gospel, was, was, their wasteful and cheerless life, and poverty; they would rather have no Christ
than a suffering one.

VI. What Christ said to this exception, or, rather, what he said after it. The objection was a perfect cavil; they might, if they pleased, answer it themselves. Man dies, and yet is immortal, and abideth for ever, so the Son of man; therefore, instead of setting aside his sufferings, (which fully, he gives them a serious caution to take heed of trifling away the day of their opportunities in such vain and fruitless civils as these; (v. 35, 36.)
Yet a little while, and, but a little while, is the light with you; therefore be wise for yourselves, and walk while we have the light.

In general, we may observe here, 1. The concern Christ has for the souls of men, and his desire of their welfare. With what tenderness does he here admonish those to look well to themselves, who were curiously ill against him? Even when he endured the contradiction of sinners, he favoured their conversion. See Prov. 29. 16. 2. The method he takes with those objectors; with marks instruct ning those that opposed themselves, 2 Tim. 2. 25.
Were but men's consciences awakened by a due consideration about the perishing state, and did they consider how little time they have to spend,
and none to spare, they would not waste precious thoughts and time in trifling cavils.

Particularly we have here,
(1.) The privilege and advantage they enjoyed in having Christ and his gospel among them, with the shortness and uncertainty of their enjoyment of it, made that a little while to them in the light
with you, Christ and his gospel, was, was, their wasteful and cheerless life, and poverty; they would rather have no Christ
than a suffering one.

(2.) The warning given them to make the best of these advantages while they enjoyed them, because of the danger they were in of losing them. Walk while we have the light; as travellers who make the best of their way forward, that they may not be neglected in the darkness. "Come," says they,
"let us mend our pace, and get forward, while we have day-light." Thus wise should we be for our souls, who are journeying towards eternity. Note, [1.] It is our business to walk, to press forward, and to get nearer it by being made fitter for it. Our life is but a day, and we have a day's journey to go. [2.] The best time of walking is while we have the light. The day is the proper season for work, as the night is for rest. The proper time for getting grace is when we have the word of grace preached to us, and the Spirit of grace стройннн с ним, and therefore then is the time to be busy. [3.] We are highly concerned thus to improve our opportunities, for fear lest our day be finished before we have finished our day's work and day's journey; " lest darkness come upon you, lest you lose your opportunities, and can neither recover them, nor dispatch the business you have to do without them. " Then darkness comes, the light is gone, and an utter incapacity to make sure the great salvation, as renders the state of the careless sinner quite deplorable; so that if his work be undone, then it is likely to be undone for ever.
ST. JOHN, XII.

(5.) The sad condition of those who have shined away the gospel, and are come to the period of their day of grace. They walk in darkness, and know neither where they go nor where they are going, nor the way they are walking in, nor the end they are walking toward. He that is destitute of the light of the gospel, and is not acquainted with its discoveries and directions, wanders endlessly in mistakes and errors, and a thousand crooked paths, and is not aware of it. Set aside the instructions of the Christian doctrine, and we know little of the difference 'twixt the gospel and idol, to destruction, and knows not his danger, for he is either sleeping or dancing at the pit's brink.

(4.) The great duty and interest of every one of us, inferred from all this; (v. 36.) While ye have the light, believe in the light. The Jews had now Christ's presence with them, let them improve it; afterward they had the first offers of the gospel made to them by the apostles wherever they came; now this is an admonition to them not to out-stript their market, but to accept the offer when it was made them: the same Christ saith to us all who enjoy the gospel. Note, [1.] It is the duty of every one of us to believe in the gospel light, to receive it as a divine light, to subscribe to the truths it discovers, for it is a light to our eyes, and to follow its guidance, and to be such as ourselves, and that we may be blessed in him as he is revealed to us, as a true light that will not deceive us, a sure light that will not mislead us. [2.] We are concerned to do this while we have the light, to lay hold on Christ while we have the gospel to shew us the way to him, and direct us in that way. [3.] They that believe in the light, shall be the children of light, they shall be owned as such, and called children of light, (Luke 16. 8. Eph. 5. 8.) and of the day, 1 Thess. 5. 5. They that have God for their Father, are children of light, for God is light; they are born from above, and heirs of heaven, and children of light, for heaven is light.

VII. Christ's retiring from them, hereupon; These things saith Jesus, and said no more at this time, but left this to be owned and admired, and to be remembered: he did not hide himself from them. And this he did, 1. For their conviction and awaking. If they will not regard what he hath said, he will have nothing more to say to them. They are joined to their iniquity, as Ephraim to idols; let them alone. Note, Christ justly removes the means of grace from those that quarrel with them, and he departs from them, from a forewarning generation, Deut. 32. 20. 2. For his own preservation. He hid himself from their rage and fury, retiring, it is probable, to Bethany, where he lodged. By this it appears that what he said, irritated and exasperated them, and they were made worse by that which should have made them better.

37. But though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him: 38. That the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, who hast believed our report! and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? 39. Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again, 40. He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them. 41. These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and spake of him.

We have here the honour done to our Lord Jesus by the Old Testament prophets, who foretold and lamented the infidelity of the many that believed not on him. It was indeed a dishonour and grief to Christ, that his doctrine met with so little acceptance, and so much opposition; but this takes off the wonder and reproach, makes the offence of it to cease, and made it no disappointment to Christ, that wherein the scriptures were fulfilled. Two things are here said concerning this untractable people, and both were foretold by the evangelical prophet Jesus, the why they did not believe, and that they could not believe.

1. They did not believe; (v. 37.) Though he had done so many miracles before them, which, one would think, should have convinced them, yet they believed not, but opposed him. Observe,

1. The plenty of the means of conviction which Christ afforded them; he did miracles, so many miracles (1 Esaias 35:1.) It signifies both many and so great. It refers to all the miracles he had wrought formerly; say the blind and lame now came to him into the temple, and he healed them, Matt. 21. 14. His miracles were the great proof of his mission, and on the evidence of them he relied. Two things concerning them he here insists upon; (1.) The number of them; they were many; (2.) The greatness of them; they were not repeated; and every new miracle confirmed the reality of all that went before. The multitude of his miracles was not only a proof of his unexhausted power, but gave the greater opportunity to examine them: and if there had been a cheat in them, it was morally impossible but that in some or other of them it would have been discovered: and, being all miracles of mercy, the more they were the more good was done. (2.) The notoriety of them. He wrought these miracles before them, not at a distance, not in a corner, but before many witnesses, appearing to their own eyes.

2. The inefficacy of these means; yet they believed not on him. They could not gainsay the premise, and yet would not grant the conclusion. Note, The most plentiful and powerful means of conviction good not of themselves work faith in the depraved prejudiced hearts of men. These saw and yet believed not.

3. The fulfilling of the scripture in this; (v. 38.) that the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled. Not that these infidel Jews designed the fulfilling of the scriptures, for it they rather fancied these scriptures which speak of the church's best sons, to be fulfilled in themselves) but the event exactly answered the prediction, so that (ut for ita ut) this saying of Esaias was fulfilled. The more improbable any event is, the more does a divine foresight appear in the prediction of it. One could not have imagined that the kingdom of the Messiah, supported with such pregnant proofs, should have met with so much opposition among the Jews, and therefore their manner is called a marvellous work, and a wonder. Isa. 29. 9. 14. Christ himself marvelled at it, but it was what Isaiah foretold, (Isa. 53. 1,) and now it is accomplished. Observe, (1.) The gospel is here called their report; Who has believed? (Isa. 53. 1.) The report of sins, and the report of salvation from God, and which you have heard from us; our report is the report that we bring, like the report of a matter of fact; or the report of a solemn resolution in the senate. (2.) It is foretold, that few comparatively of those to whom this report is brought, will be persuaded to give credit to it. Many hear it, but few heed it, and embrace it: Who believed? (Isa. 53. 1.) Here and there one, but none to speak of; not the wise, not the noble; it is a report, but a report which wants confirmation. (3.) It is spoken of as a thing to be greatly lamented, that so few believe the report of the gospel. Lord is here prefixed from the LXX. but is not in the Hebrew, and it intimates a sorrowful account brought to God by the messengers, of the cold entertainment which they and their report had; as the servant came, and shewed not what manner of things they saw. Observe, (1.) The reason why men believe not the report of the gospel, is, because the arm of the Lord is not revealed to them, because they do not acquaint themselves with, and submit themselves to, the grace of God; they do not experimentally know the virtue and fellowship of Christ's death and resurrection, in which the arm of the Lord is revealed. They saw Christ's miracles, but did not see the arm of the Lord revealed in them. (2.) They could not believe, and therefore they could not, because Esaias said, He hath blinded their eyes. This is a hard saying, who can explain it? We are sure that God is infinitely just and merciful, and therefore we cannot think that there is in any such an impiety to good, resulting from the counsels of God, as lays them under a fatal necessity of being evil; God damns none by mere sovereignty, yet it is said, They could not believe. St. Austin, coming in course to the exposition of these words, expresses himself with a holy fear of entering upon an inquiry into this mystery. Justa sunt judicia eis, sed occulta—His judgments are just, but hidden. 1. They could not believe, that is, they would not; they were obstinately resolved in their infidelity; thus Chrysostom and Austin incline to understand it, and the former gives divers instances of scripture of the putting of an impiety to signify the invincible refusal of the will, as Gen. 37. 4. They could not speak peaceably to him. and ch. 7. 7. This is a moral impiety, like that of one that is accustomed to do evil, Jer. 13. 23. But, 2. They could not, because Esaias had said, He hath blinded their eyes. Here the difficulty increases; it is certain that Esaias had not foretold this. (1.) There is a righteous hand of God sometime to be acknowledged in the blindness and obstinacy of those who persist in impenitence and unbelief, by which they are justly punished for their former resistance of the divine light and rebellion against the divine law. If God withhold abused grace, and give men over to indulge lusts; if he permit the evil spirit to do his work upon them that resisted the gospel; if his providence be his students' blocks in sinners' way, which confirm their prejudices, then he blinds their eyes, and hardens their hearts, and these are spiritual judgments, like the giving up of idolatrous gentiles to vile affections, and deacreaters christians to strong delusions. Observe the method of conversion implied here, and the steps taken in. [1.] Sinners are brought to use with their eyes, to discern the reality of many things, and to have some knowledge of them. (2.) To understand with their hearts, to apply these things to themselves; not only to assent and approve, but to consent and accept. (3.) To be converted, and effectually turned from sin to Christ, from the world and the flesh to God, as their felicity and portion. (4.) Then God will heal them, will justify and sanctify them; will pardon their sins, which are as black as sin, and mortal, and pollute their souls, which are as white as snow, and would ruin them if God denies his grace, nothing of this is done; the alienation of the mind from, and its aversion to, God and the divine life, grows into a rooted and invincible antipathy, and so the case becomes desperate. (2.) Judicial blindness and hardness are in the word of God threatened against those who willfully persist in wickedness, and were particularly foretold concerning the Jewish church and nation. Known unto God are all his works, and all our ways, Christ knew before who would betray him, and spoke of it, ch. 6. 70. This is a confirmation of the truth of scripture-prophecies, and thus even the unbelief of the Jews may help to strengthen our faith. It is also intended for caution to particular persons, to becausc lest that come upon them, which are spoken of in Isa. 36. 15. (3.) What God has foretold will certainly come to pass, and so, by a necessary consequence, in order of argument, it might be said, that therefore they could not believe, because God by the prophets had foretold they would not; for such is the knowledge of God, that he cannot be deceived in what he foresaw, and such is his truth, that he cannot deceive in what he foretold, so that the scripture cannot be broken. Yet, be it observed, that the prophecy did not name particular persons; so that it might not be said, Therefore such a one and such a one could not believe, because Esaias had said so and so; but it pointed at the body of the Jewish nation, which would persist in their infidelity, till their cities were wasted without inhabitants, as it follows, Isa. 6. 11. 12. Yet still reserving a remnant, (v. 13.) in it shall be left, which reserves sufficient to keep a door of hope open to particular persons; for each one might say, Why may not I be of that remnant? (4.) Last, the evangelist, having quoted the prophecy, shows (v. 41.) that it was intended to look farther than the prophet's own days, and that its principal reference was to the days of the Messiah; These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and of his kingdom. 1. We read in the prophecy, that this was said to Esaias, Isa. 6. 2. But here we are told that it was said by him to the purpose. For nothing was said by him as a prophet, which was not first said to him; nor any thing said to him, which was not afterward said by him to those to whom he was sent. See Isa. 21. 10. 2. The vision which the prophet there had of the glory of God, is here said to be his seeing the glory of Jesus Christ; he saw his glory. Jesus Christ therefore is equal in power and glory with the Father, and his praises are equally celebrated. Christ had a glory before the foundation of the world, and Esaias saw this. 3. It is said that the prophet there spoke of him. It seems to have been spoken of the prophet himself; (for the rest of the expression is the phrase were there given,) and yet it is here said to be spoken of Christ, for as all the prophets testified of him, so they testified him. This they spoke of him, that as to many his coming would be not only fruitless, but fatal, a savor of death unto death. It might be objected against his doctrine, If it was from heaven, why did not the Jews believe it? But this is an answer to it; It was not for want of evidence, but because their heart was made fat, and their ears heavy. It was spoken of Christ, that he should be glorified in the ruin of an unbelieving multitude, as well as in the salvation of a distinguished remnant.

42. Nevertheless among the chief rulers also many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue.

43. For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God.

Some honour was done to Christ by these rulers, for they believed on him, were convinced that he was sent of God, and received his doctrine as divine; but they did not do him honour enough, for they had not courage to own their faith in him. Many professors more kindness for Christ than really they had, these had more kindness for him than they were willing to profess.

See here what a struggle was in these rulers between their convictions and their corruptions.

1. See the power of the word in the convictions that many of them were under, who did not wilfully shut their eyes against the light. They believed on him as Nicodemus, received him as a teacher come from God. Note, the truth of the gospel has perhaps been often neglected to consider. But now we are aware of. Many cannot but approve of that in their hearts, which yet outwardly they are shy of. Perhaps these chief rulers were true believers, though very weak, and their faith like smoking flax. Note, It may be, there are more good people than we think there are. Elijah thought he was left alone, when God had seven thousand faithful worshippers in Israel. Some are really better than they seem to be. Their faults are known, but their repentance is not; a man's goodness may be concealed by a culpable yet pardonable weakness, which he himself truly repents of. The kingdom of God comes not in all with a like observation; nor have all they that are good the faculty of shewing it as some have.

2. See the power of the word in the smothering of these convictions. They believe in Christ, but because of the Pharisees, who had it in their power to do them a kindness, they durst not confess him, for fear of being excommunicated. Observe here, 1. Wherein they failed and were defective; they did not confess Christ. Note, There is cause to question the sincerity of that faith which is either afraid or ashamed to shew itself; for those who believe with the heart, ought to confess with the mouth, Rom. 10. 9.

2. What they feared; being put out of the synagogue, which they thought would be a disgrace and damage to them; as if it would do them any harm to be expelled a synagogue, that had made itself a synagogue of Satan, and from which God was departing.

That was at the bottom of this fear; they loved the praise of men, chose it as a more valuable good, and pursued it as a more desirable end, than the praise of God; which was an implicit idolatry, like that (Rom. 1. 23.) of worshiping and serving the creature more than the Creator. They set these two in the scale one against the other, and, having weighed them, they proceeded accordingly; (1.) They set the praise of men in one scale, and conscience in the other, to give praise to men, and to pay a deference to the opinions of the Pharisees, and receive praise from men, to be commended by the chief priests, and applauded by the people, as good sons of the church, the Jewish church. And they would not confess Christ, lest they should thereby derogate from the reputation of the Pharisees, and forfeit their own, and thus hinder their own preferment. And besides, the followers of Christ were put into an ill-name, and were looked upon with contempt, which they who had been used to honour could not bear. Yet perhaps if they had been convinced of another's mind, they 25. had have had more courage; but each one thought that if he should declare himself in favour of Christ, he should stand alone, and have nobody to back him; whereas if any one had had resolution to break the ice, he would have had more seconds than he thought of. (2.) They put the praise of God in the other scale; they were sensible that by confessing Christ they should both give praise to God, and have praise from God, he would be pleased with them, and say, Well done; but, (3.) They gave the preference to the praise of men, and that turned the scale; sense prevailed above faith, and represented it more desirable to stand right in the opinion of the Pharisees, than to be accepted of God. Note, Love of the praise of men is a very great prejudice to the power and practice of religion and godliness. Many come short of the glory of God, by having a regard to the applause of men, and a value for that. Love of the praise of men, as a by-end in that which is good, will make a man a hypocrite when religion is in fashion, and credit is to be got by it; and love of the praise of men, as a base principle in that which is evil, will make a man an apostate, when religion is in disgrace, and credit is to be lost for it, as here. See Rom. 2. 29.

44. Jesus cried and said, He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me. 45. And he that seeth me seeth him that sent me. 46. I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness.

47. And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.

48. He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. 49. For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak.

50. And I know that his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.

We have here the honour Christ not assumed, but asserted, to himself, in the account he gave of his mission and his errand into the world. Probably, this discourse was not at the same time with that before, for then the departure, ch. 11. 26. is mentioned after, when he made another public appearance; and as this evangelist records it, it was Christ's farewell sermon to the Jews, and his last public discourse; all that follows, was private with his disciples. Now observe how our Lord Jesus delivered this parting word; he cried and said. Both not wisdom cry, (Prov. 8. 1.) cry without? Prov. 1. 20. The raising of his voice, and the vehemency of his language, his boldness in speaking, though they had not courage openly to profess faith in his doctrine, he had courage openly to publish it; if they were ashamed of it, he was not, but set his face as a flint, Isa. 50. 7. 2. His earnestness in speaking; he cried as one that was serious and importunate, and in good earnest in what he said, and was willing to impart to them, not only the gospel of God, but even his own soul.

3. It denotes his desire that all might take notice of it. This being the last time of the publication of his gospel by himself in his person, he makes proclamation, "Whoever will hear me, let them come now." Not only for the purpose of making inquiry whether there be any that might profit by it, but to give a closing summary of all Christ's discourses?

It is much like that of Moses, (Deut. 30. 13.) See, I have set before you life and death. So Christ here takes leave of the temple, with a solemn declaration of three things.

1. The privileges and dignities which they have, that believe; this gives great encouragement to us to make use of the gospel, and to go on in the dispensation of light which he was under; they who have sinned without law, shall be judged without law. But those that have heard, or might have heard, and would not, lie open to this doom.

2. What is the constructive malignity of their unbelief; not receiving Christ's word, it is interpreted, (v. 48.) a rejecting of Christ, 3.54. 66. It denotes a rejection with scorn and contempt. Where the banner of the gospel is displayed, no neutrality is admitted; every man is either a subject or an enemy.

3. The wonderful patience and forbearance of our Lord Jesus, exercised towards those who slighted him when he was come here upon earth; I judge him not, at new. Note, Christ was not quick or hasty to take advantage against these who refused not to reject him, but first offers of his grace, but continued waiting to be gracious. He did not strike those devilish skulls, who contradicted him, never made intercession against Israel, as Elias did; though he had authority to judge, he suspended the execution of it, because he had work of another nature to do first, and that was to save the world. (1.) To save effectually those that were given him, before he came to judge the degenerate body of mankind. (2.) To obtain salvation to all the world, and thus to save them, that it is their own fault if they be not saved.

He was put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Now the executing of the power of a judge was not congruous with that undertaking, Acts 8. 35. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away, it was suspended for a time.

4. The certain and unavoidable judgment of unbelievers at last, the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God; unbelief will certainly be a damning sin. Some think when Christ saith, I judge no man, he means that they are condemned already; there needs no process, they are self-judged, no execution, they are self-ruined; judgment goes against them of course, Heb. 2. 3. Christ needs not appear against them as their accuser, they are miserable if he do not appear for them as their advocate; however, he tells them plainly, when and where they will be reckoned with.

(1.) There is one that judgeth them. Nothing is more dreadful than abused patience, and grace trampled on; though for a while mercy wrought against judgment, yet there will be judgment without mercy.

(2.) Their final judgment is reserved to the last day; to that day judgment Christ here binds over all unbelievers, to answer then for all the contempt they have put upon him. Divine justice has appointed a day, and adjourns the sentence to that day, as Matt. 26. 64.

(3.) The word of Christ will judge them then: The words that I have spoken, how light se?ver you have made of them, the same shall judge the unbelievers of Christ's word, are said to judge. Luke 22. 30. Christ's words will judge unbelievers two ways. (1.) As the evidence of their crime, they will confirm them. Every word Christ spoke, every sermon, now every argument, every kind offer, will be produced as a testimony against those who slighted all he said. 2. As the rule of their doom, they will condemn them; they shall be judged according to the tenor of that covenant which Christ procured and published. That word of Christ, He that believeth not, shall be damned, will judge all unbelievers to eternal ruin; and there are many such words which are deciding. 11. [1.] The delegation of the authority Christ had to demand our faith, and require us to receive his doctrine upon pain of damnation, v. 49, 50. Where observe, 1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received from the Father to deliver his doctrine to the world; (v. 49.) I have not spoken of myself, as a mere man, not as a common man; but the Father gave me a commandment what I should say. This is the same with what he said ch. 7. 16. My doctrine is, (1.) Not mine, for I have not spoken of myself. Christ, as Son of man, did not speak that which was of human contrivance or composition; as Son of God, he did not act separately, or by himself alone, but what he said was the result of the counsels of peace; as Mediator, his coming into the world was voluntary, and with his full consent, but not arbitrary, and of his own head. But, (2.) It was his that sent him. God the Father gave him, [1.] His commission. God sent him as his agent and plenipotentiary to concert matters between him and man, to set a treaty of peace on foot, and to settle the articles. [2.] His instructions, here called a commandment. The second Adam, and he by his obedience saved us; God commanded him what he should say, and what he should speak, two words signifying the same thing, to denote that every word was divine. The Old Testament prophets sometimes spoke of themselves; but Christ spoke by the Spirit at all times. Some make this distinction: He was directed what he should say in his set sermons, and what he was to say in his family conversations. Others this: He was directed what he should say in his preaching now, and what he should speak in his judging at the last day; for he had commission and instructions for both. 2. The scope, design, and tendency, of that commission, v. 50. I know that his commandment is life everlasting. The commission given to Christ had a reference to the everlasting state of the children of men, and was in order to their everlasting life and happiness in that state: the instructions given to Christ as a prophet, were to reveal eternal life; (1 John 5. 11.) the power given to Christ as a King, was to give eternal life, ch. 17. 2. Thus the command given him was life everlasting. This Christ he knew, I know it is so; which intimates how cheerfully, and with what satisfaction Christ pursued his undertaking, knowing very well that he went upon a good errand, and that which would bring forth fruit unto life eternal. It intimates likewise how justly they will perish, who reject Christ and his word. Those who disobey Christ, despise everlasting life, and renounce it; so that not only Christ’s words will judge them, but even their own; so shall their doings be, themselves have decided it; and who can except against it? 5. Christ’s exact observance of the commission and instructions given him, and his steady acting in pursuance of them. Whatevery I speak, it is as the Father said unto me. Christ was intimately acquainted with the counsels of God, and was faithful in discovering so much of them to the children of men, as it was agreed should be discovered, and kept back nothing that was profitable. As the faithful witness delivers souls, so did he, and spoke the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Note, (1.) This is a great encouragement to faith; the sayings of Christ, rightly understood, are what we may venture our souls upon. (2.) It is a great example of obedience. Christ said as he was bidden, and so must we; communicated what the Father had said to him, and so must we. See Acts 4. 20. In the midst of all the respects paid him, this is the honour he values himself upon, that what the Father had said to him, that he spoke, and in the manner of the Father’s commission. The Father, he said, gave his glory, that, as a Son, he was faithful to him that appointed him; and, by an unfeigned belief of every word of Christ, and an entire subjection of soul to it, we must give him the glory due to his name.

CHAP. XIII.

Our Saviour, having finished his public discourses, in which he endured the contradiction of sinners, now applies himself to a private conversation with his friends, in which he designed the consolation of saints. Henceforward we have an account of what passed between him and his disciples, who were to be entrusted with the affairs of his household, when he was gone into a far country; the necessary instructions and comforts he furnished them with. His hour being at hand, he applies himself to set his house in order. In this chapter, I. He washes his disciples’ feet, v. 1. II. He foretells who should betray him, v. 18. 30. III. He instructs them in the great doctrine of his own death, and the great duty of brotherly love, v. 31. 35. IV. He foretells Peter’s denying of him, v. 63. 65.

1. NOW before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end. 2. And supper being ended, the devil having now put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon’s son, to betray him; 3. Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God, and went to God; 4. He riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments; and took a towel, and girded himself. 5. After that he poureth water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples’ feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded. 6. Then cometh he to Simon Peter: and Peter said unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? 7. Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter. 8. Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash my feet. Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. 9. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. 10. Jesus saith to him, He that is washed, needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all. 11. For he knew who should betray him; therefore said he, Ye are not all clean. '12. So after ne had washed their feet, and had taken his garments; and was set down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I have done to you? 13. Ye call me Master and Lord; and ye say well: for so am I. 14. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet; ye also ought to wash one another's feet. 15. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you. 16. Verily, verily, I say unto you, The servant is not greater than his Lord; neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him. 17. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.

It has generally been taken for granted, that Christ's washing his disciples' feet, and the discourse that followed it, were the same night in which he was betrayed, and at the same sitting wherein he ate his last passover, referred to in his Lord's supper. But whether before the solemnity began, or after it was all over, or between the eating of the passover, and the institution of the Lord's supper, they are not agreed. This evangelist, making it his business to gather up these passages which the others had omitted, industriously omits these which the others had recorded; which occasions some difficulty in putting them together. And if it were not for the testimony of the Judas went out, (r. 50.) to get his men ready that were to apprehend the Lord Jesus in the garden, But Dr. Lightfoot is clearly of opinion, that this was done and said, even all that is recorded to the end of ch. 14. not at the passover-supper, for it is here said (v. 1.) to be before the feast of the passover; but at the supper in Bethany, two days before the passover, (et which we call Matt. 26. 2, 6.) at which Mary the second time anointed Christ's head with the remainder of her box of ointment. Or, it might be at some other supper the night before the passover, not as that was in the house of Simon the leper, but in his own lodgings, where he had none but his disciples about him, and could be more free with them.

In these verses we have the story of Christ's washing his disciples' feet; it was an action of a singular nature, no miracle, unless we call it a miracle of humility. Mary had just anointed his head; now, lest his acceptance of that should look like taking state, he presently balances it with this act of abasement. But why would Christ do this? If the disciples' feet needed washing, they could do it themselves, a wise man will not do a thing that looks odd and unusual, but for very good causes and considerations. We are sure that it was not in a humour or a frolic that this was done; no, the transaction was very solemn, and carried on with a deal of seriousness; and four reasons are here intimated why Christ did this.

1. That he might testify his love to his disciples, v. 1. 2. That he might give in instance of his own voluntary humility and condescension, v. 3. 3. That he might signify to them spiritual washings, as it were, without, but inward, in comparison with Peter, v. 6. 4. That he might set them an example, v. 12—17. And the opening of these four reasons, will, in the exposition of the whole story.

1. Christ washed his disciples' feet, that he might give a proof of that great love wherewith he loved them; loved them to the end, v. 1, 2.

1. It is here laid down as a self-evident truth, that our Lord Jesus, having loved his own which were in the world, loved them to the end, v. 1.

(1.) This is true of the disciples that were his immediate followers, in particular the twelve. These were his own in the world, his family, his school, his bosom-friends. Children he had none to call his own; but he adopted them, and took them as his own. He had those that were his own in the other world, but he left them for a time, to look after his own in this world. These he loved, he called them to be his fellow-servants, and chose them for such; with him, with his father, with his servants, was always tender of them, and of their comfort and reputation. He allowed them to be very free with him, and bore with their infirmities. He loved them to the end, continued his love to them as long as he lived, and after his resurrection; he never took away his loving-kindness. Though there were some persons of quality that espoused his cause, he did not lay abased upon them, like some of his fisher-men. They were weak and defective in knowledge and grace, and forgotten; and yet, though he preserved them often, he never ceased to love them, and take care of them.

2. It is true of all believers, for these twelve patriarchs were the representatives of all the tribes of God's spiritual Israel, (Josh. 18. 10.) and to this day Jesus beholds a people as his own, whom he washes, for they were given him by the Father, he has purchased them, and paid dear for them; and he has set them apart for himself; his own, for they have devoted themselves to him as a peculiar people. His own: where his own were spoken of, that received him not, it is as the—his own things, as a man's cattle are his own, which yet he may, when he pleases, depart from, and take his own; and so do his—his own persons, as a man's wife and children are his own, to whom he stands in a constant relation. [2.] Christ has a cordial love for his own that are in the world. He did love them with a love of good-will, when he gave himself for their redemption. He does love them with a love of condescension, when he admits them into communion with himself. Though they are in this world, a world of darkness and distance, of sin and corruption, yet he loves them. He was now going to his own in heaven, the spirits of just men made perfect there; but he seems most concerned for his own on earth, because they most needed his care; the sickly child is most indulged. [3.] Those whom Christ loves he loves to the end; he is constant in his love to them, as it were, he rests not, he loves, and loves, and loves the everlasting love, (Deut. 10. 6.) from everlasting in the counsels of it, to everlasting in the consequences of it. Nothing can separate a believer from the love of Christ; he loves his own, in spite into perfection, for he will perfect what concerns them, will bring them to that world where love is perfect.

2. Christ manifested his love to them by washing their feet, as that good woman (Luke 7. 43.) showed her love to Christ by washing his feet, and anointing them. Thus he would show that as his love to them was constant, so it was condescending, that in profession of the designs of it he was willing to humble himself; and that the glory of his exalted state, which he was now entering upon, should be no obstruction at all to the favour he bore to his chosen; and thus he would confirm the promise he had made to all his friends, that his love to them should make them set down to eat, and could come forth, and serve them. (Luke 12. 17.) would put honour upon them, as great and surprising as for the Lord to serve his servants. The disciples had just now betrayed the weakness of their love to him, in grudging the ointment that was poured upon his head; (Matt. 26. 8.) yet he presently gives this proof of his love to them. There are two things to be set off against each other in the apostles, this is one: and set them off.

3. He chose this time to do it, a little before his last passover, for two reasons:
(1.) Because now he knew that his hour was come, which he had long expected, when he should depart from the earth to the Father. Observe here,
[1.] The change that was to pass over our Lord Jesus; he must depart. This began at his death, but was completed at his ascension. As Christ himself, so all believers, by virtue of their union with him, when they depart out of the world, are absent from the body, go to the Father, are present with the Lord. It is a departure out of the world, this unholy, faithless, treacherous world; this world of labour, toil, and temptation; this vale of tears; and it is going to the Father, to the vision of the Father of spirits, and the fruition of him as ours.

[2.] The time of this change; his hour was come. It is sometimes called his enemies’ hour, (Luke 22. 53.) the hour of their triumph; sometimes his hour, the hour of his triumph; at a time he had had in his eye all along. The time of his sufferings was fixed to an hour, and the continuance of them but for an hour.

[3.] His foresight of it; He knew that his hour was come; he knew from the beginning that it would come, and when, but now he knew that it was come. We now not when our hour will come, and there is no greater bar to habitual preparation for it ought never to be undone; but when we know by the harbingers that our hour is come, we must vigorously apply ourselves to an actual preparation, as our Master did, 2 Pet. 3. 14.

Now it was in the immediate foresight of his departure that he washed his disciples’ feet; that, as his own head was anointed just now against the day of his burial, so their feet might be washed against the day of their consecration by the descent of the Holy Ghost fifty days after, as the priests were washed, Lev. 8. 6. When we see our day approaching, we should do what we can to those we leave behind.

(2.) Because the devil had now put it into the heart of Judas to betray him, v. 2. These words in a paraphrase may be considered.

[1.] As tracing Judas’s treason to its original; it was a sin of such a nature, that it evidently bore the devil’s image and superscription. What way of access the devil has to men’s hearts, and by what methods he darts in his suggestions, and mingles them indiscriminate with those thoughts which are the natures of the heart, we cannot tell. But there are some sins in their own nature so exceedingly sinful, so little temptation from the world and the flesh, that it is plain, Satan laid the egg of them in a heart disposed to be the nest to hatch them in. For Judas to betray such a Master so cheaply, and upon no provocation, was such downright enmity to God, as could not be forged but by Satan himself, who thereby thought to ruin the Redeemer’s kingdom, but it proved the ruin of his own.

[2.] As intimating a reason why Christ now washed his disciples’ feet. First, Judas being now resolved to betray him, the time of his departure could not be far off; if this matter be determined, it is easy to infer with St. Paul, I am now ready to be offered. Note, The more malicious we perceive our enemies to be against us, the more industrious we should be in the work of grace that may come. Secondly, Judas being now got into the snare, and the devil aiming at Peter, and the rest of them, (Luke 22. 31.) Christ would fortify his own against him. If the wolf has seized one of the flock, it is time for the shepherd to look well to the rest. Antidotes must be stirring, when the infection is begun.

Dr. Lightfoot observes that the disciples had learned of Judas, Luke 22. 21, at the washing of Christ; compare ch. 12. 4, &c. with Matt. 26. 8. Now, lest they that had learned that of him, should learn worse, he fortifies them by a lesson of humility against his most dangerous assaults. Thirdly, Judas, who was now plotting to betray him, was one of the twelve. Now Christ would hereby shew that he did not design to cast them all off for the faults of one. Though one of their college had a devil, and was a traitor, yet they should fare never the worse for that. Christ loves his church, though there are harbingers in it, and had still a kindness for his disciples, though there was a Judas among them, and he knew it.

II. Christ washed his disciples’ feet, that he might give an instance of his own wonderful humility, and shew how lowly and condescending he was, and let all the world know how low he could stoop in love to his own. This is intimated, v. 3—5. Jesus knowing, and now actually considering, and perhaps discoursing of his honours as Mediator, and telling his friends that the Father had given all things into his hand, he went from supper, and, to the great surprise of the company, who wondered what he was going to do, washed his disciples’ feet.

1. Here is the rightful advancement of the Lord Jesus. Glorious things are here said of Christ as Mediator.

(1.) The Father had given all things into his hands; had given him a propriety in all, and a power over all, as Possessor of heaven and earth, in pursuance of the great designs of his undertaking; see Matt. 11. 27. The accommodation and arbitration of all matters in variance between God and man, were committed into his hands as the great umpire and referee; and the administration of the kingdom of God among men, in all the branches of it, was committed to him; so that all acts, both of government and judgment, were to pass through his hands; he is heir of all things.

(2.) He came from God; this implies that he was in the beginning with God, and had a being and glory, not only before he was born into this world, but before the world itself was born; and that when he came into the world, he came as God’s ambassador, with a commission from him. He came from God as the Son of God, and the sent of God. The Old Testament prophets were raised up and employed for God, but Christ came directly from him.

(3.) He went to God, to be glorified with him with the same glory which he had with God from eternity. That which comes from God, shall go to God; they that are born from heaven, are bound heavenward. He must not be accounted an Agent for him on earth, so he went to God to be an agent for us in heaven; and it is a comfort to us to think how welcome he was there; he was brought near to the Ascendent days, Dan. 7. 13. And it was said to him, Sit thou at my right hand, Ps. 110. 1

(4.) He knew all this; was not like a prince in the cradle, that knows nothing of the honour he is born for like a son of men, who was not born from God, to whom no, he had a full view of all the honours of his exalted state, and yet stooped thus low. But how does this come in here?

[1.] As an inducement to him now quickly to leave what lessons and legacies he had to leave to his disciples, because his hour was now come when he must take his leave of them, and be exalted above them for the fuller familiar converse which he had now with them, v. 1.

[2.] It may come in as that which supported him under his sufferings, and carried him cheerfully through this sharp encounter. Judas was now betraying him, and he knew it, and knew what would be the consequence of it, yet, knowing also that he came from God, and went to God, he did not draw back, but went on cheerfully.

[3.] It seems to come in as a foil to his condescen-you, to make it the more admirable. The reasons of divine grace are sometimes represented in scripture as strange and surprising; (as Isa. 37. 17, 18. Hos. 2. 13, 14.) so here that is given as an inducement to Christ to stoop, which should rather have been a reason for his taking state; for God's thoughts are not as ours, nor his ways as our ways; and God's grace is the most signal instances of condescending grace, with the displays of divine glory, as Ps. 68. 4, 5. Isa. 37. 13.—66. 1, 2.

2. Here is the voluntary abasement of our Lord Jesus notwithstanding this, Jesus knowing his own glory as God, and his own authority and power as Mediator, one would think it should follow, He rises and walks without inquiring for the consent of his disciples, calls for robes, bids them keep their distance, and do him homage; no, quite contrary, when he considered this, he gave the greatest instance of humility. Note, (1.) A well grounded assurance of heaven and happiness, instead of puffing a man with pride, will make and keep him very humble. (2.) Those that would be found conformable to Christ, and partakers of his Spirit, must study to keep their minds low in the dust of the greatest advances. Now which Christ humbled himself to was, to wash his disciples' feet.

[1.] The action itself was mean and servile, and that which servants of the lowest rank were employed in. Let these handmaid (saith Abigal) be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord; let me be in the midst of these (1 Sam. 25. 41.) if he had ordered his servants to wash the hands or feet, it had been great condescension; (Elisha poured water on the hands of Elijah, 2 Kings 3. 11.) but for Christ to stoop to such a piece of drudgery as this, we may well be amazed at it. Thus he would teach us to think nothing below us, wherein we may be serviceable to God's glory, and the good of our brethren.

[2.] The consideration was so much the greater, that he did this for his own disciples, who in themselves were of a low and desppicable condition, not curious about their bodies; their feet, it is likely, seldom washed, and therefore very dirty. In relation to him, they were his scholars, his servants, and such as should have washed his feet, whose dependence was upon him, and their expectations from him. Many, of great spirits otherwise, will do a much thing to curry favour with their superiors, they rise by stooping, and climb by crouching; but for Christ to do this to his disciples, could be no act of policy or complaisance, but pure humility.

[3.] He rose from supper to do it. Though we translate it, (v. 2.) supper being ended; it might be better read, there being a supper made, or he being at supper, for he sat down again, (v. 12.) and we find him dipping a sop, (v. 26.) so that he did it in the midst of his meal, and thereby taught us, First, Not to reckon it a disturbance, or any just cause of uneasiness, to be called from our meal to do God or our brother any real service, esteming the discharge of our duty more than our necessary food, ch. 4. 34. Christ would not leave his preaching, to oblige his nearest relations, (Mark 3. 33.) but would leave his supper, to shew his love to his disciples in Sernity. This is the common grace about our meat. It would be armed man; a squishyish stomach to wash dirty feet at supper-time; but Christ did it, not that we might learn to be rude and slovenly, (cleanliness and godliness will do well together,) but to teach us not to be curious, not to indulge; but mortify, the delicacy of the appetite, giving good manners their due place, and no more.

[4.] He put his right hand on the head of a servant, to bid him wipe his loins; here he takes his loose and upper garments, that he might apply himself to this service the more expeditely. We must address ourselves to duty as those are resolved not to take state, but to take hims; we must divest ourselves of every thing that would either feed our pride, or hang in our way, and hinder us in what we have to do; must gird up the loins of our minds, as those that in earnest buckle to business.

[5.] He did it with all the humble ceremony that could be, went through all the parts of the service distinctly, and passed by none of them; he did it as if he had been used thus to serve; did it himself, alone, and had none to minister to him in it. He girded himself with the towel, as servants throw a napkin on their arm, or put an apron before them; he poured water into the basin of the water-pots that stood by, (ch. 2. 6.) and then washed their feet; which is the form observed in very religious services, and was such a service that then think that he did not wash the feet of them all, but only four or five of them, that being thought sufficient to answer the end; but I see nothing to contravene this conjecture, for in other places where he did make a difference, it is taken notice of; and his washing the feet of them all without exception, teaches us a catholic and extensive charity to all Christ's disciples, even the least.

[6.] Nothing appears to the contrary, but that he washed the feet of Judas among the rest, for he was present, v. 26. It is the character of a Redeemer indeed, that she had washed the saints' feet, (1 Tim. 3. 10.) and there is some comfort in that; but the blessed Jesus here washed the feet of a sinner, the worst of sinners, the worst to him, who was at this time contriving to betray him.

Many interpreters make Christ wash his disciples' feet a representation of his whole undertaking. He knew that he was equal with God, and all things were his; and yet he rose from his table in glory, laid aside his robes of light, girded himself with our nature, took upon him the form of a servant, came not to be ministered to, but to minister, poured out his blood, poured out his soul unto death, and therefore prepared a laver to wash us from our sins, Rev. 1. 5.

III. Christ washed his disciples' feet, that he might signify to them spiritual washing, and the cleansing of the soul from the pollutions of sin. This is plainly intimated in his discourse with Peter upon it, v. (2.)—11. In which we may observe,

1. The surprise Peter was at; when he saw his Master go about to wash his service; (v. 6.) Then comes he to Simon Peter, with his towel and basin, and bid him put out his feet to be washed. Chrysostom conjectures that he washed the feet of Judas first, who readily admitted it, and was pleased to see his Master so disguise himself. It is most probable, when he went about this service, (which is all that is meant by his beginning to wash,) v. 5.) that he took Peter first; and the rest would not have suffered it, if they had not first heard it explained in what passed between Christ and Peter.

Whether Christ came first to Peter or no, when he did come to him, Peter started at the proposal; Lord, (saith he) dost thou wash my feet? Here is an emphasis to be laid upon the persons, thou and me; and the placing of the words is observable; so and See the first three. Tu mihi lave pedes? Qui est, tu? Quod est, mihi? Cogitationem non potuit quarn decente—Dost thou wash my feet? What is it, thou? What is it, for me? These things are rather to be contemplated than uttered. Aug. in loc. What, thou! our Lord and Master, whom we know and believe to be the Son of God, and Saviour and Ruler of the world, do this for me, a worthless worm of the earth, a sinful one? Or consider, in what way should these hands of thy servant be washed? Paul, in his epistles, one with a touch has cleansed lepers, given sight to the blind, and raised the dead? So Theophylact, and from him Dr. Taylor. Very willingly would Peter have taken the basin and towel, and washed his Master's feet, and been proud of the honour, Luke 17. 7. 8. This had been natural and regular. "For my Master to wash my feet, is such a solemnity as never was; such a paradoxe we cannot understand; let this be thy manner of men?" Note, Christ's condescensions, especially his condescensions to us, wherein we find ourselves taken notice of by his grace, are justly the matter of our admiration. ch. 14. 22. Who am I, Lord God? And what is my father's house? 2. The immediate satisfaction Christ gave to this question of surprise, which was at least sufficient to convince his disciples: (v. 7.) William: I do not knowest now, but shalt know hereafter. Here are two reasons why Peter must submit to what Christ was doing. (1.) Because he was at present in the dark concerning it, and ought not to oppose what he did not understand, but acquiesce in the will and wisdom of one who could give a good reason for all he said and did. Christ would teach Peter an implicit obedience: "What I do, thou knowest not, and therefore art no competent judge of it, but must believe it is well done, because I do it." Note, Consciousness to ourselves of the darkness we labour under, and our inability to judge of what God doeth, should make us sparing and modest in our censures of his proceedings. Heb. 4. 1. (2.) Because there was something considerable in it, which he should hereafter know the meaning of; "Thou shalt know hereafter what need I hast of being washed, when thou shalt be guilty of the heinous sin of denying me?" so some. "Thou shalt know, when, in the discharge of the office of an apostle, thou wilt be employed in washing off from those under thy charge the sins and defilements of their earthly affections," so Dr. Hammond. Note, [1.] Our Lord Jesus does many things which even his own disciples do not for the present know the meaning of, but they shall know afterward; what he did, when he became man for us; and what he did when he became a worm, and no man, for us; what he did when he lived our life, and what he did when he laid it down, could not be understood till afterward, and then it appeared that it behoved him, Heb. 2. 17. Subsequent providences explain preceding ones; and we see afterward what was the kind tendency of events that seemed most cross; and the way which we thought was about, proved the right way. [2.] Christ's washing his disciples' feet, had a significance in it, which they themselves did not understand till afterward; until the Spirit was poured out upon them from on high, when Christ explained it to be a specimen of the laver of regeneration. We must let Christ take his own way, both in ordinances and providences, and we shall find in the issue it was the best way. 3. Peter's peremptory refusal, notwithstanding this, (v. 8.) Let Christ wash his feet; (v. 8.) Thou shalt by no means wash my feet. And so it is in the original. It is the language of a fixed resolution. Now, (1.) Here was a show of humility and modesty. Peter herein seemed to have, and no doubt he really had, a great respect for his Master, as he had, Luke 5. 8. Thus many are beguilcd of their reason in a vestigia humility, Col. 2. 18. 23. Such a self-denial as Christ's, is a mode of expression. Accept for, (2.) Under this show of humility there was a real contradiction to the will of the Lord Jesus; I will wash thy feet, saith Christ; "But thou never shalt," saith Peter; "it is not a fitting thing" to make himself viler than Christ. It is not humility, but inferiority, to put away the offers of the gospel; it is too rich to be made us, or too good news to be true. 4. Christ's insisting upon his offer, and a good reason given to Peter, why he should accept it; if I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. Which may be taken, (1.) As a severe caution against disobedience: "If I wash thee not, if thou continue in thy sin, and wilt not comply with thy Master's will in so small a matter, thou shalt not be owned as one of my disciples, but be justly discarded and cashiered for not observing orders." Thus several of the ancients understand it; if Peter will make himself wiser than his Master, and dispute the commands he ought to obey, he does in effect renounce his allegiance, and such as has, and is, not a subject. What portable is of the Son of David? And so shall his doom be, he shall have no part in him. Let him use no more manners than do him good, for to obey is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. 15. 22. Or, (2.) As a declaration of the necessity of spiritual washing; and so I think it is to be understood; "If I wash not thy soul from the pollution of sin, thou hast no part with me, no interest in me, no communion with me, no benefit by me." Note, All those, and those only, that are spiritually washed by Christ, have a part in Christ. [1.] To have a part in Christ, or with Christ, has all the happiness of a christian bound up in it, to be partakers of Christ, (Heb. 3. 14.) to share in those inestimable privileges which Christ is the object of the deep admiration of his disciples, and the highest estimation of him. It is that good part, the having of which was the one thing needful. [2.] It is necessary to our having a part in Christ, that he wash us. All those whom Christ owns and saves, he justifies and sanctifies, and both are included in his washing them. We cannot partake of his glory, if we partake not of his merit and righteousness, and of his Spirit and grace. 5. Peter's more than submission, his earnest request, to be washed by Christ, v. 9. If this be the meaning of it, Lord, wash not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. How soon is Peter's mind changed! When the mistake of his understanding was rectified, the corrupt resolution of his will was soon altered. Let us therefore not be peremptory in any resolve, (but only in our resolve to follow Christ,) because we may soon see cause to retract it; but let us be cautious in taking up a purpose we will be tenacious of. Observe, (1.) How readily Peter is to recede from what he had said; "Lord, what a fool was I to speak such a harsh word!" Now that the washing of him appeared to be an act of Christ's authority and grace, he admits it; but disliked it, when it seemed only an act of submission. [1.] Good men, when they see their error, will not be loath to retract it. [2.] Sooner or later, Christ will bring all to be of his mind. (2.) How importunate he is for the purifying grace of the Lord Jesus, and the universal influence of it, even upon his hands and head. Note, A divorce from Christ, and an exclusion from having a part in him, is an almost formidable evil in the eyes less of all that are enlightened, for the fear of which they will be persuaded to anything. And for fear of this we should be earnest with God in prayer, that he will wash us; will justify and sanctify us. "Lord, that I may not be cut off from thee, make me fit for thee, by the washing of regeneration. Lord, wash, not my feet only from the gross pollutions that cleave to me, but also wash my hands, and I will be without blemish, and almost found fit for thine inheritance." Note, Those who truly desire to be sanctified, desire to be sanctified throughout, and to have the whole man, with all its parts and powers purified, 1 Thess. 5. 23. 6. Christ's further explication of this sign, as it represented spiritual washing. (1.) With reference to his disciples that were faithful to him; (v. 10.) He that is washed all over in the bath, (as was frequently practised in those countries,) when he returns to his house, needeth not to save to wash his feet, his hands and head having been washed, and he having only dirtied his feet in walking home. Peter had gone from one extreme to the other; at first he would not let Christ wash his feet; and now he overlooks what Christ had done for him in his baptism, and what was signified thereby, and carries out to have his hands and head washed; now Christ directs him into the meaning: he must have his feet washed, but not his hands and head.

[1.] See here what is the comfort and privilege of such as are in a justified state; they are washed by Christ, and are clean every where, they are graciously accepted of God, as if they were so; and must be so, for if they, instead of repentance, to be again put into a justified state, for then should they often be baptized. The evidence of a justified state may be clouded, and the comfort of it suspended, when yet the charter of it is not vacated or taken away. Though we have occasion to repeat daily, God's gifts and callings are without repentance. The heart may be swept and garnished, and yet still remain the devil's palace; but if it be washed, it belongs to Christ, and he will not lose it.

[2.] See what ought to be the daily care of those who through grace are in a justified state, and that is, to wash their feet; to cleanse themselves from the guilt they contract daily through infirmity and inconstancy, by the renewed exercise of repentance, with a believing application of the virtue of Christ's love as a nature. We wash our clothes to keep them fresh and watchfulness against every thing that is defiling, for we must cleanse our own, and cleanse our feet, by taking heed thereto, Ps. 119. 9. The priests, when they were consecrated, were washed with water; and though they did not need afterward to be so washed all over, yet, whenever they went in, to minister, they must wash their feet and hands at the laver, on pain of death, Exod. 30, 19. 20. The provision made for our cleansing should not make us presumptuous, but the more cautious: I have washed my feet, how shall I defile them? From yesterday's pardon, we should fetch an argument against this day's temptation.

(2.) With reflection upon Judas: and ye are clean, but not all, v. 10, 11. He pronounces his disciples clean, clean through the word he had spoken to them; v. 15. He washeth himself in his own blood, said. Ye are clean: but he excepts Judas: not all; they were all baptized, even Judas, yet not all clean; many have the sign, that have not the thing signified.

Note, [1.] Even among those who are called disciples of Christ, and profess relation to him, there are some who are not clean. Prov. 30. 12. [2.] The Lord knows them that are his, and them that are not. 2 Tim. 2. 19. The eye of Christ can separate between the precious and the vile, the clean and the unclean. [3.] When these that have called themselves disciples, afterward prove traitors, their apostasy, at last, is a certain evidence of their hypocrisy all along. [4.] Christ sees it necessary to let his disciples know that they are not all clean; that we may all be jealous over ourselves, (Is it I? Lord, not I, that am among the clean, yet not clean?) and that when hypocrisy are discovered, it may be no surprise or stumbling to us.

IV. Christ washed his disciples' feet, to set before us an example. This explication he gave of what he had done, when he had done it, v. 12—17. 1. Observe with what solemnity he gave an account of the meaning of what he had done, v. 12. After he had washed their feet, he said, Know ye what I have done? (1.) He adjourned the explication till he had finished the transaction. [1.] To try their submission and implicit obedience. What he did, they should not know till after, that they might learn to acquiesce in his will when they could not give a reason for it. [2.] Because it was proper to finish the riddle before he unrolled it. Thus, as to his whole undertaking, when his sufferings were finished, he had resumed the garments of his exalted state, and was ready to sit down again, then he opened the understandings of his disciples, and poured out his Spirit, Luke 24. 45, 46.

(2.) Before he explained it, he asked them if they could construe it: Know ye what I have done to you? He put this question to them, not only to make them sensible of their ignorance, and the need they had to be instructed, (as Zech. 7. 5, 15. Knoweth thou not,...) but that they might raise their desires and expectations of instruction; "I would have you know, and if you will give attention, I will tell you." Note, It is the will of Christ that sacramental signs should be explained, and that his people should be acquainted with the meaning of them; otherwise, though ever so significant, to them who know not the thing signified, they are inexplicable.

2. Observe what he grounds that which he had to say upon; (v. 13.) You call me Master and Lord, you give me these titles, in speaking of me, in speaking to me, and you say well, for so I am; you are in the relation of scholars to me, and I do the part of a master to you." Note, (1.) Jesus Christ is our Master and Lord; he is our Redeemer and Saviour by an order of nature; Acts 1. 7. (2.) Our Teacher and Instructor, in all necessary truths and rules, as a Prophet revealing to us the will of God. He is our Lord, wise—or Ruler and Owner, that has authority over us, and propriety in us. (3.) It becomes the disciples of Christ to call him Master and Lord, not in compliment, but in reality; not by constraint, but with delight. Devout Mr. Herbert, when he mentioned the name of Christ, used to add, my Master; and thus expresses himself concerning it in one of his poems:

How sweetly doth my Master sound, my Master!
As ambergris leaves a rich scent unto the taster.
So do these words a sweet content; an oriental fragrance, my Master.

(3.) Our calling Christ Master and Lord, is an obligation upon us to receive and observe the instructions he gives us. Christ would thus pre-engage their obedience to a command that was displeasing to flesh and blood. If Christ be our Master and Lord, be so by our own consent, and we have often called him so, we are bound in honour and honesty to be obedient of him.

3. Observe the lesson which Christ hereby taught; You also ought to wash one another's feet, v. 14. (1.) Some have understood this literally, and have thought these words amount to the institution of a standing ordinance in the church; that christians should, in a solemn religious manner, wash one another's feet, in token of their condescending love to one another. St. Ambrose took it so, and practised it in the church of Milan. St. Austin saith, that those christians who do it with their hands, yet (he hoped) did it with their hearts and humility; but he saith, It is much better to do it with the hands also, when there is occasion, as 1 Tim. 5. 10. What Christ has done, christians should not disdain to do. Calvin saith, that the p.o.p, in the annual observing of this ceremony on Thursday in the passion week, is rather Christ's age than his follower, for the duty enjoined, in conformity to Christ, was neutral; Wash one another's feet. And Jansens saith, It is done

Fragile et dissimulat—Fragilis, and unlike the pre-
(2.) But doubtless it is to be understood figuratively; it is an instructive sign, but not sacramental, as the eucharist. This was a parable to the eye; and three things our Master hereby designed to teach us.

[1.] A humble condescension; we must learn of our Master to be lowly in heart, (Matt. 11. 29.) and walk with all lowliness; we must think meanly of ourselves, and respectantly of others. He does not think meanly of his own office—his mission, and the office of his sufferings. We must not think meanly of our station, and of our circumstances. We must not think meanly of sin; we must say of that which seems mean, but has a tendency to the glory of God, and our brethren's good, as David, (2 Sam. 6. 22.) If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile. Christ had often taught his disciples humility, and they had forgotten the lesson; but now he teaches them in such a way as surely they could never forget.

[2.] A submission to be servicable. To wash one another's feet is to stoop to the meanest offices of love, for the real good and benefit one of another, as blessed Paul, who, though free from all, made himself servant of all; and the blessed Jesus, who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. We must not grudge to take care and pains, and to spend time, and to diminish ourselves for the good of others. We were not under any particular obligation to even to our inferiors, and such as are not in a capacity of making us any requital. Washing the feet was, after travel, contributes both to the decency of the person, and to his ease, so that to wash one another's feet, is to consult both the credit and the comfort one of another; to do what we can, both to advance our brethren's reputation and to make their minds easy. See Rom. 12. 1. 7.) The duty is mutual: we must both accept help from our brethren, and afford help to our brethren.

[3.] A serviceableness to the sanctification one of another; Ye ought to wash one another's feet, from the pollution of sin. Austin takes it in this sense, and many others. We cannot satisfy for one another's sins, that is peculiar to Christ, but we may help to purify one another from sin. We must not in the first place wash ourselves; this charity must begin at home, (Matt. 7. 5.) but it must not end there, we must sorrow for the failings and follies of our brethren, much more their gross pollutions, (1 Cor. 5. 2.) must wash our brethren's polluted feet in tears. We must faithfully reprove them, and do what we can to bring them to repentance, (Gal. 6. 1.) to wash, and to purify one another from sin, (1 Cor. 6. 9.) to wash and to diminish their lying in the mire; this is washing their feet.

4. Here is the ratifying and enforcing of this command from the example of what Christ had now done; If your Lord and Master have done it to you, you ought to do it to one another. He shews the cogency of this argument in two things.

(1.) I am your Master, and you are my disciples, and therefore you ought to learn of me (v. 13.) for in this, as in other things, I have given you an example, that you should do to others, as I have done to you. Observe,

[1.] What a good teacher Christ is. He teaches by example as well as doctrine, and for that end came into this world, and dwelt among us, that he might set us a copy of all these graces and duties with his holy religion; and it is a copy without one false stroke. Hereby he made his own laws more intelligible and honourable. Christ is a commander like Gideon, who said to his soldiers, Look on me, and do likewise; (Judg. 7. 17.) like Abimelech, who said, What ye have seen me do, make haste and do as I have done; (Judg. 9. 48.) and like Caesar, who called his soldiers, not milites—soldiers, but commadmentes—commanders, and whose usual word was, not ille, but et tu, not omnis, not Go, but Come.

[2.] What good scholars we must be; we must do as he hath done; for therefore he gave us a copy, that we should write after it, that we might be as he was in this world, (1 John 4. 17.) and walk as he walked, 1 John 2. 6. Christ's example herein is to be followed by ministers in particular, in whom the graces of humility and holy love should especially appear, and by the exercise thereof they strictly and loyally serve the interests of their Master, and the ends of their ministry. When Christ sent his apostles to carry on his great work, he told them they should not take state upon them, nor carry things with a high hand, but become all things to all men, 1 Cor. 9. 22. What I have done to your dirty feet, that do ye to the polluted souls of sinners; wash them. Some who suppose this to be done at the passover supper, think it intimates a rule in admitting communion to the Lord's supper, to see that they were first washed and anointed, and had a clean conversation, and a blameless conversation, and then take them in to compass God's altar. But all Christians likewise are here taught to condescend to each other in love, and to do it as Christ did it, unasked, unpaid; we must not be mercenary in the services of love, nor do them with reluctance.

(2.) I am your Master, and you are my disciples, and therefore you cannot think it before you to do that, how mean soever it may seem, which you have seen me do, for, (7. 16.) the servant is not greater than his Lord, neither he that is sent, though sent with all the pomp and power of an ambassador, greater than he that sent him. Christ had urged this (Matt. 10. 24, 25.) as a reason why they should not think it strange if they suffered as he did; here he urges the other reason, They were not better than their Master, and what was consistent with his dignity, was much more consistent with their's. If he were humble and condescending, it ill became them to be proud and assuming. Note, [1.] We must take good heed to ourselves, lest Christ's gracious condescensions to us, and advancements of us, through the corruption of nature, occasion us to think nothing below them; they were not better than their Master, and what was consistent with his dignity, was much more consistent with their's. We need to be put in mind of this, that we are not greater than our Lord. [2.] Whatever our Master was pleased to condescend to, in favour to us, we should much more condescend to, in conformity to him. Christ, by humbling himself, has dignified humility, and put an honour upon it, and obliged his followers to think nothing below them; but if they should disdain to do such or such a thing, As good as you have done it, and been never the worse thought of, true indeed it is, if our Master has done it. When we see our Master serving, we cannot but see how ill it becomes us to be domineering.

Lastly, Our Saviour closes this part of his discourse with an intimation of the necessity of their obedience to these instructions: If ye know these things, or, Seeing ye know them, hath ye ye if ye do them. Most people think, Happy are they that rise and rule. Washing one another's feet will never get estates and preferments; but Christ saith, for all that, Happy are they that stoop and obey. If ye know these things, that may be understood either as speaking doubtfully, whether they knew them or no; so strong was their conceit of a temporal kingdom, that it was a question whether they could enthrone the notion of a duty so contrary to that conceit; or, as taking it for granted, that they did know these things; since they had such excellent precepts given them, recommended by such an excellent pattern, it will be necessary to the completing of their happiness, that they practice accordingly. 13. This is applicable to the commands of Christ in general. Note, Though it is a great advantage to know our duty, yet we shall come short of happiness if we do not do our duty. Knowing is in order to doing; that knowledge therefore is vain and fruitless, which is not reduced to practice; nay, it will aggravate the sin and ruin, Luke 13. 47, 48. James 4. 17. It is knowing and doing that will demonstrate us Christ's kingdom, and wise builders. See Ps. 19. 17, 18.

1. It is to be applied especially to this command of humility and serviceableness. Nothing is better known, or more readily acknowledged, than this, that we should be humble; and therefore, though many will own themselves to be passionate and intemperate, few will own themselves to be proud, for it is as unen- viable a sin, and as hateful, as any other; and yet how little is to be seen of true humility, and that mutual subjection and condescension, which the law of Christ insists so much upon! Most know these things so well as to expect that others should do accordingly to them, yield to them, and serve them, but not so well as to do so themselves.

18. I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me. 19. Now I tell you before it come, that, when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am he, Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me: and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. 21. When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me. 22. Then the disciples looked one another, doubting of whom he spake. 23. Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved. 24. Simon Peter therefore beckoned to him, that he should ask who it should be of whom he spake. 25. He then lying on Jesus' breast saith unto him, Lord, who is it? 26. Jesus answered, He it is, to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon. 27. And after the sop Satan entered into him. Then said Jesus unto him, That thou dost, do quickly. 28. Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him. 29. For some of them thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus had said unto him, Buy those things that we have need of against the feast; or, that he should give something to the poor. 30. He then having received the sop went immediately out: and it was night.

We have here the discovery of Judas's plot to betray his Master. Christ knew it from the beginning; but now first he discovered it to his disciples, who did not expect Christ should be betrayed, though he had often told them so, much less did they suspect that one of them should do it. Now here,

1. Christ gives them a general intimation of it; (v. 8.) I speak not of you all, I cannot expect you will all do that which I have chosen, and whom I have passed by; but the scripture will be fulfilled, (Ps. 41. 9.) He that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me. He doth not yet speak out of the crime, or the criminals, but raiseth their expectations of a further discovery.

2. He intimates to them, that they were not all right. He knew, (v. 16.) Ye are charg'd, but not all. So here, to know whom I have chosen, was a mystery which they knew not of. Note, What is said of the excellencies of Christ's disciple cannot be said of all that are called so. The word of Christ is a distinguishing word, which separates between cattle and catttle, and will distinguish thousands into hell, who flattered themselves with hopes that they were going to heaven. I speak not of you all; you my disciples and followers. Note, There is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies; a Judas among the apostles; it will be so till we come to the blessed society into which shall enter nothing unclean or disguised.

3. That he himself knew who were right, and who were not; I know whom I have chosen, who the few are, that are chosen among the many that are called with the common call. Note, (1.) They that are chosen, Christ himself had the choosing of them; he nominated the persons he would take for. (2.) They that are chosen, are known to Christ, for he never forgets any, whom he has once in his thoughts of love, 2 Tim. 2. 19.

4. That in the treachery of him that proved false to him, the scripture was fulfilled, which takes off very much both the surprise and offence of the thing. Christ took one into his family, whom he foresaw to be a traitor, and did not by effectual grace prevent him from being made one: he is not David's Ahithophel, for by his influence the better part of the soul failed him. Let it not therefore be a stumbling-block to any; for though it do not at all lessen Judas's offence, it may lessen our offence at it. The scripture referred to, is David's complaint of the treachery of some of his enemies; the Jewish expositors generally understand it of Ahabthofel, and one of them; Grosius thinks it intimates that the death of Judas would be like that of Ahithophel. But because that Psalm speaks of David's Ahithophel, and his treacherous counsel of the time of Ahithophel's deserting him, it may better be understood of some other friend of his, that proved false to him. This our Saviour applies to Judas.

(1.) Judas, as an apostle, was admitted to the highest privilege; he did eat bread with Christ. He was familiar with him, and favoured by him, was one of his family, one of those with whom he was intimately conversant. David said of his treacherous friend, He did eat of my bread, but Christ, being poor, had no bread he could properly call his own, he saith, He did eat bread with me, such as he had by the kindness of his friends, that ministered to him, his disciples had their share of Judas among the rest. Wherever he went, Judas was welcome with him, did not dine among servants, but sat at table with him master, ate of the same dish, drank of the same cup, and in all respects fared as he fared. He ate miraculous bread with him, when the loaves were multiplied, ate the passerover with him. Note, All that eat bread with Christ, are not his disciples indeed. See 1 Cor. 10. 5-8.

(2.) Judas, as an apostate, was guilty of the basest treachery; he lifted up the heel against Christ. [1.] He forsook him, turned his back upon him, went out from the house of the Lord, and the congregation of Christ, and the Canaanitish maid, and theSamaritan, and the disciples, and the Gentile, and the Damascan and the Samaritan. [2.] He derided him, shook off the dust of his feet against him, in contempt of him and his gospel. Nay, [3.] He became an enemy to him; spurned at him, as wrestlers do at their adversaries, whom they would overthrow. Note, It is no new thing for those that were Christ's seeming friends, to prove his real enemies. They who pretended to magnify him, magnify themselves against him. They eat not only the bread of his charity, but the bread of his covenant, yet rebel against him, and thereby prove themselves guilty not only of the basest ingratitude, but the basest treachery and perfidiousness. Judas saith he told them beforehand of the treachery of Judas; (v. 19.) "Now I tell you before it come, before Judas has begun to put his wicked plot in execution, that when it is come to pass, you may, instead of stumbling at it, be confirmed in your belief, that I am he, that he should come." 1. Be his clear and certain foresight of things to come, which in this, as in other instances, he gave incontestable proof of, he proved himself to be the true God, before whom all things are naked and open. Christ foretold that Judas would betray him, when there was no ground to suspect such a thing, and so proved himself the eternal Word, which is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. The prophecies of the New Testament concerning the Sufferings of our Saviour, were all written, and thus it be- hoved Christ to suffer, and he suffered just as it was written, Luke 24. 25, 26. ch. 8. 28. 2. By this application of the types and prophecies of the Old Testament to himself, he proved himself to be the true Messiah, to whom all the prophets spake. Thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and he suffered just as it was written, 2 Thess. 2. 1 Tim. 4. and in the Apocalypse (being evidently accomplished, it is a proof that those writings were divinely inspired, and confirms our faith in the whole canon of scripture. 3. This application of the types and prophecies of the Old Testament to himself, he proved himself to be the true Messiah, to whom all the prophets spake. Thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and he suffered just as it was written, Luke 24. 25, 26. ch. 8. 28. 3. He gives a word of encouragement to his apostles, and all his ministers; who he employed in his service; (v. 20.) He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me. The purport of these words is the same with what we have in other scriptures, but it is not so made to make out their coherence here. 1. Christ had told his disciples that they must humble and accuse themselves. "Now," saith he, "though there may be those that will despise you for your condensation, yet will there be those that will do you honour, and shall be valued and esteemed by others." They who know themselves dignified by Christ's commission, may be content to be vilified in the world's opinion. 2. It is intended to silence the scandal of the world, because there was a traitor among the apostles, would be shew of receiving any of them; for if one of them was false to his Master, whom would any of them be true to? Ex uno disce omnes—They are all alike. No, as Christ will think never the worse of them for Judas's crime, so he will stand by them, and own them, and will raise up such as shall receive them. They that had received Judas, when he was a preacher, and perhaps were converted and edified by his preaching, were never the worse, nor should reflect upon it with any regret, though he afterward proved a traitor; for he was one whom Christ sent. We cannot know what men are, much less what they will be, but those who appear to be sent of Christ, we must receive, till the contrary appear. Though some, by cruel usage of the kings, have entertained robbers unaware, yet we must also till the contrary appear. For the priests, by some have entertained angels. The abuses put upon our charity, though ordered with ever so much discretion, will neither justify our uncharitableness, nor lose us the reward of our charity.

V. The disciples quickly take the alarm; they knew their Master would neither deceive them nor jest with them; and therefore looked one upon another, with a manifest concern, doubting of whom he spake. By looking one upon another they discovered the trouble they were then in this notice; given them; it struck such an horror upon them, that they knew not well which way to look, or what to say.
st. john, xiii.

They saw their Master troubled, and therefore they were troubled. This was at least what they were eloquent for; but he must be taught to rejoice with trembling, and as though we rejoiced not.

When David wept for his son's rebellion, all his followers wept with him; (2 Sam. 18. 33.) so Christ's disciples here. Note, That which grieves Christ, is, and should be, a grief to all that are his; particularly the scandalous miscarriages of those that are called by his name: Who is offended, and I am not offended?—2. Hereby they endeavoured to discover the traitor; they looked wistfully in one another's face, to see who blushed, or, by some disorder in the countenance, manifested guilt in the heart, upon this notice: but while those who were faithful, had their consciences so clear, that they could lift up their faces without spot; he that was false, had his conscience so scared, that he was not asking neither could he blush, and so no discovery could be made this way. Christ thus perplexed his disciples for a time, and put them into confusion, that he might humble them, and prove them, might exult them in a jealousy of themselves, and an indignation at the baseness of Judas. It is good for us sometimes to be put to a gaze, to be put to a pause.

The times were solicitous to get their Master to explain himself, and to tell them particularly whom he meant: for nothing but that can put them out of their present pain, for each of them thought he had as much reason to suspect himself as any of his brethren; now, 1. Of all the disciples, John was most fit to ask, because he was the favourite, and sat next his Master; (v. 24.) There was leaning on Jesus's bosom, one of his disciples; this appears that this was John, by comparing ch. 21. 20.

Observe, (1.) The particular kindness which Jesus had for him: he was known by this periphrasis, that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved. He loved them all, (r. 1.) but John was particularly dear to him. His name signifies gracious. Daniel, who was honoured with the revelations of the Old Testament, as John of the New, was a most greatly beloved, Dan. 9. 23. Note. Among the disciples of Christ, some are dearer to him than others.

(2.) His place and posture at this time; He was leaning on Jesus's bosom. Some say that it was the fashion in those countries to sit at meat in a leaning posture, so that the second lay in the bosom of the first, and so on; which does not seem probable to me, for such a posture as that they could neither eat nor drink conveniently; but whether that were so or no, John now leaned in his bosom, and it seems to be an extraordinary expression of endearment used at this time. Note. There are some of Christ's disciples whom he lays in his bosom, who have more free and intimate communion with him than others. The Father loved the Son, and laid him in his bosom, (ch. 1. 18.) and believers are in like manner one with Christ, John 17. 24. There was then whom Jesus loved and loved; and they shall have shortly in the bosom of Abraham. They who lay themselves at Christ's feet, he will lay them in his bosom.

(3.) Yet he conceals his name, because he himself was the penman of the story; he puts this instead of his name, to shew that he was pleased with it; it is his title of honour, that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved, as in David's and Solomon's court, there was one that was the King's friend; yet he does not put his name down, to shew that he was not proud of it, nor would seem to boast of it. Paul in a like case saith, I knew a man in Christ. Note. To shun his name was his不高贵, and yet he did not put his name down, to shew that he was not proud of it. He was not only a slave of the Son of God, but a slave of the Son of God, whom Jesus loved, and would not seem to boast of it.

2. Of all the disciples Peter was most forward to know; (v. 24.) Peter, sitting at some distance, beckoned to John, by some sign or other to ask. Peter was generally the leading man, most apt to put himself forth; and where men's natural tempers lead them to be thus bold in answering and distinguishing, if it be from vanity and wisdom, they make men very servicable. God gives his gifts variously; but that the forward men in the church may not think too well of themselves, nor the modest be discouraged, it must be noted that it was not Peter, but John, that was the beloved disciple. Peter was desirous to know, not only that he might be sure it was not he, but that, as knowing who was a traitor, he might not only save himself, but his master. Peter, and guard against him, and, if possible, forestall his design. It was a desirable thing, we would think, to know who in the church will deceive us; yet let this suffice—Christ knows, though we do not. The reason why Peter did not ask himself, was, because John had a much fairer opportunity, by the advantage of his seat at table, to whisper the question into the ear of Christ, and to receive a direct and private answer. It is good to improve our interest in those that are near to Christ, and to engage their prayers for us. Do we know any that have reason to think lie in Christ's bosom? Let us beg of them to speak a good word for us.

3. The question was asked accordingly; (r. 25.) He then, laying at the breast of Jesus, and having the convenience of whispering with him, said unto his Lord, Lord, who is he that shall betray thee?—(1.) A regard to his fellow-disciple, and to the motion he made. Though Peter had not the honour he had at this time, yet he did not therefore disdain to take the hint and intimation he gave him. Note, They who lie in Christ's bosom, may often learn from these who lie at his feet, something that will be profitable for them, and be reminded of that, which they did not themselves think of. John was willing to gratify Peter herein, having so fair an opportunity for it. As every one hath received the gift, so let him minister the same for a common good, Rom. 12. 6.

(2.) A reverence of his Master. Though he whispered that in Christ's ear, yet he called him Lord: the familiarity he was admitted to, did not at all lessen his respect for his Master. It becomes us to use a reverence in every expression, and to observe a decorum, even in our secret devotions, which no eye is a witness to, as well as in public assemblies. The more intimate communication gracious souls have with Christ, the more sensible they are of his worthiness, and their own unworthiness, as Gen. 18. 27.

4. Christ gave a speedy answer to this question, but whispered it in John's ear; for it appears (r. 29.) that he could not have given it in express words, because it is so to whom I shall give a sop, Jesus a morsel, a crust; when I have dipped it in the sauce. And when he had dipped the sop, John strictly observing his motions, he gave it to Judas; and Judas took it readily enough, not suspecting the design of it, but glad of savoury bit, to make up his mouth with it.

(1.) Christ notified the traitor by a sign. He did it, not that he might have a sign by name who he was. The adversary and enemy is that wicked Judas, he is the traitor, and none but he; but thus he would exercise the observation of John, and intimate what need his ministers have of a spirit of discerning; for the false brethren we are to stand upon our guard against, are not made known to us by words, but by signs; they are to be known to us by their fruits, by their spirits; it requires great diligence to discern who shall be trusty in spiritual things.

(2.) That sign was a sop, which Christ gave him, a proper sign, because it was the fulfilling of the scripture, (r. 18.) that the traitor should be one that eat bread with him, that was at this time a fellow-commener with him. It had likewise a significance in it, and teaches us, [1.] That Christ sometimes gives sops to traitors; worldly riches, nations, and pleasures, are soft, (if I may so speak) which providence sometimes gives into the hands of wicked men. Judas perhaps thought himself a favourite because he had the sop, like Benjamin at Joseph's table, a mess by himself; thus the prosperity of fools, like a stumping soft, helps to destroy them.

[2.] That we must not be outrageous against those whom we know to be very malicious against us. Christ carves to Judas as kindly as to any at the table, though he knew he was then plotting his death. If thine enemy hunger, feed him, that is to do as Christ does.

VII. Judas himself, instead of being convinced hereafter by the wickedness, was the more confirmed in it, and the warning given him was to him a savour of death unto death; for it follows,

1. The devil hereupon took possession of him; (v. 27.) After the soft, Satan entered into him; not to make him melancholy, or drive him distracted, which was the effect of his possessing some; not to hurry him into the fire, or into the water; happy had it been for him, if that had been the worst of it, or if with the swine he had been choked in the sea; but Satan entered into him, to possess him with a prevailing prejudice against Christ and his doctrine, and a contempt of him, as one whose life was of small value, to exult in him a covetous desire of the wages of unrighteousness, and a resolution to stick at nothing for the obtaining of them. But, How can a man sin against God? Here it is said, that now Satan entered into him. Judas was all along a devil, (ch. 6. 70.) a son of perdition, but now Satan gained a more full possession of him, had a more abundant entrance into him. His purpose to betray his Master was now ripened into a fixed resolution; now he returned with seven other spirits more wicked than himself, Luke 11. 26. Note, [1.] Betrayers of Christ have much of the devil in them. Christ speaks of the sin of Judas as greater than that of any of his persecutors.

2. How can Satan to enter into him after the soft? Perhaps he was presently aware that it was the discovery of him, and it made him desperate in his resolutions. Many are made worse by the gifts of Christ's bounty, and are confirmed in their impenitency by that which should have led them to repentance. The cause of fire heaped upon their heads, in burning them, had burned them.

3. Christ hereupon dismissed him, and delivered him up to his own heart's lusts: Then said Jesus unto him, That thou dost, do quickly. This is not to be understood as either advising him to his wickedness, or warranting him in it; but either, (1.) As abandoning him to the conduct and power of Satan. Christ knew that Satan was entered into him, and had possession of him and made him; and that he gives him up as hopeless. The various methods Christ had used for his conviction, were ineffectual; and therefore, "What thou dost thou wilt do quickly; if thou art resolved to ruin thyself, go on, and take what comes." Note, When the evil spirit is willingly admitted, the good spirit justly withdraws. Or, (2.) As challenging him to do his worst; "Thou art plain, art thou that hast been the object of Christ's tactics, and now welcome, the sooner the better. I do not fear thee, I am ready for thee." Note, Our Lord Jesus was very forward to suffer and die for us, and was impatient of delay in the perfecting of his undertaking. Christ speaks of Judas's betraying him as a thing he was now doing, though he was only purposing it. Those who are contriving and designing mischief, are, in God's account, doing mischief.

3. They that were at table, understood not what he meant, because they did not hear what he whispered to John; (v. 28, 29.) No man at table, either the disciples, or any other of the guests, except John, knew for what intent he spake this to him.

[2.] To love one another, that they could not learn to suspect one another; charity thinks no evil.

(2.) They therefore took it for granted that he said it to him as a trustee, or treasurer, of the household, giving him orders for the laying out of some money. Their surmises in this case discover to us for what uses and purposes our Lord Jesus commonly directed payments to be made out of that little stock he had; and so teach us how to honour the Lord with our substance. They concluded something was to be laid out, either,

[1.] In works of piety: Buy those things that we have need of against the feast. Though he borrowed a room to eat the passover in, yet he bought in provision for it. That is to reckon well bestowed, which is laid out upon those things we have need of for the enforcement of our doctrine, else wasting among us, and we have the less reason to grudge that expense now, because our gospel-worship is far from being so chargeable as the legal worship was.

[2.] Or in works of charity; that he should give something to the poor. By this it appears, First, That our Lord Jesus, though he lived upon alms himself, (Luke 8. 3. yet gave alms to the poor, a very little, out of his own; though he might very well be excused, not only because he was poor himself, but because he did so much good otherwise, curing so many grists; yet, to set us an example, he gave, for the relief of the poor, out of that which he had for the subsistence of his family; see Eph. 4. 28. Secondly, That the time of a religious feast was thought a proper time for works of charity. When he celebrated the passover, he ordered something for the poor. When we experience God's bounty to us, that should make us bountiful to the poor.

4. Judas hereupon sets himself vigorously to pursue his design against him; He went away. Notice is taken,

(1.) Of his speedy departure: he went out presently, and quitted the house. [1.] For fear of being more plainly discovered to the company, which, if he were, he expected they would all fall upon him, and be the death of him, or at least of his project. [2.] He went out as one weary of Christ's company, and that of his apostles. Christ needed not to expel him, he expelled himself. Note, Withdrawing from the communion of the faithful, is commonly the first overt act of a backslider, and the beginning of an apostasy. Christ did not, as some would have him, look to for those with whom he was to make his bargain, and to settle the agreement with them. Now that Satan had got into him, he hurried him on with precipitation, lest he should see his error, and repent of it.

(2.) Of the time of his departure: It was night.

[1.] Though it was night, an unseasonable time for business, yet Satan had used no difficulty of the coldness and darkness of the night. This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of Christ, that the devil's servants are so earnest and venturous in his service.

[2.] Because it was night, and that gave him advantage of privacy and concealment. He was not willing to be seen treating with the chief priests, and therefore chose the dark night as the fittest time for such works of darkness. They whose deeds are evil, love darkness rather than light! see Job 21. 13, &c.

31. Therefore, when he was gone out, Jesus said, Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him. 32. If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him. 33. Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me; and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say to you. 34. A new commandment I give unto you. That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. 35. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.

This and what follows, to the end of ch. 14. was Christ's table-talk with his disciples. When supper was done, Judas went out: but what did the Master and his disciples do, whom he left sitting at table? They applied themselves to profitable discourse, to teach us, as much as we can, to make conversation with our friends at table serviceable to religion. Christ begins this discourse; the more forward we are humble to promote that communication which is good, and to the use of edifying, the more like we are to Jesus Christ. Those especially that by their place, reputation, and gifts, command the company, to whom men give ear, ought to use the interest they have in other respects, as an opportunity of doing them good.

Now our Lord Jesus discourses with them, (and, probably, discourses much more largely than is here recorded.)

1. Concerning the great mystery of his own death and sufferings, which they were as yet so much in the dark about, that they could not persuade themselves to expect the thing itself, much less did they understand the meaning of it; and therefore Christ gives them such instructions concerning it, as made the offence of the cross to cease. Christ did not begin this discourse till Judas was gone out, for he was a false brother. The presence of wicked people is often a hinderance to good discourse. When Judas was gone out, Christ said, Now is the Son of man glorified: now that Judas is discovered and discarded, who was a spot in their love-feast, and a scandal to their family, now is the Son of man glorified.

Note, Christ is glorified by the purifying of christian societies: corruptions in his church are a reproach to him; the purging out of those corruptions rolls away the reproach. Or, rather, now Judas was gone to set the wheels going, in order to his being put to death, and the thing was likely to be effected shortly; Now is the Son of man glorified, meaning, Now he is crucified.

1. Here is something which Christ instructs them in concerning his sufferings, that was very comforting. Three things.

(1.) That he should himself be glorified in them. Note, The Son of man is to be exalted to the greatest honour and disgrace, to be despitably used to the last degree, and dishonoured both by the cowardice of his friends, and the insolence of his enemies; yet now he is glorified:

For, [1.] Now he is to obtain a glorious victory over Satan and all the powers of darkness, to spoil them, and triumph over them. He is now getting on the harness, to take the field against those adversities of God and man, with as great an assurance as he had put it off.

[2.] Now he is to work out a glorious deliverance for his people; by his death, to reconcile them to God, and bring in an everlasting righteousness and happiness for them; to seal that blood which is to be an inexhaustible fountain of joys and blessings to all believers.

[3.] Now he is to give a glorious example of self-denial and patience under the cross, courage and contempt of the world, zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men, such as will make him to be for ever admired and had in honour. Christ was glorified in many miracles he had wrought, to set hisapkfor others; and his sufferings, as it were, were more than all his other glories in his humbled state.

(2.) That God the Father should be glorified in them. The sufferings of Christ were, [1.] The satisfaction of God's justice, and so God was glorified in them. Reparation was thereby made with great advantage for the wrong done him in his honour by the sin of man. The ends of the law were abundantly answered, and the glory of his government officially asserted and maintained. [2.] They were the manifestation of his holiness and mercy. The attributes of God shine bright in creation and providence, but much more in the work of redemption; see 1 Cor. 1. 21. 2 Cor. 4. 6. God is Love, and herein he hath commended his love.

(3.) That he should himself be greatly glorified after them, in consideration of God's being greatly glorified by them, v. 52. Observe how he enlarges upon it:

[1.] He is sure that God will glorify him; and those whom God glorifies, are glorious indeed. Hell and earth set themselves to revile Christ, but God resolved to glorify him, and he did it. He glorified him in his sufferings by the amazing signs and wonders, both in heaven and earth, which attended him, and extorted even from his crucifiers an acknowledgment that he was the Son of God. But especially after his sufferings he glorified him, when he set him at his own right hand, give him a name above every name.

[2.] That he will glorify him in himself—in tract. Father, First, In Christ himself. He will glorify him in his own person, and not only in his kingdom among men. This supposes his speedy resurrection. A common person may be honoured after his death, and a monarch after his exaltation, but Christ is honoured in himself. Or, Secondly, In God himself. God will glorify him with himself, as it is explained, ch. 17. 5. He shall sit down with the Father upon his throne, Rev. 3. 21. This is true glory.

[3.] That he will glorify him straightway. He looked upon the joy and glory set before him, not only as great, but as near; and his sorrows and sufferings short and soon over. God serves no bungler; in a little time, (not much but forty hours or not so much) from his death to his resurrection, and forty days from thence to his ascension, so that it might well be said that he was straightway glorified, Ps. 16. 10.

[4.] All this, in consideration of God's being glorified in and by his sufferings; seeing God is glorified in him, and receives honour from him. God shall make the Son of man to glorify him, and give honour to him. Note, First, In the exaltation of Christ there was a regard had to his humiliation, and a reward given for it. Because he humbled himself, therefore God highly exalted him. If the Father be so great a gainer in his glory by the death of Christ, we may be sure that the Son shall be no loser in his. See the covenant between them, Isa. 53. 12. Secondly, Those who mind the business of
2. Here is something that Christ instructs them in, concerning his sufferings, which was awakening, for as yet they were slow of heart to understand it; (v. 53.) Little children, yet a little while I am with you, &c. Whether they understand the things Christ here suggests, to quicken his disciples to improve their present opportunities. Two serious words.

(1.) That his stay in this world, to be with them here, they would find to be very short. Little children. This compellation does not speak so much their weakness as his tenderness and compassion; he speaks to them with the affection of a father, now that they are about to part with him: Know this then, that yet a little while I am with you. Whether we understand it of the time previous to his death, or the time between his death and ascension, it comes much to one; he had but little time to spend with them, and therefore,

(1.) Let them improve the advantage they now had. If they had any good question to ask, if they would understand anything of instruction of comfort, let them speak quickly; for yet a little while I am with you. We must make the best of the helps we have for our souls while we have them, because we shall not have them long; they will be taken from us, or we from them.

(2.) Let them not dote upon his bodily presence, as if their happiness and comfort were bound up in that; no, they must think of living without it; nor be yet filled with the same considerations that are proper for the convincing and awakening of sinners. Christ tells them here, (1.) That when he was gone they would find a miss of him; Ye shall seek me, that is, ye shall wish ye had me again with you. We are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them. Though the presence of the Comforter yielded them real and effectual relief in trials and difficulties, yet it was not such a sensible satisfaction as his bodily presence would have been to those who had been used to that. But observe, Christ said to the Jews, Ye shall seek me and not find me; but to the disciples he only saith, Ye shall seek me, intimating, that though they should not find his bodily presence any more than the Jews, yet they should find that which was tantamount, and should not seek in vain. When they sought his body, though they did not find it, yet they sought to good purpose. (2.) That when he went they could not come, which suggests to them high thoughts of him who was going to an invisible inaccessible world, to dwell in that light which none can approach unto; and also low thoughts of themselves, and serious thoughts of their future state. Christ tells them that they could not find him, (John shu told the people that they could not serve the Lord, only to quicken them to so much the more diligence and care. They could not follow him to his cross, for they had not courage and resolution; it appeared that they could not, when they all forsook him and fled. Nor could they follow him to his crown, for they had not a sufficiency of their own, nor were their work and warfare ever finished.

II. He discourses with them concerning the great duty of brotherly love; (v. 34, 35.) Ye shall love one another. Judas was now gone out, and had proved himself a false brother; but they must not therefore harbour such jealousies and suspicions one of another, as would be the bane of love: though there was one Judas among them, yet they were not all Judases. Now that the enmity of the Jews against Christ and his followers was swelling to the height, and they must expect such treatment as their Master had, and to be beloved one by another, to strengthen one another's hands.

Three arguments for mutual love are here urged.

1. The command of their Master; (v. 34.) A new commandment I give unto you. He not only commands it as amiable and pleasant, not only counsels it as excellent and profitable, but commands it, and makes it one of the fundamental laws of his kingdom. He commands it of himself: believing in Christ, 1 John 3. 22. 1 Pet. 2. 25 it is the command of our Ruler, who has right to give law to us; it is the command of our Redeemer, who gives us this law in order to the curing of our spiritual diseases, and the preparing of us for our eternal bliss. It is a new commandment; that is, (1.) It is a renewed commandment; it was a commandment from the beginning, (1 John 2. 7.) as old as law-giving; but it is a new commandment of the law of Moses; yet, because it is also one of the great commandments of the New Testament of Christ, the new lawyer, it is called a new commandment; it is like an old book in a new edition corrected and enlarged. This commandment had been so corrupted by the traditions of the Jewish church, that, when Christ revived it, and set it in true light, it might well be called a new commandment. Law-givers, who were so much in vogue, and self-love had so much the ascendant, that the law of brotherly love was forgotten as obsolete, and out of date; so that as it came from Christ new, it was new to the people. (2.) It is an excellent command; as a new song is an excellent song, that has an uncommon gratefulness in it. (3.) It is an everlasting command; so strangely new as to be always so; as the new covenant which shall never decay: (Heb. 8. 13.) it shall be new to eternity when faith and hope are antici- pated. (4.) As Christ gives it, it is new. Before it was, Thou shalt love thy neighbour; now it is, Ye shall love one another; it is pressed in a more winning way, when it is thus pressed as mutual duty owing to one another.

The example of their Saviour is another argument for brotherly love; as I have loved you. This is it that makes it a new commandment—that this rule and reason of love, (as I have loved you,) is perfectly new, and such as had been hid from ages and generations. Understand this, (1.) Of all the instances of Christ's love to his disciples, which they had already experienced during the time he went in and out among them. He spake kindly to them, concerned himself heartily for them, and for their welfare: instructed, comforted and corrected them; prayed with them, and for them; vindicated them when they were accused, took their part when they were run down, and publicly owned them to be dearer to him than his mother, or sister, or brother. He reproved them for what was amiss, and yet compassionately bore with their failings, excused them, made the best of them, and passed by many of their faults, and not a few of these, and just now washed their feet; and thus they must love one another, and love to the end. Or, (2.) It may be understood of the special instance of love to all his disciples, which he was now about to give, in laying down his life for them, Greater love hath no man than this, ch. 13. 13. Has he thus loved us all? Justly may he expect that we should be loving to one another. Not that we are capable of doing any thing of the same nature for each other, (Ps. 49. 7.) but we must love one another in some respects after the same manner; we must set this before us as our copy, and take directions from it. Our love to one another must be free and ready, laborious and expensive, constant and persevering; it must be love to the souls one of another. We must also love one another from this motive, and upon this consideration—begetter Christ had loved us. See Rom. 13. 1—

s. Eph. 5. 2. 5. Phil. 2. 1—

3. The veneration of their profession; (v. 35.) By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, if you have love one to another. Observe, We must have love, not only show love, but have it in the root and habit of it; and have it there where it is not any present occasion to shew it; have it ready. It (Crellius) appear that you are indeed of my followers by following me in this. But Brotherly love is the badge of Christ's disciples. By this he knows they may know themselves, (1 John 3. 14.) and by this others may know them. This is the livery of his family, the distinguishing character of his disciples; this he would have them noted for, as that wherein they excelled all others—their loving one another. This was so that their Master had not only said that he would hear of him, but have heard of his love, his great love; and therefore if you see any people more affectionate one to another than what is common, say, 'Certainly these are the followers of Christ, they have been with Jesus, by this it appears, (1.) That the heart of Christ was very much upon it, that his disciples should love one another; in this they most gloriously vulgar; whereas the way of the world is to be every one for himself, they should be hearty for one another. He does not say, By this shall men know that ye are my disciples— if ye work miracles, for a worker of miracles is but a cipher without charity; (1 Cor. 13. 1, 2,) but if ye love one another from a principle of self-denial and gratitude to Christ; this Christ would have to be the fruition of his religion, the principal note of the true church. (2.) That it is the true honour of Christ's disciples to excel in brotherly love. Nothing will be more effectual than this to commend them to the esteem and respect of others. See what a powerful attractive it was, Acts 2. 46, 47. Terrufians speak of it as the glory of the primitive church, that the christians were known by their affection to one another. Their adversaries took notice of it, and said, See how these christians love one another. (3.) That, if the followers of Christ do not love one another, they not only cast an unjust reproach upon their profession, but give just cause to suspect their own sincerity. Q. Jesus are these thy christians, these passionate, malicious, pitiful, ill-natured people. Is this thy sort's coat? When our brethren stand in need of help from us, and we have an opportunity of being serviceable to them, when they differ in opinion and practice from us, or are at any ways rivals with, or provoking to, and so we have an occasion to conciliate and forgive; in such cases as this it will be known whether we have this badge of Christ's disciples.

In these verses, we have,

1. Peter's curiousity, and the check given to that. 2. Peter's question was held and blunt : (v. 36.) Lord, whither goest thou? Referring to what Christ had said, He which calleth me, I will go to him. The practical instructions Christ had given them concerning brotherly love, he overlooks, and asks no questions upon them, but fastens upon that concerning which Christ purposely kept them in the dark. Note, It is a common fault among us, to be more inquisitive concerning things secret, which be long to God only, than concerning things revealed, which concern others; more desirous to have our own secrets fastened upon, than directed to know what is done in heaven than what we may do to get thither. It is easy to observe it in the converse of christians, how soon a discourse of that which is plain and evident, is dropped, and no more said to it, the subject is exhausted; while a matter of doubtful disputation, is run into an endless strife of controversy.

2. Christ's answer was instructive. He did not gratify him with any particular account of the world he was going to, nor ever foretold his glories and joys so distinctly as he did his sufferings; but said what he had said before: (v. 33.) Let that suffice, thou canst not follow me now, but shalt follow me hereafter. (1.) We may understand it of his following him to the cross. 'Thou hast not yet strength enough,' said he, 'to drink of faith and resolution to drink of my cup;' and it appeared so by his cowardice, when Christ was suffering. For this reason, when Christ was seized, he provided for the safety of his disciples: Let these go their way, because they could not follow him now. Christ considers the frame of his disciples, and will not cut out for them that work and hardship which they are not as yet fit for; the day shall be as the wedding day. Peter, though designed for martyrdom, cannot follow Christ now, not being come to his full growth, but he shall follow him hereafter; he shall be crucified at last, like his Master. Let him not think that because he escapes suffering now, he shall never suffer. From our missing the cross once, we must not infer that we shall never meet it; we may be reserved for greater trials than we have yet known.

(2.) We may understand it of his following him to the crown. Christ was now going to his glory, and Peter was very desirous to go with him. 'No,' said Christ, 'thou canst not follow me now, thou art not yet ripe for heaven, nor hast thou finished thy work on earth. The forerunner must first enter to prepare a place for thee, but thou shalt follow me afterwards, after thou hast fought the good fight, and at the time appointed.' Note, Believers must not expect to be glorified as soon as they are effectually called, for there is a wilderness between the Red-sea and Canaan.

11. Peter's confidence, and the check given to that.

1. Peter makes a daring protestation of his constancy. He is not content to be left behind, but threats, 'I will follow thee, Lord; for whither thou goest, I will go.' See Matt. 16. 28. 'I will follow thee, Lord.' 1 Thess. 2. 19. 'No man speaketh of us as evil, because we are Christ's.' 2 Thess. 3. 5. 'That no man dothOE} solves, as Thomas did, that he will go and die with him; and better die with him, than live without him. See here, (1.) What an affectionate love Peter had to our Lord Jesus, "I will lay down my life for thy sake, and I can do no more." I believe Peter spake as he thought, and, though he was inconstant, he was not insinuate, in this resolution. Note, Christ should be dearer to us than our own lives, which thou saidst when we are called to it, we should be willing to lay down for his sake, Acts 20. 24. (2.) How ill it took he to have it questioned, intimated in that expostulation, "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? Dost thou suspect my fidelity to thee?" 1 Sam. 29. 8. Note, It is with regret that true love hears its own sincerity arraigned, as ch. 21. 17. Christ had associated himself with them; was a devil, or he was discovered, and gone out, and therefore Peter thinks he may speak with the more assurance of his own sincerity; "Lord, I am resolved I will never leave thee, and therefore why cannot I follow thee?" We are apt to think that we can do any thing, and take it amiss to be told that this and the other we cannot do, whereas without Christ we can do nothing.

2. Christ gives him a surprising prediction of his inconstancy, v. 28. Jesus Christ knows us better than we know ourselves, and has many ways of discovering those to themselves, whom he loves, and will hide pride from.

(1.) He upholds Peter with his confidence; "Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake?" Methinks, he says grace enabling me, with a smile, "Peter, thy promises are too large, too lavish to be believed; thou dost not consider with what reluctance and struggle a life is laid down, and what a hard task it is to die; not so soon done as said." Christ hereby puts Peter upon second thoughts, not that he might retract his resolution, or recede from it, but that he might insert it that necessary proviso, "Lord, thy grace enabling me, I will lay down my life for thy sake." "Wilt thou undertake to die for me? What, thou that tremblest to walk upon the water to me? What, thou that, when sufferings were spoken of, cried out, Be it far from thee, Lord? It was an easy thing to leave thy boats and nets to follow me, but not so easy to lay down thy life." His Master himself struggled when it came to that, and the discourse is not greater to him and his Lord. Note, It is good for us to shame ourselves of our presumptuous confidence in ourselves. Shall a bruised reed set up for a pillar, or a sickly child undertake to be a champion? What a fool am I to talk so big.

(2.) He plainly foretells his cowardice in the critical hour. To stop the mouth of his boasting, lest Peter should say it again, Yea, Master, that I love thee. Christ solemnly asserts it with, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, The cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice. He does not say, as afterward, This night, for it seems to have been two nights before the passover; but, "Shortly thou wilt have denied me thrice, within the space of one night; nay, within so short a space as between the first and last crowing of the cock; the cock shall not crow, shall not have crowed his crowing out, till thou hast again and again denied me, and that for fear of suffering." The crowing of the cock is mentioned, [1.] To intimate that the trial in which he would miscarry thus, should be in the night, which was an improbable circumstance, but Christ's foretelling it was an instant of his infallible foresight. [2.] Because the crowing of the cock was to be the occasion of his repentance, which of itself would not have been, if Christ had not put this into the prediction. Christ not only foresaw that Judas would betray him, though he only in heart designed it; but he foresees that Peter would deny him, though he did not design it, but the contrary. He knows not only the wickedness of sinners, but the weakness of saints.

Christ told Peter, First, That he would deny him, would renounce and abjure him; "Thou wilt not only not follow me still, but be ashamed to own that ever thou didst follow me." Secondly, That he would do this not once only by a hasty slip of the tongue, but that he should go over this past, and abuse it, and turn it to his account, and so common it give it as a reason, why the prophecies of scripture are expressed darkly and figuratively; because, if they did plainly describe the event, the accomplishment would thereby either be deterred, or necessitated by a fatality inconsistent with human liberty; and yet this plain and express prophecy of Peter's disaster, and the courage of Christ, would do nothing but make Christ necessary to Peter's sin. But we may well imagine what a mortification it was to Peter's confidence of his own courage, to be told this; and to be told it in such a manner, that he durst not contradict it, else he would have said as Hazael: What! is thy servant a dog? This could not but fill him with confusion. Note, The most secure are sometimes the most unsafe, and the least safe the most confident; they only betray their own weakness, that most confidently presume upon their own strength, 1 Cor. 10. 12.

CHAP. XIV.

This chapter is a continuation of Christ's discourse with his disciples after supper: when he had convicted and discursed Judas, he set himself to comfort the rest, who were full of sorrow upon what he had said of leaving them, and a great many good words and comfortable words he he speaketh to them. The discourse is interlocutory: as Peter in the foregoing chapter, so Thomas, and Philip, and Judas, in this interposed their thoughts upon what he said, according to the liberty he had assigned them. Two preceding conversations are as instructive as solemn speeches, and more so. The general scope of this chapter is in the first verse; it is designed to keep trouble from their hearts; now in order to that, they must believe; and let them consider, I. Heaven as their everlasting rest, v. 2, 3. II. Christ himself as their way, v. 4, 11. III. The great power they shall be clothed with by the prevalence of their prayers, v. 12, 14. IV. The coming of another Comforter, v. 15, 17. V. The fellowship and communion that should be between him and them after his departure, v. 18, 24. VI. The instructions which the Holy Ghost should give them, v. 25, 26. VII. The peace Christ bequeathed to them, v. 27. VIII. Christ's own cheerfulness in his departure, v. 28, 31. And this which he said to them, is designed for the comfort of all his faithful followers.

1. LET not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me.

2. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. 3. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

In these verses, we have,

1. A general caution which Christ gives to his disciples, against trouble of heart; (v. 1.) Let not your heart be troubled. They now began to be troubled, were entering into this temptation. Now here see,

1. How Christ took notice of it. Perhaps it was legible in their looks; it was said, (ch. 13. 22.) they looked one upon another with anxiety and concern, and Christ took observation of it, and observed it; however, it was intelligible to the Lord Jesus, who is acquainted with all our secret undiscovered sorrows, with the wound that bleeds inwardly; he knows not only how we are afflicted, but how we stand affected under our afflictions, and how near they lie to our
he takes cognizance of all the trouble which his people are at any time in danger of being overlooked, and he keeps their souls in adversity. Many things concurred to trouble the disciples now.

(1.) Christ had just told them of the unkindness he should receive from some of them, and this troubled them all. Peter, no doubt, looked very sorrowful upon what Christ said to him, and all the rest were sorry for him and for themselves too, not knowing how or what to say to comfort him in the trouble of some ill thing or other they should do. As to this, Christ comforts them, though a godly jealousy over ourselves is of great use to keep us humble and watchful, yet it must not prevail to the disquieting of our spirits and the damping of our holy joy.

(2.) He had just told them of his own departure from them; that he should not only go away, but go away in a cloud of sufferings. They must not hear him loaded with reproaches, and those will be as a sword in their bones; must see him barbarously abused, and put to death, and this also will be a sword piercing through their souls, for they had loved him, and chosen him, and left all to follow him. When we now look upon Christ pierced, we cannot but tremble and be in bitterness, though we see in this the issue and fruit of it; much more grievous must the sight be to them who could then look no further.

If Christ depart from them, [1.] They will think themselves shamefully disappointed; for they looked that this had been he that should have delivered Israel, and should have set up his kingdom in secular power and glory, and, in expectation of that, had lost all to follow him. Now, if he leave the world in the same circumstances of meanness and poverty in which he had lived, and worse, they are quite defeated. [2.] They will think themselves sadly deserted and exposed. They knew by experience what little presence of mind they had in difficult emergencies, that they could count upon nothing but being ruined and run down if they part with their Master. Now, in reference to all these, Let not your heart be troubled. Here are three words, upon any of which the emphasis may significantly be laid.

First, Upon the word troubled, μη ῥούσσεσθαι. Be not so troubled, as to be put into a hurry and confusion, like the troubled sea when it cannot rest. He does not say, "Let not your hearts be sensible of the griefs, or sad because of them," but, "Be not troubled, and be not discouraged, be not cast down and disquieted." Ps. 42, 5.

Secondly, Upon the word heart; "Though the nation and city be troubled, though your little family and flock be troubled, yet let not your heart be troubled. Keep possession of your own souls when you can keep possession of nothing else. The heart is the main butt; whatever you do, keep trouble from that, keep that with all diligence. The spirit must sustain the infirmity, therefore see that that be not wounded." Thir'dly, Upon the word your; "You that are my disciples and followers, my redeemed, chosen, sanctified ones, however others are overwhelmed with the sorrows of this present time, be not you so, for you know better; let the sinners in Zion tremble, but let the Lamb be joyful and glad in his kingdom. Here, Christ's disciples should do more than others, should keep their minds quiet, when every thing else is unequal.

2. The remedy he prescribes against this trouble of mind, which he saw ready to prevail over them; in general, believe and trust. [1.] Some read it in both parts imperatively, "Believe in God, and his perfections and providences, believe also in me, and my mediation. Build with confidence upon the great acknowledged principles of natural religion; that there is a God, that he is most holy, wise, powerful, and good; and that he is the master and legislator of the world, and has the sovereign disposal of all events; and comfort yourselves likewise with the peculiar doctrines of that holy religion which I have taught you." But, (2.) We read the former as an acknowledgment, that they did believe in God, for which he commends them; "But if you would effectually provide against a stormy day, believe also in me." Though many through the account of their unbelief in God and their unbelief in Christ, and become interested in his favour and promise, which otherwise as sinners we must despair of; and the remembrance of God would have been our trouble; but by believing in Christ as the mediator between God and man, our belief in God becomes comfortable; and this is the will of God, that all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father: they that rightly believe in God, will believe in Jesus Christ, whom he has made known to them; and believing in God through Jesus Christ, is an excellent means of keeping trouble from the heart. The joys of faith are the best remedies against the griefs of sense; it is a remedy with a promise annexed to it; the just shall live by faith; and he that believeth on the Son of God has everlasting life annexed to it; And I had fainted unless I had believed.

II. Here is a particular direction to act faith upon, the promise of eternal life, ver. 3. He had directed them to trust to God, and to trust in him; but what must they trust God and Christ for? Trust them for a happiness to come, when this body, and this world shall be no more; and for a happiness to last, as the immortal soul and the eternal world shall last. Now this is proposed as a sovereign cordial under all the troubles of this present time, to which there is that in the happiness of heaven, which is admirably adapted and accommodated. All the saints have encouraged themselves with this in their greatest extremities, That heaven would make amends for all.

Let us see how this is suggested here:

1. "Believe and consider that really there is such a happiness; In my Father's house there are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you." (1.) See under what condition the happiness of heaven is here represented; as mansions, many mansions in Christ's Father's house. [1.] Heaven is a house, not a tent or tabernacle; it is a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. [2.] It is a Father's house; in which the Father, and his saints, and his Son, and his angels, and his cherubims, and his seraphims, and his holy ones, shall dwell together, and make heaven a temple. In heaven there are accommodations for particular saints; though all shall be swallowed up in God, yet our individuality shall not be lost there, every Israelite had his lot in Canaan, and every elder a seat, Rev. 4, 4. Secondly, Durable dwellings. Many, from πολλά, manifold, abiding places. The house itself is lasting; our estate in it is not for a moment, but for ages, and ages, "Let the sinners in Zion tremble, but the Lamb be joyful and glad in his kingdom." Here, Christ's disciples should do more than others, should keep their minds quiet, when every thing else is unequal.

2. The remedy he prescribes against this trouble of mind, which he saw ready to prevail over them; in general, believe and trust. [1.] Some read it in both parts imperatively, "Believe in God, and his perfections and providences, believe also in me, and my mediation. Build with confidence upon the
not the rest he discouraged, in heaven there are mansions for them all. — Rehoboth, Gen. 26. 22.

(2.) See what assurance we have of the reality of the happiness itself, and the sincerity of the proposal of it to us: "If it were not so, I would have told you. If you had deceived yourselves, when you quitted your livelihoods, and ventured your lives for me, in prospect of a happiness future and unseen, I would not have exhorted you. " The assurance is built. (1.) Upon the veracity of his word. It is implied, "If there were not such a happiness, valuable and attainable, I would not have told you that there was." (2.) Upon the sincerity of his affection to them. As he is true, and would not impose upon them himself, so he is kind, and would not suffer them to be imposed upon. If either there were no such mansions, or none designed for them, who had left all to follow him, he would not have given them timely notice of the mistake, that they might have made an honourable retreat to the world again, and have made the best hand they could of it. Note, Christ's good-will to us is a great encouragement to our hope in him. He loves us too well, and means us too well, to disappoint the expectations of his own running, out of love to the souls of all men most miserable, who have been of him most neglectful.

2. Believe and consider that the design of Christ's going away was to prepare a place in heaven for his disciples. You are urged to think of my going away, whereas I go on your errand, as the forerunner; I am to enter for you." He went to prepare a place for us; that is, (1.) To take possession for us, as when a master builds, or a friend, or attorney, and so to secure our title as indefeasible. Lot was given to Christ, for the use and benefit of all that should believe on him. (2.) To make provision for us as our friend and father. The happiness of heaven, though prepared before the foundation of the world, yet must be further fitted up for man in his fallen state. It consisting much in the presence of Christ there, it was therefore necessary that he should go before, to enter into that glory which his disciples were to share in. Heaven would be an unworthy place for a Christian if Christ were not there. He went to prepare a table for them, to prepare thrones for them, Luke 22. 30. Thus he designed to bespeak the fitness of heaven's happiness for the saints for whom it is prepared.

Believe and consider that therefore he would certainly come again in due time, to fetch them to that blessed place which he was now going to预备 for himself, and prepare for them: (xii. 3.) "If I go and prepare a place for you, if that be the errand of my journey, you may be sure, when every thing is ready, I will come again, to receive you to myself, so that you shall follow me hereafter, that where I am there ye may be also." Now these are connected words indeed:

(1.) That Jesus Christ will come again, I know—intimating the certainty of it, that he will come, and that he is daily coming. We say, We are coming, when we are busy in preparing for our coming, and so he is; all he does has a reference and tendency to his second coming. Note, The belief of Christ's second coming, which he has given us, is an excellent preservative against trouble of heart, Phil. 4. 5. Jam. 5. 8.

(2.) That he will come again, to receive all his faithful followers to himself. He sends for them privately at death, and gathers them one by one; but they are to make their public entry in solemn token together at the last day, and then Christ himself will come again to receive them, to conduct them out of the abundance of his glory, and to welcome them out of the abundance of his love; he will hereby testify the utmost respect and endearment imagindisciples to address themselves to him, and he answers them both.

1. Thomas inquired concerning the way, (v. 5.) without any apology for contradicting his Master; he said, "Lord, we know not whether thou goest, to what place or what state, and how can we know the way, in which we must follow thee? We can neither see it nor inquire it out, but must still be at a loss." Christ's testimony concerning their knowledge made them more sensible of their ignorance, and more inquisitive after further light.

Thomas here shows more modesty than Peter, who thought he could follow Christ now. Peter was the more solicitous to know whether Christ went. Thomas here, though he complains that he did not know that, yet he was most of all to know the way. Now. I. His confession of his ignorance was commendable enough; if good men be in the dark, and know but in part, yet they are willing to own their defects; but, 2. The cause of his ignorance was culpable. They knew not whether Christ went, because they dreamed of a temporal kingdom in external pomp and power, and dotted upon that, notwithstanding what he had said again and again to the contrary, that it was that, when Christ spake of going away and following their him, their fancy ran upon his going to some remarkable city or other, Bethleem, or Nazareth, or Capernaum, or some of the cities of the Gentiles, as David to Hebron, there to be anointed king, and to restore the kingdom to Israel; and which way this place lay, where these castles in the air were to be built, cast, west, north, or south, they could not tell, and therefore knew not the way. Thus still we think ourselves more in the dark than we need be to concern the future state of the church, because we expect its worldly prosperity, whereas it is spiritual advancement that the promise points at. Had Thomas understood, as he might have done, that Christ was going to the invisible world, the world of spirits, to which spiritual things only have a reference, he would not have said, Lord, we do not know the way.

Now to this complaint of their ignorance, which included a desire to be taught, Christ gives a full answer, v. 6, 7. Thomas had inquired, both whither he went, and what was the way, and Christ answers both these inquiries, and makes good what he had said, that they would have no need of answer if they had understood; he had been and he was the way; they knew the Father, and he was the end; and therefore, whither I go we know, and the way we know. Believe in God as the end, and in me as the way, (v. 1.) and ye do all ye should.

(1.) He speaks of himself as the way, v. 6. Dest then not know the way? I am the way, and I only, for no man comes to the Father, but by me. Great things Christ here hath of himself, shewing us,

[1.] The nature of his mediation; he is the way, the truth, and the life.

Let us consider these first distinctly: First, Christ is the way, the highway spoken of, Isa. 35. 8. Christ was his own way, for by his own blood he entered into the holy place, (Heb. 9. 12,) and he is our way, for we enter by him. By his doctrine and example he shows us how to get to heaven; by his instruction he procures us our happiness, and he is the way. In him God and man meet, and are brought together. We could not get to the tree of life in the way of innocence, but Christ is another way to it. By Christ, as the way, an intercourse is settled and kept up between heaven and earth; the angels of God ascend and descend; our prayers go to God, and his blessings come to us by him; this is the way that leads to rest; he good old way. The disciples followed him, and Christ tells them that they followed the road, and, while they continued following him, they would never be out of their way.

Secondly, He is the truth: 1. As truth is opposed to figure and shadow. Christ is the substance of all the Old Testament types, which are therefore said to be figures of the truth, Heb. 9. 24. Christ is the true manna, (ch. 6. 33,) the true tabernacle, (Heb. 8. 2.) the highway to the Father, (v. 6.) is opposed to falsehood and error; the doctrine of Christ is true doctrine; when we inquire for truth, we need learn no more than the truth as it is in Jesus. 2. As truth is opposed to fallacy and deceit, he is true to all that trust in him, as true as truth itself, 2 Cor. 1. 20.

Thirdly, He is the life; for we are alive unto God, only in and through Jesus Christ. Rom. 6. 11. Christ is mortal in us, through us, and in us, his souls, which our souls are to our bodies. Christ is the resurrection and the life.

Let us consider these jointly, and with reference to each other. Christ is the way, the truth, and the life; that is, 1. He is the beginning, the middle, and the end. In him we must set out, go on, and finish. As the truth, he is the guide of our way; as the way, he is the highway of our going; and as the beginning, he is the opening or bringing way; (Heb. 10. 26,) there is truth and life in it, as well as at the end of it. 2. He is the true way to life, the only true way; other ways may seem right, but the end of them is the way of death.

[2.] The necessity of his mediation: We man come to the Father but by me. Fallen man must come to God as a Judge, but cannot come to him as Father, unless by Christ as Mediator.

We cannot procure the way of our access to God by repentance and the acts of worship, without the Spirit and grace of Christ, nor obtain the happiness of coming to God as our Father, without his merit and righteousness; he is the High-Priest of our profession, our Advocate.

(2.) He speaks of his Father as the end; (v. 7.) If ye had known me, ye should, or would, have known my Father also; not from henceforth, by the glory you have seen in me, and the doctrine you have heard from me, we know him and have seen him. Here it is

[1.] A tacit reproach to them for their dullness and carelessness in acquainting themselves with Jesus Christ, though they had been his constant followers and associates; If we had known me. They knew me and knew me not; they knew me, and should have known him. They knew him we the Christ, but did not follow on to know God in him. Christ had said to the Jews, (ch. 8. 19,) If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also; and here the same to his disciples; for it is hard to say, which is more strange, the wilful ignorance of those that are enemies to the light, or the defects and mistakes of the children of light, that have such opportunities of knowing us. If Christ had known Christ, they would have known that his kingdom is spiritual, and not of this world: that he came down from heaven, and therefore must return to heaven; and then they would have known his Father also, would have known whether he desired to go, when he said, I go to the Father, to a glory in the other world, not in this. If we know Christ better, we should understand better.

[2.] A favourable intimation that he was well satisfied concerning their sincerity, notwithstanding the weakness of their understanding; "I say from henceforth, from my giving you this hint, which will serve as a key to all the instructions I have given you hitherto, let me tell you, ye know him, and have seen him, much as we know me, as I have seen thee," for in the face of Christ we see the glory of God, as we see a father in his son that resembles him. Christ tells his disciples, they were not so ignorant as they seemed to be; for, though little children, ye know the Father. 1 John 2. 13. 14. Many of the disciples of Christ have more knowledge and more grace than they think they have, and Christ takes notice of, and is well pleased with, that good in them which they themselves are not aware of; for they that know God, do not all at once know that they know him, 1 John 3. 21. 22. 15. Philip inquired concerning the Father, (v. 8.) and Christ answered him, v. 9—11. where observe,
1. Philip's request for some extraordinary discovery of the Father. He was not so forward to speak as some others of them were, and yet, from an earnest desire of further light, he cries out, Show us the Father. Philip listened to what Christ said to Thomas, and fastened upon the last words, with which he gave him a hint to press his request of a word for his fellow-disciples. Grant us but one sight of the Father, and we have enough. Jansenns saith, "Though Philip did not mean it, yet the Holy Ghost, by his mouth, desired here to teach us, that the satisfaction and happiness of a soul consist in the vision and fruition of God," Ps. 16. 11—17. In the knowledge of God the understanding rests, and is at the top of its ambition, in the knowledge of Christ, by which the soul is satisfied; a sight of the Father is a heaven upon earth, fills us with joy unspeakable.

2. (As Philip speaks it here, it intimates that he was not satisfied with such a discovery of the Father as Christ thought fit to give them, but he would prescribe to him, and press upon him, something further, and no less than some visible appearance of the glory of God, like that to Moses, (Exod. 33. 22.) and to the elders of Israel, Exod. 24. 9—11. "Let us see the Father with our bodily eyes, as we see thee, and it sufficeth us; we will trouble thee with no more questions, Whither goest thou?" And so it discovers, not only the weakness of his faith, but his ignorance of the gospel-way of manifesting the glory of God, which is spiritual, and not sensible. Such a sight of God, he thinks, would suffer them, and yet those who did thus see him were not suffered, but soon corrupted themselves, and made a graven image. Christ's institutions have provided better for the confirmation of our faith than our own inventions would.

Christian's reply, referring him to the discoveries already made of the Father, v. 9—11.
1. He refers him to what he had seen, v. 9. He upbraids him with his ignorance and inattention: "Have I been so long time with you, now above three years intimately conversant with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip?" Now, he that has seen me, hath seen the Father; and how saivest thou then, Show us the Father? Wilt thou ask to see which thou hast already known? Now here,
2. He reproves him for two things: First, For not improving his acquaintance with Christ, as he might have done, to a clear and distinct knowledge of him; "Hast thou not known me, Philip, whom thou hast followed so long, and conversed with so much?" Philip, the first day he came to him, declared that he knew him to be the Messiah; he might have been warmer; he might have been more careful to dwell in him. Many that have good knowledge in the scripture, and divine things, fall short of the attainments justly expected from them, for want of compounding the ideas they have, and going on to perfection. Many know Christ, who yet do not know what they might know of him, nor see what they should see in him.

That which aggravated Philip's dulness was, that he had had so long an opportunity of improvement; I have been so long time with thee. Note, The longer we enjoy the means of knowledge and grace, the more we should be active in grace and knowledge. Christ expects that our proficiency should be in some measure according to our standing, that we should not be always babes. Let us thus reason with ourselves; "Have I been so long a hearer of sermons, a student in the scripture, a scholar in the school of Christ, and yet so weak in the knowledge of Christ, and so unskilful in the word of righteousness?"

Secondly, He reproves him for his infirmity in the prayer made; Show us the Father. Note, Herein appears much of the weakness of Christ's disciples, that they know not what to pray for as they ought, (Rom. 8. 26.) but often ask amiss, (James 4. 3.) for that which either is not promised, or is already bestowed in the sense of the promise, as here.

2. (See here what inducements we have to believe this; and they are two. We must believe it, First, For his word's sake; The words that I speak to you, I speak not of myself: See ch. 7. 16. My doctrine is not of me, What he saith the Father, and in seeing him thus we see the Father. In Christ we behold more of the glory of God than Moses did at Mount Horeb.

2. See here what inducements we have to believe this; and they are two. We must believe it, First, For his word's sake; The words that I speak to you, I speak not of myself: See ch. 7. 16. My doctrine is not of me, What he saith the Father, and in seeing him thus we see the Father. In Christ we behold more of the glory of God than Moses did at Mount Horeb.
on earth, as the body of the Lord Jesus, ch. 2, 21. Here was the true Shekinah, of which that in the tabernacle was but a type. The fulness of the Godhead dwelt in him bodily, Col. 2, 9. The Father so dwelleth in Christ, that in him he may be found, as a man where he dwells. Seek ye the Lord, seek him, Christ, and he will be found, for in him he dwells. 2. As the captivity stands, so will the works of mercy, Christ did, and the Father did them in him; and the work of redemption in general was God's own work. 3. We are bound to believe this, for the very works' sake. As we are to believe the being and perfections of God, for the sake of the works of creation, which declare his glory; so we are to believe the revelation of God to man in Jesus Christ, for the sake of those mighty works, which, by shewing forth themselves, (Matt. 14, 2.) shew forth him, and God in him. Note, Christ's miracles are proofs of his divine mission, not only for the conviction of infidels, but for the confirmation of the faith of his own disciples, ch. 2, 11. 15. 36. 16. 37.

12. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father. 13. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. 14. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.

The disciples, as they were full of grief to think of parting with their Master, so they were full of care what would become of themselves when he was gone; while he was with them, he was a support to them, kept them in contentment, kept them in heart; but if he leave them, they will be as sheep having no shepherd, in an easy prey to those who seek to run them down. Now, to silence these fears, Christ here assures them that they should be clothed with powers sufficient to bear them out. As Christ had all power, they, in his name, should have great power, both in heaven and in earth.

1. Great power on earth; (v. 12.) He that believeth on me, (as I know you do,) the works that I do, shall he do also. This does not weaken the argument Christ had taken from his works, to prove himself one with the Father, (that others should do as great works,) but rather strengthens it; for the miracles which the apostles wrought, were wrought in his name, and by faith in him; and this magnifies his power more than anything, that he not only wrought miracles himself, but gave power to others to do so too. Two things he assurs them of:

1. That they should be enabled to do such works as he had done, and that they should have a more ample power for the doing of them, than they had had when he first sent them forth, Matt. 10, 8. Did Christ heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead? So should they. Did he convince and convert sinners, and draw multitudes to him? So should they. Though he should depart, the work should not cease, nor fall to the ground, but should be carried on as vigorously and successfully as ever; and it is still in the doing.

2. That they should do greater works than these: (1.) In the kingdom of nature they should work greater miracles. No miracle is little, but some to our apprehension seem greater than others. Christ had healed with his hand, Matt. 17, 20. but Peter with his girdle, Acts 5, 15. Paul by the handkerchief that had touched him, Acts 19, 12. Christ wrought miracles for two or three years in one country, but his followers wrought miracles in his name for many ages in divers countries. Ye shall do greater works, if there were occasion, for the glory of God. The prayer of faith, if at any time it had been necessary, should have removed mountains.

(2.) In the kingdom of grace. They should do ten greater victories by the gospel than had been obtained while Christ was upon earth. The truth of Christ, under such outward disadvantages, was the miracle of all. I think this refers especially to the gift of tongues, which was the immediate effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, which was a constant miracle upon the mind, in which words are framed, and which was made to serve so glorious an intention as of spreading the gospel to all nations in the dark, and to all men in their own hearts, and in those who believed not, (1 Cor. 14, 22.) and more powerful for their conviction, than any other miracle whatsoever.

The reason Christ gives for this, is, Because I go unto my Father. [1.] Because I go, it will be requisite that you should have such a power, lest the work suffer damage by our absence. [2.] Before I go to the Father, I shall be in a capacity to furnish you with such a power, for I go to the Father, to send the Comforter, from whom you shall receive power. Acts 1, 8. The wonderful works which they did in Christ's name, were part of the glories of his exalted state, when he ascended on high, Eph. 4, 8.

1. Great power in heaven; Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that shall be done, (v. 13, 14.) as Israel, that was a prince with God. Therefore you shall do such mighty works, because you have such an interest in me, and I in my Father. Observe,

1. In what way they were to keep up communion with him, and fetch in power from him, when he was gone to the Father—by prayer. When dear friends are to be removed at a distance from each other, they provide for the settling of a correspondence; thus, when Christ was going to his Father, he tells his disciples how they might write to him upon every occasion, and send it by a safe and ready way of conveyance, without danger of miscarriage, or lying by the way; Let me hear from you by prayer, the prayer of faith, and you shall hear from me by the Spirit. This was the old way of intercourse with heaven, ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord; but Christ by his death has laid it more open, and it is still open to us. Here is,

(1.) Humility prescribed; Ye shall ask. Though they had quitted all for Christ, they could demand nothing of him as a debt, but must ask it as an alms, must be humble suppliants, beg or starve, beg or perish.

(2.) Liberty allowed; Ask any thing, anything that is good and proper for you; anything, provided you know what you ask, you may ask; you may ask for assistance in your work, for a mouth and wisdom, for preservation out of the hands of your enemies, for power to work miracles when there is occasion, for the success of the ministry in the conversion of souls; ask to be informed, directed, vindicated.

Occasions vary, but they shall be welcome to the throne of grace upon every occasion.

2. In what name they were to present their petitions; Ask in my name. To ask in Christ's name, is, (1.) To plead his merit and intercession, and to depend upon that plea. The Old Testament saints had an eye to this when they prayed for the Lord's sake, (Dan. 9, 17.) and for the sake of the anointed; (Ps. 84, 9.) and Christ with a more powerful, a clearer light by the gospel, and so we are enabled more expressly to ask in his name. When Christ dictated the Lord's prayer, this was not inserted, because they did not so fully understand this matter as they should afterward, when the Spirit was poured out. If we ask in our own name, we cannot expect to speed, for, being strangers, we have no name in heaven; being sinners, we have an ill name there: but Christ's is a good name, well known in heaven, and very precious. (2.) It is to aim at his glory and honour in our prayers, and to seek that as our highest end in all our prayers.

3. What success they should have in their prayers; "What ye ask, that will I do;" (v. 13.) And again, (v. 14.) "I will do it." Ye may be sure I will: not only it shall be done, I will see it done, or give orders for the doing of it, "I will do it," for he has not only the interest of an intercessor, but the power of a sovereign prince, who sits at the right hand of God, the hand of action, and has the doing of all in the kingdom of God. By faith in his name we may have what we will for the asking.

4. For what reason their prayers should speed so well; that the Father may be glorified in the Son. That is, (1.) This they ought to aim at, and have their eye upon, in asking. In this all our desires and prayers should meet, as in their centre; to this they must all be directed, that God in Christ may be in the highest perfection, and the most honour and advantage. Hallowed be thy name, is an answered prayer, and is put first, because, if the heart be sincere in that, it does in a manner concurate all the other petitions. (2.) This Christ will aim at in granting, and for the sake of this will do what they ask, that hereby the glory of the Father in the Son might be manifested. The wisdom, power, and goodness of God were magnified in the Redemption, when by a power derived from him, and exerted in his name, and for his service, his apostles and ministers were enabled to do such great things, both in the proofs of their doctrine, and in the successes of it.

13. If ye love me, keep my commandments. 16. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; 17. Even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeketh him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

Christ not only proposes such things to them as were the matter of their comfort, but here promises to send the Spirit, whose office it should be to be their Comforter, to impress those things upon them.

1. He promises to this a memorandum of duty; (v. 15.) If ye love me, keep my commandments. Keeping the commandments of Christ is here put for the practice of godliness in general, and for the faithful and diligent discharge of their office as apostles in particular. Now observe, 1. When Christ is comforting them, he bids them keep his commandments; for we must not expect comfort but in the way of duty. The same word (τουτους) signifies both as a motive and as a grant. 2. When they were in care what they should do, now that their Master was leaving them, and what would become of them now, he bids them keep his commandments, and then nothing could come amiss to them. In difficult times our care concerning the events of the day should be swallowed up in a care concerning the duty of the day. 3. When they were skewing their love to Christ by their grieving to think of his departure, and the sorrow which filled their hearts upon the foresight of that, he bids them, if they would shew their love to him, do it, not by those weak and feminine passions, but by their conscientious care to perform their trust, and by a universal obedience to his commands; that is better than sacrifice, better than tears.

14. I love you, and set you free. I will put my laws in their hearts, and in their minds will I write them. I will be to them a Father, and they shall be to me sons. (v. 26.) That is, I will make them to understand many things, such as a good master doth by his sons; that they may do what is meet according to their understanding.

removals from us; for if he depart for a season, it is that we may receive him for ever.' Let this moderate our grief, The Lord is at hand.

11. He promises that they should continue their acquaintance with him, and interest in him; (v. 19, 20.) Yet a little while, and the world sees me no more, that is, Now I am no more in the world; after his death, the world saw him no more, for though he rose to heaven, they did not see him ascend, Acts 10, 31. The malignant world thought they had seen enough of him, and cried, Away with him, crucify him; and so shall their doom be; they shall see him no more. Those only that see Christ with an eye of faith, shall see him for ever; the world sees him no more till his second coming; but his disciples have communion with him in his absence.

1. Ye shall continue him, when the world sees me no more. They saw him with their bodily eyes after his resurrection, for he showed himself to them by many inexcusable proofs, Acts 1, 3. And then were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. They saw him with an eye of faith after his ascension, sitting at God's right hand, as Lord of all; saw that in him, which the world saw not.

2. Because I live, ye shall live also. That which grieved them, was, that their Master was dying, and they counted upon nothing else but to die with him. No, saith Christ, 1. I live; this the great God glories in, I live, saith the Lord, and Christ saith the same; not only, I shall live, as he saith of them, but, I do live; for he has life in himself; and live for evermore. They were eternally his, while we know that our Redeemer lives. 2. Therefore we shall live also. Note, The life of Christians is bound up in the life of Christ; as sure and as long as he lives, they that by faith are united to him, shall live also; they shall live spiritually, a divine life in communion with God, this life is hid with Christ; if the head and root live, the members and branches live also. They were eternally his, while he shall rise in the virtue of Christ's resurrection; it will be well with them in the world to come, it cannot but be well with all that are his, Isa. 26, 19.

3. Ye shall have the assurance of this; (v. 20.) At that day, when I am glorified, when the Spirit is poured out, ye shall know more clearly and certainly than ye do now, that I am in my Father, and you in me. (1.) These glorious mysteries will be fully known in heaven; At that day, when I shall receive you to myself, you shall know perfectly that which now you see through a glass darkly. Now it appears not what we shall be, but then it will appear what we were.

(2.) They were more fully known after the pouring out of the Spirit upon the apostles; at that day divine light of this is shed, and their eyes shall see more clearly, their knowledge should greatly advance and increase then, would become more extensive and more distinct, and like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking.

(3.) They are known by all that receive the Spirit of truth, to their abundant satisfaction, for in the knowledge of this is founded, and their eyes should see more clearly, their knowledge should greatly advance and increase then, would become more extensive and more distinct, and like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking.

5. They are known by all that receive the Spirit of truth, to their abundant satisfaction, for in the knowledge of this is founded, and their eyes should see more clearly, their knowledge should greatly advance and increase then, would become more extensive and more distinct, and like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking.

(2.) They were more fully known after the pouring out of the Spirit upon the apostles; at that day divine light of this is shed, and their eyes shall see more clearly, their knowledge should greatly advance and increase then, would become more extensive and more distinct, and like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking.

(3.) They are known by all that receive the Spirit of truth, to their abundant satisfaction, for in the knowledge of this is founded, and their eyes should see more clearly, their knowledge should greatly advance and increase then, would become more extensive and more distinct, and like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking.

(3.) They shall have the comfort of that love; I will manifest myself to him. Some understand it of Christ's shewing himself alive to his disciples after his resurrection, but, it being promised to all that love him and keep his commandments, it must be construed so as to extend to them, that there is a spiritual manifestation of Christ and his love made to all believers; when he enlightens their minds to know his love, and the dimensions of it. (Eph. 5. 15. 19.) doubles their graces, and draws them into exercise, and thus enlarges their comforts in himself. When he clears up the evidences of their interest in him, and gives them tokens of his love, experience of his tenderness, and comforts of his kingdom and glory, then he manifests himself to them; and Christ is manifested to none but those to whom he is pleased to manifest himself.

Now, upon occasion of Christ's making this promise: (1.) One of the disciples expresses his wonder and surprise at it, v. 22. Observe,

[1.] Who it was that said this—Judas, not Iscariot. Judas, or Judas, was a famous name; the most famous tribe in Israel was that of Judah; two of Christ's disciples were of that name; one of them was the traitor; the other was the brother of James, (Luke 6. 16.) one of these that were akin to Christ, Matt. 13. 53. He is called Lebbeus and Thaddæus; was the penman of the last of the epistles, which in our translation, for distinction's sake, we call the Epistle of Jude. This was he that spake here. Observe, First, There was a very good man, and a very ill man, called by the same name; for names confound us not to God, nor do they make men worse; Judas the apostle was never the worse, nor Judas the apostate ever the better, for being name-sakes. But, Secondly, The evangelist carefully distinguishes between them; when he speaks of this Judas, he adds, not Iscariot. Take heed of mistaking; let us not confound the precious and the vile.

[2.] What he said—Lord, how is it? Which speaks either, First, The weakness of his understanding. So some take it. He expected the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, that it should appear in external pomp and power, such as all the world would wonder at. "How then," thinks he, "should it be confined to us only?" 2 Peter 1. 18—19. "What is the matter now, that thou wilt not shew thyself openly, as is expected, that the Gentiles may come to thy light, and shew to the brightness of thy rising?" Note, We create difficulties to ourselves by mistaking the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if it were of this world. Or, Secondly, As speaking the strength of his affections, and the humble and thankful sense he had of Christ's distinguishing favours to them; Lord, how is it? He is amazed at the condescensions of divine grace, as David, 2 Sam. 7. 18. What is there in us to desire such great things? Note, 1. Christ's manifesting of himself to his disciples, is done in a distinguishing way; to them, and not unto the world that sits in darkness; to the base, and not to the mighty and noble; to babes, and not to the wise and prudent. Distinguishing favours are very obliging; considering who are passed by, and who are pitchèd upon. 2. It is justly marvellous in our eyes; for it is unaccountable that we, so unworthy, should enjoy such great favours; Even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee.

(2.) Christ, in answer hereunto, explains and confirms what he had said, v. 23, 24. He overlooks what infinity there was in what Judas spake, and goes on with his comforts.

[1.] He further explains the condition of the promise, which was so grand, and kept up his commentator's thoughts: and to as this, he shews what an inseparable connection there is between love and obedience; love is the root, obedience is the fruit. First, Where a sincere love to Christ is in the heart, there will be obedience; "If a man love me indeed, that love will be such a commanding contraining principle in him, that no question, he will keep my words." Where there is true love to Christ, there is a value for his favour; a generation for his架子, and an entire surrender of the whole man to his control and government. Where love is, duty follows of course, is easy and natural, and flows from a principle of gratitude.

Secondly, On the other hand, where there is no true love to Christ, there will be no care to obey him; He that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings, v. 24. This comes in here as a discovery of those that do not love Christ: whatever they pretend, certainly, do not love him, that believe not his truths, and obey not his laws, to whom Christ's sayings are but as idle takes, which he heed not, or hard sayings, which he likes not. It is also a reason why Christ will not manifest himself to the world that doth not love him, because they put this affo at upon him, not to keep his sayings; why should Christ be familiar with them that will be strange to him?

[2.] He further explains the promise; (v. 24.) If a man does thus love me, I will manifest myself to him. First, My Father will love him; this he had said before, (v. 21.) and here it repeats it for the confirming of our faith; because it is hard to imagine that the great God should make those the objects of his love, that have not love to his Son. Jude wondered that Christ should manifest himself to them; but this answers it, "If my Father love you, why should not I be free with you?"

Secondly, We will come unto him, and make our abode with him. This explains the meaning of Christ's manifesting himself to him, and magnifies the favour. 1. Not only, I will, but We will, and my Father, who, in this, are one. See v. 9. The light and love of God are communicated to man in the light and love of the Redeemer, so that wherever Christ is formed, the image of God is stamped. 2. Not only, "I will shew myself to him at a distance," but, "We will come to him, to be near him, to be with him;" such are the powerful influences of divine graces and comforts upon the souls of those that love Christ in sincerity. 3. Not only, "I will give him a transient view of me, or make him a short and running visit," but, "We will take up our abode with him, which notes complacency in him, and constancy to him. God will not only love obedient believers, but he will take a pleasure in loving them, will rest in love to them, Zeph. 3. 17. He will be with them as at his home.

[3.] He gives a good reason both to bind us to observe the conditions he has set forth, and to expect the promise upon the promise; (v. 24.) The word which you hear, is not mine, but his that sent me. To this purport he had often spoken, (ch. 7. 16—8. 28—12. 49.) and here it comes in very pertinently. First, The stress of duty is laid upon the precepts of Christ as our rule, and justly, for the word of Christ which we are to keep, is the Father's word, and his will the Father's will. Secondly, The stress of our concern is laid upon the promise of Christ. But far much as, in dependence upon that promise, we must deny ourselves, and take up our cross, and quit all, it concerns us to inquire, whether the security be sufficient for us to venture our all upon; and this satisfies us it is, that the promise is not Christ's bare word, but the Father's which sent him; which therefore we may rely upon.

25. These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you. 26. But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you. 27. Peace I leave with you.
my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, I give unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

Two things Christ here comforts his disciples with.

1. That they should be under the tuition of his Spirit; v. 26. Where we may observe,

(1.) The reflection Christ would have made upon the instructions he had given them; These things have I spoken unto you, (referring to all the good lessons he had taught them, since they entered themselves into his school,) being yet present with you. This intimates, (1.) That what he had said he did not retract or unsay, but ratify it, or stand to it. What he had spoken he had spoken, and would abide by it. (2.) That he had improved the opportunity of his bodily presence with them to the utmost; "As long as I have been yet present with you, you know I have lost no time." Note, When our teachers are about to be removed from us, we should call to mind what they have spoken, being yet present with us.

2. The encouragement given them to expect another teacher, and that Christ would find out a way of speaking to them, after his departure from them, v. 26. He had told them before, that the Father would give them this other comforter; (v. 16.) and here he returns to speak of it again; for as the promise of the Messiah had been, so the promise of the Spirit now was, the consolation of Israel. Two things he here mentions further concerning the sending of the Holy Ghost.

(1.) On whose account he should be sent; The Father will send him in my name; for my sake, at my special instance and request; or, as my agent and representative. He came in his Father’s name, as his ambassador; the Spirit comes in his name, as resident in his absence, to carry on his undertaking, and to bring things for his second coming. Hence he is called the Spirit of Christ, for he pleads his cause, and does his work.

(2.) On what errand he should be sent; two things he shall do.

[1.] He shall teach you all things as a Spirit of wisdom and revelation. Christ was a teacher to his disciples, if he leave them now that they have made so little progress, what will become of them? Why, the Spirit will teach them, shall be their standing Tutor. He shall teach them all things necessary for them, either to learn themselves, or to teach others. For they that would teach the things of God, must first themselves be taught of God; this is the Spirit’s work. See Isa. 59. 21.

[2.] He shall bring all things to your remembrance, whatever I have said unto you. Many a good lesson Christ had taught them, which they had forgotten, and which would be to seek when they had occasion for it; many things they did not retain the remembrance of, because they did not rightly understand the meaning of; the Spirit shall not teach them a new gospel, but bring to their minds that which they had been taught, by leading them into the understanding of it. Thus apostles were all of them to preach, and some of them to write, the things that Jesus did and taught, to transmit them to distant nations and future ages; now if they had been left to themselves, herein, some needful things might have been forgotten, others misrepresented, through the treachery of their memories; therefore the Spirit is promised to enable them truly to relate and record what Christ said unto them. And to all the saints the Spirit of grace is given to be a remembrancer, and to him by faith and prayer we should commit the keeping of what we hear and know.

II. That they should be under the influence of his peace; (v. 27.) Peace I leave with you. When Christ was about to leave the world, he made his will; his soul he committed to his Father, his body he bequeathed to Joseph, to be decently interred, his clothes fell to the soldiers, his mother he left to the care of John; but what should he leave to his poor disciples, that had left all for him? Silver and gold are laid up for his poor servants; but he left them peace. But he left peace to them, and an infinitely better, his peace. "I leave you, but I leave my peace with you. I not only give you a title to it, but put you in possession of it." He did not part in anger, but in love; for this was his farewell, Peace I leave with you, as a dying father leaves portions to his children; and this is a worthy portion. Observe,

1. The legacy that is here bequeathed, Peace, my peace. Peace is put for all good, and Christ has left us all the needful good, all that is really and truly good, all the purchased promised good. Peace is put for reconciliation and love; the peace bequeathed is peace with God, peace with one another; peace in our own bosoms, that seems to be especially mean, a tranquillity of mind arising from sense of our justification before God. It is the counterpart of our pardons, and the composure of our minds. This Christ calls his peace, for he is himself our Peace, Eph. 2. 14. It is the peace he purchased for us, and preached to us, and on which the angels congratulated men at his birth, Luke 2. 14.

2. To whom this legacy is bequeathed; "To you, my disciples and followers, that will be exposed to trouble, and have need of peace; to you that are the sons of peace, and are qualified to receive it." This legacy was left to them as the representatives of the church, to them and their successors, to them and all true christians in all ages.

3. In what manner it is left. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you. That is, (1.) I do not compliment you with, Peace be unto you; n, it is not a mere formality, but a real blessing. (2.) The peace I give is of such a nature, that the smiles of the world cannot give it, nor the frowns of the world take it away. Or, (3.) The gifts I give you, are not such as this world gives to its children and votaries, that it is kind to. The world's gifts are only for the poor and time; Christ's gifts enrich the soul for eternity: the world gives lying vanities, and that which will cheat us; Christ gives substantial blessings, which will never fail us. The world gives and takes, Christ gives a good part that shall never be taken away. (4.) The peace which Christ gives, is infinitely more valuable than that which the world gives. The world's peace begins in ignorance, consists with sin, and ends in endless troubles; Christ's peace begins in grace, consists with no allowed sin, and ends at length in everlasting peace. As is the difference between a killing lethargy and a reviving refreshing sleep, such is the difference between Christ's peace and the world's.

4. What use they should make of it; Let not your heart be troubled, for any evil past or present, neither let it be afraid of any evil to come. Note, They that are interested in the covenant of grace, and entitled to the peace which Christ gives, ought not to yield to overwhelming griefs and fears. This comes in here as the conclusion of the whole matter; he had said, (v. 1.) Let not your heart be troubled, and here he repeats it, as that which he had now given sufficient reason for.

28. Ye have heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If I loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said I go unto the Father: for my Father is greater than I. 29. And now I have told you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to pass, ye might believe. 30. Hereafter will I not talk much with you: for the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me. 31. But that the world may know that I love the Father; and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. Arise, let us go hence.

Christ here gives his disciples another reason, why their hearts should not be troubled for his going away; and that is, because his heart was not. And here he tells them what it was that enabled him to endure the cross, and despise the shame, that they might look unto him, and run with patience. He comforted himself, 1. That though he went away, he should come again; "Ye have heard how I have said, and now I say it again, I go away, and come again." Note, What we have heard of the doctrine of Christ, especially concerning his second coming, we have need to be told again, and again told, when we are under the power of any transport of passion, grief, or fear, or care, we forget that Christ will come again. See 1 Phil. 4. 3. Christ encouraged himself with this, in his sufferings and death, that he should come again, and the same should comfort us in our departure at death; we go away to come again; the leave we take of our friends at that parting, is only a good prelude to a final farewell. See 1 Thess. 4. 13, 14. 11. That he went to his Father; "If ye loved me, as by your sorrow ye say you do, ye would rejoice instead of mourning, because though I leave you, yet I said, I go unto the Father, not only mine, but yours, which will be my advancement and your advantage; for my Father is greater than I." Observe here, 1. It is matter of joy to Christ's disciples, that he is gone to the Father, to take possession for orphans, and make intercession for transgressors. His departure had a bright side as well as a dark side. Therefore he sent this message after his resurrection, (ch. 20. 17.) I ascend to my Father and your Father, as most comfortable. 2. The reason of this is, because the Father is greater than he, which, if it be a proper proof of faith, which it is, alleged, (as no doubt, it is,) must be understood thus, that his state with his Father would be much more excellent and glorious than his present state; his returning to his Father (so Dr. Hammond) would be the advancing of him to a much higher condition than that which he was now in. Or, thus, His going to the Father himself, and bringing all his followers to him there, was the ultimate end of his undertaking, and therefore greater than the mean. This makes the character of expectations of his disciples to something greater than that which now they thought all their happiness bound up in. The kingdom of the Father, wherein he shall be all in all, will be greater than the mediatorial kingdom. 3. The disciples of Christ should show that they love him by their rejoicing in the glories of his exaltation, which is, alleged, (as no doubt, it is,) must be understood thus, that he is gone to his Father, where he would be, and where we shall shortly with him. Many that love Christ, let their love run out in a wrong channel; they think if they love him, they must be continually in pain of him; whereas they that love him, should dwell at ease in him, should rejoice in Christ Jesus. III. That his going away, compared with the prophecies which went before of it, would be a means of confirming the faith of his disciples; (v. 29.) I have told you before it come to pass, that I must die and rise again, and ascend to the Father, and send the Comforter, that, when it is come to pass, ye might believe. See this reason, ch. 13. 19. - 16. 4. Christ told his disciples of his death, though he knew it would both puzzle them and grieve them, because it would afterward redound to the confirmation of their faith in two things. 1. That he who foretold these things, had a divine presence, and knew beforehand what a day would bring forth. When St. Paul was going to Jerusalem, he knew not the things that did abide him there, but Christ did. 2. That the things foretold were according to the divine purpose and designation, not sudden resolves, but the counsels of an eternal counsel. Let them therefore make no resolution, no resolution, but be for the confirmation of their faith, and so would redound to their real benefit; for the trial of our faith is very precious, though it cost us present heaviness, through manifold temptations, 1 Pet. 1. 6. IV. That he was sure of a victory over Satan, with whom he knew he was to have a struggle in his departure; (v. 30.) Henceforth I will not talk much with you. Satan's power may be adjusted to the purging out the Spirit. He had a great deal of good talk with them after this; (ch. 15. and 16.) but, in comparison with what he had said, it was not much. His time was now short, and he therefore spake largely to them now, because the opportunity will soon be over. Note, We should always endeavour to talk to the purpose, because perhaps we may not have time to talk much. We know not how soon our breath will be stopped, and therefore should be always breathing something that is good. When we come to be sick, and die, perhaps we may not be capable of talking much to those about us; and therefore what good counsel we have to give them, let us give it while we are in health. 1. The reason why he would not talk much with them, was, because he had now other work to apply himself to; The prince of this world comes; he called the devil the prince of this world, ch. 12. 31. The disciples dreamed of their Master being the prince of this world, and they, worldly princes under him. But Christ tells them that the prince of this world was his enemy, and so were the princes of this world, that were actuated and ruled by him, 1 Cor. 2. 8. But he has nothing in more need of a strong temptation than the world, and the world's prince, and therefore he had need also of this piece of comfort, that he could in some degree resist them. 1. The prospect Christ had of an approaching conflict, not only with men, but with the powers of darkness. The devil had set upon him with his temptations, (Matt. 4.) had offered him the kingdom of this world, if he would hold them as tributary to him, with an eye to which, Christ called him in disdain, the prince of this world; then the devil departed from him for a season; But now, says Christ, I see him rallying again, preparing to make a furious onset, and so to gain that by terrors, which he could not gain by allurements; to frighten from his undertaking, whom he could not entice from it. Note, The foresight of a temptation gives us great advantage in our resistance of it; for, being forewarned, we should be forearmed. While we are here, we may see Satan continually coming against us, and ought therefore to be always upon our guard. 2. The assurance he had of good success in the conflict; He hath nothing in me, &c. 40. - He hath nothing at all. 1. There was no fault in Christ to give authority to the prince of this world in his terras. The devil is said to have the power of death; (Heb. 2. 14.) the Jews called him the devil; he was every man's enemy. Now Christ having done so much, he had no legal power against him, and therefore, though he prevailed to crucify him, he could not prevail to terrify him; though he hurried him to death, yet not to despair. When Satan comes to disquiet us, he has something in us to perplex us with, for we have all sinned; but when he would disturb Christ, he found no occasion against him. (2.) There was no corruption in Christ to give advantage to the prince of this world in his temptations; he could not crush his undertaking by drawing him to sin, because there was nothing sinful in him, nothing irregular for his temptations to fasten upon, no tender for him to strike fire into; such was the spotless purity of him, that he was above the possibility of sinning. The more Satan's interest is in us crushed, and destroyed, the more comfortably we may expect sufferings and death.

V. That his departure was in compliance with, and obedience to, his Father. Satan could not force his life from him, and yet he would die; that the world may know that I love the Father, v. 31. We may take this,

1. As confirming what he had often said, that his undertaking, as Mediator, was a demonstration to the world, (1.) Of his compliance with the Father; hereby it appeared that he loved the Father. As it was an evidence of his love to man, that he died for his salvation; so it was of his love to God, that he died for his glory, and the accomplishing of his purposes. Let the world know that between the Father and the Son there is no love lost. As the Father loved the Son, and gave him all power in heaven and earth, so the Son loved the Father, and gave his Spirit into his hand. (2.) Of his obedience to his Father; "As the Father gave me commandment, even so I did the thing commanded, in the manner commanded." Note, The best evidence of our love to the Father, is, our doing as he hath given us commandment. As Christ loved the Father, and obeyed him, even to the death; so we must love Christ, and obey him. Christ's eye to the Father's commandment, obliging him to suffer and die, bore him up with cheerfulness, and overcame the reluctancies of nature; this took off the offence of the cross, that what he did was by order from the Father; the command of God is sufficient to bear us out in that which is most disputed by others, and therefore should be suffered, even to the death, because we must love Christ, and obey him.

2. As concluding what he had now said; having brought it to this, here he leaves it; that the world may know that I love the Father, you shall see how cheerfully I can meet the appointed cross; "Arise, let us go hence to the garden," so some; or to Jerusalem. When we talk of troubles at a distance, it is easy to say, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest; but when it comes to the pinch, when an unavoidable cross lies in the way of duty, then to say, "Arise, let us go to meet it, instead of going out of our way to miss it," this lets the world know that we love the Father. If this discourse was at the close of the passover-supper, it should seem that at these words he says the disciples must retire to the withdrawing room, where he might the more freely carry on the discourse with his disciples in the following chapters, and pray with them. Dr. Goodwin's remark upon this, is, that Christ mentioning the great motive of his sufferings, his Father's commandment, was in all haste to go forth to suffer and die, because he sees the time of Judas's betraying him; "Arise, says he, let us go forth hence, he looks upon the glass, as it were, sees it not quite out, and therefore sits down again, and preaches another sermon.

Now, (1.) In these words he gives his disciples an encouragement to follow him. He does not say, I will go, but, Let us go. He calls them out to no hardships, but what he himself goes before them, as their leader. They had promised they would not desert him; "Come," says he, "let us go then; let us see how you will make the words good." (2.) He gives them an example, teaching them at all times, especially in suffering times, to sit loose to common things below, and often to think and speak of leaving them. Though we sit easy, and in the midst of the delights of an agreeable conversation, yet we must not think of being here always; Arise, let us go hence. If it were at the close of the paschal and eucharistical supper, it teaches us that the solemnities of our communion with God are not to be considered as constant in this world. When we sit down under Christ's table, we must consider it to be good to be here; yet we must think of rising and going hence; going down from the mount.

CHAP. XV.

It is generally agreed that Christ's discourse in this and the next chapter, was at the close of his last supper, the night in which he was betrayed, and it is a continued discourse, not interrupted as that in the foregoing chapter was; and what he chooses to discourse of is very pertinent to the present sad occasion of a farewell sermon. Now that he was about to leave them, 1. They would be tempted to leave him, and return to Moeris again; and therefore he tells them, how necessary it was that they should by faith adhere to him, and abide in him. 2. They would be tempted to grow strange one to another; and therefore he presses it upon them that they should love one another, and keep up that communion when he was gone, which had hitherto been their comfort. 3. They would be tempted to shrink from their apostleship, when they met with hardships; and therefore he prepares them to bear the shock of the world's ill-will. There are four words, to which his discourse in this chapter may be reduced; 1. Fruit, v. 1., 8. 2. Love, v. 9., 17. 3. Hatred, v. 18., 25. 4. The Comforter, v. 26., 27.

I AM the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. 2. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. 3. Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you. 4. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me. 5. I am the vine, ye are the branches: He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing. 6. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned. 7. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you. 8. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples.

Here Christ discourses concerning the fruit, the fruits of the Spirit, which his disciples were to bring forth, under the similitude of a vine. Observe here,

1. The doctrine of this similitude; what notion we ought to have of it: 1. That Jesus Christ is the vine, the true vine. It is an instance of the humility of Christ, that he is pleased to speak of himself under low and humble comparisons. He that is the Sun of righteousness, and the bright and morning Star, compares himself to a vine. The church, which is Christ mystical, is a vine; (Ps. 80. 8.) so is Christ, who is the church assigned. Christ and his church are thus set forth.

1. He is the vine, planted in the vineyard, and not a spontaneous product; planted in the earth, for he is the Word made flesh. The vine has an insinuous, unpromising outside; and Christ had no form, nor comeliness, Isa. 53. 2. The vine is a spreading plant, and Christ will be known, Salvation to the ends of the earth. The fruit of the vine honours God, and cheerers man; (Judg. 9. 13.) so ought a Christian's mediation; it is better than gold, Prov. 8. 19.

2. He is the true vine, as truth is opposed to pretence and counterfeit; he is really a fruitful plant, a plant of renown. He is not like that wild vine, which deceived those who gathered of it; (2 Kings 4. 38.) but a true vine. Unfruitful trees are said to be, (Hab. 3. 17. marg.) but Christ is a vine that will not deceive. Whatever excellence there is in any creature, serviceable to man, it is but the shadow of that grace which is in Christ for his people's good. He is that true vine typified by Judah's vine, which enriched him with the blood of the grape, (Gen. 49. 11.) by Joseph's vine, the branches of which ran over the wall, (Gen. 49. 22.) by Israel's vine, under which he dwelt safely, 1 Kings 4. 25.

2. That believers are branches of this vine, which springs from the root of his love, and of which the light is unseen, and our life is hid with Christ; the root bears the tree, (Rom. 11. 18.) diffuses sap to it, and is all in all to its flourishing and fruitfulness; and in Christ are all supports and supplies. The branches of the vine are many, some on one side of the house or wall, others on the other side; yet, meeting in the root, are all but one vine; thus all good Christians, though in place and opinion distant from each other, yet meet in Christ, the centre of their unity. Believers, like the branches of the vine, are weak, and insufficient to stand of themselves, but as they are borne up. See Ezek. 15. 2.

3. That the Father is the husbandman, the land-worker. Though the earth in the Lord's, it yields him no fruit unless he work it. God has not only a property in, but a care of, the vine and all the branches. He hath planted, and gathered, and gives the increase; for we are God's husbandry, 1 Cor. 3. 9. See Isa. 5. 1, 2.—27. 2, 3. He had an eye upon Christ, the root, and upheld him, and made him to flourish out of a dry ground. He has an eye upon all the branches, and prunes them, and watches over them, that nothing hurt them. Never was any husbandman so wise, so watchful about his vineyard, as God is about his church, which therefore must needs prosper.

II. The duty taught us by this similitude, which is, to bring forth fruit, and, in order to that, to abide in Christ.

1. We must be fruitful. From a vine we look for grapes, (Isa. 5. 2.) and from a Christian we look for fruitfulness, for that is the fruit, a Christian temper and disposition, a Christian life, a Christian act, and Christian design. We must honour God, and do good, and exemplify the purity and power of the religion we profess; and this is bearing fruit. The disciples here must be fruitful, as Christians, in all the fruits of righteousness, and as apostles, in diffusing the savour of that knowledge. To persuade them to this, he urges,

1. The doom of the unfruitful. (v. 2.) they are taken away. It is here intimated, that there are many who profess for branches in Christ, who yet do not bear fruit. Were they really united to Christ by faith, they would bear fruit; but, being only tied to him by the thread of an outward profession, though they seem to be branches, they will soon be seen to be dry ones; unfruitful professors are unfruitful professors; professors, and no more. It might be read, Every branch that beareth not fruit in me, and it comes much to one; for they that do not bear fruit in Christ, and in his spirit and grace, are as if they had not fruit at all. He says, (v. 3.) It is not threatened, that they shall be taken away, in justice to them and in kindness to the rest of the branches. From him that has not yet united with Christ, and fruit produced thereby, shall be taken away even that which he seemed to have, Luke 8. 18. Some think this refers primarily to Judas.

2. The fruitful branches must bear fruit; be fruitful, for they purge the vine; the more fruitful, the purer. (v. 4.) fruit. Note: [1.] Further fruitfulness is the blessed reward of former fruitfulness. The first blessing was, Ye shall be fruitful, and it is still a great blessing. (Gen. 1.) Even fruitful branches, in order to their further fruitfulness, have need of purging, or pruning; or—\he taketh away that which is superfluous and luxuriant, which hinders its growth and fruitfulness.

The best hope that in them which is present, about amputandum—something which should be taken away; some notions, passions, or humours, that want to be purged away, which Christ has promised to do by his word, and Spirit, and providence: and these shall be taken off by degrees in the proper season. [2.] The purging of fruitful branches, in order to their greater fruitfulness, is the care and work of the husbandman, or husbandry, of Christ.

(3.) The benefits which believers have by the doctrine of Christ, the power of which they should labour to exemplify in a fruitful conversation; (v. 5.) Now ye are clean.

[1.] Their society was clean, now that Judas was expelled by that word of Christ, Whosoever doeth, do quickly; and till they were get clean of him, they were not all clean. The word of Christ is a distinguishing word, and separates between the precious and the vile; it will purify the church of the first-born in the great dividing day.

[2.] They were each of them clean, that is, sanctified, by the truth of Christ; (ch. 17. 17.) that faith by which they received the word of Christ, purified their hearts, Acts 15. 9. The Spirit of grace by the word refined them from the dress of the world and the flesh; and purged out of them the leaven of the Hebrews and Egyptians; from which, when they saw their invertebrate rage and enmity against their Master, they were now pretty well cleansed. Apply it to all believers. The word of Christ is spoken to them; there is a cleansing virtue in that word, as it works grace, and works out corruption; it cleanses as fire cleanses the gold from its dross, and as physic cleanses the body from its disease. We then evidence that we are cleansed by the word, when we bring forth fruit unto holiness. Perhaps, here is an allusion to the law concerning vineyards in Canaan; the fruit of them was as unclean, and unmercised, the three first years after it was planted; and the fourth year it was to be holiness of praise unto the Lord; and then it was clean, Lev. 19. 23. 34. The disciples had now been three years under Christ's instruction; and now ye are clean.

(4.) The glory that will redound to God by our fruitfulness, with that comfort and honour that will come to ourselves by it, v. 8. If we bear much fruit.

[1.] Herein our Father will be glorified. The fruitfulness of the apostles, as such, in the diligent discharge of their office, would be to the glory of God in the conversion of souls, and the evidence of them up to him, Rom. 15. 9, 16. The fruitfulness of all Christians, in a lower and narrower sphere, is to the glory of God. By the eminent good works of Christians many are brought to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

[2.] So shall we be Christ's disciples indeed, ap proving ourselves so, and making it to appear that we are really what we call ourselves. So shall we both evidence our discipleship, and adorn it, and be to our Master for a name, and a praise, and a glory, that is, disciples indeed, Jer. 13. 11. So shall we be endued with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and have the reward of disciples, a share in the joy of our Lord. And the more fruit we bring forth, the more we abound in that which is good, the more he is glorified.

2. In order to our fruitfulness, we must abide in Christ, must keep up our union with him by faith, and do all we do in religion in the virtue of that union. Here is (4.) The duty enjoined; (v. 4.) Abide in me, and I in you. Note, It is the great concern of all Christ's disciples, constantly to keep up a dependence upon Christ, and communion with him; habitually to adhere to him, and actually to derive fruit from him. Those that are come to Christ, must abide in him; “Abide in me, by faith; and I in you, by my Spirit; abide in me, and then fear not; but I will abide in you.” For the communion between Christ and believers never fails on his side. We must abide in Christ's word by a regard to it, and it in us as a light to our feet. We must abide in Christ's merit as our righteousness and plea, and it in us as our support and comfort. The knot of the branch abides in the vine, and the sap of the vine abides in the branch, and so there is a constant communication between them.

(2.) The necessity of our abiding in Christ, in order to our fruitfulness; (v. 4, 5.) Ye cannot bring forth fruit, except ye abide in me; but if ye do, ye bring forth much fruit; for, in short, without me, or separate from me, ye can do nothing.” So necessary is it to our comfort and happiness, that we be fruitful, that the best argument to engage us to abide in Christ, is, that otherwise we cannot be fruitful.

[1.] Abiding in Christ is in order to our doing much good. He that is constant in the exercise of faith in Christ and love to him, that lives upon his promises and is led by his Spirit, he brings forth much fruit, he is very serviceable to God's glory, and his own account in the great day. Note, Union with Christ is a noble principle, productive of all good. A life of love and obedience to Christ, is incomparably the most excellent life a man can live in this world; it is regular and even, pure and heavenly, it is useful and comfortable, and all that answers the end of life.

[2.] It is necessary to our doing any good. It is not only a means of cultivating and increasing what good there is already in us, but it is the root and spring of all good; “Without me ye can do nothing: not only no great things, but the sick, the dead, but nothing.” Note, We have as necessary and constant a dependence upon the grace of the Mediator for all the spiritual and divine life, as we have upon the providence of the Creator for all the actions of the natural life; for, as to both, it is in the divine power, that we live, move, and have our being. Derived from the merit of Christ, we can do nothing; it is a blessing in the Christian to have God's grace, and for God to have grace to us. We are nothing towards our sanctification. Without Christ, we can do nothing aright, nothing that will be Fruit pleasing to God, or profitable to ourselves, 2 Cor. 3. 5. We depend upon Christ, not only, as the vine upon the wall, for support; but, as the branch on the root, for sap.

(3.) The fatal consequences of forsaking Christ; (v. 6.) If a tree be not in the vine, it is cast forth as a branch. This is a description of the fearful state of hypocrites that are not in Christ; and of apostates that abide not in Christ.

[1.] They are cast forth as dry and withered branches, which are plucked off because they cumber the tree. It is just that they should have no be-neft by Christ, who think they have no need of him; and that they who reject him, should be rejected by him; those that abide not in Christ, shall be abandoned by him; they are left to themselves, and left to their own devices and dispositions, and they are justly cast out of the communion of the faithful.

[2.] They are withered, as a branch broken off from the tree. That they abide not in Christ, though they may flourish a while in a plausible, at least a passable profession, yet in a little time they wither and come to nothing. Their parts and gifts wither, their zeal and devotion wither; their credit and reputation is lost, they are cast off; Job 8. 11-13. Note. They that bear no fruit, after a while will bear no leaves. How soon is that fig-tree withered away, which Christ has cursed!

[3.] Men gather them. Satan's agents and emissaries pick them up, and make an easy prey of them. They that fall off from Christ, presently fall in with sinners; and the sheep that wander from Christ's fold, the devil stands ready to seize them for himself. When the Spirit of the Lord was departed from Saul, an evil spirit possessed him.

[4.] They cast them into the fire, that is, they are cast into the fire; and they who seduce them and draw them to sin, do in effect cast them there; for they made them children of hell. Fire is the fittest place for withered branches, for they are good for nothing else, Ezek. 15. 2.

[5.] They are burnt. That follows of course; but it is here added emphatically, and makes the threatening very terrible; they will not be consumed in a moment, like thorns under a pot, (Ecc. 7. 6.) but as it is, they are burning for ever in a fire, which not only cannot be quenched, but will never spend itself. This comes of quitting Christ, this is the end of barren trees. Apostates are twice dead; (Luke 12.) and when it is said, They are cast into the fire and are burned, it speaks as if they were twice damned. Some apply men's gathering them, to the ministry of the angels in the great day, when they shall gather out of Christ's kingdom all things that offend, and shall bundle the tares for the fire.

(4.) The blessed privilege which they have, that abide in Christ; (v. 7.) If my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will of my Father in my name, and it shall be done for you.

See here, [1.] How our union with Christ is maintained, by the word; If ye abide in me, he had said before, and I in you; here he explains himself, and my words abide in you; for in it is the word that Christ is set before us, and offered to us, Rom. 10. 6-8. It is in the word that we receive and embrace him; and so where the word of Christ dwells richly, there Christ dwells. If the word be our constant guide and monitor, if it be in us at home, then we abide in Christ, and he in us.

[2.] How our communion with Christ is maintained—by prayer; Ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done to you. And what can we desire more than to have what we will for the asking? Note, They that abide in Christ as their hearts' delight, shall have, through Christ, the very things that we shall not ask for nothing that is good for us. Two things are implied in this premise: First, That if we abide in Christ, and his word in us, we will not ask any thing but what is proper to be done for us. The promises abiding in us, lie ready to be turned into prayers; and the prayers so regulated, cannot but speed. Secondly, That if we abide in Christ and his word, we shall have such an interest in God's favour and Christ's mediation, that we shall have an answer of peace to all our prayers.

9. As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love.
If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love: even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. 11. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full. 12. This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you. 13. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. 14. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you. 15. Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you. 16. Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain: that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you. 17. These things I command you, that ye love one another.

Christ, who is love itself, is here discoursing concerning love, and love in a fourfold way. 1. Concerning the Father's love to him: and concerning this he here tells us, 1. That the Father did love him; (v. 9.) As the Father hath loved me. He loved him as Mediator: This is my beloved Son. He was the Son of his love. He loved him, and gave all things into his hand; and yet so loved the world, as to deliver him up for us all. 2. That he abode in his Father's love; v. 10. He continually loved his Father, and was beloved of him. Even then, when he was made sin and a curse for us, and it pleased the Lord to bruise him; yea he abode in his Father's love. See Ps. 89. 33. Because he continued to love his Father, he went cheerfully through his sufferings, and therefore his Father continued to love him. 3. That therefore he abode in his Father's love, because he kept his Father's law; I have kept my Father's commandments, as Mediator, and so abide in his love. Herby he showed that he continued to love his Father, that he went on, and went through, with his undertaking, and therefore the Father continued to love him. His soul delighted in him, because he did not fail, nor was discouraged, Isa. 42. 1. 4. We having broken the law of creation, and thereby thrown ourselves out of the love of God; Christ satisfied for us by obeying the law of redemption, and so he abode in his love, and restored us to it. 11. Concerning his own love to his disciples, that he leaves them, he loves them. And observe here, 1. The pattern of this love: As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you. A strange expression of the condescending grace of Christ! As the Father loved him, who was most worthy, he loved them, who were most unworthy. The Father loved him as his Son, and he loves them as his children. So gave all things into his hand; so, with himself, he freely gives us all things. The Father loved him as Mediator, as head of the church, and the great trustee of divine grace and favour, which he had not for himself only, but for the benefit of these for whom he was ordained; and, says he, I have been a faithful trustee. As the Father has committed his love to me, so I transmit it to you. Therefore the Father was well pleased with him, that he might be well pleased with us in him; and loved him, that in him, as he might, he might make us happy. Eph. 3. 8. 2. The means and products of this love, which are four: (1.) Christ loved his disciples, for he laid down his life for them; (v. 15.) Greater love hath no man than this, to lay down his life for his friend. And this is the love wherewith Christ hath loved us, he is our life:—and for us, body for body; and, because he was made sin and a curse for us, God's love is so deep that he will give himself for us, and foresaw how dear the engagement would cost him. Observe here, 1. The extent of the love of Christ to the children of men to one another; the highest proof of it is, laying down one's life for a friend to save his life, and perhaps there have been some such heroic achievements of love, more than licking out one's own eyes. Gal. 4. 15. If all that a man has he will give for his life, he that gives that for his friend, gives all, and can give no more; this may sometimes be our duty, 1 John 3. 16. Paul was ambitious of the honour: (Phil. 2. 17.) and for a good man some will even dare to die, Rom. 3. 7. It is love in the highest degree, which is strong as death. 2. The excellency of the love of Christ beyond all other love; he laid down his life on the thousandth of the world: others have laid down their lives, content that they should be taken from them; but Christ gave up his was not merely passive, but made it his own act and deed. The life which others have laid down, has been but of equal value with the life for which it was laid down, and perhaps less valuable; but Christ is infinitely more valuable than ten thousand of others who have laid down their lives for their friends, but Christ laid down his for us, when we were enemies, Rom. 5. 8. Plunged sinner out justified cordial consent, gave me myself to incomparable divine amoris sanctitius—These hearts must be harder than iron or stone, which are not soften'd by such incomparable sweetness of divine love. Calvin. 3. Christ loved his disciples, and he took them into a covenant of friendship with himself; (p. 14. 15. ) If we approve ourselves by your obedience my disciples indeed, we are my friends, and shall be treated as friends. Note, The followers of Christ are the friends of Christ, and he is graciously pleased to call and count them so. They do the duty of his servants, are admitted and advanced to the dignity of his friends. David had one servant in his court, and Solomon one in his, that was in a particular manner, the king's friend; (2 Sam. 15. 57. 1 Kings 4. 5.) but this honour have all Christ's servants. We may in some particular instances be friends to a stranger; but we espouse all the interests of a friend, and concern ourselves in all his cares: thus Christ takes believers to be his friends, he visits them, and converses with them, as his friends; and so some of his disciples in the particular afflictions of their afflictions, and takes pleasure in their prosperity; he pleads for them in heaven, and takes care of all their interests there. Have friends but one soul? He that is joined to the Lord, is one spirit, 1 Cor. 6. 17. Though they often dwell themselves unfriendly, he is a friend that loves at all times. Observe how endearingly this is expressed here. 1. He will not call them servants, though they called him Master and Lord. They that would be like Christ in honour, must not take a side in sitting upon all occasions in their authority and arbitrarily, but remember that their servants are their fellow-servants. But, [2.] He will call them his friends; he will not only love them, but will let them know it; for in his tongue is the law of kindness. After his resurrection he seems to speak with more affectionate tenderness of and to his disciples than before; Go to my brethren, (ch. 20. 17.) Children, have ye any meat, ch. 21. 5. But observe, though Christ called them his friends, that called the Father, like ordains, should and shall be fruitful; should labour, and shall not labour in vain. Secondly, That it might be perpetuated; that the fruit should remain, that the good effect of their labours may continue in the world, from generation to generation, to the end of time. The church of Christ was not to be a short-lived thing, as many of the sects of the philosophers, that were a nine days' wonder; it did not come up in a night, nor should it perish in a night, but be as the days of heaven. The sermons and writings of the apostles are transmitted, and in the future ages to the end of the world, to be an imperishable foundation, even since the Christian church was first founded by the ministry of the apostles and seventy disciples; as one generation of ministers and Christians has passed away, still another has come. By virtue of that great charter, (Matt. 28. 19.) Christ has a church in the world, which, as our lawyers say of bodies corporate, does not die, but lives in a succession, and abides in the world to this day, and shall do while the world remains.

Lastly, His love to them appeared in the interest they had at the throne of grace; Whatever ye shall ask of my Father in my name, he will give it you. Probably, this refers in the first place to the power of working miracles, which the apostles were clothed with, which was to be drawn out by prayer. It may be a figure of speech, as in Matt. 10. 8. Let them go forth, and declare the perfection of your labours, whatever help from heaven ye have occasion for at any time, it is but ask and have. Three things are here hinted to us for our encouragement in prayer, and very encouraging they are. [1.] That we have a God to go to, who is a Father; Christ here calls him the Father, both mine and yours; and the Spirit in the word and in the heart teaches us to cry, Abba, Father. [2.] That we come in good name. Whichever we draw up and we come upon the throne of grace, according to God's will, we may with a humble boldness mention Christ's name in it, and plead that we are related to him, and he is concerned for us. [3.] That an answer of peace is promised us. What ye come for, shall be given you. This great promise made to that great duty, keeps up a comfortable and gauding intercourse between heaven and earth.

III. Concerning the disciples' love to Christ, enjoin'd in consideration of the great love where with he had loved them. Three things he exhorts them to:

1. To continue in his love; (v. 9.) "Continue in your love to me, and in mine to you." Both may be taken in. We must place our happiness in the continuance of Christ's love to us, and make it our business to give continued proofs of our love to Christ, that nothing may tempt us to withdraw from him, or provoke him to withdraw from us. Note, All that love Christ, should continue in their love to him, that is, be always loving him, and taking all occasions to shew it, and love to the end. The disciples were to go out upon service for Christ, in which they would meet with many troubles, that says Christ, "Continue in my love. Keep up your love with care, and then all the troubles ye meet with will be easy; love made seven years' hard service easy to Jacob. Let not the troubles ye meet with for Christ's sake, quench your love to Christ, but quicken it rather." 2. To let his joy remain in them, and fill them, v. 11. This he designed in those precepts and promises to them. [1.] That his joy might remain in them. The words are so placed in the original, that they may be read either.

[1.] That my joy in you may remain. If they bring forth much fruit, and continue in his love, he will continue to rejoice in them, as he had done. Note, Fruitful and faithful disciples are the joy of the Lord Jesus; he rests in his love to them, Zeph. 3. 17. As there is a transport of joy in heaven in the conversion of sinners, so there is a remaining joy in the perseverance of saints.
[2.] Or, that my joy, that is, your joy in me, may remain. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should constantly and continually rejoice in him, Phil. 4. 4. The joy of the hypocrite is but for a moment, but the joy of those who abide in Christ's love is a continual feast. The word of the Lord enduring for ever, the joys that flow from it, and are founded on it, do so too.

[2.] "That your joy may be full; not only that you might be full of joy, but that your joy in me and in my love may rise higher and higher, till it come to perfection, when we enter into the joy of your Lord." Note, 1. They, and only they, that have Christ's joy remaining in them, have their joy full; worldly joys are empty, soon surfeit, but never satisfy; it is only wisdom's joy that will fill the soul, Ps. 36. 8. 2. The design of Christ in his word is to fill the joy of his people; see 1 John 1. 4. This and the other he hath said, that our joy might be fuller and fuller, and perfect at last.

3. To evidence their love to him, by keeping his commandments; (v. 10.) If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love. That will be an evidence of the fidelity and constancy of your love to me, and then you may be sure of the continuance of my love to you. (1.) Then promise: Ye shall abide in my love, as in a dwelling-place, at home in Christ's love; as in a resting-place, at ease in Christ's love; as in a strength-hold, safe in it. Ye shall abide in my love, ye shall have grace and strength to persevere in loving me. If the same hand that first shed abroad the love of Christ in our hearts, did not keep us in that love, we should not long abide in it, but, through the love of the world, should go out of doors with Christ behind.

(2.) The condition of the promise; If ye keep my commandments. The disciples were to keep Christ's commandments, not only by a constant conformity to them themselves, but by a faithful delivery of them to others; they were to keep them as trustees, in whose hands great deposit was I deeds, for they were to teach all things that Christ had commanded, Matt. 28. 20. This commandment they must keep without spot, (1 Tim. 6. 14.) and thus they must shew that they abide in his love.

To induce them to keep his commandments, he wrou.

[1.] His own example; as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love, Christ submitted to the law of mediation, and so preserved the honour and dignity of it, to teach us to submit to the law of the Mediator, and so preserve the honour and comfort of our relation to him.

[2.] The necessity of it to their interest in him; (v. 14.) Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you, and not otherwise. Note, First, Those only will be accounted Christ's faithful friends, that approve themselves his obedient servants for you, and so shew that they are, and that they shall be treated as his enemies. Idem vel ut plene co detum vera est amicitia. Friendship involves a fellowship of aversions and attachments. Sallust. Secondly, It is universal obedience to Christ, that is, the only acceptable obedience; to obey him in everything that he commands us, not excepting, much less excepting against, any command which he gives us. 10. Concerning the disciples' love one another, enjoined as an evidence of their love to Christ, and a grateful return for his love to them. We must keep his commandments, and this is his commandment, that we love one another, v. 12. and again, v. 17. No one duty of religion is more frequently enjoined, or more pathetically urged upon us, by our Lord Jesus, than that of mutual love, and for good reason.

1. It is here recommended by Christ's pattern, (v. 12.) as I have loved you. Christ's love to us shewed direct and engage our love to each other; in that manner, and from that motive, we should love one another, as, and because, Christ has loved us. He here specifies some of the expressions of his love to them; he called them friends, communicated his mind to them, was ready to give them what they asked; Go ye and do likewise.

2. It is required by his precept. He introduces his authority, has made it one of the statutes laws of his kingdom. Observe how differently it is expressed in these two verses, and both very emphatical.

1. This is my commandment, (v. 12.) as it is the most necessary of all the commandments. As under the law the prohibition of idolatry was the commandment more insisted on than any other, foreseeing the people's delusion from the days of Christ, foreseeing the idleness of the Christian church to uncharitableness, has laid much stress upon this precept.

(2.) These things I command you, v. 17. He speaks as if he were about to give them many things in charge, and yet names this only, that ye love one another; not only because this includes many others, but because it will have a good influence upon all.

18. If the world hate ye, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. 19. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. 20. Remember the word that I said unto you. The servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep your's also. 21. But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me.

22. If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin. 23. He that hateth me hateth my Father also. 24. If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father.

25. But this cometh to pass, that the word might be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause.

Here Christ discourses concerning hatred, which is the character and genius of the devil's kingdom. Observe here,

1. Who they are, in whom this hatred is found; in the world, the children of this world, as distinguished from the children of God; who are in the interests of the god of this world, whose image they bear, and whose power they are subject to; all those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who would not come into the church of Christ, which he audibly calleth and visibly separates from this evil world. The citing of these the world, speaks, 1. Their number; there were a world of people that opposed Christ and Christianity. Lord, how were they increased, that troubled the Son of David! I fear if we should put it to the vote between Christ and Satan, Satan would out-vote us easily. 2. It speaks the hatred and enmity and combination; these peoples are best described, and are as the, Ps. 2. 13. Jews and Gentiles.
that could agree in nothing else, agreed to persecute Christ's ministers. 3. It speaks their spirit and disposition; they are men of the world. (Ps. 17. 13, 14.) wildly devoted to this world, and the things of it, and never thinking of another world. The people of God, though they are taught to hate the sin of sinners, yet not their persons, but to love and do good to all men. A malicious, spiteful, envious, spirit, is not the spirit of Christ, but of the world. Who they are against whom this hatred is excited; against the disciples of Christ, against Christ himself, and against the Father. 1. The world hates the disciples of Christ. The world hateth you. (v. 19.) and he speaks of it as that which they must expect and count upon, v. 18, as I John 3. 13. Observe how this comes in here. (1.) Christ has expressed the severity that he had for them as friends; but, lest they should be puzzled up with this, there was given them, as there was to Paul, a thorn in the flesh, that is, as it is explained there, reproaches and persecutions for Christ's sake, 2 Cor. 12. 7, 10. (2.) He had appointed them their work, but tells them what hardships they should meet with in it, that it might not be a surpise to them. They must prepare accordingly. (3.) He had charged them to love one another, and need enough they had to love one another, for the world would hate them; to be kind to one another, for they would have a great deal of unkindness and ill-will from these that were without. "Keep peace among yourselves, and that will fortify you against the world's quarrels with you." There that are in the list of enemies, are concerned to hold together. See, [1.] The world's enmity against the followers of Christ; it hateth them. Note, Whom Christ blesseth, the world curseth. The favourites and heirs of Heaven have never been the darlings of this world, since the old enmity was put between the seed of the woman and of the serpent. Why did Cain hate Abel, but because his works were righteous? Esau hated Jacob, because of the blessing; Joseph's brethren hated him, because his Father loved him; Saul hated David, because the Lord was with him; Ahab hated Micaiah, because of his prophecies; such are the causeless causes of the world's hatred. [2.] The fruits of that enmity. Two of which we have here. 1. They will persecute you, because they hate you, for hatred is a restless passion. It is the common lot of those who will live godly in Christ Jesus, to suffer persecution, 2 Tim. 3. 12. Christ foresaw all that ill-usage his ambassadors would meet with in the world, and yet, for the sake of those few that by their ministry were to be called out of the world, he sent them forth as sheep in the midst of wolves. Secondly, Anointed fruit of their enmity is implied, that the world would reject their doctrine; when Christ says, If they have kept my sayings, they will keep your's, he means, They will keep your's, and record your's, no more than they have regarded and kept mine. Note, The preachers of the gospel cannot but take the despising of their message to be the greatest injury that can be done to themselves; as it was a great affliction to Jeremiah, to say, Let us not give heed to any of your words, Jer. 18. 18. [3.] The causes of that enmity. The world will hate them, First, Because they do not belong to it; (v. 19.) "If we were of the world, of its spirit, and in its interests, if we were carnal and worldly, the world would love you, as its own; because ye are called out of the world, it hateth you, and ever will." Note, 1. We are not to wonder, if those that are devoted to the world, are caressed by it as its friends; most men bless the covetous, Ps. 10. 5.—39. 18. 2. Nor are we to wonder, if those that are delivered from the world, are maligned by it as its enemies; when Israel is rescued out of Egypt, the Egyptians will pursue them. Observe, There is no why Christ's disciples are not of the world, is not because they have by their own wisdom and virtue distinguished themselves from the world, but because Christ hath chosen them out of it, set them apart for himself; and this is the reason why the world hates them; (1.) It is a grace which by virtue of this choice they are designed for, sets them above the world, and so makes them the objects of its envy. The saints shall judge the world, and the upright have dominion, and therefore they are hated. (2.) The grace which by virtue of this choice they are endowed with, sets them against the world; they swim against the current of worldly, and are not conformed to it; they witness against the world by virtue of this choice to it. This would support them under all the calamities which the world's hatred would bring upon them, that therefore they were hated, because they were the choice and chosen ones of the Lord Jesus, and were not of the world. Now, (1.) This was no just cause for the world's hatred of them. If we do any thing to make ourselves hateful, we have reason to lament it; but if men hate us for that for which they should love and value us, we have reason to pity them, but no reason to perplex ourselves. Nay, (2.) This was just cause for their own joy. He that is hated because he is rich and prosperous, cares not who has the vexation of it, while he has the satisfaction of it. —Plinus me sibitat, at mihi plaudo. Ipe deplorant arboris, nescire pecunia. Let them hiss on, he cries, While in my own opinion fully blessed, Timon in Hor. Much more may they hug themselves, whom the world hates, but Christ loves. Secondli, Another cause of the world's hating you, will be, because you do belong to Christ, (v. 21.) for my name's sake. Here is the core of the controversy; whatever is pretended, this is the ground of the quarrel, they hate Christ's disciples because they bear his name, and bear up his name in the world. Note, 1. It is the character of Christ's disciples, that they stand up for his name. The name into which they were baptized, is that which they are to bear and live by; and 2. It has commonly been the lot of those that appear for Christ's name, to suffer for so doing; to suffer many things, and hard things, all these things. 3. It is matter of comfort to the greatest sufferers, if they suffer for Christ's name sake. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye. (1 Pet. 4. 14.) happy indeed, considering not only the honour that is imprinted upon their sufferings, (Acts 5. 41.) but the comfort that is infused into, and especially the crown of glory which those sufferings lead to. If we suffer with Christ, and for Christ, we shall reign with him. Thirdly, After all, it is the world's ignorance that is the true cause of its enmity to the disciples of Christ; (v. 21.) because they know not him that sent me. 1. They know not God. If men had but a due acquaintance with the very first principles of natural religion, and did but know God, though they would not embrace Christianity, yet they could not hate and persecute it. These have no knowledge, who eat up God's people, Ps. 14. 4. 2. They know not God, as he that sent our Lord Jesus, and authorized him to be the great Mediator of the peace. We do not rightly know God, if we do not know him in Christ, and they who persecute those whom he sends, make it to appear that they know not that he was sent of God. See 1 Cor. 2. 8. 2. The world hates Christ himself. And this is spoken of here for two ends. (1.) To mitigate the trouble of his followers, arisefing from the world's hatred, and to make it the less strange, and the less grievous: (p. 18.) We 'know that it hated me before, ye see.' We read it as signifying previous time; he began in the latter cut of suffering, and then left us to pledge him; but it may be read as speaking his superiority over them; 'Ye know that it hated me, your first, your chief and captain, your leader and commander.' [1] If Christ, who excelled in goodness, and was perfectly innocent and universally beloved, was hated, can we expect that any virtue or merit of our's should screen us from its fierce? [2] In every instance it appears on the face of our religion, more so much opposition in the planting of it, his servants and followers can look for no other in the propagating and professing it.

For this he refers them (p. 20.) to his own word, at their admission into discipleship; Remember the word that I said unto you. It would help us to understand Christ's latter sayings, to compare them with his former sayings. Nor would any thing contribute more to the making of us wise, than remembering the words of Christ, which will expand his providences. Now in this word there's,

First, A plain truth; The servant is not greater than the Lord. This he said to them, Matt. 10. 24. Christ is our Lord, and therefore we must diligently attend all his motions, and patiently obsequies in all his dispositions, for the servant is inferior to his master; to this Christ refers, in his words, to the servant and his master, and the word of grace, 'I'll be with them, and I'll be in them.' [2]

Secondly, A proper inference drawn from it, 'If they have persecuted me, as ye have seen and are likely to see much more. They will also persecute you; ye may expect it and count upon it.' 1. We will do the same things to you, they will do the same things to you; ye will reprove them for their sins, and call them to repentance, and give them strict rules of holy living, which they will not hear. 2. Ye cannot do more than I have done to oblige them; after so great an instance, let none wonder if they suffer ill for doing well. He adds, 'If they have kept my saying, they will keep your saying also;' as there have been such things among his people, will there be such among your people, 'If they have kept my saying, they will keep your saying also.'

(2.) It serves to aggravate the wickedness of this unbelieving world, and to discover its exceeding sinfulness; to hate and persecute the angels was had enough, but in them to hate and persecute Christ himself, was much worse. The world is generally in an ill name in scripture, and nothing can put it into a worse name than this, that it hated Jesus Christ. There is a world of people that are haters of Christ.

Two things he insists upon to aggravate the wickedness of these that hated him;

[1] That there was the greatest reason imaginable why they should love him; men's good words and good works recommend them; now as to Christ, [1] First, His words were such as merited their love; (p. 18.) 'If I had not spoken unto them, to count their sin, they had not had sin, their sin had been comparatively so. But now that I have said so much to them to recommend myself to their benevolence, they have no pretence, no excuse for their sin.' Observe here,

1. The advantage which they have, that enjoy the gospel; Christ it comes and speaks to them; he speaks in person to the men of that generation, and is still speaking to us by our Bibles and ministers, and as one that has the most unquestionable authority over us, and affection for us. For this reason it is that we carry solemnly presenting majesty, and in a condescending tenderness, able, one would think, to charm the dearest adder.

2. This is the reason which they have, that enjoy the gospel; 'If I had not spoken to them, if they had never heard of Christ and salvation by him, they had not had sin.' (1.) Not this kind of sin. They had not been chargeable with a contempt of Christ, it is true, but they might have been more of grace to them. As sin is not imputed where there is no heart, so unbelief is not imputed where there is no gospel: and where it is imputed, it is thus far the only damming sin, that being a sin against the remedy, other sins would not damn, if the guilt of them were not bound on with this. (2.) Not such a degree of sin. If they had not had the gospel among them, their other sins had not been so bad; for the words of grace are more than sufficient, if the words of grace are more than sufficient, to forgive us our sins, and be a safe ground from the wrath of God, and to deliver us from the wrath of God, and to deliver us from the judgments of God.

3. The aggravating guilt which they lie under, to whom Christ has come and spoken in vain, who in he has called and invited in vain, with whom he has reasoned and pleaded in vain; they have no cloak for their sin, they are altogether unexcusable, and in the judgment-day will be speechless, and not have a word to say to their condemnation. Note, The clearer and fuller the discoveries are, which are made of the grace and truth of Jesus Christ, the more is said to us, that is convincing and redeeming, the greater is our sin if we do not love him and believe in him. The word of Christ strips sin of its cloak, that it may appear sin.

Secondly, His works were such as merited their love, as well as his words (p. 24.) 'If I had not done among them, in their country, and before their eyes, such works as no other man ever did, they had not had sin; their unbelief and cuniny had been excusable; and they might have had some colour to say that my word was not to be credited, if otherwise confirmed but he produced satisfactory proofs of his divine mission, works which no other man did. Note. 1. As the Creator demonstrates his power and goodness by doing things which the creature itself cannot do, so the Redeemer. His miracles, his mercies, works of wonder, and works of grace, prove him sent of God, and sent on a kind errand. 2. Christ's works were such as no man ever did. No common person that had not a commission from heaven, and God with him, could work miracles, ch. 5. 2. And no prophet ever wrought such miracles, so many, so illustrous. Moses and Elias wrought miracles as servants by a derived power; but Christ, as a Son, by his own power. This was it that amazed the people, that with authority he commanded diseases and devils: (Mark 1. 27.) they owned they never saw the like, Mark 2. 12. They were all good works, works of mercy; and this seems especially intended here, for he is upholding them with this, that they hated him. One that was so universally useful in so many ways, was the man that the whole world, had thought, should have been universally beloved, and yet even he is hated. 3. The works of Christ enhance the guilt of sinners' infidelity and unbelief, unto him, to the last degree of wickedness and abominability. If they had only heard his words, and not seen his works; if we had only his sermons upon record, and not his miracles, unbelief might have pleaded want of proof; but it has no excuse: what we have seen of his miracles, by both his words and works, is that sin, not only of obtrusive unbelief, but of this ingratitude. They saw Christ to be most undeserving, and studious to do them a kindness; yet they hated him, and studied to do him mischief. And worst of his word that great love wherewith he lovedus, and yet are not wonted upon by it.

[2.] That there was no reason at all why they should hate him. What is said at one time will say and do not what is recommending, yet at another time will say and do that which is provoking and disabling; but our Lord Jesus not only did much to merit men's esteem and good-will, but never did any thing justly to incur their displeasure; this he pleads by quoting a scripture for it; (v. 23.)

"This comes to pass, this unceasing hatred of me, and of my disciples unto this, that the word might be fulfilled, which is written in their law," (that is, in the Old Testament, which is a law, and was received by them as a law,) "They hated me without a cause;" this David speaks of himself as a type of Christ, Ps. 35. 19.—68. 4. Note, First, They that hate Christ, hate him without any just cause; 'tis true to Christ is unreasonable enmity. We think those deserve to be hated, that are haughty and froward, but Christ is meek and lowly, compassionate and tender; those also that under colour of compliance are malicious, envious, and revengeful, but Christ devoted himself to the service of those that used him, nay, and of those that abused him; toiled for others' ease, and impover-ished himself, and that with all whole heart, we think most hateful, that are hurtful to kings and provinces, and disturbers of the public peace; but Christ, on the contrary, was the greatest blessing imaginable to his country, and yet was hated. He testified indeed that their works were evil, with a design to make them good, but to hate him for that cause was to hate him without a cause. Secondly, Herein the scripture was fulfilled, and the unfruitful answer'd the type. Saul and his courtiers hated David without cause, for he had been serviceable to him with his harp, and with his sword; Absalom and his party hated him, though to him he had been an indulgent father, and to them a great benefactor. Thus was the Son of David, hated and hunted most unjustly. They that hated Christ, did not design therein to fulfill the scripture; but God, in permitting it, had that in his eye; and it confirms our faith in Christ as the Messiah, that even this was foretold concerning him, and, being foretold, was accomplished in him. And we must not think it strange or hard, if it have a further accomplishment in us. We are apt to justify our complaints of injuries done us, with this, that they are causeless, whereas the more reasonable consideration is, that more be laid to the sufferings of Christ, and may be the more easily borne.

3. In Christ the world hates God himself; this is twice said here; (v. 23.) He that hateth me, though he thinks his hatred goes no further, yet really he hates my Father also. And again, v. 24. They have seen and hated both me and my Father. Note, (1.) There are those that hate God, notwithstanding the beauty of his nature, and the beauty of his pro- vidence; they are enraged at his justice, as the devils that believe it and tremble, are vexed at his dominion, and would gladly break his bands asunder. They who cannot bring themselves to deny that there is a God, and yet wish there were none, they see and hate him. (2.) Hatred of Christ will be construed and adjudged hatred of God, for he is in his person his Father's; the more like they are to the Son, they are the more odious to the divinity of Christ, and would gladly break his bands asunder. They who cannot bring themselves to deny that there is a God, and yet wish there were none, they see and hate him.

Now the fear of God. Let an unbelieving malignant world know that their enmity to the gospel of Christ, will be of no avail, in the person of Christ makes the blessed God himself; and let all that suffer for righteousness' sake, according to the will of God, take comfort from this; if God himself be hated in them, and struck at through them, they need not be either ashamed of their cause, or afraid of the issue.

26. But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: 27. And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning.

Christ having spoken of the great opposition which his gospel was likely to meet with in the world, and the hardships that would be put upon the preachers of it, lest any should fear that they and it would be run down by such violent torrent, he here intimates to all those that were well-wishers to his cause and interest, what effectual provision was made for the supporting it, both by the principal testimony of the Spirit, (v. 26.) and the subordinate testimony of the apostles; (v. 27.) and testimonies are the proper supports of truth.

1. It is here promised that the blessed Spirit shall maintain the cause of Christ in the world, notwithstanding the opposition it should meet with. Christ, when he was reviled, committed his injured cause to his Father, and did not lose by his silence, for the Comforter came, pleaded it powerfully, and carried it triumphantly. "When the Comforter or Advocate is come, which proceedeth from the Father, and whom I will send to supply the want of my bodily presence, he shall testify of me against those that hate me without cause."

We have more in this verse concerning the Holy Ghost, than in any one verse beside in the Bible; and being baptized into his name, we are concerned to acquaint ourselves with him, as far as he is revealed.

1. Here is an account of him in his essence, or subsistence rather. He is the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father. Here, (1.) He is spoken of as a distinct person; not a quality or property, but a person under the proper name of a spirit, and proper title of the Spirit of truth, a title fitly given to him by Christ, to distinguish him from all the rest.

(2.) As a divine person, that proceedeth from the Father, by outgoings that were of old from ever-last- ing. The spirit or breath of man, called the breath of life, proceeds from the man, and by it modified he delivers his mind, by it invigorated he sometimes exerts his strength to blow out what he would extinguish, and blow up what he would ex- cite. Thus the blessed Spirit is the eternal Son of divine light, and the energy of divine power. The rays of the sun, by which it dispenses and diffuses its light, heat, and influence, proceed from the sun, and yet are one with it. The Viene Creed says, the Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son, for he is called the Spirit of the Son, Gal. 4. 6. and the Son is here said to send him. The Greek church of Rome, when they began to lose their hold in testifying of divine light, and the energy of divine power. The rays of the sun, by which it dispenses and diffuses its light, heat, and influence, proceed from the sun, and yet are one with it. The Viene Creed says, the Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son, for he is called the Spirit of the Son, Gal. 4. 6. and the Son is here said to send him. The Greek church of Rome, when they began to lose their hold in testifying of divine light, and the energy of divine power. The rays of the sun, by which it dispenses and diffuses its light, heat, and influence, proceed from the sun, and yet are one with it.
the veil. The Spirit was sent, [1.] By Christ as Mediator, now ascended on high to give gifts and grace, and all power being given to him. [2.] It is in the Christian church and in heaven, and from heaven, Acts 2, 2. [3.] The Spirit was given in a second instance, from heaven, Acts 2, 2., "but according to my Father's will and appointment, and with his concoursing power and authority." [4.] To the apostles, to instruct them in their preaching, enable them for working, and carry them through their sufferings. He was given to them and their successors, both in Christianity and in the ministry; to them and their seed, and their seed's seed, according to that promise, Isa. 59. 21.

3. In his office and operations, which are two; (1.) One implied in the title given to him, he is the Comforter, or Advocate. An advocate for Christ, to maintain his cause against the world's unfidelity, a comforter to the saints against the world's hatred.

(2.) Another expressed; He shall testify of me. He is not only an advocate, but a witness for Jesus Christ; he is one of the three that bears record in heaven, and the first of the three that bears witness on earth, 1 John 5. 7. 8. He instructed the apostles, and enabled them to work miracles; he inflicted the scriptures which are the standing witnesses that testify of Christ, ch. 5. 39. The power of the ministry is derived from the Spirit, he qualifies ministers, and the power of Christianity too, for he sanctifies christians, and in both testifies of Christ.

4. It is here promised that the apostles also, by the Spirit's assistance, should have the honour of being Christ's witnesses; (r. 27.) And ye also shall bear witness of me, being competent witnesses, for ye have been with me from the beginning of my ministry. Observe here,

1. That the apostles were appointed to be witnesses for Christ in the world. When he had said, The Spirit shall testify, he adds, And you also shall bear witness. Note, The Spirit's working is not to supersede, but to engage and encourage our's. Though the Spirit testify, ministers also must bear their testimony, and people attend to it; for the Spirit of grace witnesses and works by the means of grace. The apostles were the first witnesses that were called in the famous trial between Christ and the prince of this world, whom Jesus issued in the cuộcment of the intruder. This speaks, (1.) The work cut out for them; they were to attest the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, concerning Christ, for the recovering of his just right, and the maintaining of his crown and dignity. Though Christ's disciples fled when they should have been witnesses for him upon his trials before the High-Priest and Pilate, yet after the Spirit was poured out upon them, they appeared courageous in vindication of the cause of Christ against the accusations it was leveled with. The truth of the christian religion was to be proved very much by the evidence of matter of fact, especially Christ's resurrection, of which we have a specimen in a narrative from chosen witnesses, (Acts 10. 41.) and they bore their testimony accordingly, Acts 3. 15. 3. 32. Christ's ministers are his witnesses. (2.) The honour put upon them hereby—that they should be workers together with God; "The Spirit shall testify of me, and you also, under the conduct of the Spirit, and in concurrence with the Spirit, (who will preserve you from mistaking in that which you relate on your own knowledge, and will inform you of that which you cannot know but by revelation,) shall bear witness." This might encourage them against the hatred and contempt of the world, that Christ had honoured them, and would own them.

2. That they were qualified to be so; Ye have been with me from the beginning. They not only heard his public sermons, but had constant private converse with him. He went about doing good, and while others saw his wonderful and wonderful works that he did in their country, only, they mistook them with him with the discourses of them all. They had likewise opportunity of observing the unspeaking purity of his conversation, and could witness to him that they never saw in him, or heard from him, anything that had the least tincture of human frailty. Note, (1.) We have great reason to receive the record which the apostles or Gospels, they did not speak by hearsay, but what they had from the greatest assurance of imaginable, 2 Pet. 1. 16. 1 John 1. 1, 3. (2.) The scripture best able to bear witness for Christ, that have themselves been with him, by faith, hope, and love, and by living a life of communion with God in him. Ministers must first learn Christ, and then preach them. Those speak best of the things of God, that speak from the things of God. Christ is particularly an advantage to have been acquainted with Christ from the beginning, to understand all things from the very first, (Luke 1. 5.) to have been with him from the beginning of our days. An early acquaintance, and constant converse with the gospel of Christ, will make a man like a good householder.

CHAP. XVI.

Among other glorious things God hath spoken of himself, this is one, I wound, and I heal, Deut. 32. 38. Christ discourses in this chapter, which continues and concludes his farewell sermon to his disciples, das... 1. Here are woundings which are the beginning of our life, the beginning of our power and ability, they were because before them, v. 1., 6. There are healing words in the comfort he administers to them for their support under these troubles, which are five, 1. That he would send them the Comforter, v. 7., 15. 2. That he would visit them again at his resurrection, v. 16., 22. 3. That he would send to them an answer of peace to all their prayers, v. 23., 25. 4. That he was now but returning to his Father, &c. 28., 32. 5. That with the consolations he would send to them they might meet with in this world, be virtue of his victors over it they should be sure of peace in him, v. 33.

1. THESE things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended. 2. They shall put you out of the synagogues; ye, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doeth God service. 3. And these things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me. 4. But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, because I was with you. 5. But now I go my way to him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? 6. But because I have said these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your heart.

Christ dealt faithfully with his disciples when he sent them forth in his errands, for he told them the worst of it, that they might sit down and count the cost. He had bid them in the chapter before to expect the world's hatred, where in these verses of this chapter. 1. He gives them a reason why he alarmed them thus with the expectation of trouble; These things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be offended, or scandalized, v. 1. 2. The disciples of Christ are apt to be offended at the cross; and the offence of the cross is a dangerous temptation, even to good men, either to turn back from the ways of God, or turn aside out of them, or drive on heavily in them; to quit either their integrity or their comfort. It is not for nothing that a suffering time is called an hour of temptation.

Our Lord Jesus, by giving us notice of trouble, designed to take off the terror of it, that it might not be a surprise to us. Of all the adversities of our peace in this world of troubles, none insurmountable more violently, nor put our troops more into disorder, than disappointment does; but we can easily welcome a guest we expect, and bring forewarned, are for-armed—Prov. 18. 17. They shall know beforehand what they should suffer; (v. 3.) "They that have power to do it, shall put you out of their synagogues; and that is not the worst, they shall kill you." Ecco duo gladii—Behold two swords drawn against the followers of the Lord Jesus.

1. The sword of ecclesiastical censure; this is drawn against them by the Jews, for they were the only pretenders to church-power. They shall cast you out of their synagogues, saith our Lord Jesus;—they shall make you excommunicate. (1.) They shall cast you out of the particular synagogues ye were members of. At first, they scourged them in their synagogues as contempters of the law, (Matt. 10. 17.) and at length, cast them out as incorrigible. (2.) They shall cast you out of the congregation of Israel in general, the nation of the Jews; shall put you out of the house of Israel, the family to which you belong, into the condition of an outlaw, qui eadmodum uxor—be knocked on the head, as another wolf; they will look upon you as Samaritans, as heathen men and publicans. Interdico uti aqua et igne—I forbid you the use of water and fire. And were it not for the penalties, forfeitures, and incapacities, incurred hereby, it would be no injury to be thus driven out of a house infected and fallen. Note, It has often been the lot of Christ's disciples to be unjustly excommunicated. Many a good truth has been branded with an anathema, and many a child of God delivered to Satan.

2. The sword of civil power; "The time cometh, the hour is come; now things are likely to be worse with you than hitherto they have been; when ye are expelled as heretics, they will kill you, and think the world will be the better for it." (1.) You will find them really cruel: They will kill you. Christ's sheep have been accounted as sheep for the slaughter; the twelve apostles (as we are told) were all put to death, except John. Christ had said, (ch. 13. 27.) Ye shall bear witness, scil. you shall be martyrs, shall seal the truth with your blood, your hearts' blood. (2.) You will find them seemingly conscientious; they will think they do God service; they will seem xarqg, ruqkgs—to offer a sacrifice to God; as those that cast out God's servants of old, and said, Let the Lord be glorified, Isa. 66. 3. Note, [1.] It is possible for those that are real enemies to God's service, to pretend a mighty zeal for it. The devil's work has many a time been done in God's livery, and one of the most mischievous enemies of Christianity ever had, sits in the temple of God. Note, [2.] It is common to patronise an enmity to religion with a show of duties to God, and service to his church. God's people have suffered the greatest hardships from conscientious persecutors. Paul verily thought he ought to do what he did against the name of Jesus. This does not at all lessen the sin and guilt of those who are excommunicated from God to them; but it does greatly the sufferings of the persecuted, to die under the character of being enemies to God; but there will be a resurrection of names, as well as of bodies, at the great day.

III. He gives them the true reason of the world's enmity and rage against them; (v. 3.) "These things will they do unto you, not because you have done them any harm, but because they have not known the Father, nor me. Let this comfort you, that no one but the worst of men can do these things; 1. Many that pretend to know God, are wretchedly ignorant of him. They that pretend to do him service, thought they knew him, but it was a wrong notion they had of him. Israel transgressed the covenant, and yet cried, My God, we know thee, Hos. 8. 1, 2. 2. They that are ignorant of Christ, cannot have any right knowledge of God. In vain do men pretend to know him, if they have not known his Son. Why should he not have set men in their right place, and let them understand, that God and Christ, think that they an acceptable piece of service to persecute good people. They that know Christ, know that he came not into the world to destroy men's lives, but to save them; that he rules by the power of truth and love, not of fire and storm. Never was there such a persecuting church as that which makes ignorance the mother of derision.

IV. He tells them why he gave them notice then now, and why not sooner.

1. Why he told them of it now; (v. 4.) not to discourage them, or add to their present sorrow; nor did he tell them of their danger, that they might continue to avoid it, but that, when the time should come (and you may be sure it will come) you may remember what I told you of, etc. When suffering, it will be of use to us to remember what Christ has told us of sufferings. (1.) That our belief of Christ's foresight and faithfulness may be confirmed; and, (2.) That the trouble may be the less grievous, for we were told of it before, and we took up our profession in expectation of it, so that it ought not to be a surprise to us, nor looked upon as a wrong to us. As Christ in his sufferings, so his followers in the same, should have an eye to the fulfilling of the scripture.

2. Why he did not tell them of it sooner; "I spake not this to you from the beginning, when you and I came to be first acquainted, because I was with you." (1.) While he was with them, he bore the shock of the world's malice, and stood in the front of the battle against him the powers of darkness levelled all their force, not against small or great, but only against him, as the king of Israel, and therefore he did not need them to say so much to them of suffering, because it did not fall much to their share; but we do find that from the beginning he bid them prepare for sufferings; and therefore, (2.) It seems rather to be meant of the promise of another Comforter. This he had said little of to them at the beginning, because he was himself with them to instruct, guide, and comfort them; and then they needed not the promise of the Spirit's extraordinary presence. The children of the bride-chamber would not have so much need of a comforter till the bridegroom should be taken away.

V. He expresses a very affectionate concern for the present sadness of his disciples, upon occasion of what he had said to them; (v. 5, 6.) "Now I am to be no longer with you, but go away to him that sent me. The hour cometh, and none of you asketh me with any courage, Whither goest thou? But, instead of inquiring after that which would comfort you, you pester me with that which looks melancholy, and sorrow hath filled your heart." 1. He had told them that he was about to leave them; New I go my way. He was not driven away by force, but voluntarily departed; his life was not extorted from him, but deposited by him. He went to him that sent him, to give an account of his nomination. Thus, when we depart out of this world, we go to him that sent us into it, to give an account of his nomination. Remember Fifthly, Note, that as many have and do with sorrow, so as the Father hath and will, for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you. All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I, that he shall take of mine, and shew it unto you.

As it was usual with the Old Testament prophets to comfort the church in its calamities with the promise of the Messiah, (Isa. 9. 6. Mic. 5. 5. Zech. 3. 8.) so, the Messiah being come, the promise of the Spirit was the great cordial, and is still.

Three things we have here concerning the Comforter's coming:
1. That Christ's departure was absolutely necessary to the Comforter's coming, ver. 7. The disciples were so loath to believe this, that Christ saw cause to assert it with a more than ordinary solemnity: *I tell you the truth. We may be confident of the truth of every thing that Christ has told us, he has no design to impose upon us. Now, to make them easy, he here tells them, 1. In general, It was expedient for them that he should go away. This was strange doctrine, but if it was true, it was comfortable enough, and showed them how absurd their sorrow was; It is expedient, not only for me, but for you also, that I go away; though they do not see it, and are loath to believe it, so it is. Note, (1.) These things often seem grievous to us, that are really expedient for us; and particularly our going away when we have finished our course. (2.) Our Lord Jesus is always for that which is most expedient for us, whether we think so or no. He deals not with us according to the folly of our own choices, but graciously over-rules them, and gives us the physic we are loath to take, because he knows it is good for us.

2. It was therefore expedient, because it was in order to the sending of the Spirit. Now observe, (1.) That Christ's going was in order to the Comforter's coming. [1.] This is expressed negatively; If I go not away, the Comforter will not come. And why not? First, So it was settled in the divine councils concerning this affair, and the measures must not be altered: shall the earth be forsaken for them? He that gives freely, may recal one gift before he bestows another; while we would fondly hold all. Secondly, It is congruous enough that the ambassador extraordinary should be recalled, before the envoy come, that is constantly to reside. Thirdly, The sending of the Spirit was to be the fruit of Christ's purchase, and that purchase was to be made by his death, which was his going away. Fourthly, It was to be in answer to his intercession within the veil. See ch. 14. 16. Thus must this gift he both paid for, and prayed for, by each one of us, that we may thankful to put the greater value upon it. Fithly, The great argument the Spirit was to use in convincing the world, must be, Christ's ascension into heaven, and his welcome there. See v. 10. and ch. 7. 39. Lastly, The disciples must be weaned from his bodily presence, which they were too apt to date upon, before they were duly prepared to receive the spiritual aids and comforts of a new dispensation.

[2.] It is expressed positively; If I depart, I will send him to you; as though he had said, I, just as because the prince of this world is judged, 12. I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot hear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth, for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come. 14. He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you.

Note, there are three things concerning the Comforter's coming.

1. That he was necessary. This was strange doctrine, but if it was true, it was comfortable enough, and showed them how absurd their sorrow was: It is expedient, not only for me, but for you also, that I go away; though they do not see it, and are loth to believe it, so it is. Note, (1.) These things often seem grievous to us, that are really expedient for us; and particularly our going away when we have finished our course. (2.) Our Lord Jesus is always for that which is most expedient for us, whether we think so or no. He deals not with us according to the folly of our own choices, but graciously over-rules them, and gives us the physic we are loath to take, because he knows it is good for us.

2. That he was sent, and not made. The Comforter is sent. Christ's going was in order to the sending of the Spirit. This was expressed negatively; If I go not away, the Comforter will not come. And why not? First, So it was settled in the divine councils concerning this affair, and the measures must not be altered: shall the earth be forsaken for them? He that gives freely, may recal one gift before he bestows another; while we would fondly hold all. Secondly, It is congruous enough that the ambassador extraordinary should be recalled, before the envoy come, that is constantly to reside. Thirdly, The sending of the Spirit was to be the fruit of Christ's purchase, and that purchase was to be made by his death, which was his going away. Fourthly, It was to be in answer to his intercession within the veil. See ch. 14. 16. Thus must this gift he both paid for, and prayed for, by each one of us, that we may thankful to put the greater value upon it. Fithly, The great argument the Spirit was to use in convincing the world, must be, Christ's ascension into heaven, and his welcome there. See v. 10. and ch. 7. 39. Lastly, The disciples must be weaned from his bodily presence, which they were too apt to date upon, before they were duly prepared to receive the spiritual aids and comforts of a new dispensation.

[2.] It is expressed positively; If I depart, I will send him to you; as though he had said, *I, just as to provide effectually that you shall be no losers by my departure. The glorified Redeemer is not unmindful of his church on earth, nor will ever leave it without its necessary supports. Though he departs, he sends the Comforter; nay, he departs on purpose to send him. Thus still, though one generation of men and of their departure, another is raised up in their room, for Christ will maintain his own cause. (2.) That the presence of Christ's Spirit in his church is so much better, and more desirable, than his bodily presence, that it was really expedient for us that he should go away, to send the Comforter. His corporal presence could be but in one place at one time, but his Spirit is everywhere, in all places at all times. Wherever two or three are gathered in his name, Christ's bodily presence draws men's eyes, his spirit draws their hearts; that was the letter which kills, his Spirit gives life.

II. That the coming of the Spirit was absolutely necessary to the carrying on of Christ's interest on earth; (v. 8.) And when he is come, (whence hence, that he is sent, is willing of himself to come, and at his first coming he will do this;) he will reprove, or, as the margin reads it, he will convince the world, by your ministry, concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment.

1. See here what the office of the Spirit is, and on what errand he is sent: (1.) To reprove. The Spirit, by the word and conscience, is a reprove. And ministers of the word, by the Spirit, reprove. (2.) To convince. It is a law term, and speaks the power of the judge in summing up the evidence, and setting a matter that has been long canvassed in a clear and true light. He shall convince, that is, He shall put to silence the adversaries of Christ and his cause, by discovering and demonstrating the falsehood and fallacy of that which they have said and owned, and the truth and certainty of that which they have opposed. Note, Convincing work is the Spirit's work, he can do it effectually, and none but he; man may open the cause, but it is the Spirit only that can open the heart. The Spirit is called the Comforter, (v. 7.) and here it is said, He shall convince. One would think that were cold comfort, but it is the method by which the Spirit takes, first to convince, and then to comfort; first to open the wound, and then apply healing medicines. Or, taking conviction more generally, for a demonstration of what is right, it intimates that the Spirit's comforts are solid, and grounded upon truth.

2. See who they are, whom he is to reprove and convince; the world, both Jew and Gentile. (1.) He shall give the world the most powerful and means of conviction, for the apostles shall go into all the world, baptized by the Spirit, to preach the gospel, fully proved. He shall sufficiently provide for the taking off and silencing of the objections and prejudices of the world against the gospel. Many an infidel was convinced of all, and judged of all, 1 Cor. 14. 24. (2.) He shall effectually and savingly convince many in the world, some in every age, in every place, in order to their conversion to the faith of Christ. Now this is the great encouragement to the disciples, in reference to the difficulties they were likely to meet with,

[1.] That they should see good done, Satan's kingdom fall like lightning, which would be their joy, as it was his. Even this malignant world the Spirit shall work upon; and the conviction of sinners is the comfort of faithful ministers. [2.] That this would be the foundation of encouragement and comfort to the disciples, who, by their continual service and sufferings, these should contribute very much to this good work.

3. See what the Spirit shall convince the world of. (1.) Of sin, (v. 9.) because they believe not on me. [1.] The Spirit is sent to convince sinners of sin, not barely to tell them of it; in conviction there is more than that, it is to prove it upon them, and force them to own it, as they (ch. 8. 9.) that were convinced of all the shortcomings of their own consciences; Make them to know their abominations. The Spirit convinces of the fact of sin, that we have done so and so; of the fault of sin, that we have done ill in doing so; of the folly of sin, that we have been actuated against right reason, and our true interest; of the fifth of sin, that by it we are become odious to God; of the fountain of sin, the corrupt nature; and lastly, of the fruit of sin, that the end thereof is death. The Spirit demonstrates the depravity and degeneracy of the whole world, that all the world is guilty before God.

[2.] The Spirit, in conviction, fastens especially upon the old unbelievers, the sinners, the unfaithful, the unbelievers, the rebellious, the covenant. First, As the great reigning sin. There was, and is, a world of people, that believe not in Jesus Christ, and they are not sensible that it is their sin; natural conscience tells them that murder and theft are sins; but it is a supernatural work of the Spirit to convince them that it is a sin to suspend their belief of the gospel, and to reject the salvation offered by it. Natural religion, after it has given us its best discoveries and directions, lays and leaves us under this further obligation, that whatever divine revelation shall be made to us at any time, with sufficient evidence to prove it divine, we accept it, and submit to it; which law they transgress, who, when God spake-eth to us by his Son, refuse him that speaketh; and therefore it is sin.

Secondly, The great ruining sin. Every sin is so in its own nature, no sin is so to them that believe in Christ; so that it is unbelief thatissaans sinners; it is because of that, that they cannot enter into rest, that they cannot escape the wrath of God; it is a sin against the remedy.

Thirdly, As that which is at the bottom of all sin; so Calvin takes it. The Spirit shall convince the world, that the true reason why sin reigns among them, is, because they are not by faith united to Christ. Ne putamus vel guttam inanem rectitudinis sine Christo nobis inesse—Let us not suppose that, apart from Christ, we have a drop of rectitude. Calv.

(2.) Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more, (v. 10.) We may understand this,

[1.] Of Christ's personal righteousness. He shall convince the world, that Jesus of Nazareth was Christ the righteous, (1 John 2. 1.) as the cornation owned, (Luke 23. 47.) Certainly this was a righteous man. His enemies put him under the worst of characters, and multitudes were not, or would not, be convinced but that he was a bad man, which strengthened their prejudices against his character, but he is justified by the Spirit, (1 Tim. 3. 16.) he is proved to be a righteous man, and not a deceiver; and then the point is in effect gained; for he is either the great Redeemer, or a great cheat; but a cheat we are sure he is not.

Now by what medium or argument will the Spirit convince men of the sincerity of our Lord Jesus? Why, by a convincing effect; and the Spirit will contribute toward the removal of their prejudices; they shall see him no more, in the likeness of sinful flesh, in the form of a servant, which made them slight him. Moses was more respected after his removal than before. But, Secondly, His going to the Father would be a full conviction of it. The coming of the Spirit, according to the promise, was a proof of the Son's resurrection and ascension, (Acts 2. 33.) and that was a demonstration of his righteousness; for the holy God would never set a deceiver at his right hand.

[2.] Of Christ's righteousness, communicated to us for our justification and salvation; that everlasting righteousness, which Messiah was to bring in, Dan. 9. 24. Now,

First, The Spirit shall convince men of this rightousness; having by convictions of sin shewed them their need of a rightnessness, lest that drive them to despair, he will shew them where it is to be had, and how they may, upon their believing, be acquitted from guilt, and accepted as righteous in God's sight. It was hard to convince those of this righteousness, that went about to establish their own; but God will do it.

Secondly, Christ's having made this great argument proper to convince men of this righteousness; I go to the Father, and, as an evidence of my welcome with him, you shall see me no more. If Christ had left any part of his undertaking unfinished, he had been sent back again; but now we are sure he is at the right hand of God, we are sure of being justified through his name.

(3.) Of judgement, because the prince of this world is judged, v. 11. Observe here,

[1.] The devil, the prince of this world, was judged; was discovered to be a great deceiver and destroyer; and as such, judgment was entered against him, and execution in part done. He was cast out of the Gentile world, where his oracles were silenced, and his altars deserted; cast out of the bodies of men. Christ's name, which miraculous power continued long in the church; he was cast out of the souls of people by the grace of God working with the gospel of Christ; he fell as lightning from heaven.

[2.] This is a good argument wherewith the Spirit convinces the world of judgment, that is, First, Of inherent holiness and sanctification, Matt. 12. 18. By the judicial punishment and vengeance, it appears that Christ is stronger than Satan, and can disarm and dispossess him, and set up his throne upon the ruins of his. Secondly, Of a new and better dispensation of things. He shall show that Christ's errand into the world, was to set things right in it, and to introduce times of reformation and regeneration; and he proves it by this, that the prince of this world, with great matter of this world, is judged and expelled. All will be well when his power is broken, who made all the mischief. Thirdly, Of the power and dominion of the Lord Jesus. He shall convince the world that all judgement is committed to him, and that he is the Lord of all; which is evidently this, that he has judged the prince of this world, has broken the serpent's head, destroyed him that had the power of death, and sealed principalities. If Satan be thus subdued by Christ, we may be sure no other power can stand before him. Fourthly, Of the final day of judgement; all the obdurate enemies of Christ's gospel and kingdom shall certainly be reckoned with at last, for the devil, their ringleader, is judged.

III. That the coming of the Spirit would be of unspeakable advantage to the disciples themselves; the Spirit has won to do, not only the command of Christ, to convince and humble them, but upon his servants and agents, to instruct and comfort them; and therefore it was expedient for them that he should go away.

1. He intimates to them the tender sense he had of their present weakness; (v. 12.) I have yet many things to say unto you, (not which should have been said, as v. 10. 2) but the spirit of the world, that it cannot hear them now. See what a teacher Christ is! (1.) None like him for copiousness; when he has said much, he hath still many things more to say; treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him; we are not straitened in him, if we be not straitened in ourselves. (2.) None like him for compassion; he would have told them more of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, particular of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, but they could not bear it; he would have founded and stilled them, rather than have given them any satisfaction. When, after his resurrection, they spake to him of restoring the kingdom to Israel, he referred them to the coming of the Holy Ghost, by which they should receive power to bear those discoveries which were so contrary to the notions they had received, that they could not bear them now.

2. He assures them of sufficient assistance, by the pouring out of the Spirit. They were now conscious to themselves of great dulness, and many mistakes; and what shall they do now their Master is leaving them? "But when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, you will be easy, and all will be well." Well indeed! for he shall undertake to guide the apostles, and glorify Christ.

(1.) To guide the apostles; he will take care,

[1.] That they do not miss their way. He will guide you; as the camp of Israel was guided through the wilderness by the pillar of cloud and fire. The Spirit guided their tongues in speaking, and their pens in writing, to secure them from mistakes. The Spirit is given us to be our guide, (Rom. 8. 14.) not only to show us the way, but to go along with us, by his continued aids and influences.

[2.] This they will not come short of their end; He will guide them into all truth, as the skillful pilot guides the ship into the port it is bound for. To be led into a truth, is more than barely to know it; it is to be intimately and experimentally acquainted with it; to be pliably and strongly affected with it; not only to have the notion of it in our heads, but the relish, and savour, and power of it in our hearts; it denotes a gradual discovery of truth shining more and more; "He shall lead you by these truths that are plain and easy, to those that are more difficult." But how into all truth? The meaning is,

First, Into the whole truth relating to their embassy; whatever was needful or useful for them to know, in order to the due discharge of their office, they should be fully instructed in; what truths they were to teach others, the Spirit would teach them, would give them the understanding of, and enable them both to explain and to defend.

Secondly, Into nothing but the truth; All that he shall guide you into, shall be truth; (1 John 2. 27.) the anointing is truth.

In the following words he proves these three:

1. "The Spirit shall teach you nothing but the truth, for he shall not speak of himself and erringe from the truth, but whatsoever he shall hear he shall speak, that he might know to be the mind of the Father, that, and that only, shall he speak." This intimates, (1.) That the testimony of the Spirit, in the word and by the apostles, is what we may rely upon. The Spirit knows and searches all things, even the deep things of God, and the apostles received that Spirit; (1 Cor. 2. 10, 11.) so that we may venture our souls upon the Spirit's word. (2.) That the testimony of the Spirit always concurs with the word of Christ, for he does not speak of himself, has no separate interest or intention of his own, but, as in essence, so in records, he is one with the Father and the Son, 1 John 5. 7. Men's word and spirit often disagree, but the eternal Word and the eternal Spirit never do.

2. "He shall teach you all truth, and keep back nothing that is good to say; for he shall come not to judge the world, but to save the world." Thus the self-satisfaction of their minds, and of use to them in their conduct, and was also a great confirmation of their mission. Jansenius has a pious note upon this: We should not grudge that the Spirit does now shew us things to come in this world, as he did to the apostles; let it suffice, that the Spirit in the word hath shewed us things to come, in the other world, which are our chief concern.

(2.) The Spirit undertook to glorify Christ, \textit{v. 14, 15.}

[1.] Even the shedding of the Spirit was the glorifying which Christ, God the Father glorified him in heaven, and the Spirit glorified him on earth. It was the honour of the Redeemer, that the Spirit was both sent in his name, and sent on his errand, to carry on and perfect his undertaking. All the gifts and graces of the Spirit, all the preaching and all the writing of the apostles, under the influence of the Spirit, the tongues, and miracles, were to glorify Christ.

[2.] The Spirit glorified Christ, by leading his followers into the truth as it is in Jesus, \textit{Eph. 4. 21.} He assures them,

First, That the Spirit should communicate the things of Christ to them; \textit{He shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you.} As in essence he proceeded from the Son, so in influence and operation he derives from him. \textit{He shall take, and shew.} He[1] which is mine. All that the Spirit shows us, that is, applies to us, for our instruction and comfort, all that he gives us for our strength and quickening, and all he secures and seals to us, did all belong to Christ, and was had and received from him. All was his, for he bought it, and paid dear for it, and therefore he had reason to call it his own; his, for he first received it; it was given him as the Head of the church, to be derived from him to all his members. The Spirit came not to erect a new kingdom, but to advance and establish the same kingdom that Christ had erected, to maintain the same interest, and pursue the same design; those therefore who pretend to the Spirit, and yet vitally Christ, give themselves the lie, for he came to glorify Christ.

Secondly, That herein the things of God should be communicated to us; lest any should think that the receiving of this would not make them much the richer, he adds, \textit{All things that the Father has, are mine.} As God, all that self-existent light and self-sufficient happiness which the Father has, he has; as Mediator, all things are delivered to him of the Father; \textit{(Matt. 11. 27.)} all that grace and truth which God designed to shew to us, he lodged in the hands of the Lord Jesus, \textit{Col. 1. 19.} Spiritual blessings which only those are given by the Father to the Son for us, and the Son can't shew the Spirit to us, but he shews them to us. Some apply it to that which goes just before; \textit{He shall shew you things to come,} and so it is explained by \textit{Rev. 1. 1.} God gave it to Christ, and he shewed it to John, who wrote what the Spirit said, \textit{Rev. 3. 1, 6.}

16. A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while, and ye shall see me, because I go to the Father. 17. Then said some of his disciples among themselves, What is this that he saith unto us, A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while, and ye shall see me: and, Because I go to the Father? 18. They said therefore, What is this that he saith, A little while? we cannot tell what he saith. 19. Now Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him, and said unto them, Do ye enquire among yourselves of that I said, A little while, and ye shall not see me: and again, a little while, and ye shall see me? 20. Verily, verily, I say unto you, That ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. 21. A woman when she is in travail hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but as soon as she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. 22. And ye now therefore have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you.

Our Lord Jesus, for the comfort of his sorrowful disciples, here promises that he would visit them again.

I. Observe the intimation he gave them of the comfort he designed them, \textit{v. 16.} Here he tells them,

1. That they should now shortly lose the sight of him; \textit{A little while, and ye that see me now,} and still desire to see me, shall not see me; and therefore if they had any good question to ask him, they must ask quickly, for he was now taking his leave of them. Note, It is good to consider how near to a period our seasons of grace are, that we may be quickened to improve them while they are continued. Now our eyes see our teachers, see the days of the Son of man; but, perhaps, yet a little while and we shall not see his face. They lost the sight of Christ, \textit{1.} At his death, when he withdrew from this world, and never after shewed himself openly in it. The most that death does to our Christian friends, is, to take them out of our sight, not out of being, not out of bliss, not out of all relation to us, only out of sight, and then not out of mind. \textit{2.} At his ascension, when he withdrew from them, \textit{(who, after his resurrection, had for some time conversed with him,) out of their sight; a cloud received him,} and, though they looked up steadfastly after him, \textit{they saw him no more, Acts 1. 9, 10, 2 Kings 2. 12.} See \textit{2 Cor. 5. 16.}

2. That yet they should speedily recover the sight of him; \textit{Again a little while, and ye shall see me,} and therefore ye ought not to sorrow as those that have no hope; his farewell was not a final farewell, they should see him again. \textit{4.} At his resurrection, soon after his death, when he shewed himself alive, by many infallible proofs, and this in a very little while, not forty hours. See \textit{Hos. 6. 2.} \textit{2.} By the pouring out of the Spirit, soon after his ascension, which scattered the mists of ignorance and mistakes they were almost lost in, and gave them a much clearer insight into the mysteries of Christ's gospel than they had yet had. The Spirit's coming was Christ's visit to his disciples, not a transient but a permanent one, and such a visit as abundantly renews the sight of him. \textit{3.} At his second coming. They \textit{shall see him again as they removed one by one to him at death, and they shall all see him together at the end of time, when he shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him.} It might be truly said of this, that it was but a little while, and they should see him, for the days of the days of time, to the days of eternity? \textit{2 Pet. 3. 8, 9.}

The reason given is, \textit{Because I go to the Father, and therefore,} \textit{1.} \textit{I must leave you for a time, because my business calls me to the upper world, and you must be content to wait me, for really my business is your's.} \textit{2.} \textit{You shall see me again shortly, for the Father will not detain me to your prejudice. If I go upon your errand, you shall see me again as soon as my business is done, as soon as is convenient.} It should seem, all this.
refers rather to his going away at death, and return at his resurrection, than his going away at his ascension, and his return at the end of time; for it was his death that was their grief, not his ascension, (Luke 24. 52.) and between his death and resurrection it was indeed a little while. And it may be read, not, yet a little while, (it is not in vage, as it is ch.
12. 35.) for the reason which we gave before, namely,
the three days of his lying in the grave; and again, for a little while ye shall see me, namely, the forty days between his resurrection and ascension.
Thus we may say of our ministers and Christian friends, Yet a little while, and we shall not see them, either they must leave us, or we leave them, but it is certain that we must part shortly, and yet not part for ever. Thus we may say of those whom we hope to rejoin with joy in the morning.
II. The perplexity of the disciples upon the intimation given them; they were at a loss what to make of it; (v. 17, 18.) Some of them said, softly, among themselves, either some of the weakest, that were least able, or some of the most injudicious, that were most desirous to understand him, What is this that he saith to us? Though Christ had often spoken to them of his departure, and of their being left alone in the dark; though present be upon present, it is in vain, unless God give the understanding. Now see here,
1. The disciples' weakness, in that they could not understand so plain a saying which Christ had already given them a key to, having told them so often in plain terms that he should be killed, and the third day rise again; yet, say they, He cannot tell what he saith; for, (1.) Sorrow had filled their heart, and made them apt to receive the impressions of comfort.
The darkness of ignorance and the Arrdness of melancholy commonly increase and thicken one another; mistakes cause griefs, and then griefs confirm mistakes. (2.) The notion of Christ's secular kingdom was so deeply rooted in them, that they could make no sense at all of those sayings of his,
which they knew not how to reconcile with that notion.
When we think the scripture must be moved to agree with the false ideas we have imbibed, no wonder that we complain of its difficulty; but when our reasonings are captivated to revelation, the matter becomes easy. (3.) It should seem, that which puzzled them, was the little while. If he must go at last, yet they could not conceive how he should leave them quickly, when his stay hitherto had been so short, and so little while, comparatively. 'Thus it is hard for the multitude of men, says the psalm, that wherewith thou hast made us draw near, which yet we know will come certainly, and may come suddenly. When we are told, Yet a little while, and we must go hence; Yet a little while, and we must give up our account; we know not how to digest it; for we always took the vision to be for a great while to come, Ezek. 12. 27.
2. Their willingness to be instructed. When they were at a loss about the meaning of Christ's words, they sought to understand it, and asked help of one another. By mutual converse about divine things we both borrow the light of others, and improve our own. Observe how exactly they repeat Christ's words. Though we cannot fully solve every difficulty we meet with in scripture, yet we must not therefore throw it by, but resolve what we cannot explain, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto us.
III. The further explication of what Christ had said.
1. See here why Christ explained it; (v. 19.) because he knew they were desirous to ask him, and designed it. Note, The knots we cannot untie, we must bring to him who alone can give an understanding. Christ knew they were desirous to ask him, but were bashful and ashamed to ask. Note, Christ takes cognizance of pious desires, though they be not as yet offered up, the grievances that cannot be angered, and even prevents them with the blessings of his goodness. Christ instructed those who he knew were desirous to ask him, though they did not
ask. Before we call, he answers.
Another reason why Christ explained it, was, because he observed them canvassing this matter among themselves. Do ye inquire this among yourselves? Well, I will make it easy to you.
This intimates to us they are that Christ will teach: (1.) The humble that confess their ignorance, for so much their inquiry implied. (2.) The diligent, that use the means they have; Do ye inquire? You shall be taught. To him that hath, shall be given.
2. See here how he explained it; not by a nice and critical descending upon the words, but by bringing the thing more closely to them; he had told them of not seeing him, and seeing him, and they did not perceived that, and therefore he explains it by their sorrowing and rejoicing, because we commonly measure things according as they affect us; (v. 20.) Ye shall weep and lament, for my departure, but the world shall rejoice in it; and ye shall be sorrowing, and your grief shall be turned into joy.
Why do you sorrow? Because you receive not the world, your sorrow will be turned into joy. But he says nothing of the little while, because he saw that perplexed them more than any thing; and it is no matter for our knowing the times and the seasons.
Note, Believers have joy or sorrow, according as they have or have not a sight of Christ, and the tokens of his presence with them.
3. See here, what Christ says here, and v. 21, 22. of their sorrow and joy.
(1.) It is primarily to be understood of the present state and circumstances of the disciples, and so we have.
[1.] Their grief foretold; Ye shall weep and lament, and ye shall be sorrowful. The sufferings of Christ could not but be the sorrow of his disciples, they wept for him because they loved him; the pain of our friend is pain to ourselves; when they slept, it was for sorrow, Luke 22. 43. They wept for themselves, and their own loss, and the sad apprehensions they had of what would become of them when he was gone. It could not but be a grief to lose him for whom they had left their all, and from whom they expected so much. Christ has given notice to his disciples beforehand to expect sorrow, that they may treasure up comforts according thereunto.
[2.] The world's rejoicing at the same time; But the world shall rejoice. That which is the grief of saints, is the joy of sinners. First, They that are strangers to Christ, will continue in their carnal mirth, and not at all interest themselves in their sorrrow. It is nothing to them that pass by, Lam. 1.
12. Nay, Secondly, They that are enemies to Christ, will therefore rejoice, because they hope they have conquered him; but the reason for the enemies of the chief priests had Christ upon the cross, we may suppose they made merry over him, as they that dwell on earth over the slain witnesses, Rev. 11. 10. Let it be no surprise to us if we see others triumphing,
when we are trembling for the ark.
[3.] The return of joy to them in due time; But your sorrow shall be turned into joy. As the joy of the righteous is as the morning, so also is the joy of the wicked, but for a moment. The disciples were glad when they saw the Lord. His resurrection was life from the dead to them, and their sorrow for Christ's sufferings was turned into a joy of such a nature as could not be damped and imibited by any sufferings of their own. They were sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing; (2 Cor. 6, 10.) had sorrowful lives, and yet joyful hearts.
(2.) It is applicable to all the faithful followers of
The lamb, and describes the common case of christians. 1. Their condition and disposition are both mournful; sorrows are their lot, and seriousness is their temper: they that are acquainted with Christ, must, as he was, be acquainted with grief; they are and cannot for that which others make light of, their own sins, and the sins of those about them; they mourn with sufferers that mourn, and mourn for sinners that mourn not for themselves. 2. The world at the same time, goes away with all the mirth; they laugh now, and spend their days so joyfully, that one would think they neither knew sorrow, nor feared it. Carnal mirth and pleasures are so easily resorted to by the best, that men would not have so large a share of them, and the favourites of heaven be such strangers to them. 3. Spiritual mourning will shortly be turned into eternal rejoicing. Gladness is soon for the upright in heart, that now in tears, and without doubt they shall shortly reap in joy. Their sorrow will not only be followed with joy, but turned into it; for the most precious comforts take rise from grievous griefs.

This he illustrates by a similitude taken from a woman in travail, to whose sorrows he compares those of his disciples, for their encouragement; for it is the will of Christ that his people should be a comforted people. 1. The fruit of the curse, is the sorrow and pain of a woman in travail, according to the sentence, (Gen. 3. 16.) In sorrow shalt thou bring forth. These pains are extreme, the greatest griefs and pains that women come, Gen. 19. 23. 1. 2. 3. 2. Jer. 4. 31.—6. 24.) and they are inevitable, 1 Thess. 5. 3. See what this world is; all its roses are surrounded with thorns; all the children of men are upon this account foolish children, that they are the heinousness of that bore them from the very first. This comes of sin. 2. The fruit of the blessing; in the joy that is for a child born into the world. If God had not preserved the blessing in force after the fall, Be fruitful and multiply, parents could never have looked upon their children with any comfort; but what is the fruit of a blessing is matter of joy; the birth of a living child is, (1.) The parents’ joy; it makes them very glad, Jer. 20. 15. Though children are certain cares, uncertain comforts, and often prove to be children of sorrow, it is natural to us to rejoice at their birth. Could we be sure that our children, like John, should be filled with the Holy Ghost, we might, indeed, like his parents, have joy and gladness in their birth, Luke 1. 14. 15. But when we consider, not only that they are born in sin, but, as it is here expressed, they are born into the world, a world of snares, and a vale of tears, we shall see reason to rejoice with trembling, lest it should prove better for them that they had never been born. (2.) Such is joy such as makes the anguish not to be remembered, or remembered as waters that pass away, Job 11. 16. Have omen minima inserat, Job 41. 51. Now this is very proper to set forth. [1.] The sorrows of Christ’s disciples in this world; they are like travelling pains, sore and sharp, but not too long, and in order to a joyful product; they are in pain to be delivered, as the church is described, (Rev. 12. 2.) and the whole creation, Rom. 8. 22. And, [2.] Their joys after these sorrows, which will surpass our for, for they are not such as the apostles, Rev. 21. 4. When they are born into that blessed world, and reap the fruit of all their services and sorrows, the toll and anguish of this world will be no more remembered, as Christ’s were not, when he saw of the travail of his soul abundantly to his satisfaction, Isa. 53. 11.

Secondly, The application of the similitude: (v. 22.) Ye now therefore have sorrow; and are likely to have more, but I will see you again, and you me, and then all will be well. 1. Here again he tells them of their sorrow; Ye now therefore have sorrow; therefore, because I am leaving you, as is intimated in the antithesis, I will see you again. Note, Christ’s withdrawals are just cause of grief to his disciples. If he hide his face, they cannot but be troubled. When the sun sets, the sunflower will hang the head. And Christ takes notice of those griefs, has a battle for the tears, and a book for the sighs, of all gracious mourners. 2. He, more largely than before, assures them of a return of joy, Ps. 30. 5. 11. He himself went through his own griefs, and bore our’s, for the joy that was set before him; and he would have us encourage ourselves with the same prospect. Three things result from this.

(1.) The cause of it; “I will see you again. I will make you a kind and friendly visit, to inquire after you, and minister comfort to you.” Note, [1.] Christ will graciously return to those that wait for him, though for a small moment he has seemed to forsake them, Isa. 54. 7. Men, when they are preferred, will scarcely look upon their inferiors; but the exalted Jesus will visit his disciples. They shall not only see him in his glory, but he will see them in their meanness. [2.] Christ’s returns are returns of joy to all his disciples. When clouded evidences are cleared up, interrupted communion revived, then is the mouth filled with laughter. (2.) The cordialness of it; Your heart shall rejoice. Divine consolations put gladness into the hearts of men. Isa. 1. 19. Christ is our song and not flashy secret, and that which a stranger does not interfer with; it is sweet, and gives a good man satisfaction in himself; it is sure, and not easily broken in upon. Christ’s disciples should heartily rejoice in his returns, sincerely and greatly. (3.) The continuance of it; Your joy no man taketh from you. Men will attempt to take their joy from them, they would if they could; but they shall not prevail. Some understand it of the eternal joy of them that are glorified; they that are entered into the joy of their Lord, shall go no more out. Our joys on earth we are liable to be robbed of by a thousand accidents, but heavenly joys are everlasting. I rather understand it of the spiritual joys of those that are sanctified, particularly the apostles and the first Christians. In the number of this second name, see Paul, in the name of the rest, who always comes up to triumph, 2 Cor. 2. 14. A malicious world would have taken it from them; if bonds and banishments, tortures and deaths, would have taken it from them, they had lost it; but when they took everything else from them, they could not take this; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing. They could not rob them of their joy, but they could not separate them from the love of Christ, could not take them from their God, nor of their treasure in heaven.

29. And in that day ye shall ask me nothing. Verily, verily, I say unto you, WHATSOEVER YE SHALL ASK IN MY NAME, ye shall receive.

ST. JOHN, XVI.
name, he will give it you. 21. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. 22. These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: but the time cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, but I shall shew you plainly of the Father. 23. At that day ye shall ask in my name: and I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you: 24. For the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God.

An answer to their askings is here promised, for their further comfort. Now there are two ways of asking, asking by way of inquiry, that is the asking of the ignorant; and asking by way of request, and that is the asking of the indigent. Christ here speaks of both, asking by way of inquiry, they should not need to ask; (v. 23.) "In that day ye shall ask me nothing: &c.;" ye shall ask no questions; "ye shall have such a clear knowledge of gospel mysteries, by the opening of your understandings, that ye shall not need to inquire," (as Hec. 8. 11. They shall not teach;) "ye shall have more knowledge on a sudden than hitherto ye have had by diligent attendance." They had asked some ignorant questions, (v. 21.) But to the question of Christ in the pref. 18. 1. some distrustful ones, (as Matt. 19. 27.) some impertinent ones, (as ch. 21. 21.) some curious ones, (as Acts 1. 6.) but after the Spirit was poured out, nothing of all this. In the story of the apostles, Acts we seldom find them asking questions, as David, Shall I do this? Or, Shall I go thither? For they were constantly under a divine guidance. In that weighty case of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, Peter went, nothing doubting, Acts 10. 20. Asking questions supposes us at a loss, or at least at a stand, and the best of us have need to ask questions: but we should aim at such a full assurance of understanding, that we may not hesitate, but be constantly led in a plain path both of truth and duty.

Now in this he gives a reason, (v. 23.) which plainly refers to this promise, that they should not need to ask questions: "These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs, in such a way as you have thought not so plain and intelligible as you could have wished, but the time cometh, when I shall shew you plainly, as plainly as you can desire, of the Father, so that you shall not need to ask questions." 1. The great thing Christ would lead them into, was the knowledge of God: "I will shew you the Father, and bring him unto you," (John 14. 9.) This is that which Christ designs to give, and which all true christians desire to have. When Christ would speak the greatest favour intended for his disciples, he tells them that he would shew them plainly the Father; for what is the happiness of heaven, but immediately and eternally to see God? To know God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is the greatest and best of all the favours which we can receive from God, with the contemplation of; and to know him as our Father, is the greatest happiness for the will and affections to please themselves with the choice and enjoyment of.

2. Of this he had hitherto spoken to them in proverbs, which are wise sayings, and instructive, but figurative, and resting in generals. Christ had spoken many things very plainly to them, and especially to the disciples; but, (1.) Considering their dullness, and unaptness to receive what he had said to them, he might be said to speak in proverbs; what he had said to them was as a book sealed, Isa. 29. 11. (2.) Comparing the discoveries he had made to them, in what he had spoken to their ears, with what he would make to them, when he would put his Spirit into their hearts; all hitherto had been but proverbs. It would be a pleasing surprise to themselves, and they would think themselves in a new world, when they would reflect upon all their former notions as confused and enigmatical, compared with their present clear and distinct knowledge of divine things. The manifestation of the letter was nothing to that of the Spirit, 2 Cor. 3. 13—14. (3.) Confining it to what he had said of the Father, and the counsel of the Father, what he had hitherto shewn to them, Christ is here said to shew them, for as the Father speaks by the Son, so the Son by the Spirit. But this promise will have its full accomplishment in heaven, where we shall see the Father as he is, face to face, not as we do now, through a glass darkly; (1 Cor. 13. 12.) which is matter of comfort to us under the cloud of present darkness, by reason of which we cannot discern our speech, but that it will be transformed present here, we have many questions to ask concerning the invisible God and the invisible world; but in that day we shall see all things clearly, and ask no more questions.

II. He promises that by way of request, they should ask nothing in vain. It is taken for granted that all Christ's disciples give themselves to prayer. He had taught them how his precept and advice, that that must be their support and comfort when he had left them; their instruction, direction, strength, and success, must be fetched in by prayer.

New, 1. Here is an express promise of a grant, v. 25. The preface to this promise is such as makes it inviolably sure, and leaves no room to question it; Verily, verily, I say unto you, I say unto you. We know the name of the sweet and sweet; the golden sceptre is here held out to us, with this word, What is thy petition, and it shall be granted? For he says, Whatever we shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. We had it before, ch. 14. 13. What would we more? The promise is as express as we can desire.

1. We are here taught how to seek: we must ask of the Father in Christ's name: we must have an eye to God as a Father, and come as children to him: and to Christ as Mediator, and come as clients. Asking of the Father includes a sense of spiritual wants and a desire of spiritual blessings, with a conviction that they are to be had from God only. It includes also humility of address to him, with a believing confidence in him, as a Fatherable and ready to help us. Asking in Christ's name includes an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness to receive any favour from God, and a complacency in the method God has taken of keeping up a correspondence with us by his Son, and an entire dependence upon Christ as the Lord our righteousness.

2. We are here told how we shall speed: He will give it you. What more can we wish for than to have what we want, most of all our heart's desire, will, He will give it you, from procedure every good and perfect gift. What Christ purchased by the merit of his death, he needed not for himself, but intended it for, and consigned it to, his faithful followers; and having given a valuable consideration for it, which was accepted in full, by this promise he draws a bill as it were upon the treasury in heaven, which we are to present by prayer, and in his name to ask for that which is purchased and promised, as one of the true intents of the new covenant. Christ had promised them great illumination by the Spirit, but they must pray for it, and did so, Acts 1. 14. God will for this be inquired of. He had promised them perfection hereafter, but what shall they do in the meantime? They must continue praying. Perfect fruition is reserved for the land of our rest; asking and receiving are the comfort of the land of our pilgrimage.

2. Here is an invitation to them to petition. It is thought sufficient if great men permit addresses, but Christ calls upon us to petition, v. 24.

(1.) He looks back upon their practice hitherto: Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name. That refers either, [1.] To the matter of their prayers; Ye have asked nothing comparatively, nothing to what you might have asked, and will ask when the Spirit is poured out. See what a generous benefactor our Lord Jesus is, above all benefactors; he gives liberally, and is so far from upbraiding us with the frequency and largeness of his gifts, that he rather upbraids us with the seldomness and straitness of our requests; Ye have asked nothing in comparison of what you might have asked, had you been pleased to give. We are bid to open our mouth wide. Or, [2.] To the name in which they prayed. They prayed many a prayer, but never so expressly in the name of Christ as now he was directing them to do; for he had not as yet offered up that great sacrifice, in the virtue of which our prayers were to be accepted, nor entered upon his intercession for us, the immense whereof was to perfume all our devotions, and so enable us to pray in his name. Hitherto they had cast out devils, and healed diseases, in the name of Christ, as a king and a prophet, but they could not as yet distinctly pray in his name as a priest.

(2.) He looks forward to their practice for the future: Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full. It did not require a deeper sense of that which they needed and he had promised. [2.] He assures them that they shall receive. What we ask from a principle of grace, God will graciously give; Ye shall receive it. There is something more in that than in the promise, that he will give it. He will not only give it, but give you to receive it, give you the comfort and benefit of it, a heart to eat of it, Eph. 6. 2. [3.] That hereby their joy shall be full. Which speaks, First, The blessed effect of the prayer of faith; it helps to fill up the joy of faith. Would we have our joy full, as full as it is capable of being in this world, we must be much in prayer. When we are bid to rejoice evermore, it follows immediately, Pray without ceasing. See how high we are to aim in prayer—not only at peace, but joy, a full joy. Here are the second parts. The blessed effects of the answer of peace; Ask, and ye shall receive that which will fill your joy. Christ’s gifts, through Christ, fill the treasures of the soul, they fill its joys, Prov. 8. 21. Ask for the gift of the Holy Ghost, and ye shall receive it; and whereas other knowledge increases sorrow, (Ecc. 1. 18.) the knowledge he gives will increase, will fill, your joy.

1. First, This cautions us against hard thoughts of God. When we are taught in prayer to plead Christ’s merit and intercession, it is not as if all the kindness were in Christ only, and in God nothing but wrath and fury; no, the matter is not so, the Father’s love and good-will appointed Christ to be the Mediator; so that we owe Christ’s merit to God’s mercy in having bestowed it on us, and let it cherish and confirm in us good thoughts of God. Believers, that love Christ, ought to know that God loves them, and therefore to come boldly to him as children to a loving Father.

23. I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go to the Father. 29. His disciples said unto him, Lo, now speakest thou plainly. 30. Now are we sure that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee: by this we believe that thou camest forth from God. 31. Jesus answered them, Do ye now believe? 32. Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is now come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me. 33. These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.

Two things Christ here comforts his disciples with:

1. An assurance that, though he was leaving the world, he was returning to his Father, from whom he had come; and that this was the consummation of his mission. 2. A plain declaration of Christ's mission from the Father, and his return to him; (v. 28.) I came forth from the Father, and am come, as you see, into the world. Again, I leave the world, as you will see shortly, and go to the Father. This is the conclusion of the whole matter. There was nothing he had more instanced upon than these two things—whence he came, and whither he went: the Alpha and Omega of the mystery of godliness. (1 Tim. 3. 16.) that the Redeemer, in his entrance, was God manifest in the flesh, and, in his exit, was received up into glory. These two great truths are here, (1.) Contracted, and put into a few words, brief summaries of christian doctrine are of great use to young beginners. The principles of the oracles of God brought into a little compass in creeds and catechisms, have, like the beams of the sun concentrated in a burning-glass, conveyed divine light and heat with a wonderful power. Such we have, Job 28. 28. Eccl. 12. 13. 1 Tim. 1. 13. Tit. 2. 11. 12. 1 John 5. 11. much in a little, (2.) Compared, and set the one over against the other. There is an admirable harmony in divine truths; they both corroborate and illustrate one another; Christ's coming and his going do so: Christ had commenced his disciples for believing that he came forth from God, (v. 27.) and from thence infers the necessity and equity of his returning to God again, which therefore should not seem to them either strange or sad. Note, The due improvement of what we know and own would help us into the understanding of that which seems difficult and doubtful.

If we ask concerning the Redeemer, whence he came, and whither he went, we are he told that he came forth from God, and he went back to the Father at his ascension. He was not forced away, but made it his own act and deed to leave the world, to return to it no more till he comes to put an end to it; yet still he is spiritually present with his church, and will be to the end.

2. The disciples' satisfaction in this declaration;
structions and invitations are at last persuaded to believe, have reason to be ashamed that they stood it out so long. [5.] Now, why not every one? When an hour of temptation comes, where will your faith be then? As far as there is constancy in our faith, there is cause to question the sincerity of it, and to ask, Do we indeed believe? [2.] A prediction of their fall; that, how confident soever they were now of their own stability, in a little time they would all desert him; which was fulfilled that very night, when they were seized by a party of the guards, all his disciples forsook him and fled, Matt. 26. 56. They were scattered, [1.] From one another; they shifted every one for his own safety without any care or concern for each other. Troublesome times are times of scattering to Christian societies; in the cloudy and dark day the flock of Christ is dispersed. [2.] Scattered from him; Ye shall leave me alone. They should have been witnesses for him upon his trial, should have ministered to him in his sufferings; if they could have given him no comfort, they might have done him some credit; but they were ashamed of his chain, and afraid of sharing with him in his sufferings, Ezek. 24. 12. So Christ, as a society, is not visible. [3.] Scattered from him; Ye shall not leave me; The day of observation is come, when the Father will be with his people; yet he called them to his own bosom, and the church of the present is the church of the future; the disciples were scattered, and the church is now dispersed, but we have a Father's love, and the Father is with them. They that converse with God in solitude, are never less alone than when alone. A good God and a good heart are good company at any time. Secondly, When solitude is their affliction, their enemies lay them alone, and their friends leave them so; their company, like Job's, is made desolate; yet they are in the very midst of them, as much as when the Father is with them, as he was with Joseph in his bonds, and with John in his banishment. In their greatest troubles they are as one whom his Father pities, as one whom his mother comforts. And while we have God's favourable presence with us, we are happy, and ought to be easy, though all the world forsake us. Non Deo tribuimus justum hominem sed unum alium, si alii propitious; We do not render due honour to God, unless we deem him alone all-sufficient, Calvin.

1. He comforts them with a promise of peace in him, by virtue of his victory over the world, whatever troubles they might meet with in it; (v. 33.) These things I have spoken, that in me ye might have peace; and if ye have it not in me, ye will have it in all things as I have it in all things. He is the cause of all trouble, but promises to be the answer of all distress; he sees us within, and shall comfort us, and be our consolation; ye must expect no other, and yet may cheer yourselves, for I have overcome the world. Observe, 1. The end Christ aimed at in preaching this farewell sermon to his disciples; that in him they might have peace. He did not hereby intend to give them a full view of that doctrine which they were shortly to be made masters of by the pouring out of the Spirit, but only to satisfy them for the present, that his departure from them was really for the best. Or, we may take it more generally; Christ had said all this to them, that by enjoying him they might have the best enjoyment of themselves. Note, (1.) It is the will of Christ, that his disciples should have peace within, whatever their troubles. He sends them without the world, that they may be the only true peace, and in him alone believers have it, for this man shall be the peace, Nuc. 5. 5. Through him we have peace with God, and so in him we have peace in our own minds. (2.) The word of Christ aims at, that in him we may have peace. Peace is the fruit of the lips, of his lips, Isa. 57. 19. The entertainment they were likely to meet with in the world; You shall not have outward peace, never expect it, though you were sent to proclaim peace on earth, and good-will toward men,
CHAP. XVIII.

This chapter is a prayer, it is the Lord's prayer, the Lord's Christ's prayer. There was one Lord's prayer, which he taught us to pray, and did not pray himself, for he needed not to pray for the forgiveness of sin, but this was proper for all the elect to use, which they might be joined in with Mediator; and is a sample of his intercession, and set us an example both for instruction and encouragement in prayer. Observe, 1. The circumstances of the prayer, v. 1. 2. The peculiar petitions, v. 6. 3. The manner of offering it, v. 7. 4. The prayers for those that are his. And there see, (1.) The general plea with which he introduces his petitions for them, v. 6. 10. (2.) The particular petitions, he puts up for them, v. 7. 11. (3.) The concluding, v. 21. 22.

1. THESE words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee: 2. As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as they hast given him. 3. And this is eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. 4. I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do. 5. And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.

Here we have,

1. The circumstances of this prayer, v. 1. Many a solemn prayer Christ made in the days of his flesh; (sometimes he continued all night in prayer;) but none of his prayers are recorded so fully as this. Observe, (1.) The time when he prayed this prayer: when he had spoken these words, had given the foregoing farewell to his disciples, he prayed this prayer in their hearing; so that,

(1.) It was a prayer after sermon; when he had spoken from God to them, he turned to speak to God for them. Note, Those we pray for we must pray for. He that was to prepare the dry bones, was also himself, by Christ's prayer, to breathe upon them. And the word preached should be prayed over, for God gives the increase.

(2.) It was a prayer after sacrament; after Christ and his disciples had eaten the passover and the Lord's supper together, and he had given them a suitable exhortation, he closed the solemnity with this prayer; that God would preserve the good impressions of this gesture to those that use it.

(3.) It was a family-prayer. Christ's disciples were his family, and, to set a good example before masters of families, he not only, as a son of Abraham, taught his household, (Gen. 18. 19.) but, as a son of David, blessed his household, (2 Sam. 6. 20.) prayed for them and with them.

(4.) It was a parting prayer; when we and our friends are parting, it is good to part with prayer, (Ps. 20. 5.) Christ was parting by death; and that parting should be sanctified and sweetened by prayer. Dying Jacob blessed the twelve patriarchs, dying Moses, the twelve tribes, and so, here, dying Jesus the twelve apostles.

(5.) It was a prayer that was a preacher to his sacrifice which he was now about to offer on earth, specifying the favours and blessings designed to be purchased by the merit of his death for the souls of his, like a priest bishop the uses of a fine, and directing to what intents and purposes it shall be levied. Christ prayed then as a priest now offering sacrifice, in the virtue of which all prayers were to be made.

(6.) It was a prayer that was a specimen of his intercession, which he ever lives to make for us within the veil. Not that in his exalted state he addresses himself to his Father by way of humble petition, as when he was on earth. No, his intercession in heaven is a presenting of his merit to his Father, with a sining out of the benefit of it for all his chosen ones.

2. The outward expression of fervent desire which he used in this prayer; he lifted up his eyes to heaven, as before, (ch. 11. 41.) not that Christ needed thus to engage his own attention, but he was pleased to make the same, as it were, to his Father, and to justify it against those that ridicule it. It is significant of the lifting up of the soul to God in prayer, Ps. 25. 1. Sursum corda, was anciently used as a call to prayer. Up with your hearts, up to heaven; thither we must direct our desires in prayer, and tence we must expect to receive the good things we pray for.

II. The first part of the prayer itself, in which Christ prays for himself. Observe here,

1. He prays to God as a Father; He lifted up his eyes, and said, Father. Note, As prayer is to be made to God only, so it is our duty in prayer to eye him as a Father, and to call him our Father. All that have the Spirit of adoption, are taught to cry, Abba, Father, Rom. 8. 15. Gal. 4. 6. If God be our Father, we have liberty of access to him, temporal and spiritual grace in him, and great expectations from him.

Christ calls him here holy Father, (v. 11.) and righteous Father, (v. 25.) For it will be of great use to us in prayer, both for our direction and encouragement, to call God as we hope to find him.

2. He prayed for himself first; though Christ, as God, was prayed to, Christ, as man, prayed; thus it became him to fulfill all righteousness. It was said to him, as it is said to us, Ask, and I will give thee, Ps. 2. 8. What he had purchased he must ask for; and shall we expect to have what we never merited, but have a thousand times forfeited, unless we pray for it? This puts an honour upon prayer, that it was the messenger Christ sent on his errands, the way in which he communicated with God, and very adorably gives great encouragement to praying people, and cause to hope that even the prayer of the desolate shall not be despised; time was, when He that is advocate for us, had a cause of his own to solicit, a great cause, on the success of which depended all his honour as Mediator; and this he was to solicit in the same method that is prescribed to us, by prayers and supplications, (Heb. 5. 7.) so that he knows the heart of a petitioner, (Exod. 23. 9.) he knows the way. Now observe,

(1.) Christ begin with prayer for himself, and afterward prayed for his disciples; this charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. We must love and pray for our neighbour as ourselves, and therefore must in a right manner love and pray for ourselves first.

(2.) He was much shorter in his prayer for himself than in his prayer for his disciples. Our prayers for the church must not be crowded into a corner of our prayers; in making supplication for all saints, we have room enough to enlarge, and should not straiten ourselves.

Now observe two petitions which Christ puts for himself, and they are two—one, that he might be glorified. But this one petition, Glorify thou me, is twice put up, because it has a double reference.

[1.] To the prosecution of his undertaking further; Glorify me, that I may glorify thee, in doing what is agreed upon to be yet done, v. 1—3. And, [2.] To the performance of his undertaking hitherto; "Glorify me, for I have glorified thee. I have done my part, and thou, Lord, do thine," v. 4, 5.

[1.] Christ here prays to be glorified, in order to his glorifying God; (v. 1.) Glorify thy Son according to thy promise, that thy Son may glorify thee according to his undertaking. Here observe,

First, What he prays for—that he might be glorified in this world; "The hour is come when all the powers of darkness will combine to vilify thy Son and me, Father, glorify him," The Father glorified the Son upon earth, 1. Even in his sufferings, by the signs and wonders which attended them. When they that came to take him, were thunder-struck with a word, when Judas confessed him innocent, and sealed that confession with his own guilty blood, when the judge's wife asleep, and the judge himself had disappeared himself, when, so it was darkened, and the veil of the temple rent, then the Father not only justified, but glorified the Son. Nay, 2. Even by his sufferings; when he was crucified, he was magnified, he was glorified, ch. 12. 31. It was in his cross that he conquered Satan and death; his thorns were a crown, and Pilate in the inscription over his head wrote more than he thought. But, 3. Much more after his sufferings: the Spirit glorified the Son when he raised him from the dead, showed him openly to chosen witnesses, and poured out the Spirit to support and plead his cause, and set up his kingdom among men, then he glorified him. This he here prays for, and insists upon.

Secondly, What he pleads to enforce this request. But, He is the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He is the true light, the Father's image, as God, as Mediator. It is in consideration of this, that the heathen are given him for his inheritance; for thou art my Son, Ps. 2. 7, 8. The devil had tempted him to renounce his sonship with an offer of the kingdoms of this world, but he rejected it with disdain, and depended upon his Father for his preference, and here applies himself to him for it. Note, They that have received the adoption of sons, may in faith pray for the inheritance of sons; if sanctified, then glorified; Father, glorify thy Son.

3. He pleads the time; The hour is come: the season prefixed to an hour. The hour of Christ's passion was determined in the counsel of God. He had often said his hour was not yet come; but now it was come, and he knew it. May not know his time, but will not fail to judge of it, and be present at the solemnity, Ps. 37. 28. But, the hour is come in this hour, (ch. 12. 27.) and here the hour; compare Mark 14. 33. ch. 16. 21. For, the hour of the Redeemer's death, was also the hour of the Redeemer's birth, was the most signal and remarkable hour, and, without doubt, the most critical that ever was since the clock of time was first set a-going. Now was the beginning of an hour that, nor did ever any hour challenge such expectations of it before, nor such reflections upon it after.

(1.) "The hour is come, in the midst of which I need to be owned." Now is the hour when this grand affair is come to a crisis; after many a skirmish, the decisive battle between heaven and hell is now to be fought, and that great cause, in which God's hour and man's happiness are together embark'd, must now be either won or lost for ever. The two champions, David and Goliath, Michael and the dragon, are now entering the lists; the trumpet sounds for an engagement that will be irretrievably fatal either to the one or to the other: "Now glorify thy Son, now give him victory over principalities and powers, now let the bruising of his body bring in the reward of the righteousness of the absent One. Let thy Son be so upheld as not to fail or be discouraged." When Joshua went forth conquering and to conquer, it is said, The Lord magnified Joshua; so he glorified his Son, when he made the cress his triumphant chariot.

(2.) "The hour is come, in the close of which I expect to be crowned; the hour is come, when I am to be glorified and set as the right hand." Between him and that glory there intervened a bloody scene of suffering; but, being short, he speaks as if he made little of it; The hour is come that I must be glorified; and he did not expect it till then. Good Christians in a trying hour, particularly a dying hour, may thus plead; "Now the hour is come, stand by me, appear for me, now or never; now the earthly body, now the Son of God, now the hour is come, that I should be glorified," 2 Cor. 5. 1.

3. He pleads the Father's own interest and concern therein—that thy Son may glorify thee; for he had consecrated his whole undertaking to his Father's honour; he desired to be carried triumphantly through his sufferings to his glory, that he might glorify the Father two ways. (1.) The design of the undertaking, he was to glorify; Father, glorify thy Son, glorify thy name, expressed the great intention of his sufferings, which was to retrieve his Father's injured honour among men, and, by his satisfaction, to come up to the glory of God, which man, by his sin, came short of; "Father, own me in my sufferings, that I may honour thee by them." (2.) By the doctrine of the cross, which was shortly to be published to the world, by which God's kingdom was established among men. He prays that his Father would so grace his sufferings, and crown them, as not only to take off the offence of the cross, but to make it to them that are saved, the wisdom of God, and the power of God. If God had not glorified Christ crucified, by raising him from the dead, his whole undertaking had been crushed; therefore glorify him, he prays, and bless him evermore.

Now hereby he hath taught us, [1.] What to say and aim at in our prayers, in all our designs and desires—and that is, the honour of God. It being our chief end to glorify God, other things must be sought and attended to in subordination and subserviency to the Lord: "Do this and the other for thy servant, that thy servant may glorify thee. Give me health, that I may glorify thee with my body; success, that I may glorify thee with my estate," &c. Hallowed be thy name, must be our first petition, which must fix our end in all our other petitions, 1 Pet. 4. 11. [2.] He hath taught us what to expect and hope for. If we sincerely set ourselves to glorify our Father, he will not be wanting to do that for us which is requisite to put us into a capacity of glorifying him. He hath given us so much grace he hath given sufficient, and the opportunity how convenient. But if we secretly honour ourselves more than him, it is just with him to leave us in the hand of our counsels, and then, instead of honouring ourselves, we shall shame ourselves. 4. He pleads his commission: [v. 2, 3.] he desires to glorify his Father, in conformity to, and in pursuance of, the commission given him: "Glorify thy Father in the same manner as thou hast given him; so is it connected with the petition; or, that thy Son may glorify thee according to the power given him; so it is connected with the plea. Now see here the power of the Mediator: [1.] The original of his power: "Thou hast given him power," he saith from God, to whom all power belongs. Man, in his fallen state, must, in order to recover, he taken under a new model of government, which could not be erected but by a special commission under the brightness of heaven, directed to the undertaking of that glorious work, and constituting him sole arbitrator of the grand difference that was, and sole guarantee of the grand alliance that was to be, between God and man; so, as to this office, he received his power, which was to be executed in a way distinct from his power and government as Creator. Note, The church's king is no usurper, as the prince of this world is; Christ's right to rule is incontestable. [2.] The extent of his power. He has power over all flesh. [1.] Over all mankind. He has power in and over the world of spirits, the powers of the upper and lower worlds, Gen. 1. 14. 18. 22.] but, being now mediating between God and man, he here pleads his power over all flesh. They were men when he was to subdue and save; of that race he had a remnant given him, and therefore all that rank of beings was put under his feet. [2.] Over mankind, considered as corrupt and fallen, for he is called flesh, Gen. 6. 3. If he had not put in this sense, he flesh, he had not needed a Redeemer. Over this sinful race the Lord Jesus has all power; and all judgment, concerning them, is committed to him; power to bind or loose, acquit or condemn: power on earth to forgive sins, or not. Christ, as mediator, has the government of the whole world put into his hand. He is King of nations, has power even over those that know him not, nor obey his gospel; whom he does not rule, he overrules, Ps. 22. 28.—72. 8. Matt. 28. 18. ch. 1. 5. 3. 5. (3.) The grand intention and design of this power; that he should give eternal life to them that now have trusted him. Here is the mystery of our salvation laid open. [1.] Here is the Father making over the elect to the Redeemer, and giving them to him as his charge and trust, as the crown and remembrance of his undertaking. He has a sovereign power over all the fallen race, but a peculiar interest in the chosen remnant. He has delivered over his feet, but they were delivered into his hand. [2.] Here is the Son undertaking to secure the happiness of those that were given him, that he should give eternal life to them. See how great the authority of the Redeemer is! He has lives and crowns to give, eternal lives that never die, immortal crowns that never fade. Now consider how great the Lord Jesus is, who has such privileges in his gift; and how gracious he is in giving eternal life to these whom he undertakes to save. First, He sanctifies them in this world, gives them the spiritual life, which is eternal life in the heart and embryo, ch. 14. Grace in the soul, is heaven in that soul. Secondly, He will glorify them in the other world; their happiness shall be completed in the vision and fruition of God. This only is meant, because it supposes all the other parts of his undertaking, teaching them, satisfying for them, sanctifying them, and preparing them for that eternal life; and indeed, all the other were in order to this; we are called to his kingdom and glory, and begotten to the inheritance, what is last in execution was first in intention, and that is eternal life. [3.] Here is the evidence of the Redeemer's universal dominion to them. He has power over all flesh, a purpose that he might give eternal life to the select number. Note, Christ's dominion over the children of men, is in order to the salvation of the children of God. All things are for their sakes, 2 Cor. 4. 15. All Christ's laws, ordinances, and promises, which are given to all, are designed effectually to convey spiritual life, and secure eternal life, to all that were given to Christ. He is Lord over all things to the church. The administration of the kingdoms of providence and grace are put into the same hand, that all things may be made to centre for good to the called. [4.] Here is a further explication of this grand design: [v. 3.] "This is life eternal, which I am empowered, and have undertaken to give; this is the nature of it, and this the way heading to it; I shall know thee the only true God, and all the discourses and principles of natural religion, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent, as Mediator, and the doctrines and laws of that holy religion, which he is instituted for the recovery of man out of his lost estate." Here is, [1.] The grand end which the christian religion sets before us, and the way leading to it, the principle of the justification and sanctification of a spiritual life. This he was to reveal to all, and secure to all, that were given him. By the gospel, life and immortality are brought to light, are brought to hand, a life which transcends this so much in expediency as it does in duration. [2.] The sure way of attaining this blessed end, which is, by the right knowledge of God and Jesus Christ: the present principle of this life is the believing knowledge of God and Christ; the future perfection of the life will be the intuitive knowledge of God and Christ; they that are brought into union with Christ, and live a life of communion with God in Christ, know, in some measure, by experience, what eternal life is, and will say, "If this be heaven, heaven is sweet." See Ps. 17. 15. Secondly, The knowledge of God and Christ leads to life eternal; this is the way in which Christ gives eternal life, by the knowledge of him that has called us; (2 Pet. 1. 3) and this is the way in which we come to receive it.

The christian religion shews the way to heaven,

1. By directing us to God, as the author and felicity of our being; for Christ died to bring us to God, to know him as our Creator, and to love him, obey him, submit to him, and trust in him, as our own ruler, and benefactor, to devote ourselves to him as our own. (1 John 5. 20) and he who in this text is proposed as the object of the same religious regard with the Father. It is certain there is but one only living and true God, and the God we adore is he. He is the true God, and not a mere name or notion; the only true God; and all that ever set up as rivals with him, are vanity and a lie; the service of him is the only true religion.

2. By directing us to Jesus Christ, as the Mediator between God and man; Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. If man had continued innocent, the knowledge of the only true God would have been life eternal to him; but now that he is fallen, there must be something more; now that we are under guilt, to know God, is to know him as a righteous judge, whose curse we are under; and nothing is more killing than this; we are under guilt, as persons continuous to the God we adore, by whom alone we can now have access to God; it is life eternal to believe in Christ; and this he has undertaken to give to as many as were given him. See ch. 6. 39, 40. They that are acquainted with God and Christ, are already in the suburbs of life eternal.

3. That the glorification of him who is perfect, and the same is the glory of the Redeemer; what he is the author of, he will be the finisher of. It was a strange way for the Son to glorify the Father, by abasing himself, (that looked more likely to disapprove him,) yet it was contrived so that he should glorify him; "I have glorified thee on the earth, in such a way as none on earth could hear the manifestation of thy glory."

2. It is recorded for example to all, that we may follow his example. (1.) We must make it our business to do the work God has appointed us to do, according to our capacity and the sphere of our activity; we must each of us do all the good we can in this world. (2.) We must win at the goal of God in all. We must enjoy the work of him, in which he has given unto the children of men, demanding only this quiet rent; on the earth, where we are in a state of probation and preparation for eternity. (3.) We must persevere herein to the end of our days; we must not sit down till we have finished our work, and accomplished, as a hiring, our day.

3. It is recorded for encouragement to all those that rest upon him. If he have finished the work that was given him to do, then he is a complete Savior, and did not do his work by the halves. And he that finished his work for us, will finish it in us to the day of Christ.

Secondly, See with what confidence he expects the jou set before him; (v. 5.) Now, O Father, glory that this is what he depends upon, and can not be denied him.

1. See here what he prayed for; Glorify thou me, as before, v. 1. All repetitions in prayer are not to be counted vain repetitions; Christ prayed, saying, the same words, (Matt. 26. 44, 45) and yet prayed more earnestly. What his Father had promised him, and he was assured of, yet he must pray for; promises are not to be taken in the word, which is the guide of our desires and the ground of our hopes.

4. Christ's being glorified, includes all the honours, powers, and joys of his exalted state. See how it is described.

(1.) It is a glory with God; not only, Glory my name on earth, but Glory me with thine own self. It was paradise, it was heaven, to be with his Father, and in the bosom of the Father, in the bosom of the Father, and in the bosom of the Father, and in the bosom of the Father.

(2.) It is the glory he had with God before the world was. By this it appears. [1.] That Jesus Christ, as God, had a being before the world was, co-eternal with the Father; our religion acquaints us with one that was, fhe, all things, and by whom all things consist. [2.] That his glory with the Father, was glory with the Father, in that he was appointed himself of this glory, and drew a veil over it; though he was still God, yet he was God manifest in the flesh, not in his glory. He laid down this glory for a time, as a pawn or pledge that he would go through with his undertaking, according to the appointment of his Father. [4.] That in his exalted state he resumed this glory, and chasèd himself again with his former robes of light.
Having performed his undertaking, he did, as it were, resurrexerat—take up his favor, by this demand, Glory thee, and I shall be glorified in the glory of the other world, as far exceeding all the glory of this. He had despised the kingdom of this world and the glory of them, when Satan offered them to him, and therefore might the more boldly claim the glories of the other world.

Let the same mind be in us.

"Lord, give the glories of this world to whom thou wilt give them, but let me have my portion of glory in the world to come. It is no matter, though I be buffeted with men; but, Father, glory thee with thine own self.”

2. See here what he pleaded; I have glorified thee, and now, in consideration thereof, glory thee, For.

(1) There was an equity in it, and an admirable becomingness, that if God were glorified in him, he should glorify himself in him. Christ had a far more glorious station than any of men. For there was in Christ an infinite value, where in was what Christ did to glorify his Father, that he properly merited all the glories of his exalted state. If the Father was a gainer in his glory by the Son's humiliation, it was the Son should be no loser by it, at long run, in his glory.

(2) It was according to the covenant between them, that if the Son would make himself an offering for sin, he should divide the spoil with the strong; (Isa. 53. 10, 12) and the kingdom should be his; and this he had an eye to, and depended upon in his sufferings; it was for the joy set before him, that he endured the cross; and now in his exalted state, he still expects the completion of his exaltation, because he perfected his undertaking, Heb. 10. 13.

(3) It was the most proper evidence of his Father's accepting and approving the work he had finished. By the glorifying of Christ we are satisfied, and therein a real demonstration was given that his Father was well pleased in him as his beloved Son.

(4) Thus we must be taught that those, and only those, who glorify God on earth, and persevere in the work God hath given them to do, shall be glorified with the Father, and with the Son, in the kingdom of this world. Not that we can merit that glory, as Christ did, but our glorifying God is required as an evidence of our interest in Christ, through whom eternal life is God's free gift.

6. I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word. 7. Now they have known that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee. 8. For I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me: and they have received them, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and they have believed that thou didst send me. 9. I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me: for they are thine. 10. And all mine are thine, and thine are mine: and I am glorified in them.

Christ, having prayed for himself, comes next to pray for those that are his, and he knew them by name, though he did not here name them. Now observe here.

What did he not pray for; (v. 9.) I pray not for the world. Note, There is a world of people that Jesus Christ did not pray for. It is not meant of the world of mankind in general, (he prays for that here, (v. 21.) That the world may believe that thou hast sent me,) nor is it meant of the Gentiles, in distinction from the Jews; but the world is here understood for the whole creation. This Christ did not pray for, nor did he pray for the world in general, or for the world of men, and yet he prayed for the world, for the remaining heap of rejected worthless chaff, and Christ neither prays for it, nor did he pray for it, but alone does it, and the wind drives it away. These are called the world, because they are governed by the spirit of this world, and have their portion in it; for these Christ does not pray; not but that there are some things which he intercedes with God for on their behalf, as the dresser for the reprise of the barren tree; but he does not pray for them in this prayer; they are not specially prayed for. He does not say, I pray against the world, as Elias made intercession against Israel; but, I pray not for them, I pass them by, and leave them to themselves; they are not written in the Lamb's book of life, and therefore not in the breast-plate of the great High-priest. And miserable is the condition of such, as it was of those who in the prophet was forbidden to pray for, and more so Jer. 7. 16. We that know not who are chosen, and who are passed by, must pray for all men, 1 Tim. 2. 1, 4. While there is life, there is hope, and room for prayer. See 1 Sam. 12. 23.

II. When he did pray for: not for angels, but for the children of men. 1. He prays for them that were given him, meaning primarily the disciples that had attended him in the regeneration; but it is doubtless to be extended further, to all who come under the same character, who receive and believe the words of Christ, v. 6, 8. 2. He prays for all that should believe on him; (v. 20.) and it is not only the petitions that follow, but those also which went before, that must be construed to extend to all believers, in every place, and every age; for he has a concern for them all, and calls things that are not as though they were.

III. What encouragement he had to pray for them, and what the general pleas with which he introduces his petitions for them, and recommends them to his Father's favour; they are five.

1. The charge he had received concerning them; These were, and they were the same which thou hast given me: (v. 6) and again, (v. 20.) They which thou hast given me are thine. 2. The Father, these I am now praying for, are such as the Father trusted with me, and what I have to say for them is in pursuance of the charge I have received concerning them. Now.

(1.) This is meant primarily of the disciples that then were, who were given to Christ as his pupils, to be educated by him while he was on earth, and his agents to be employed for him in the world, and were given him to do good in this world, to be the learners of his doctrine, the witnesses of his life and miracles, and the monuments of his grace and favour, in order to their being the publishers of his gospel, and the planters of his church. When they left all to follow him, this was the secret spring of that strange resolution; they were given to him, else they had not given themselves to him. Now, these are the Father's gift to the church, were first the Father's gift to Jesus Christ. As un-under the law the Levites were given to Aaron, (Numb. 3. 9.) to him (the great High-Priest of our profession) the Father gave the apostles first, and ministers in every age, to keep his charge, and the charge of the whole congregation, and to do the service of the tabernacle. See Eph. 4. 8, 11. Ps. 68. 18. Christ received this gift for so that he might give it to men.

As this puts a great honour upon the ministry of the gospel, and magnifies that office, which is so much vilified; so it lays a mighty obligation upon the ministers of the gospel to devote themselves entirely to Christ's service, as being given to him.

(2.) But it is designed to extend to all the elect, for they are elsewhere said to be given to Christ; (ch. 6. 32.) and accordingly had their names in heaven. This he assumes upon the supposition that those he was to save were given to him as his charge; to his care they were committed, from his hand they were expected, and concerning them he received commandments. He here shows,

[1.] That the Father had authority to give them;

Thine they were. He did not give that which was none of his own, but covenanted that he had a good title to. The elect that the Father gave to Christ, were his own three ways: First, They were creatures, and their lives and beings were derived from him. When they were given to Christ to be vessels of honour, they were in his hand, as clay in the hand of the potter, to be disposed of as God's wisdom saw most for God's glory. Secondly, They were criminals, and their lives and beings were forfeited to him. For his covenant, as men, and as Christ, and was given to him to Christ to be redeemed, that might have been made sacrifices to justice then when they were pitched upon to be the monuments of mercy; might justly have been delivered to the tormentors when they were delivered to the Saviour. Thirdly, They were chosen, and their lives and beings were designed for him; were set apart for God, and were conscientious to themselves, and as such, and that he might give them.

[2.] That he did accordingly give them to the Son;

Thou gavest me, as sheep to the shepherd, to be kept as patients to the physician, to be cured; children to a tutor, to be educated; thus he will deliver up his charge; (Heb. 2. 13.) The children thou hast given me. They were delivered to Christ, First, That the election of grace might not be frustrated, that not one, no not of the little ones, might perish. That great concern must be lodged in some one good hand, able to give sufficient security, that the purpose of God according to election might stand. Secondly, That the undertaking of Christ might not be fruitless; they were given to him as his seed, in whom he should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, (Isa. 53. 10, 11.) and might not after this way go forth, and be ashamed, and despised, for naught, and in vain, Isa. 53. 4. We may plead, as Christ does, "Lord, keep my graces, keep my comforts, for they thou gave, and thou gavest them me." They were delivered to Christ, Second, That the election of grace might not be frustrated, that not one, no not of the little ones, might perish. That great concern must be lodged in some one good hand, able to give sufficient security, that the purpose of God according to election might stand. Secondly, That the undertaking of Christ might not be fruitless; they were given to him "as his seed, in whom he should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, (Isa. 53. 10, 11.) and might not after this way go forth, and be ashamed, and despised, for naught, and in vain, Isa. 53. 4. We may plead, as Christ does, "Lord, keep my graces, keep my comforts, for they thou gave, and thou gavest them me." They were delivered to Christ, Third, That the election of grace might not be frustrated, that not one, no not of the little ones, might perish. That great concern must be lodged in some one good hand, able to give sufficient security, that the purpose of God according to election might stand.

[3.] What success the doctrine of Christ had among those that were given him, in several particulars.

[1.] "They have received the words which I gave them, as they stood and received the seed, and the earth drinks in the rain." They attended to the words of Christ, apprehended in some measure the meaning of them, and were affected with them: they received the impression of the word. The word was to them an ingrained word.

[2.] "They have kept thy word; (v. 7.) They have known all things are of thee; (v. 8.) They have received the words, and embraced them, have given their assent and consent to them, and have known a certainty that I came out from thee, and have believed that thou sent me." Observe here,

First, What it is to believe; it is to know surely, to know that it is so of a truth. The disciples were very weak and defective in knowledge; yet Christ, who knew them better than they knew themselves, passe his word for them that they did believe.

Note, We may know surely that which we neither do nor can know fully; may know the certainty of the things which are not seen, though we cannot particularly describe the nature of them. We walk by faith, which knows surely, not yet by sight, which knows clearly.

Next, This shows us what it is we are to believe: that Jesus Christ came out from God, as he is the Son of God, in his person the image of the invisible God, and that God did send him; that in his undertaking he is the ambassador of the eternal King; so that the Christian religion stands upon the same foot, and is of equal authority, with natural religion; and therefore all the doctrines of Christ are to be received as divine truths, all his commands obeyed as divine laws, and all his promises depended upon as divine securities.

(2.) How Jesus Christ speaks of this here: he enlarges upon it,

[1.] As pleased with it himself. Though the many instances of his disciples' dullness and weakness had grieved him, yet their constant adherence to him, their gradual improvements, and their great attachment to him, was a matter of delight to him; he delighted in the progress of his scholars. He accepts the sincerity of their faith, and graciously passes by the infirmity of it. See how willing he is to make the best of us, and to say the best of us; thereby encouraging our faith in him, and teaching us charity to one another.

[2.] As pleasing it with his Father. He is praying for those there were given him: and he pleads that they had given themselves to him. Note, The due improvement of grace received, is a good plea, according to the tenor of the new covenant, for further grace; for so runs the promise, To him that hath shall be given. They that keep Christ's word, and believe on him, let Christ alone to commend them, and which is more, to recommend them, to his Father.

4. He pleads the Father's own interest in them; (v. 9.) I pray for them, for they are thine; and this by virtue of a joint and mutual interest, which he and the Father have in what pertained to each; All mine are thine, and thine are mine. Between the Father and Son there can be no dispute; (as there is among the children of men) about meum and tuum—mine and thine, for the matter was settled from all eternity; all mine are thine, and thine are mine. Here is,

(1.) The plea particularly urged for his disciples, That these transgressions of the elect to Christ was so far from making them less the Father's, that it was in order to the making them the more so. Note, [1.] All that receive Christ's word, and believe in him, are taken into covenant-relation to the Father, and are looked upon as his; Christ presents them to him, and they, through Christ, present themselves to him. Christ has redeemed us, made himself our Advocate to the Father, made his Father their Father, and has subordinated his Father to them. [2.] This is a good plea in prayer, Christ here pleads it. They are thine; we may plead it for ourselves, I am thine, save me; and for others, (as Moses, Exod. 32. 11.) They are thy people, They are thine; wilt thou not provide for thine own? wilt thou not secure them, that they may not be run down by the devil and the world, and be lost on account of sin? that they may not depart from thee? They are thine, and are thine as thine.

(2.) The foundation on which this plea is grounded; All mine are thine, and thine are mine. This speaks the Father and Son to be, [1.] One in essence. Every creature must say to God, All mine are thine; but man can say to him, All thine are mine, but he that is the same in substance with him, and equal in power and glory. [2.] One in interest; no separate or divided interests between them.

First, What the Father has, as Creator, is delivered over to the Son, to be used and dispensed in subserviency to his great undertaking. All things are delivered to him; (Matt. 11. 27.) the grant is general, that nothing was excepted, but he and all things under him.

Secondly, What the Son has, as Redeemer, is designed for the Father, and his kingdom shall shortly be delivered up to him. All the benefits of redemption purchased by the Son, are intended for the Father's praise, and in his glory all the lines of his undertaking centre; All mine are thine. The Son owns none for his that are not devoted to the service of the Father; nor will any thing he accepted as a piece of service to the Christian religion, which does not tend to the exaltation of his wisdom, or to the support of natural religion. In a limited sense, every true believer may say, All mine are mine; if God be our's in covenant, all he has, is so far our's, that it shall be engaged for our good; and in an unlimited sense, every true believer does say, Lord, all mine are mine; all laid at his feet, to be serviceable to him. And then what we have may be comfortably committed to God's care and blessing, when it is cheerfully submitted to his putting it to a use for the support of the Son, and Lord, take care of what I have, for it is all thine.

5. He pleads his own concern in them; I am glorified in them; (John 17. 10.)

(1.) I have been glorified in them; what little honour Christ had in this world, was among his disciples; he had been glorified by their attendance on him and obedience to him, their preaching and doing, and their showing mission to his own name. What little interest Christ has in this degenerate world, lies in his church; and then it and all its affairs lie near his heart, within the veil. [2.] Therefore I commit them to the Father, who has engaged to glorify the Son, and, upon that account, will have a gracious eye to those in whom he is glorified. That in which God and Christ are glorified, may, with humble confidence, be committed to God's special care.

11. And now I am no more in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to thee. Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are. While I was with them in the world, I kept them in thy name; those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition: that the Scripture might be fulfilled. And now come I to thee: and these things I speak in the world, that they might have my joy fulfilled in themselves. I have given them thy word; and the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world.
After the general pleas with which Christ recommended his disciples to his Father's care, follow the particular petitions he puts up for them: and, 1. They all relate to spiritual blessings in heavenly things. He does not pray that they might be rich and great in the world, that they might raise estates, and get preferments, but that they might be kept from sin, and furnished with the duty and knownness of salvation. The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity; for, what relates to that, Christ came to purchase and bestow, and so teaches us to seek, in the first place, both for ourselves and for others. 2. They are such blessings as were suited to their present state and case, and their various exigencies and occasions. Note, Christ's intercession is always good people's Advocate with the Father, and is acquainted with all the particulars of our wants and burdens, our dangers and difficulties, and knows how to accommodate his intercession to each, as to Peter's peril, which he himself was not aware of; (Luke 22. 32.) I have prayed for thee. 3. He is large and full in the petitions, orders them before his Father, and fills his mouth with arguments, to teach us fervency and importance in prayer, to labor for the well being of our souls at the throne of grace, wrestling as Jacob, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.

Now the first thing Christ prays for, for his disciples, is their preservation, in these verses; in order to which he commits them all to his Father's custody. Keeping supposes danger, and their danger arises from their world, the world wherein they were, the evil of this he begs they might be kept from. Now observe, 1. The request itself; Keep them from the world. There were two ways of their being delivered from the world: 1. By taking them out of it; and he does not pray that they might be so delivered: I pray not that they should be taken out of the world; that is, (1.) I pray not that they may speedily be removed by death. If the world will be vexations to them, the readiest way to secure them, would be to hasten them out of it to a better world, that will give them better treatment. Send chariots and horses of fire for them, to fetch them to heaven; Job, Elijah, Jonah, Moses, when that occurred which fretted them, prayed that they might be taken out of the world, and the Christ would not pray so for his disciples, for two reasons. 1. Because he came to conquer, not to countenance, those intemperate heats and passions which make men impatient of life, and importunate for death. It is his will that we should take up our cross, and not avoid it. 2. Because he had work for them to do in the world; the world, though sick of them, (Acts 22. 22.) and therefore not worthy of them, (Heb. 11. 38.) yet very useful to them. In pity therefore to this dark world, Christ would not have these lights removed out of it, but continued in it, especially for the sake of those in the world, that were to believe in him through their world. Let not them be taken out of the world, when their Master is; they must each, in his own order, die a martyr, but not till they have finished their work for the Father, the taking of good people out of the world is a thing by no means to be desired, but dreaded rather, and laid to heart, Isa. 57. 1. Secondly, Though Christ loves his disciples, he does not presently send for them to heaven, as soon as they are effectually called, but leaves them for some time in this world, that they may do good, and glorify God, upon earth, and be ripened for heaven to hear the voice of Christ; and for them, as they can still be spared to die.

(2.) I pray not that they may be totally freed and exempted from the troubles of this world, and taken out of the toil and terror of it in some place of ease and safety, there to live undisturbed; that is, the preservation I desire for them. Non ut omnium molestias liberari utim et delicias colant, sed ut inter media pericula salvi. tamen, manente Dei auxilio—not that, being freed from all trouble, they may bask in luxurious ease, but that, by the help of God, they may be preserved in a scene of danger, care, and toil. Calamities are so natural to man, that it is difficult for a man to serve with the world, but that they may not be over come by it; not that, as Jeremiah wished, they might leave their people, and go from them, (Jer 9. 2.) but that, like Ezekiel, their faces may be strong against the faces of wicked men, Ezek. 3. 8. It is more the honour of a christian soldier by faith to overcome the world, than by a monastical vow to conceal himself from it. And it is the duty and concern of Christ to serve him in a city than to serve him in a cell.

2. Another way is, by keeping them from the corruption that is in the world; and he prays they may be thus kept, v. 11, 15. Here are three branches of this petition:

(1.) Holy Father, keep those whom thou hast given me. Christ was now leaving them; but let them not think that their defence was departed from them; no, he does here, in their hearing, commit them to the custody of his Father and their Father. Note, It is the unspiability of comfort all be lievers, that Christ himself has committed them to the care of God himself. Those cannot but be safe, whom the almighty God keeps, and he cannot but keep those whom the Son of his love commits to him: and hereby, in a way of love, he committed the keeping of our souls to God, 1 Pet. 4. 19. 2 Tim. 1. 12. [1.] He here puts them under the divine protection, that they might not be run down by the malice of their enemies; that they and all their concerns might be the particular care of the divine providence; Keep their lives, till they have done their work; keep their comforts, and let not them be taken away by the hardships they meet with; keep up their interest in the world, and let not that sink. This prayer is owing the wonderful preservation of the gospel-ministry and gospel-church in the world unto this day; if God had not graciously kept both, and kept up both, they had been extinguished and lost long ago. [2.] He puts them under the divine tuition, that they might not themselves run away from their duty; if they do not like the way of the world, they might pray that their Father would bring them to keep in the way of the world; Keep them in their integrity, keep them disciples, keep them close to their duty. We need God's power not only to put us into a state of grace, but to keep us in it. See ch. 10. 28, 29. 1 Pet. 1. 5. The titles he gives to him he prays to, and them he prays for, enforce the petition.

First, He speaks to God as a holy Father. In conferring ourselves and others to the divine care, we may take encouragement, 1. From the attribute of his holiness, for that is engaged for the preservation of his holy ones; he hath sworn by his holiness, Ps. 89. 35. If he be a holy God, and hate sin, he will make those that are his, holy, and keep them from sin, who hate it too, and dread it as the greatest evil. 2. From this relation of a Father, wherein he stands to us all as Christ. If he be a Father, he will take care of his own children, will teach them and keep them; who else should?

Secondly, He speaks of them as those whom the Father had given him. What we receive as our Father's gifts, we may comfortably remit to our Father's care. "Father, keep the graces and comforts thou hast given me; the children then hast given me, keep them to do me good, to multiply and preserve the ministry of the gospel." (2.) Keep them through thine own name. That is, [1.] Keep them for thy name's sake; so some. Thy name and honour are concerned in their preservation as well as care, for both will suffer by it.
if they either revolt or sink." The Old Testament saints often pleaded, for thy name's sake; and these may with comfort plead it, that are indeed more concerned for the honour of God's name than for any interest of their own.

[2] Keep them in thy name; so others; the original is so, περὶ ὀνόματος. Keep them in the knowledge and fear of thy name; keep them in the profession and service of thy name, whatever it cost them. Keep them in the interest of thy name, and let them ever be faithful to that; keep them in thy truths, in thine ordinances, in the way of thy commandments.

[3] Keep them by or through thy name; so others. Keep them by thine own power, in thine own hand; keep them thyself, undertake for them, let them be thine own immediate care. Keep them by the means of preservation which thou hast self-applied, and by which thou hast made thyself known. Keep them by thy word and ordinances; let thy name be their strong tower; thy tabernacle their pavilion.

[4] Keep them from the evil; or out of the evil. He had taught them to pray daily, Deliver us from evil, and this would encourage them to pray.

[5] Keep them from the evil one, the devil and all his children. Keep them from Satan as a tempter, that either he may not have leave to sift them, or that their faith may not fail. Keep them from him as a destroyer, that he may not drive them to despair.

[6] Keep them from the evil thing, that is, sin; from every thing that looks like it, or leads to it. Keep them, that they do no evil. 2 Cor. 13. 7. Sin is that evil which, above any other, we should dread and deprecate.

[7] Keep them from the evil of the world, and of their tribulation in it, so that it may have nothing in it, no malignity; not that they might be kept from affliction; but kept through it, that the property of their afflictions might be so altered that there might be no evil in them, nothing to do them any harm.

II. The reasons with which he enforce these requests for their preservation, which are five.

1. He pleads that hitherto he had kept them; (v. 12.) "While I was with them in the world, I have kept them in thy name, in the true faith of the gospel and the service of God; these that thou gavest me for my constant attendants I have kept, they are all safe, and none of them missing, none of them removed, kept living in the interest of thy name, and that the scripture might be fulfilled." Observe,

(1.) Christ's faithful discharge of his undertaking concerning his disciples; while he was with them, he kept them, and his care concerning them was not in vain. He kept them in God's name, preserved them from falling into any dangerous errors or sins; from striking in with the Pharisees, who would have confined and confined him; and he kept them from deserting him, and returning to the little all they had left for him; he had them still under his eye and care when he sent them to preach; went not his heart with them? Many that followed him a while, took offence at something or other, and went off; but he kept the twelve, that they also should not go away. He kept them from falling into the hands of persons who esteem not spiritual lives; caught them when he surrendered himself, ch. 18. 9. While he was with them, he kept them in a visible manner by instructions still sounding in their ears, miracles still done before their eyes; when he was gone from them, they must be kept in a more spiritual manner. Sensible comforts and supports are sometimes given and sometimes withheld; but when they are withdrawn, yet they are not left com-

What Christ here says of his immediate followers, is true of all the saints while they are here in the world; Christ keeps them in God's name. It is implied, [1.] That they are weak, and cannot keep themselves; their own hands are not sufficient for them. [2.] That they are, in God's account, valuable and worth the keeping; precious in his sight and honourable; his treasure, his jewels. [3.] That their salvation is designed, for that it is that they should be kept, 1 Pet. 2. 9. As the, given are reserved for the day of evil, so the righteous are preserved for the day of bliss. [4.] That they are the charge of the Lord Jesus; for as his charge he keeps them, and exposed himself like the good Shepherd for the preservation of the sheep.

[2] The comfortable account he gives of his undertaking; None of them is lost. Note, Jesus Christ will certainly keep all that are given to him, so that none of them shall be totally and finally lost; they may think themselves lost, and may be nearly lost; (in imminent peril;) but it is the Father's will that he should lose none, and none he will lose; (ch. 6. 39.) so it will appear when they come altogether, and none of them shall be wanting.

(3) A broad put upon Judas, as one of those whom he had undertaken to keep. He was among those that were given to Christ, but not of them. He speaks of Judas as already lost, for he had abandoned the society of his Master and his fellow-disciples, and abandoned himself to the devil's guidance, and in a little time would go to his own place; he is as good as lost.

But the apostacy and ruin of Judas were no reproach at all to his master, or his family; for,

[1.] He was the son of perdition, and therefore none of those that were given to Christ to be kept. He deserved perdition, and God left him to throw himself headlong into it. He was the son of the destroyer, as Cain, who was of that wicked one. That great enemy whom the Lord will consume, is called a son of perdition, because he is a man of sin, 2 Thess. 2. 3. It is an awful consideration, that one of the apostles proved a son of perdition. No man's place or name in the church, no man's privileges or opportunities of getting grace, no man's profession or external performances, will secure him from ruin, if his heart he not right with God; nor are any more likely to prove sons of perdition at last, after a plausible course of profession, than those that, like Judas, have the bag. But Christ's distinguishing Judas from those that were given to him, (for he was indisputably, without exception, the son of the destroyer, as he was the son of God, both in his person and in his office,) intimates that the truth and true religion ought not to suffer for the treachery of those that are false to it, 1 John 2. 19.

[2] The scripture was fulfilled; the sin of Judas was foreseen in God's counsel, and foretold in his word, and the event would certainly follow after the prediction as a consequence, though it cannot be said necessarily to follow from it as an effect. See Ps. 89, 38-40. 52-56. 109. One would be amazed at the treachery of apostates, were we not told it be-

2. He pleads that he was now under a necessity of leaving them, and could no longer watch over them in the way that he had hitherto done it; (v. 11.) "Keep them now, that I may not lose the labour I bestowed upon them while I was with them. Keep them now, that I may send one with us to go with each other." We shall have occasion to speak of that, v. 21. But see here,

(1.) With what pleasure he speaks of his own departure. He expresses himself concerning it with an air of triumph and exultation, with reference both to the world he left, and the world he removed to.

[1] "Now am I no more in the world. Now farewell to this provoking troublesome world, I have had enough of it, and now the welcome hour is at hand when I shall be no more in it. Now that I have finished the work I had to do in it, I have done with it; nothing remains now but to hasten out of it as fast as I can." Note. It should be a pleasure to those that have their home in the other world, to think of being no more in this world; for when we have done what we have to do in this world, and are made meet for that, what is there here, that should court our stay? When we receive a sentence of death, and are to go hence, with what a holy triumph would we say, "Now I am no more in this world; this dark deceitful world, this poor empty world, this tempting deluding world; no more vexed with its thorns and briers, no more endangered by its nets and snares; now I shall wander no more in this howling wilderness, be tossed no more on this stormy sea; now I am no more in this world, but can cheerfully quit it, and give it a final farewell."

[2.] Now I come to thee. To get clear of the world is but the one half of the comfort of a dying Christ, of a dying christian; the far better half is to think of going to the Father, to sit down in the immediate uninterrupted and everlasting enjoyment of him. Note. They who love God, cannot but be pleased with going hence, and think of going hence with what a holy triumph.

[2.] Another reason is more express; the world hates them, because they are not of the world. They to whom the world is not, of Christ comes in power, are not of the world, for it has this effect upon all that receive it in the love of it, that it means them from the wealth of the world, and turns them against the wickedness of the world, and therefore the world bears them a grudge.

3. He pleads their conformity to himself in a holy non-conformity to the world: (v. 16.) Father, keep them, for they are of my spirit and mind, they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. — They may in faith commit themselves to God's custody. (1.) Who are as Christ was in this world, and stand in his steps. God will love those that are like Christ. (2.) Who do not engage themselves in the world's interest, nor devote themselves to its service. Observe,

[1.] That Jesus Christ was not of this world; he never had been of it, and least of all, now that he was upon the point of leaving it. This speaks, First, His state; he was none of the world's favourites or darlings, none of its princes or graces: worldly possessions he had none, nor where to lay his head; nor worldly power, he was no judge or divider. Secondly, His spirit; he was perfectly dead to the world, the prince of this world had nothing in him; the things of this world were nothing to him; not loving himself, he made himself of no reputation: not riches, nor pleasures, for, for our sakes he became poor; poor pleasures, for he acquainted himself with grief. See ch. 8. 23.

[2.] That therefore true christians are not of this world. The Spirit of Christ in them is opposite to the spirit of the world. First, It is their lot to be despised by the world; they are not in favour with the world any more than their Master before them was. Secondly, It is their privilege to be delivered from the world; as Abraham out of the land of his nativity. Thirdly, It is their duty and character to be dead to the world. Their most pleasing converse is, and should be, with another world, and their prevailing concern about the business of that world, not of this. Christ's disciples were weak, and had in my infirmities; yet this he could not take from them. They are off the world, not of the earth, and therefore he recommends them to the care of heaven.

17. Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth. 18. As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world. 19. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth.

The next thing he prayed for them, was, that they ought to be sanctified; not only kept from evil, but made good.

1. Here is the petition; (v. 17.) Sanctify them through thy truth, through thy word, for thy word is truth, it is true, it is truth itself. He desires they may be sanctified both as christians and as ministers.

1. As christians. Father, make them holy, and that will be their preservation, 1 Thess. 5. 23. — Observe here,

(1.) The grace desired — sanctification. The disciples were sanctified, for they were not of the world; yet he prays, Father, sanctify them, that is, [1.] Conform the work of sanctification in themstrengthen their faith, influence their good affections, give them good resolutions. [2.] Carry on that good work in them and continue it: be the light shine more and more. [3.] Complete it, crown it with the perfection of holiness; sanctify them throughout and to the end. Note,

First, It is the prayer of Christ for all that are his, that they may be sanctified, because he cannot for shame own them as his, either here or hereafter. And after his example, in his work, we present them to his Father, if they be not sanctified. Secondly, Those that through grace are sanctified, need have no longer to be sanctified more and more. Even disciples must pray for sanctifying grace; for if he that was the author of the good work be not the finisher of it, we are undone. Not to go forward is to go backward; be that is holy, must be holy still, more holy still, pressing forward, pressing upward, as those that have to do with God. Thirdly, Sanctification is as well as God that justifies. See ch. 2. 14. Fourthly, It is an encouragement to us in our prayers for sanctifying grace, that it is what Christ in tercedes for, for us.

(2.) The means of conferring this grace — through thy truth, thy word is truth. Not that the Holy One of Israel is hereby limited to means, but in the counsel of force; among other things, it was settled and agreed, [1.] That all needful truth should be comprised and summed up in the word of God. Divine revelation, as it now stands in the written word, is not only pure truth without mixture, but entire truth without deficiency. [2.] That this word of truth should be the outward and ordinary means of our sanctification; not of itself, for then it would always be the case, according to Rom. 10. 17, that the Spirit commonly uses in beginning and carrying on that good work; it is the seed of the new birth, (1 Pet. 1. 23.) and the food of the new life, 1 Pet. 2. 1, 2.

2. As ministers. Sanctify them, set them apart for thyself and service; let their call to the apostleship be ratified in heaven. Prophets were said to be sanctified, Jer. 1. 1. Priests and Levites were so. Sanctify them; (1.) Qualify them for the office, with christian graces and ministerial gifts, to make them able ministers of the New Testament. (2.) Separate them to the office, Rom. 1. 1. I have called them, they have consented; Father, say Amen to it. (3.) Own them in the office; let thy hand go along with them; sanctify them by or in truth, as truth is opposed to figure and shadow, so truth is opposed to vanity and corruption; not only insincerely, but ceremonially, as the Levitical priests were, by anointing and sacrifice. Sanctify them to thy truth, the word of thy truth, to be the preachers of thy truth to the world; as the priests were sanctified to serve at the altar, so let them be to preach the gospel. 1 Cor. 9. 13, 14. Note, [1.] Jesus Christ intercedes for his ministers, with a particular concern, and recommends to his Father's grace those stars he carries in his right hand. [2.] The great thing to be asked of God for gospel-ministers, is, that they may be sanctified, effectually separated from the world, entirely devoted to God, and experimentally acquainted with the influence of that word upon their own hearts, which they preach to others. Let them have the Urim and Thummim, light and knowledge, for their guidance.

II. We have here two pleas or arguments to enforce the petition for the disciples' sanctification.

1. The mission they had from him; (v. 18.) As thou hast sent me into the world, to be thy ambassador to the children of men, so now that I am recalled, have I sent them into the world, as my delegates. Note here,

(1.) Christ's mission was the commence of his own mission: Thou hast sent me. — The world. The great Author of the christian religion had his commission and instructions from him who is the original and object of all religion. He was sent of God to say what he said, and do what he did, and be what he is, to those that believe on him; which was his comfort in his undertaking, and may be our abundanstantly, in our dependence upon him; his record was on high, from whence his mission was.

23. Why Christ came into the world, to bear witness to, and to manifest in the world his sanctifying virtue and power: the death of Christ. Some read it, that they be sanctified in truth, that is, truly; for as God must be served, so, in order to that, we must be sanctified, in the spirit, and in truth. And this Christ has prayed for, for all that are his; for this is his will, even their sanctification, which encourages them to pray for it.

20. Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; 21. That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. 22. And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are one: 23. In them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou hast loved me.

Next to their purity he prays for their unity: for the wisdom from above is sincerity, and peace; and amity is the ambler indeed, when it is like the onement on Aaron's holy head, and the dew on Zion's holy hill. Observe,

1. Those and those only, are interested in the mediation of Christ, that do, or shall, believe in him. This is that by which they are described, and it comprehends all the character and duty of a Christian. They that lived then, saw, and believed, but they in after-ages have not seen, and yet have believed.

2. It is through the word that souls are brought to believe on Christ, and it is for this end that Christ appointed the scriptures to be written, and a standing ministry to continue in the church, while the church stands, that is, while the world stands, for the raising up of a seed.

3. It is certainly and infallibly known to Christ who shall believe on him. He does not here pray at a venture, upon a contingency depending on the treacherous will of man, which pretends to be free, but by reason of sin is in bondage with its children; no, Christ knew very well whom he prayed for, the matter was reduced to a certainty by the divine predestination; he knew who were given him, who, being ordained to eternal life, were entered in the Lamb's book, and should undoubtedly believe.

4. Jesus Christ intercedes not only for great and eminent believers, but for the meanest and weakest; not for those only that are to be employed in the highest posts of trust and honour in his kingdom, but for all, even those that in the eye of the world are inconsiderable. As the Divine Providence extends itself to the meanest creatures, so does the Divine Grace to the meanest Christians. He need not add, the good Shepherd has an eye even to the foot of the flock.

5. Jesus Christ in his mediation had an actual e gout of those of the chosen remnant that were yet unborn, the people that should be created, (Ps. 22: 51.) the other sheep which he must yet bring, before they are formed in the womb, he knows them, (Jer. 1: 5.) and prayers are filled in heaven for them both in the same language. Before they begin, and call forth things that are not as though they were.

11. What is intended in this prayer; (v. 21.) that they all may be one. The same was said before, (v. 11.) that they may be one as we are, and again, v. 22. The heart of Christ was much upon this. Some think that the oneness prayed for, (v. 11.) has special reference to the disciples as ministers of the gospel, that they might be one in their testimony to Christ, and that the harmony of the evangelists, and concurrence of the first preachers of the gospel, are owing to this prayer. Let them be not only of one heart, but one mouth, speaking the same thing. The unity of gospel-ministers is both the beauty and strength of the gospel interest.

But it is certain that the oneness prayed for, (v. 21.) respects all believers. It is the prayer of Christ for all that are his, and we may be sure that it is an answered prayer—that they all may be one, or, (v. 21.) one as we are, (v. 22.) made perfect in one, v. 23. It includes three things;

1. That they might all be incorporated in one body; Father, look upon them all as one, and ratify that which he has joined together into one church. Though they live in distant places, from one end of heaven to the other, and in several ages, from the beginning to the close of time, and so cannot have any personal acquaintance or correspondence with each other, yet let them be united in one common head.” As Christ died, so he prayed, to gather them all in one, ch. 11. 32. Eph. 1. 22.

2. That they might all be animated by one Spirit. This is plainly implied in that—that they may be one in us. Union with the Father and Son is obtained and kept up only by the Holy Ghost. He that is joined to the Lord, is one spirit, 1 Cor. 6. 17. Let them all be stamped with the same image and superscription, and influenced by the same power. That they might all be knit together in the bond of love and charity, all of one heart. That they all may be one, (1.) In judgment and sentiment; not in every little thing, it is neither possible nor needful, but in the great things of God, and in them, by the virtue of this prayer, they are all agreed—that God’s favour is better than life; that sin is the worst of evils, Christ the best of friends; that there is another life after this; and the like. (2.) In disposition and inclination. All that are so justified, have the same divine nature and image; they have all a new heart, and it is one heart. (3.) They are all one in their designs and aims. Every true christian, as far as he is so, eves the glory of God as his highest end, and the glory of heaven as his chief good. (4.) They are all one in their desires and prayers; though they differ in words and the manner of expressing it, as in their profession and the act of adoration; and observing the same rule, they pray for the same things in effect. (5.) All one in love and affection. Every true christian has that in him, which inclines him to love all true christians as such. That which Christ here prays for, is, that communion of saints which we profess to believe; the fellowship which all believers have with God, and their intimate union in all the same things in heaven and earth, 1 John 1: 3. But this prayer of Christ will not have its complete answer till all the saints come to heaven; for then, and not till then, they shall be perfect in one, v. 23. Eph. 4. 13.

III. What is intimated by way of plea or argument, or to enforce this petition; three things.

1. The oneness that is between the Father and the Son, which is mentioned again and again, v. 11. 22—23.
   (1.) It is taken for granted, that the Father and Son are one, in nature and essence, equal in power and glory, these mutual endearments. The Father loveth the Son, and the Son always pleased the Father. They are one in design, and one in operation. The intimacy of this oneness is expressed in these words, Thou in me, and I in thee. This he often mentions for his support under his present sufferings, when his enemies were ready to fall upon him, and his friends to fall off from him, yet he was not alone, but the Father and the Father in him. (2.) This is insisted on in Christ’s prayer for his disciples’ oneness.
   (1.) As the pattern of that oneness, showing how he desired they might be one. Believers are one in some measure, as God and Christ are one; for, First, The union of believers is a strict and close union; they are united by a divine nature, by the power of divine grace, in pursuance of the divine counsels. Secondly, It is a holy union, in the Holy Spirit, for holy ends; not a holy politic for any secular purpose. Thirdly, It is, and will be at last, a complete union. Father and Son have the same attributes, properties, and perfections; so have believers now, as far as they are sanctified, and when grace shall be perfected in glory, they will be exactly correspondent to each other, all changed into the same image.

2. As the centre of that oneness; that they may be one in us, all meeting here. There is one God and one Mediator; and herein believers are one, that they all agree to depend upon the favour of this one God as their felicity, and the merit of this one Mediator as their righteousness. That is a consipicuous act, of which the Son was in the end, and Christ the way. All who are truly united to God and Christ, who are one, will soon be united to one another.

3. As a plea for that oneness. The Creator and Redeemer are one in interest and design; but to what purpose are they so, if all believers were not one body with Christ, and did not jointly receive grace and glory from him, as he had received it for them? Christ’s design was to reduce revolted mankind to God: “Father,” says he, “let all that believe, be one, that in one body they may be reconciled.” (Eph. 2: 13, 16.) which speaks of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the church; that great mystery, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, (Eph. 3: 6.) to which I think this prayer of Christ principally refers, it being one great thing he aimed at in his dying; and I wonder none of the expositors I have met with do so apply it. “Father, let the Gentiles that believe be incorporated with the believing Jews, and make of twain one new man.”

Those words, I in them, and then in me, shew what that union is, which is so necessary, not only to the benefit of the church, but the very being, of his church. First, Union with Christ; I in them. Christ dwelling in the hearts of believers, is the life and soul of the new man. Secondly, Union with God through him: They in me: so as by me to be in them. Thirdly, Union with each other, resulting from those; that they hereby may be made perfect in one. We are complete in him.

2. The design of Christ in all his communications of light and grace in mutual endearments;
   (22.) “The glory which thou gavest me, as the trustee or channel of conveyance, I have accordingly given them, to this intent, that they may be one, as we are one; so that these gifts will be in vain, if they be not one.” Now these gifts are either,

(1.) Those that were conferred upon the apostles, and first planters of the church. The glory of being God's ambassadors to the world; the glory of working miracles; the glory of gathering a church out of the world, and erecting the throne of God's kingdom among men; this glory was given to Christ, and some of the honour he put upon them when he sent them to disciple all nations.

Or, (2.) This was given in common to all believers. The glory of being in covenant with the Father, and accepted of him; of being laid in his bosom, and designed for a place at his right hand, was the glory which the Father gave to the Re
demer, and he has confirmed it to the redeemed.
[1.] This honour, he says, he hath given them, because he hath intended it for them, settled it upon them, and given it to them. They are the Christ's promises to be real gifts. [2.] This was given him, to give them; it was conveyed to him in trust for them, and he was faithful to him that appointed him. [3.] He gave it them, that they might be one. First, To entitle them to the privilege of unity, that by virtue of their common relation to one God the Father, and one Lord Jesus Christ, they might be truly denominated one. The gift of the Spirit, that great glory which the Father gave to the Son, by him to be given to all believers, makes them one, for he works all in all, 1 Cor. 12. 4.

Secondly, To engage them to the duty of unity.
That in consideration of their agreement and communication in one creed and one covenant, one Spirit and one Bible; in consideration of what they have in one God and one Christ, and of what they hope for in the heaven, they may be of one mind and one mouth. Worldly glory sets men at variance; for some be advanced, others are eclipsed, and therefore, while the disciples dreamed of a temporal kingdom, they were ever and anon quarrelling: but spiritual honours being conferred alike upon all Christ's subjects, they being all made to our God ingles and perfect, there is no occasion for contest and emulation. The more Christians are taken up with the glory Christ has given them, the less desirous they will be of vain-glory, and, consequently, the less disposed to quarrel.

3. He pleads the happy influence their oneness would have upon others, and the furtherance it would give to the public good. This is twice urged;
(v. 23.) that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. [1.] To establish their unity; for they that believe know it; for without knowledge there can be no true faith. Believers must know what they believe, and why and wherefore they believe it. They who believe at a venture, venture too far. Now Christ
here shews,

(1.) His good-will to the world of mankind in general. Herein he is of his Father's mind, as we are sure he is in every thing, that he would have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth, 1 Tim. 2. 4. 2 Pet. 3. 9. Therefore it is his will that all means possible should be used, and no stone left unturned, for the conviction and conversion of the world. We know not who are chosen, but we must in our places do our utmost to further men's salvation, and take heed of doing any thing to hinder it.

(2.) The good fruit of the church's oneness; it will be an evidence of the truth of Christianity, and a means of bringing many to embrace it.
[1.] In general, it will recommend Christianity to the world, and to the good opinion of those that are without.

Firstly, The embodying of christians in one society
by the new-covenant charter, will greatly promote Christianity, when the world shall see so many of those that were its children, called out of its family, disringuished from others, and changed from what they themselves sometimes were; when they shall see this society raised by the foolishness of preaching, and kept up by miracles of divine providence and grace, and how admirably well it is modelled and constituted, they will be ready to say, We will go with you, for we see that God is with you.

Secondly, The uniting of christians in love and charity, is the beauty of their profession, and invites good men to be with them. This is a feature in those primo-primitive christians, Acts 2. 42. 43. - 4. 32. 33. When Christianity, instead of causing quarrels about itself, makes all other strife to cease, when it cools the fiery, smooths the rugged, and disposes men to be kind and loving, courteous and beneficent, to all men; studious to preserve and promote peace in all relations and societies; this will be a mark by which it may distinguish itself neither of national religion or natural affection in them.

[2.] In particular, it will beget in men good thoughts,
First, Of Christ: They will know and believe that thou hast sent me. By this it will appear that Christ was sent of God, and that his doctrine was divine, in that his religion prevails to join so many of different capacities, temperaments, and interests in other things, in one body by faith, with one heart by love. Certainly he was sent by the God of power, who fashions men's hearts alike, and the God of love and peace; when the worshippers of God are one,
he is one, and his name one.

Secondly, Of christians: They will know that thou hast loved them as thou hast loved me. Here is, 1. The privilege of believers: the Father do
self loveth them with a love resembling his love to his Son, for they are loved in him with an everlasting love. 2. The evidence of their interest in this privilege, and that is, their being one. By this it will appear that God loves us, if we love one another with a pure heart; for wherever the love of God is shed abroad in the heart, it will change it into the same image. See how much good it would do to the world, to know better how dear to God all good christians are! The Jews had a saying, If the world did but know the worth of good men, they would hedge them about with jewels. Those that have so much of God's love, should have more of our's.

24. Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: for thou hast loved me before the foundation of the world.

25. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee: but I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me.

26. And I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it: that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them.

Here is,
1. A petition for the glorifying of all those that were given to Christ, (v. 24.) not only these apostles, but all believers; Father, I will that they may be with me. Observe,
1. The connection of this request with those forgoing. He had prayed that God would preserve, sanctify, and unite them; and now he prays that he would crown all his gifts with their glorification.
In this method we must pray, first for grace, and then for gifts, Ps. 84. 10. So he here this method God gives. Far be it from the only wise God to come under the imputation, either of that foolish builder,
who, without a foundation, built upon the sand, as he would, if he should glorify any whom he has not first sanctified; or, of that foolish murder, who began to build, and was not able to finish, as he would, if he should sanctify any, and not glorify them.

3. The manner of the request; Father, I will, Here, as before, he addresses himself to God as a Father, and therein we must do likewise; but when he says, I will, he speaks a language peculiar to himself, and such as does not become ordinary petitioners, but very well became him who paid for what he prayed for.

3. It speaks the authority of his intercession in great things. But his was an authority with power in heaven, as well as on earth. He entering with his own blood into the holy place, his intercession there has an uncontrollable efficacy; he intercedes as a king, for he is a priest upon his throne, (like Melchizedek,) a king-priest.

2. It speaks his particular authority in this matter; he had a power to give eternal life, (v. 23,) and pursuant to that power, he says, Father, I will. Though now he took upon him the form of a servant, yet that power being to be most illustriously exerted when he shall come the second time in the glory of a judge, to say, Come, ye blessed, having that in his eye, he might well say, Father, I will.

3. The request itself—That all the elect might come to be with him in heaven at last, to see his glory, was the request of Jesus. Now observe,

1. Under what notion we are to hope for heaven: wherein does that happiness consist? Three things make heaven:

1. It is to be where Christ is; where I am; in the paradise, whither Christ's soul went at death; in the third heavens, whither his soul and body went at his ascension; where I am, to be short; and where he is, to be eternal. In this world we are but in transitus—in our passage; there we truly are, where we are to be for ever: so Christ reckoned, and so must we.

2. It is to be with him where he is: this is no tautology, but intimates that we shall not only be in the same happy place where Christ is, but that the happiness of the place will consist in his presence, that is, the fulness of his joy. The very heaven of heavens, where Christ is in company with him, and communion with him, Phil. 1. 23.

3. It is to behold his glory, which the Father has given him. Observe,

First, The glory of the Redeemer is the brightness of heaven. That glory, before which angels cover their faces, was his glory, ch. 12. 41. The Lamb is the light of the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21. 23. Christ will come in the glory of his Father, for he is the brightness of his glory. God shewed his glory there, as he does his grace here, through Christ.

"The Father has given me this glory;" he was as yet in his low estate; but it was very sure, and very near.

Secondly, The felicity of the redeemed consists very much in the beholding of that glory; they will have the immediate view of his glorious person; shall see God in my flesh, Job 19. 26. They will have a clear insight into his glorious undertaking, as it will be then accomplished; they will see into these springs of love, from whence flow all the streams of grace; they shall have an approving sight of Christ's glory, (Cant. fulget radix maris—The axe shines with the radiance of her husband,) and an assimilating sight: they shall be changed into the same image and likeness of glory.

2. Upon what ground we are to hope for heaven; no other than purely the mediation and intercession of Christ, because he hath said, Father, I will. Our sanctification is our evidence, for he that has this hope in him, purifies himself; but it is the will of Christ that is our title, by the which we are sanctified, Heb. 10. 10.

(4.) The plea he insists upon for himself; but I have known thee. Christ knew the Father so as no one else ever did; knew upon what grounds he went in his undertaking, knew his Father's mind in every thing, and therefore, in this prayer, even in the intercourse with God, with confidence, as we do to one we know, Christ is here sweetly giving promises for those that were here his; pursuing this petition, when he had said, The world has not known thee, one would expect it should follow, but they have known thee; no, their knowledge was not to be boasted of: but I have known thee; which intimates that there is nothing in us to commend us to Christ's interest in heaven; but Christ, in interourse with him, result from, and depend upon, Christ's interest and intercourse. We are unworthy, but he is worthy.

(5.) The plea he insists upon for his disciples; and they have known that thou hast sent me; and,

1. Hereby they are distinguished from the unbelieving world. When multitudes, to whom Christ was sent, and his grace offered, would not believe, and light; but all our souls thus beholding it, and believing it, and were not ashamed to own it. Note, To know and believe in Jesus Christ, in the midst of a world that perishes in ignorance and infidelity, is highly pleasing to God, and shall certainly enwreathe with distinguishing glory. Singular faith qualifies for singular favours.
[2.] Hereby they are interested in the mediation of Christ, and partake of the benefit of his acquaintance with the Father; "I have known thee, immediately and perfectly; and those, though they have not so known thee, nor were capable of knowing thee; yet they have known that thou hast sent me, have known that which was required of them to know, have known the Creator in the Redeemer. Knowing Christ as sent of God, they have, in him, known the Father, and are introduced to an acquaintance with him; therefore, Father, look after them for my sake."

The respect he had to his disciples; (v. 26.) "I have led the knowledge of thee, and will do yet more and more; with this great and kind intention, that the love wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them, and I in them." Observe here,

(1.) What Christ had done for them; I have declared unto them my name. [1.] This he had done for those that were his immediate followers. All the time that he went in and out among them, he made it his business to declare his Father's name to them, and to beget in them a veneration for it. The tendency of all his sermons and miracles, was, to advance his Father's honour, and to spread the knowledge of him, ch. 1. 18. [2.] This he has done for all that believe on him: for they had not been brought to believe, if Christ had not made known the Father's name to them. Note, We are indebted to Christ for all the knowledge we have of the Father's name: he declares it, and he opens the understanding to receive that revelation.

Secondly, Those whom Christ recommends to the favour of God, he first leads into an acquaintance with God.

(2.) What he intended to do yet further for them; I will declare it. To the disciples he designed to give further instructions after his resurrection. (Acts 1. 3.) and to bring them into a much more intimate acquaintance with divine things, by the pouring out of the Spirit after his ascension; and to all believers, into whose hearts he hath shined, he shames more and more. Where Christ has declared his Father's name, he will declare it; for to him that hath shall be given; and that they know God, by both need and desire to know him: and moreover of the Father's hearken. This is fully pleaded for them; "Father, own and favour them, for they will own and honour thee."

(3.) What he aimed at in all this; not to fill their heads with curious speculations, and furnish them with anything to talk of among the learned, but to secure and advance their real happiness in two things:

First, Communion with God; therefore I have given them the knowledge of thy name, of all that whereby thou hast made thyself known, that thy love, even that wherewith thou hast loved me, may be, not only toward them, but in them." That is,

"First, Let them have the fruits of that love for their sanctification; let the Spirit of love, with which thou hast filled me, be in them. Christ declares the Father's name to believers, that with that divine light that shone into their minds, a divine love may be shed abroad in their hearts, to be in them a commanding, constraining principle of holiness, that they may partake of a divine nature. When God's love to us comes to be in us, it is like the virtue which the leadstone gives the needle, inclining it to move toward the pole; it draws out the soul toward God, in pure and devout affections, which are as the odour of the flowers in the soul. Secondly, Let them have the taste and relish of that love for their consolation; let them not only be interested in the love of God, by having God's name declared to them, but, by a further declaration of it, let them have the comfort of that interest: that they may not only know God, but know that they know him." 1 John 2. 3. It is the love of God that shed abroad in the heart, that fills it with joy, Rom. 5. 3, 5. This God has provided for, that we may not only be satisfied with his loving kindness, but satisfied of it; and so may live a life of complacency in God, and communion with him; this we must pray for, this we must press after; if we have it, we must thank Christ for it; if we want it, we may thank ourselves.

[2.] Union with Christ in order hereunto; and in the Spirit. There is no getting into the love of God but through Christ, nor are we kept in that love but by abiding in Christ, that is, having him to abide in us; nor can we have the sense and apprehension of that love but by our experience of the indwelling of Christ, that is, the Spirit of Christ in our hearts. It is Christ in us that is the only hope of glory, that will not make us ashamed, Col. 1. 27. All our communion with God, the reception of his love to us, and our return of love to him again, passes through the hands of the Lord Jesus, and the comfort of both is owing purely to him. Christ had said but a little before, I in them; (v. 23.) and here it is repeated again, (though the sense was complete without it,) and the prayer closed with it, to show how much the heart of Christ was set upon it; all his petitions centre in this, and with this the promise of the Son of Man is ended; "I in them, let me have this, and I desire no more." It is the glory of the Redeemer to dwell in the redeemed; it is his rest for ever, and he has desired it. Let us therefore make sure our union with Christ, and then take the comfort of his intercession. This prayer had an end, but that he ever lives to make.

CHAP. XVIII.

Hitherto this evangelist has recorded little of the history of Christ, only so far as was requisite to introduce his discourse: but now that the time drew near that Jesus must die, he is very particular in relating the circumstances of his sufferings, and some which the others had omitted, especially his sayings. So far were his followers from being ashamed of his cross, or endeavouring to conceal it, that this was its own, both by word and writing, they were most insidious to proclaim, and glorify in it. This chapter relates I. How Christ was arrested in the garden, and surrendered himself a prisoner. II. How his followers were abused in the High-Priest's court, and how Peter, in the mean time, denied him, v. 13. 27. III. How he was prosecuted before Pilate, and examined by him, and put in election with Barabas for the favour of the people, and lost it, v. 28. 40.

1. WHEN Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples. 2. And Judas also, which betrayed him, knew the place; fo: Jesus ofttimes resorted thither with his disciples. 3. Judas then, having received a band of men and officers from the Chief Priests and Phari-saees, cometh thither with lanterns and torches and weapons. 4. Jesus therefore, knowing all things that should come upon him, went forth, and said unto them, Whom seek ye? 5. They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto him, I am he. And Judas also, which betrayed him, stood with them. 6. As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground. 7. Then asked he them again, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus of Nazareth. 8. Jesus answered, I have told you that I am he: if therefore ye seek me, let these go their way: 9. That the saying might be fulfilled, which he spake, Of them whom thou gavest me have I lost none. 10. Then Simon Peter having a sword drew it, and smote the High-Priest’s servant, and cut off his right ear. The servant’s name was Malchaus. 11. Then said Jesus unto Peter. Put up thy sword into the sheath: the cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it? 12. Then the band and the captain and officers of the Jews took Jesus, and bound him.

The hour was now come that the Captain of our salvation, who was to be made perfect by sufferings, should appear in his grace unto the encounter. The day of recompence is in his heart, and the year of his redemption is come, and his own arm works the salvation, for he has no second. Let us turn aside now, and see this great sight.

1. Our Lord Jesus, like a bold champion, takes the field first; (c. 1, 2.) When he had spoken these words, he departed from them, (c. 2.) and so finished his testimony, he would lose no time, but went forth immediately out of the house, out of the city, by moonlight, for the passover was observed at the full moon, with his disciples, (the eleven, for Judas was otherwise employed,) and he went over the brook Cedron, which runs between Jerusalem and the mount of Olives, where was a garden, not of our Lord’s, but some friend’s, who allowed him the liberty of it. Observe,

1. That our Lord Jesus entered upon his sufferings when he had spoken these words, as Matt. 26. 1. When he had finished these sayings. Here it is intimated,

1. 1. That our Lord Jesus took his work before him. The office of the priest was to teach, and pray, and offer sacrifice. Christ, after teaching and praying, applies himself to make atonement. Christ had said all he had to say as a prophet, and now he addresses himself to the discharge of his office as a priest, to make his soul an offering for sin; and when he had gone through that, he entered upon his kingly office.

2. That having by his sermon prepared his disciples for this hour of trial, and by his prayer prepared himself for it, he then courageously went out to meet it. When he had put on his armour, he entered the lists, and not till then. Let those that suffer according to the will of God, in a good cause, with a good conscience, and having a clear d e t o it, comfort themselves with this, that Christ will not engage those that are his in any conflict, but he will first do that for them which is necessary to prepare them for it; and if we receive Christ’s instructions and commands, and be interested in his intercession, we may, with an unskidded resolution, venture through the greatest hardships in the way of duty.

2. That he went forth with his disciples. Judas knew what house he was in, in the city, and he could have staid and met his sufferings there; but,

1. He would do as he was wont to do, and not after his method, either to meet the cross or to miss it, when his hour was come. It was his custom when he was at Jerusalem, after he had spent the day in public work, to retire at night to the mount of Olives; there his quarters were, in the skirts of the city, for they would not make room for him in the palaces, in the heart of the town. This being his custom, he would not be put out of his method by the foresight of his sufferings, but, as Daniel, did just then as he did of time, Dan. 6. 10.

2. He was as unwilling that there should be an uproar among the people, as his enemies were, as it was not his design to draw fire upon himself, but that they should know that their blood is precious to Christ, and that not a drop of it shall be shed but upon a valuable consideration, need not stand upon such terms.

3. He would set us an example in the beginning of his passion, as he did at the end of it, of retirement from the world. Let us go forth to him without the camp, and bear his reproach, Heb. 13. 13. We must lay aside, and leave behind, the cares, and cares, and comforts, of cities, even holy cities, if we would cheerfully take up our cross, and keep up our communion with God therein.

3. That he went over the brook Cedron: he must go over that to go to the mount of Olives; but the notice taken of it intimates that there was something in it significant; and it points, (1.) At David’s prayer concerning the Messiah, (Ps. 22. 1.) That he shall drank the brook in the way; the brook of suffering in the way to his glory and our salvation, signified by the brook of Cedron; the black brook, so called, either from the darkness of the valley it ran through, or the colour of the water, tainted with the durt of the city; such a brook Christ drank of, when he lay in the way of our redemption, and therefore shall he lift up the head, his own and our’s. (2.) At David’s pattern, as a type of the Messiah. In his flight from Absalom, particular notice is taken of his passing over the brook Cedron, and going up by the ascent of mount Olivet, weeping, and all that were with him in tears too, 2 Sam. 15. 23. 30. The Son of David, being driven out by the rebellious Jews, who would not have him to reign over them. (a.) And Judas, like A nthophel, being in the plot against him, Jobst. 23. 11. Over the brook in meanness and humiliation, attended by a company of true mourners. The guilty kings of Judah had burnt and destroyed the idols they found at the brook Cedron; (Asa, 2 Chron. 15. 16. Hezekiah, 2 Chron. 30. 14. Josiah, 2 Kings 23. 4. 6.) into that brook the abominable things were cast. Christ, being now made sin for us, that he might be delivered up, Heb. 9. 28. and he, having begun his passion by the same brook, Mount Olivet, where Christ began his sufferings, lay on the east side of Jerusalem; Mount Calvary, where he finished them, on the west; for in them he had an eye to such as should come from the east and the west.

4. That he entered into a garden. This circumstance is taken notice of only by this evangelist, that Christ’s sufferings were on the Mount of Olives, and that he entered into a garden to rest himself, or to prepare himself for the curse upon the ground for man’s sake she was removed. (2.) When we are in the midst of our possessions and enjoyments, we must keep up an expecta tion of troubles, for our gardens of delight are in a vain of tears.
5. That he had his disciples with him, (1.) Because he had already some like him all the while that he retired for prayer. (2.) They must be witnesses of his sufferings, and his patience under them, that they might have the more assurance, and affliction preach them to the world, (Luke 24. 48.) and be prepared to suffer themselves. (3.) He would take them into the danger to show them their weakness, notwithstanding the promises they had made of fidelity. Christ sometimes brought them into difficulties, that he may magnify himself in their deliverance.
6. That Judas the traitor knew the place, knew it to be the place of his usual retirement, and, probably, by some word Christ had dropped, knew that he intended to be there that night, for want of a better closet.
A solitary garden is a proper place for meditation and prayer, and, after a passover, a proper time to retire for private devotion, that we may pray over the impressions made, and the vows renewed, and clench the nail.

Mention is made of Judas's knowing the place, (1.) To aggravate the sin of Judas, that he would betray his Master, notwithstanding the intimate acquaintance he had with him; nay, and that he would not only do it, but joyfully, and in such a manner as giving him an opportunity of betraying him; a generous mind would have scorned to do so base a thing!
Thus has Christ's holy religion been wounded in the house of his friends, so as it could not have been wounded anywhere else. Many an apostate could not have been so profane as he is, if he had not been a professor; could not have ridiculed scriptures and ordinances, if he had not known them.
(2.) To magnify the love of Christ, that, though he knew where the traitor would seek him, thither he went to be found of him, now that he knew his hour was come. Thus he shews himself willing to suffer and die for us. What he did was not by con-strait, but by consent; though as man he said, Let this cup pass away; as Mediator he said, "Lo, I come.
I come with a good will." It was late in the night, (we may suppose it eight or nine o'clock,) when Christ went out to the garden; for it was not only his meat and drink, but his rest and sleep, to do the will of him that sent him. When others were going to bed, he was going to prayer, going to suffer.
11. The Captain of our salvation having taken the field, the enemy presently comes upon the spot, and the people commit themselves to Judas with another, commissioned by the chief priests, especially those among them that were Pharisees, who were the most bitter enemies to Christ. This evangelist passes over Christ's agony, because the other three had fully related it, and presently introduces Judas and his company that came to seize him. Observe, (1.) The persons employed in this action—a band of Roman soldiers, officers from the chief priests, with Judas. (1.) Here is a multitude engaged against Christ—

* This Jesus was a dangerous man, it is likely, they had a warrant from him to take him up, for they feared the people. See what enemies Christ and his gospel were to the Romans. They were likely to have, numerous and potent, and therefore formidable: ecclesiastical and civil powers combined against them, Ps. 2. 1. 2. Christ said it would be so, (Matt. 10. 18.) and found it so.

(4.) All under the direction of Judas; he received this band of men, it is probable that he desired it, telling them it was necessary for the good for-purpose, and being as ambitious of the honour of commanding in chief in this expedition, as he was coves-rous of the wages of this unrighteousness. He thought himself bravely preferred from coming in the rear of the contemptible twelve, to be placed at the head of these formidable hundreds; he never made such a figure before, and promised himself, perhaps, that this should not be the last time, but he should be rewarded with a captain's commission, or better, if he succeeded well in this enterprise.

2. The preparation they had made for an attack;
they came with lanterns, and torches, and weapons.
(1.) If he should abscond, though they had moonlight, they would have occasion for their lights; but they might have spared these; the second Adam was to come by night, not by light, and therefore there was no need of them. They were either for fear or shame, among the trees of the garden. It was folly to light a candle, to seek the sun by.
(2.) If he should resist, they would have occasion for their arms; the weapons of his warfare were spiritual, and at these weapons he had often beaten them, and put them to silence, and therefore they have now recourse to other weapons, swords and sceptres.

III. Our Lord Jesus gloriously repulsed the first onset of the enemy, v. 4—6, where observe,
1. How he received them, with all the mildness imaginable toward them, and all the calmness imaginable in himself.
(1.) He met them with a very soft and mild question; (v. 4.) Knowing all things that should come upon him, and therefore not at all surprised with this alarm, with a wonderful intrepidity and presence of mind, undisturbed and undaunted, he went forth to meet them, and, as if he had been unconcerned, softly asked, "Whom seek ye? What is the matter? What means this bustle at this time of night?" See here, [1.] Christ's foresight of his sufferings; he knew all those things that should come upon him, for he had obliged himself to suffer them; unless we had strength, as Christ had, to bear the discovery, we should not covet to know what shall come upon us; it would but anticipate our pain; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;
yet it will do us good to expect sufferings in general, so that when they come, we may say, "It is but what we looked for, the cost we sat down and counted.
[2.] To move to Christ's toleration of our suffer-hins. He did not run away from them, but went out to meet them, and reached forth his hand to take the bitter cup. When the people would have forced him to a crown, and offered to make him a king of Galilee, he withdrew, and hid himself; (ch. 6. 15.)
but when they came to force him to a cross, he offered himself for he came to this world to suffer, and went unto the cross to reign. The suffering Christ will never expose ourselves to trouble, for we know not when our hour is come; but then we are called suffering, when we have no way to avoid it, but by sin; and when it comes to that, let none of these things move us, for they cannot hurt us.
(2.) He met them with a very calm and mild answer, when they told him whom they were in quest of, v. 5. They said, Jesus of Nazareth; and he said, I am he.
[1.] It should seem, their eyes were held, that they could not know him. It is highly probable that many of the Roman band, at least the officers of the temple, had often seen him, so as to satisfy their curiosity; Judas, however, to be sure, knew him well enough, and yet none of them could pretend to say, Thou art the man we seek. Thus he showed them the folly of bringing lights to see for him, for he could make them not to know him, when they saw him; and he has herein showed us how easily he can intimidate the counsels of his enemies, and make them lose themselves, when they are seeking mischief.

[2.] In their enquiries for him they called him Jesus of Nazareth, which was the only title they knew him by, and, probably, he was so called in their warrant. It was a name of reproach given him, to darken the interpretation of it, and to make it appear as if they knew him not, whereas he was; for if they had known, surely they would not have persecuted him.

[3.] He fairly answers them, I am he. He did not improve the advantage he had against them by their blindness, as Elias did against the Sirens, telling them, This is not the way, neither is this the way. He did not, therefore, heap reproach on reproach, but willingly suffered to be reproached, calling him Jesus of Nazareth, he answered to the name, for he despised the reproach; he might have said, I am not he, for he was Jesus of Bethlehem; but he would by no means allow equivocations. He has hereby taught us to own him, whatever it cost us; not to be ashamed of him or his words; but even in difficult times, when the way is crooked, and dangerously to go under his banner, I am he. I am he, is the glorious name of the blessed God, (Exod. 3. 14.) and the honour of that name is justly challenged by the blessed Jesus.

[4.] Particular notice is taken, in a parenthesis, that Judas stood with them. He that used to stand with them that followed Christ, now stood with those that fought against him. This describes an apostate; he that changes sides, he herbs himself with those with whom his heart always was, and with whom he shall have his lot in the judgment-day. This is mentioned, First, To shew the impudence of Judas. One would wonder where he got the confidence with which he now faced his master, and was not ashamed, neither could he blush; Satan in his heart gave him a whore's forehead. Secondly, To shew that Jesus of Nazareth was made a superstitious and political power, which went along with that word, I am he, to tell the aggressors; it was an arrow levelled at the traitor's conscience, and pierced him to the quick; for Christ's coming and his voice will be more terrible to apostates and betrayers than to sinners; any other class.

2. See how he terrified them, and obliged them to retire; (v. 6.) They went backward, and, like men thus struck down, fell to the ground. It should seem they did not fall forward, as humbling themselves before him, and yielding to him, but backward, as standing it out to the utmost. Thus Christ was declared to be more than a man, even then when he was triumphed up in as a worm, and no man. This word, I am he, had revived his disciples, and raised them up; (Matt. 14. 27.) but the same word strikes his enemies as dead. He is dead, therefore fell he to the ground.

3. What he could have done with them; when he struck them down, he could have struck them dead; when he spoke to them to the ground, he could have spoken to hell, and have sent them, like K. Richard's company, the next way thither; but he would not do so. [1.] Because the hour of his suffering was come, and he would not put it by; he would, only show that his life was not his own, but laid it down of himself, as he had said. [2.] Because he would give an instance of his patience and forbearance with the worst of men, and his compassion to these very enemies. In striking them down, and no more, he gave them both a check and repent, and space to repent; but their hearts were hardened, and all was in vain.

(2.) What he will do at last with all his implacable enemies, that will not repent to give him glory; they shall fall, they shall fall before him. Now the case is quite different. He has made them turn their back, and Phil. 2. 8. And it will be accomplished more and more; with the breath of his mouth he will chase the wicked, (2 Thess. 2. 8. Rev. 19. 21.) God judgeth the swift, and judgeth the slow. What will he do when he shall come to judge, seeing he did this when he was come to be judged? Amendment. Having given his enemies a repulse, he gives his friends a protection, and that he has word for:—7:9, where we may observe,

1. How he continued to expose himself to their rage, n. 7. They did not he long where they fell, but, by divine permission, got up again; it is only in the other world that God's judgments are everlasting. When they were down, one would have thought they were never to rise; but they were not, they were up again, one would have thought they should have let fall their pursuit; but we still find, (1.) They are as eager as ever to seize him. It is in some confusion and disorder that they recover themselves, they cannot imagine what ailed them that they could not keep their ground, but will impute it to any thing rather than Christ's power. Note, There are hearts so very hard in sin, that nothing will be upon them to reduce and bring them to repentance.

He is as willing as ever to be seized. When they were fallen before him, he did not insult over them, but, seeing them at a loss, asked them the same question, Whom seek ye? And they gave him the same answer, Jesus of Nazareth. In his repeating the question, he seems to come yet closer to their consciences; (2.) Do ye not know where I am? Are ye not aware that ye are in an error, and will ye meddle with your match? Have ye not had enough of it, but wilt ye try the other struggle? Did ever any harden his heart against God and prosper? In their repeating the same answer, they showed an obstinacy in their wicked way; they still called him Jesus of Nazareth, with as much disdain in as ever, and Judas as unfeeling as any of them. Let us therefore fear, or rather learn, that steps at first in a civilized way, our hearts be hardened.

2. How he contrived to secure his disciples from their rage. He improved this advantage against them for the protection of his followers; when he showed his courage with reference to himself, I have told you that I am he, he shows his care for his disciples, Let these go their way. He speaks this as speaking for them, rather than a contract with them; for they lay at his mercy, not he at theirs. He charges them therefore as one having authority; Let these go their way; it is at your peril if ye meddle with them. This aggravated the sin of the disciples in forsaking him, and particularly Peter's denying him, that Christ had given them this pass, or warrant of protection, and yet they had not faith and courage enough to rely upon it, but hearken to themselves to such base and wretched ends as their坏了. When Christ said, Let these go their way, he intended,

(1.) To manifest his effect not to concern for his disciples; when he exposed himself, he exceeded them, because they were not yet fit to suffer; their faith was weak, and their spirits low, and it would have been as much as their souls, and the lives of thousands of our disciples, to have come to this pass now. Also were must not be put into old hands. And besides, they had other work to do; they not go their own way, for they are sent into all the world, to preach the gospel; Destroy them not, for a blessing is in them. Now herein, [3.] Christ gives us a great courage to stand by and follow him; for though he has allotted us sufferings, yet he considers our frame, will wisely take the cross, and proportion it to our strength, and will deliver the godly out of temptation, either from it, or through it. [2.] He gives us a good example of love to our brethren and concern for their welfare. We must not consult our own ease and safety; beloved brethren, let every one of us as our own, and in such cases more than our own. There is a generous and heroic love, which will enable us to lay down our lives for the brethren, 1 John 3. 16.
ST. JOHN, XVIII.

(2.) He intended to give a specimen of his undertaking as Mediator. When he offered himself to suffer and die, it was that we might escape. He was our savior;—a savior in distress; when he said, Le., I come, he said after that they go their way; like the ram offered instead of Isaac.

3. Now herein he confirmed the word which he had spoken a little before, (ch. 17. 12.) Of them which thou gavest me, I have lost none. Christ, by fulfilling that word in this particular, gave an assurance that it should be accomplished in the full extent of it, not only for them that were now with him, but for all that believe in and through him, through all the ages of the world. Though Christ's keeping of them was meant especially of the preservation of their souls from sin and apostacy, yet it is here applied to the preservation of their natural lives, and very fitly, for even the body was a part of Christ's charge and care; he is to raise it up at the last day, and therefore to preserve that as well as the spirit and soul, 1 Thess. 5. 23. 2 Tim.
4. 17. 18. Christ will preserve the natural Life for the service in which it is designed; it is given him to be used for him, and he will not lose the service of it, but will be magnified in it, whether by life or death; it shall be held in life as long as any use is to be made of it. Christ's witnesses shall not die till they have given in their evidence. But that is not all;
this preservation of the disciples was in the tendency of it, a spiritual preservation; they were now so weak in faith and resolution, that, in all probability, if they had been called out to suffer at this time, they would have shamed themselves and their Master,
and some of them, at least the weaker of them, would have been lost; and therefore, that he might lose none, he would not expose them. The safety and preservation of the saints are owing, not only to the knowledge and grace in proportioning the strength to the trial, but also to the providence in proportionating the trial to the strength.

V. Having provided for the safety of his disciples, he rebukes the rashness of one of them, and re-presses the violence of his followers, as he had repulsed the violence of his persecutors, v. 10, 11.
where we have,

1. Peter's meekness. He had a sword; it is not likely that he wore one constantly as a gentleman, but they had two swords among them all, (Luke 22. 58.) and Peter was intrusted with one, and he drew it, for now, if ever, he thought it was his time to use it,
and he smote one of the High-Priest's servants, who,
it is likely, was one of the foremost, and aiming, it is likely, to seize him down the head, missed his blow, and only cut off his right ear. The servant's name is named, to show the greater certainty of the narrative, as recorded; it was Malchus, or Malchus, Neh. 10. 3.

(1.) We must here acknowledge Peter's goodwill: he had an honest zeal for his Master, though now misguided: he had lately promised to venture his life for him, and would now make his words good. Probably, it exasperated Peter to see Judas at such a time, taking advantage of his baseless, excited Peter's boldness, and I wonder that when he did draw his sword, he did not aim at his head.

(2.) Yet we must acknowledge Peter's ill-conduct;

and though his good intention did excuse, yet it would not justify him. [3.] He had no warrant from his Master for what he did. Christ said, Do not repeat the word of command, and not cut run; for before they expose themselves to sufferings, they must see to it, not only that their cause be good, but their cause clear. [2.] He transgressed the duty of his place, and resisted the powers that were, which Christ had never countenanced, but forbidden, in the same manner, (v. 26.) 3 Peter increased his Master's suffering, and, not distributing the rebuke he had for it once, is ready to repeat, Master, spare thyself; suffering be far from thee;
though Christ had told him that he must and would suffer, and that his hour was now come; thus, while he seemed to fight for Christ, he fought against him.
[4.] He broke the capacitance his master had lately put on his to do their way, if need be, without their way, he not only insulted for their safety, but in effect passed his word for their good behaviour, that they should go away peaceably; this Peter heard, and yet would not be bound by. As we may be guilty of a sinful cowardice when we are called to appear, so we may be of a shameful forwardness
when we are called to retire. [5.] He foolishly assumed that he had a right to receive the answer of this enraged multitude; if he had cut off Malchus's head when he cut off his ear, we may suppose the soldiers would have fallen upon all the disciples, and have hewed them to pieces, and would have represented Christ as no better than Barabbas.
Thus many have been guilty of self-destruction,
in their zeal for self-preservation. [6.] Peter played the scoundrel so soon after this, (Defying his Master;) that we have reason to think that he would not have done this, but that he saw his Master cause them to fall on the ground, and then he could deal with them;
but when he saw him surrender himself notwithstanding, his courage failed him then; whereas the true Christian hero will appear in the cause of Christ,
not only when it is prevailing, but when it seems to be declining; will be on the right side, though he be not the rising side.

(3.) We must acknowledge God's over-ruling provvidence in directing the stroke, (so that it should do no more execution, but only cut off his ear, which was rather marking him than maiming him,) as also in giving Christ an opportunity to manifest his power and goodness in healing the hurt, Luke 22.
51. Thus was what was in danger of turning to Christ's suffering profit, and an occasion of that which he has done much of to his honour, even among his adversaries.

2. The rebuke his Master gave him; (v. 11.) Put up thy sword into the sheath, or scabbard; it is a gentle rebuke, because it was his zeal that carried him beyond the bounds of discretion; he did not aggravate the matter, only bid him do so no more.
Many think, when they are in grief and distress, it was a rebuke to show them they were not yet fit for anything about them; but Christ has here set us an example of meekness in sufferings. Peter must put up his sword, for it was the sword of the Spirit that was to be committed to him; weapons of warfare not carnal, yet mighty. When Christ with a word felled the aggressors, he showed Peter how he should be armed, with a sword, quick and powerful,
which should be never dull, and as sharp as ever about them; and with that, not long after this, he laid Ananias and Sapphira dead at his feet.

3. The reason for this rebuke: The cup, which my Father has given me, shall I not drink it? Matthew relates another reason which Christ gave for this rebuke, but John preserves this, which he had omitted; in which Christ gives us,

(1.) A full new, of his own submission to his Father's will. Of all that was anisss in what Peter did, he seems to resent nothing so much as that he would have mended his sufferings now that his hour was come; "What, Peter, wilt thou step in between the cup and the lip? Get thee hence, Satan." If Christ determined to suffer and die, it is presumption for Peter in word or deed to oppose it: Shall I not drink it? The manner of expression speaks a sort of compulsion; or, as it might be thought to the contrary. He was willing to drink of this cup, though it was a bitter cup, an infusion of the wormwood and the gall, the cup of trembling, a bloody cup, the dregs of the cup of the Lord's wrath, Isa. 51. 22. He drank it, that he might put into our hands the cup of salvation, the cup of consolation, the cup of blessing: and therefore he is called the cupbearer, because his Father put it into his hand. If his Father will have it so, it is for the best, and be it so.

(2.) A fair pattern to us of submission to God's will in every thing that concerns us. We must pledge Christ in the cup that he drank of, (Matt. 20. 25.) and must argue ourselves into a compliance. [1.] It is a but a cup; a small matter comparatively, be it what it will. It is not a sea, a red sea, a dead sea, for it is not hell; it is light, and but for a moment. [2.] It is a cup that is given us; sufferings are gifts. [3.] It is given us by a Father, who has a Father's authority, and does us no wrong; a Father's affection, and means us no hurt.

VI. Having entirely reconciled himself to the dispensation, he calmly surrendered, and yielded himself. So many sorrows, not because he could not have made his escape, but because he would not. One would have thought the care of Malchus's ear should have made them relent, but nothing would win upon them. Maleficios fieri, quem nec majestas miracul comes pietas beneficia confingere potuit.-Accursed rage, which the grandeur of the miracle could not appease, nor the tenderness of the favour conciliate. Anselm. Observe here,

1. How they seized him; they took Jesus. Only some few of them could lay hands on him, but it is charged upon them all, for they were all aiding and abetting; in treason there are no accessories; all are principals. Now the scripture was fulfilled, Bulls have compassed me, (Ps. 22. 12.) compassed me like bees, Ps. 118. 12. The breath of our nostrils is taken in their pit, Lam. 4. 20. They had so often been frustrated in their attempts to seize him, that now, having gotten him into their hands, we may suppose, they flew upon him with so much the more violence.

2. How they secured him; they bound him. This particular of his sufferings is taken notice of only by this evangelist, that, as soon as ever he was taken, he was bound, pinioned, handcuffed; tradition says, "They bound him with such cruelty, that the blood started at his fingers' ends; when bound, his hands behind him, they clapped an iron chain about his neck, and with that dragged him along." See Gerhard. Harm. cap. 5.

(1.) This speaks the spite of his persecutors. They bound him, [1.] That they might torment him, and put him in pain, as he bound Simon to afflict him, [5.] That they might disarm him, [3.] He would not take it, even in answer, as he did before, and was now so weak, so weak Christ, though free-born, [3.] That they might prevent his escape, Judas having hidden them bode him fast. See their folly, that they should think to fetter that power which had but just now proved itself omnipotent! [5.] They bound him as one already condemned, for they were resolved to prosecute him to the death, and that he should die as fast as he could, with his bands bound. 2 Cor. 11. 33, 34. Christ had bound the consciences of his persecutors with the power of his word, which galled them; and to be revenged on them, he laid these bonds on him.

(2.) Christ's being bound was very significant; for, in all other things, there was a mystery, [1.] Before they bound him, he had bound himself by his own undertaking to the work and office of a Mediator; he was already bound to the horns of the altar; every man to his own house, and duty to his fat ox, else their cords would not have held him. [2.] We were bound with the cords of our vagaries, (Prov. 5. 22.) with the yoke of our transgressions, Lam. 1. 14. A bond is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound over to the judgment of God; corruption is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound under the power of Satan. Christ, being able to free any man, to free us from these bonds, himself submitted to be bound for us, else their cords would not have bound hand and foot, and reserved in chains of darkness. To his bonds we owe our liberty, his confinement was our enlargement; thus the Son maketh us free. [3.] The types and prophecies of the Old Testament were herein accomplished; Isaac was bound, that he might be sacrificed: Joseph was bound, and the iron entered into his soul, in order to his being brought from prison to royal. Ps. 105. 18. Samson was bound in order to his slaying more of the Philistines at his death than he had done in his life. And the Messiah was prophesied of as a prismer, Isa. 53. 8. [4.] Christ was bound, that he might bind us to duty and obedience. His bonds for us are bound upon us, by which we are forever obliged to bear. His bonds are the salvation of his friends, as Christ's to us all: A bondman's bonds, (Col. 4. 18.) remember them as bound with him from all sin, and to all duty. [5.] Christ's bonds for us were designed to make our bonds for him easy to us, if at any time we be so called out to suffer for him, to sanctify and sweeten them, and put honour upon them: these enabled Paul and Silas to sing in the stocks, and Ignatius to call his bonds for Christ spiritual pearls. Ignat. ad Polyc. 13. And led him away to Annas first; for he was father-in-law to Caiphas, which was the High-Priest that same year. 14. Now Caiphas was he which gave counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people. 15. And Simon Peter followed Jesus; and so did another disciple: that disciple was known unto the High-Priest, and went in with Jesus into the palace of the High-Priest. 16. But Peter stood at the door without. Then went out that other disciple, which was known unto the High-Priest, and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter. 17. Then saith the damsel that kept the door unto Peter, Art thou not also one of this man's disciples? He saith, I am not. 18. And the servants and officers stood there, who had made a fire of coals; for it was cold: and they warmed themselves: and Peter stood with them, and warmed himself. 19. The High-Priest then asked Jesus of his disciples, and of his doctrine. 20. Jesus answered him, I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whether the Jews always resort: and in secret have I said nothing. 21. Why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said. 22. And when he had thus spoken, one of the officers which stood by struck Jesus with the palm of his hand, saying. Answerest thou the High-Priest so? 23. Jesus answered him, If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou me? 24. Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the High-Priest. 25. And Simon Peter stood and argued himself. They said therefore unto him, Art not thou also one of his disciples? He denied it, and said, I am not. 26. One of the servants of the High-Priest, being his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with him? 27. Peter then denied again: and immediately the cock crew.

We have here an account of Christ's arraignment before the High-Priest, and some passages that occurred therein, which were omitted by the other evangelists; Peter's denying of him, which the other evangelists had given the story of entire by itself, is interwoven with the other passages. The crime laid to his charge, having relation to religion, the judges of the spiritual court took it to fall directly under their cognizance; both Jews and Gentiles seized him, and so both Jews and Gentiles tried and condemned him, for he died for the sins of both. Let us go over the story in order.

1. Having seized him, they led him away to Annas first, before they brought him to the court, that was sat, expecting him, in the house of Caiaphas, v. 13.

1. They led him away, led him in triumph, as a trophy of their victory; led him as a lamb to the slaughter, and they led him through the sheep-gate, spoken of Neh. 3. 1. For through that they went from the mount of Olives into Jerusalem. They hurried him away with violence, as if he had been the worst and vilest of malefactors. We had been led away of our own imputable lusts, and led captive by Satan at his will, and, that we might be rescued, Christ was led away, led captive by Satan's agents and instruments.

2. They led him away to their masters that sent them: it was now about midnight, and one would think they should have put him in ward, (L.c. 24. 12.) should have led him to some prison, till it was a proper time to call a court; but he is hurried away immediately, not to the justices of peace, to be committed, but to the judgment-seat, to be condemned; so extremely violent was the prosecution, partly because they feared a rescue, which they would thus not only leave no time for, but give a terror to; partly because they greedily thirsted after Christ's blood, as the eagle that hatcheth to the prey.

3. They led him to Annas first; probably, his house lay in the way, and was convenient for them to refresh themselves, and, as some think, to be paid for their service. I suppose Annas was old and infirm, and could not be present in council with the rest at that time of night, and yet earnestly desired to see the prey. To gratify him therefore with the assurance of their success, that the old man might sleep the better, and to receive his blessing for it, they preserved their prisoner before him. It is sad to see them that are old and sickly, when they cannot commit sin as formerly, taking pleasure in them that do. Dr. Lightfoot thinks Annas was not present, because he was to attend early that morning in the temple, to examine the sacrifices, which was his duty to be offered, whether they were without blemish: if so, there was a significance in it, that Christ, the great Sacrifice, was presented to him, and sent away bound, as approved and ready for the altar.

4. This Annas was father-in-law to Caiaphas the High-Priest: this kindness by marriage between them, or correct likeness was a reason why it was ordered that this piece of respect should be done to Annas, to favour him with the first sight of the prisoner; or why Annas was willing to countenance Caiaphas in a matter his heart was so much upon. Note, Acquaintance and alliance with wicked people are a great confirmation to many in their wicked ways.

5. Annas did not long detain them, being as willing as any of them to have the prosecution pushed on, and therefore sent him bound to Caiaphas to his house, which was appointed for the rendezvous of the Sanhedrim upon this occasion; or to the usual place in the temple, where the High-Priest kept his court; this is mentioned, v. 24. But our translators intimate in the margin, that it should come in here, and, accordingly, read it there, Annas had sent him away.

1. The power of Caiaphas intimated; (v. 13.) He was High-Priest that same year. The High-Priest's commission was during life; but there were now such frequent changes by the simonical artifices of aspiring men with the government, that it was become almost an annual office, a presage of its final period approaching; while they were undermining one another, God was over-turning them all, that he might come, whose right it was. Caiaphas was High-Priest that same year when Messiah was to be cut off; which intimates, (1.) That when a bad thing was to be done by a High-Priest, according to the fore-knowledge of God, Providence so ordered it, that a bad man should be in the chair to do it. (2.) That, when God would make it to appear what corruption there was in the heart of a bad man, he put him into a place of power, where he had temptation and opportunity to exert it. It was the ruin of Caiaphas, that he was High-Priest that year, and so became a ringleader in the putting of Christ to death. Many a man's advancement has lost him his reputation, and he had not been dishonoured if he had not been preferred.

6. The office of Caiaphas, which is intimated, (v. 14.) by the repeating of what he had said some time before, that, right or wrong, guilty or innocent, it was expedient that one man should die for the whole; which refers to the story, ch. 11. 50. This comes in here, to shew, (1.) What a bad man he was; this was that Caiaphas that governed himself and the church by rules of policy, in defiance of the rules of equity. (2.) What ill usage Christ was likely to meet with in his court, when his case was adjudged before he was heard, and they were already resolved what to do with him; he must die; so that his trial was a jest. Thus the enemies of Christ's gospel are resolved, true or false, to run it down. (3.) It is a testimony to the innocence of our Lord Jesus, from the mouth of one of his worst enemies, who owned that he fell a sacrifice to the public good, and that it was not just he should die, but expedient only.

7. The concurrence of Annas in the prosecution of Christ. He made himself a partaker in guilt, (1.) With the captives and officers, that without law or mercy had bound him; for he approved it by continuing him bound, when he should have set him free, he not being convicted of any crime, it being attempted an escape. If we do not what we can, to undo what others have ill done, we are accessibl
Now, [1.] This other disciple, whatever he was, showed a respect to Peter, in introducing him, not only to gratify his curiosity and affection, but to give him an opportunity of being serviceable to his Master upon his trial, if there were occasion. Those that have a real kindness for Christ and his ways, though their temper may be reserved, and their circumstances lead them to be cautious and retired, yet, if their faith be sincere, they will discover, when they are called to it, what they have been instructed by heaven for nobility, by bringing forth a perfect mind and a good turn. Peter perhaps had formerly introduced this disciple into conversation with Christ, and now he requires his kindness, and is not ashamed to own him, though, it should seem, he had at this time but a poor downcast appearance.

[2.] But this kindness proved no kindness, nay a great dishonour; by letting him into the High-Priest’s hall, he let him into temptation, and the consequence was bad. Note, The courtesies of our friends oftentimes prove a snare to us, through a misguided affection.

2. Peter, being got in, was immediately assaulted with the temptation, and failed by it, v. 17. Observe here, (1.) How slight the attack was. It was a silly maid, of so small account, that she was only set to keep the door, and to ask questions, and she only asked him carelessly, Art not thou one of this man’s disciples? Probably, suspecting it by his sheepish look, and coming in tamely. We should many a time better maintain a good cause, if we had a good heart on it, and could put a good face on it. Peter had some reason to take the alarm, if Malchus had set upon him, and had said, Whither goest thou? This is he that cut off my ear, and I will have his head for it;" but when a maid only asked him, Art not thou one of them? he might without danger have answered, And what if I am? Suppose the servants had ridiculed him, and insulted over him, upon it, these can bear but little for Christ, that cannot bear that; that is but running with the footmen.

(2.) How speedy the surrender was: without taking time to recollect himself, he suddenly answered, I am not. If he had had the boldness of the lion, he would have said, “It is my honour that I am so;” or if he had had the wisdom of the serpent, he would have kept silence at this time, for it was an evil time. But all his care being for his own safety, he thought he could not secure that but by a peremptory denial. I am not; he not only denies it, but even disdains it, and scorns herwords.

3. Yet he goes further into the temptation; (v. 18.) And the servants and officers stood there, and Peter with them. [1.] See how the servants made much of themselves; the night being cold, they made a fire in the hall, not for their masters, (they were so eager in prosecuting Christ, that they forgot cold,) but for themselves, to warm themselves. They cared not what became of Christ, all their care was to sit and warm themselves, Acts 6. 6. [2.] See how Peter hurried himself with them, and made one among them. He sat and warmed himself.

First, It was a fault had enough, that he did not attend his Master, and appear for him at the upper end of the hall, where he was; for, if he had been a witness for him, and have confronted the false witnesses that swore against him, if his Master had called him; however, he might have been a witness for him, might have taken an exact notice of what passed, that he might relate it to the other disciples, who could none of them get in to hear the trial; he might have learned by his Master’s example how to carry himself when it should come to his turn to suffer thus;
yet neither his conscience nor his curiosity could bring him into the court, but he sits by, as if, like Galileo, he cared for none of these things. And yet at the same time we have reason to think his heart was as full of grief and concern as it could hold, but he had no courage to own it. Lord, lead us not into temptation. Secondly, It was much worse, that he joined himself with these that were his Master's enemies; he stood with them, and swarmed himself; that was a poor excuse for joining with them. A little thing will draw those into bad company, that will be drawn to it by the love of a good life. If Peter's zeal for his Master had not frozen, but had continued in the heat, it seemed to be of but a few hours before, he had not had occasion to warm himself now. Peter was much to be blamed.

1. Because he associated himself with these wicked men, and kept company with them. Doubtless, they were diverting themselves with this night's expedition, scoffing at Christ, at what he had said, at what he had done, and triumphing in their victory over him; and what sort of entertainment would this give to Peter? If he said as they said, or by silence gave consent, he involved himself in sin; if not, he exposed himself to danger. If Peter had not so much courage as to appear publicly for his Master, yet he might have had so much devotion as to retire into a corner, and weep in secret at his Master's sufferings, and forsaking him; if he could not have done good, he might have kept out of the way of doing hurt. It is better to abstain than appear to no purpose, or bad purpose.

2. Because he desired to be thought one of them, that he might not be suspected to be a disciple of Christ. Is this Peter? What a contradiction is this to the prayer of every good man, Gather not my soul among sinners. Note, among the proficients is not so absurd as David among the Philistines. They that deprecate the lot of the scornful hereafter, should dread the seat of the scornful now. It is ill warming ourselves with those with whom we are in danger of burning ourselves, Ps. 111:4.

IV. Peter, Christ's friend, having begun to deny him, the High-Priest, his enemy, begins to accuse him, and makes him to answer for himself, v. 19–21. It should seem, the first attempt was to prove him a seducer, and a teacher of false doctrine, which this evangelist relates; and when they failed in the proof of that, then they charged him with blasphemy, which is related by the other evangelists, and therefore omitted here. Observe,

1. The articles or heads upon which Christ was examined; (v. 19.) concerning his discipies and his doctrine. Observe,

(1.) The irregularity of the process; it was against all law and equity; they seize him as a criminal, and now that he is their prisoner, they have nothing to lays to his charge; no libel, no prosecutor; but the judge must himself be the prosecutor, and the prisoner himself the witness, and, against all reason and justice, is put on to be his own accuser. The High-Priest, and then, (see therefore, which seems to refer to v. 14.) because he had resolved that Christ must be sacrificed to their private malice under colour of the public good, therefore he examined him upon those interrogatories which would touch his life. He examined him,

[1.] Concerning his disciples, that he might charge him with sedition, and represent him dangerous to the Roman government as well as to the Jewish church. He asked him who were his disciples—what number they were—of what country—what were their names and characters? Injuring that his scholars were designed for soldiers, and would in time become a formidable body.

Some think his question concerning his disciples, was, “What is now become of them all? Where are they? Why do they not appear?” Upbraiding him with their cowardice in deserting him; thus adding to the affliction of it. There was something significant in this, that Christ's calking and owning his disciples was the first thing laid to his charge, for it was for their sakes that he sanctified himself and suffered.

[2.] Concerning his doctrine, that he might charge him with heresy, and bring him under the penalty of the law against false prophents, Deut. 13. 1. For if Christ's doctrine was so manifestly discernible in that court, (Deut. 17. 12.) there was no person could not distinguish it; he therefore knew it could not perish but at Jerusalem, where that court sat. They could not prove any false doctrine upon him; but they hoped to extort something from him, which they might distort to his prejudice, and to make him an offender for some word or other, Isa. 29. 21. They said nothing to him concerning his miracles, by which he had done so much good, and proved his doctrine beyond contradiction, because of these they were sure they could take no hold. Thus the adversaries of Christ, while they are industriously quarrelling with his truth, wilfully shut their eyes against the evidences of it, and take no notice of them.

2. The appeal Christ made, in answer to these interrogatories. (1.) As to his disciples, he said nothing; because it was an impertinent question; if his doctrine was sound and good, his having disciples to whom to communicate it, was no more than what was practised and allowed by their own doctors. If Caiaphas, in asking him concerning his disciples, designed to ensnare him, and bring them into trouble, it was in kindness to them that he said nothing of them, for he had said, Let these go. Their manner to upbraid him with their cowardice, no wonder that he said nothing, for Pudet hae opprobria nobis, Et diei potuisse, et non potuisse reficli— Shame attaches, when charges are exhibited that cannot be refuted; he would say nothing to condemn them, and could say nothing to justify them. (2.) As to his doctrine, he said nothing in particular, but in general referred himself to what he had heard him, being not only made known by God, but made manifest also in their consciences, v. 20, 21.

[1.] He tacitly charges his judges with illegal proceedings; he does not indeed speak evil of the rulers of the people, nor say now to these princes, Ye are wicked; but he appeals to the settled rules of their own court, whether they dealt fairly by him? Do ye indeed judge righteously? Ps. 58. 1. So here, Why ask ye me? Which implies two absurdities in judgment: First, “Why ask ye me now concerning my doctrine, when ye have already condemned it?” They had made an order of court for the excommunicating of all that owned him, (ch. 9. 22.) had issued out a proclamation for the apprehending of him; and now they come to ask what his doctrine is. Thus he was condemned, as his doctrine and cause commonly are, unheard. Secondly, “Why ask ye me? Must I accuse myself, when ye have no evidence against me.”

[2.] He insists upon his fair and open dealing with them in the publication of his doctrine, and justifies himself with that. The crime which the Sanhedrin by the law was to inquire after, was the clan destine spreading of dangerous doctrines, enticing secrecy, Deut. 13. 6. As to this, therefore, Christ clears himself very fully.

First, As to the manner of his preaching; he spake openly, with freedom and plainness of speech; he did not deliver things ambiguously, as Apollo did his oracles. Those that would under muse the truth and spread corrupt notions, do it by sly insinuations, putting queries, starting difficulties, and asserting nothing; but Christ explained himself fully, with, "Verily, verily, I say unto you; his reproves were free and bold, and his testimonies expressed against the corruptions of the age.

Secundily, As to the persons he preached to; he spake to the world, to all that had ears to hear, and were willing to hear him, high or low, learned or unlearned, Jew or Gentile, friend or foe; his doctrine feared not the censure of a mixed multitude; nor did he grudge the knowledge of it to any, (as the masters of some rare invention commonly do,) but freely communicated it, as the sun does his beams.

Thirdly, As to the places he preached in; when he was in the country, he preached ordinarily in the synagogues—the places of meeting for worship, and on the sabbath-day—the time of meeting; when he came up to Jerusalem, he preached the same doctrine in the temple at the time of the solemn feasts, when the Jews from all parts assembled there; though he often preached in private houses, and on mountains, and by the sea-side, to show that his worthiness to him was not to be confined to temples and synagogues; yet what he preached in private, was the very same with what he delivered publicly. Note, The doctrine of Christ, purely and plainly preached, needs not be ashamed to appear in the most numerous assembly, for it carries its own strength and beauty along with it. What Christ's faithful ministers say, they would be willing all the world should hear; wisdom cries in the places of concourse, Prov. 1. 21. 8. 5. 3.

Fourthly, As to the doctrine itself; he said nothing in secret, contrary to what he said in public, but only by way of repetition and explication; in secret have I said nothing; as if he had been either suspicious of the truth of it, or conscious of any ill design in it. He sought no corners, for he feared no colours, nor said any thing that he needed to be ashamed of; what he did speak in private to his disciples, he ordered them to proclaim on the houses, Matt. 10. 27. God saith of himself, (Isa. 45. 19.) I have not spoken in secret; his commandment is not hidden, Deut. 30. 11. And the righteousness of faith speaks in like manner, Rom. 10. 6. Veritas mildet non abscondit—Truth fears nothing but concealment. Tertullian.

[3.] He appeals to what he had heard him, and declares they might be examined what doctrine he had preached, and whether it had that dangerous tendency that was surmised; "Ask them that heard me, what I said unto them; some of them may be in court, or may be sent for out of their beds." He means not his friends and followers, who might be presumed to speak in his favour, but, Ask any impartial hearer; ask your own officers. Some think he puts it as a case of necessity, as if he knew what I said, referring to the report which they had made of his preaching, (ch. 7. 46.) Never man staked like this man. Nay, you may ask some one upon the bench; for it is probable that some of them had heard him, and been put to silence by him. Note, The doctrine of Christ may safely appeal to all that know it, and has so much right and reason on its side, that they who will judge impartially, cannot but do so to his honour.

V. While the judges were examining him, the servants that stood by, were abusing him, v. 22. 23. 1. It was a base affront which one of the officers gave him; though he spake with so much calmness and convincing evidence, this insolent fellow struck him with the palm of his hand, probably on the side of his head or face, saying, Answerest thou the High-Priest so? As if he had behaved himself rudely to the court.

(1.) He struck him, Vass i'vawes—he gave him a blow. Some think it signifies a blow with a rod or wand, from 3aab, or with the staff, which was the badge of his office. Now the scripture was fulfilled, (Isa. 50. 6.) I gave my cheeks, mpsizayaw, (so the Seventy,) to blows, the word here used. And Matt. 26. 67. They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod. (ch. 20. 1.) The sky shall smite upon the High-Priest, v. 6. They have smitten me upon the cheeks. It was unjust to strike one that neither said nor did amiss; it was insolid for a mean servant to strike one that was confessedly a person of account; it was cowardly to strike one that had his hands tied; and barbarous to strike a prisoner at the bar. Here was a breach of the peace in the face of the court, and yet the judges contumacious. In the face of law was our due; but Christ bore it, to his own, "Upon me be the curse, the shame." (2.) He checked him in a haughty imperious manner; Answerest thou the High-Priest so? As if the blessed Jesus were not good enough to speak to his master, or not wise enough to know how to speak to him, but, like a rude and ignorant prisoner, must be controlled by the jailer, and taught how to behave. Christ was not ashamed to be associated with such as Malchus, who owed to Christ the healing of his ear, and the saving of his head, and yet made him this ill return. But, whoever it was, it was done to please the High-Priest, and to curry favour with him; for what he said, speaks a jealousy for the dignity of the High-Priest. Wicked rulers will not want wicked servants, who will help forward the affliction of those whom their masters personally delight. He was a successor of this High-Priest, that commanded the bystanders to smite Paul thus on the mouth, Acts 25. 2. Some think this officer took himself to be affronted by Christ's appeal to those about him concerning his doctrine, as if he would have vouch'd him to be a witness; and perhaps he was one of those officers that had spoken honourably of him, (ch. 7. 46.) and lest he should not be thought a servant friend to him, he thus appears a bitter enemy. 2. Christ here affront a wonderful meekness and patience; (v. 23.) "If I have spoken evil, in what I have now said, bear witness of the evil. Observe it to the court, and let them judge of it, who are the proper judges; but if well, and as it did become me, why smitest thou me?" Christ could have answered him with a miracle of wrath, could have struck him as he had struck the servant Malchus, and as that was lifted up against him. But this was the day of his patience and suffering, and he answered him with the meekness of wisdom, to teach us not to avenge ourselves, not to render railing for railing, but with the innocence of the dove, to bear injuries, even them when with the wisdom of the serpent, as our Saviour, we shew the injustice of them, and appeal to the majesty of heaven, and the power of conscience. He did not here turn the other cheek, by which it appears that that rule, Matt. 5. 39, is not to be understood literally; a man may possibly turn the other cheek, and yet have his heart full of malice; but, comparing Christ's precept with his pattern, we learn, (1.) That in such cases we must not be our own avengers, nor judges in our own case; we must rather receive than give the second blow, when this is possible; and we must learn to defend ourselves, but not to avenge ourselves: the magistrate (if it be necessary for the preserving of the public peace, and the restraining and terrifying of evil-doers) is to be the avenger, Rom. 13. 4. (2.) Our resentment of injuries done us, must always be rational, and never passionate; such Christ's here was; when he suffered, he reasoned, but threatened not. He fairly expostulated with him that did him the injury, and so may we. (3.) When we are called out to suffering, we must accommodate ourselves to the inconvenience.
sions of a suffering state, with patience, and by one indulgence done we be prepared to receive another, and to make the best of it.

VI. While the servants were thus abusing him, Peter was proceeding to deny him, v. 25—26. It is a sad story, and none of the least of Christ's sufferings.

1. He repeated the sin the second time, v. 26. While he was warming himself with the servants, as one of them, they asked him, "Art not thou one of his disciples? What dost thou here among us?"

He, perhaps, hearing that Christ was examined about his disciples, and fearing he should be seized, or at least smitten, as his Master was, if he should own it, flatly and said, I am not. This was his great folly to thrust himself into the temptation, by continuing in the company of those that were unsuitable for him, and that he had nothing to do with. He said to warm himself; but they that warm themselves with evil-doers, grow cold toward good people and good things; and they that are fond of the devil's free-side, are in danger of the devil's fire. Peter might have stood by his Master at the bar, and have warmed himself better than here, at the fire of his Master's love, which many waters could not quench, Cant. 8. 6, 7. He might there have warmed himself with zeal for his Master, and indignation at his persecutors; but he chose rather to warm with them, than to warm against them. But how could one (one disciple) be warm alone? Ech. 4. 11.

(1.) It was a great unhappiness that he was again assaulted by the temptation; and no other could be expected, for this was a place, this an hour, of temptation. When the judge asked Christ about his disciples, probably the servants took the hint, and challenged Peter for one of them, "Answer to thy name. See here, [1.] The subtility of the tempter in running down one whom he saw falling, and hastening a greater force against him; not a maid now, but all the servants. Note, Yielding to one temptation invites another, and perhaps a stronger. Satan redoubles his attacks when we give ground.

[2.] The danger of bad company. We commonly study to approve ourselves to those with whom we choose to associate ourselves; their good word we value ourselves upon, and covet to stand right in their eyes. But in this case, no sooner do we choose our praise, and govern ourselves accordingly; we are therefore concerned to make the first choice well, and not to mingle ourselves with those whom we cannot please without displeasing God.

(2.) It was his great weakness, nay, it was his great wickedness, to yield to the temptation, and to say, I am not one of his disciples, as one ashamed of that which was his honour, and afraid of suffering for it, which would have been yet more his honour. See how the fear of man brings a snare. When Christ was admired, and caressed, and treated with respect, Peter pleased himself, and perhaps prided himself, in this, that he was a disciple of Christ, and so put in for a share in the honours done his Master; but thus many who seem fond of the reputation of religion when it is in fashion, are ruined by the repulse of it; but we must take it for better and worse.

2. He repeated the sin the third time, v. 26, 27. Here he was attacked by one of the servants, who was kinsman to Malchus, who, when he heard Peter deny himself to be a disciple of Christ, gave him the lie with great assurance, "Did not I see thee in the garden with Jesus?" Witness to his Master's speech. Peter then denied again, as if he knew nothing of Christ, nothing of the garden, nothing of all this matter.

(1.) This third assault of the temptation was more than the former; before, his relation to Christ was only suspected, here, it is proved upon him by one that saw him with Jesus, and saw him draw his sword in his defence. Note, They who by sin-think to help themselves out of trouble, do but entangle and embarrass themselves the more. Dare to be brave! for, though sometimes we may come when either he or we some of his relations may have us at their mercy, He that may need a friend, should not make a foe. But observe, though here was sufficient evidence against Peter, and sufficient provocation given by his denial, to have prosecuted him, yet he escapes, has no harm done him, nor attempted to be done. Note, We are often drawn into sin by groundless causeless fears, which there is no occasion for, and which a small degree of wisdom and resolution would make nothing of.

(2.) His yielding to it was no less base than the former; He denied again. See here, [1.] The nature of sin in general; the heart is hardened by the deceitfulness of it, Heb. 3. 13. It was a strange degree of effrontery that Peter was arrived to on a sudden, that he could speak with such assurance, and in a lie, as he did in a disproof; but the beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water; when once the fence is broken, men easily go from bad to worse. [2.] Of the sin of lying in particular; it is a fruitful sin, and upon that account exceeding sinful; one lie needs another to support it, and that another. It is a rule in the devil's politics, Male facta male factis tegere, ne heriuniant—To cover sin with sin, in order to cover that which is worse.}

30. Then led they Jesus from Caiaphas unto the hall of judgment: and it was early; and they themselves went not into the judgment hall, lest they should be defiled: but that they might eat the Passover.

29. Pilate then went out unto them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this man? 30. They answered and said unto him, If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee. 31. Then said Pilate unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death: 32. That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying what death he should die. 33. Then Pilate entered into the judgment hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou the King of the Jews? 34. Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell thee of me? 35. Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the Chief Priests have delivered thee unto me: what hast thou done? 36. Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered unto the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence. 37. Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a King then? Jesus answered, Thou savest that I am a King. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice. 38. Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, I find in him no fault at all. 39. But ye have a custom, that I should release unto you one at the Passover: will ye therefore that I release unto you the King of the Jews? 40. Then cried they all again, saying, Not this man, but Barabbas. Now Barabbas was a robber.

We have here an account of Christ's arraignment before Pilate, the Roman governor, in the prætorium. (A Latin word made Greek, the praetor's house, or hall of judgment; thither they hurried him, to get him condemned in the Roman court, and executed by the Roman power. Being resolved on his death, they took this course, 1. That he might be put to death the more legally and regularly, according to the present constitution of their government, since they became a province of the empire; not stoned in a popular tumult, as Stephen, but put to death with the present formalities of justice. Thus he was treated as a magistrate, being made sin for us. 2. That he might be put to death the more safely. If they could engage the Roman government in the matter, which the people stood in awe of, there would be little danger of an uproar. 3. That he might be put to death with more reproach to himself. The death of the cross, which the Romans commonly used, being of all other the most ignominious, they were desirous by it to put an inde cible mark of infamy upon him, and so to sink his reputation. For even before he was apprehended they hanged upon Crosses him. 4. That he might be put to death with less reproach to them. It was an invi dious thing to put one to death, that had done so much good in the world, and therefore they were willing to throw the odium upon the Roman government, to make that the less acceptable to the people, and save themselves from the reproach. Thus many were more afraid of the scandal of an ill thing, than of the sin of it. See Acts 5. 28.

Two things are here observed concerning the prosecution:

(1.) Their policy and industry in the prosecution: It was early; some think about two or three in the morning; others about five or six; when most people were in their beds; and so there would be the less danger of opposition from the people that were for Christ; while, at the same time, they had their agents about, to call these together, whom they should influence: very civil against him. So much their heart was upon it, and how violent they were in the prosecution! Now that they had him in their hands, they would lose no time till they had him upon the cross, but denied themselves their natural rest, to push in this matter! See Misc. 2. 1.

(2.) Their superstition and vile hypocrisy: The chief priests and elders, though they came along with the procurator, and with every form of justice, yet per cipitously went not into the judgment hall, because it was the house of an uncleansemed Gentile, lest they should be defiled, but kept out of doors, that they might eat the passover, for the paschal lamb, (that was eaten the night before,) but the passover-fracst, upon the sacrifices which were offered in the fifteenth day, the Chagigah, as they called it, the passover-balls, spoken in Deut. 16. 2. 9. Chrim. 20. 24. 33. 8. 9. These they were to eat of, and therefore would not go into the court, for fear of touching a Gentile, and thereby contracting, not a legal, but only a traditional pollution. This they scrupled, but made no scruple of breaking through all the laws of equity, to persecute Christ to the death. They strained at a gnat, and swallowed a camel.

Let us now see what passed at the judgment hall. Here is,

1. Pilate's conference with the prosecutors; they are called first, and stated what they had to say against the prisoner, as was very fit, v. 29—32.

2. The judge calls for the indictment. Because they would not come into the hall, he went out to them into the court before the house, to talk with them. Looking up a Pilate as a magistrate, that we may give every one his due, here are three things commendable in him:

(1.) His diligent and close application to business. If it had been upon a good occasion, it had been very well that he was willing to be called up early to the judgment seat. Men in public trusts must not lose their care.

(2.) His concord with the humour of the people, and receiving from the honour of his place, to gratify their scruples. He might have said, "If they be so nice as not to come in to me, let them go home as they came;' by the same rule as we might say, "If the complainant scruple to put off his hat to the magistrate, let not his complaint be heard;' but Pilate insists not upon it, bears with them, and goes out to them; for when it is for good, we should become all things to all men.

(3.) His adherence to the rule of justice, in demanding the accusation, suspecting the prosecution to be malicious; "What accusation bring ye against this man? What is the crime ye charge him with, and what proof have ye of it?" It was a law of nature, before Valerius Publicola made it a Roman law, No quærum immolavisse condemnare. That no one should be condemned unheard. See Acts 25. 16. 17. It is unreasonable to commit a man, without alleging some cause in the warrant, and much more to arraign a man, when there is no bill of indictment found against him.

2. The prosecutors demand judgment against him, upon a general surmise that he was a criminal; not alleging, much less proving, any particular worth of death or of bonds; (v. 30.) If he were not a malefactor, or evil-doer, we would not have delivered him to thee to be condemned. This speaks them.

(1.) Very rude and uncivil to Pilate, a company of ill-natured men, that affected to despise dominion. When Pilate was so complainant to them, as to come out to treat with them, yet they were to the highest degree out of humour with him. He put the most reasonable question to them that he could; but if it had been low, they could not have answered him with more disdain.

(2.) Very spiteful and malicious towards our Lord Jesus; right or wrong, they will have him to be a malefactor, and treated as one. We are to presume a man innocent till he is proved guilty, but they will presume him guilty, who could prove himself innocents. They cannot say, "He is a traitor; a rebel against his own peace," but they say, "He is an evil-doer." He an evil-doer, who went about doing good! Let those be called whom he had cured, and fed and taught; whom he had rescued from devils, and raised from death; and let them be asked whether he were an evil-doer or no? Note, It is no new thing for the best of benefactors to be branded and run down as the worst of malefactors.

(3.) Very proud and conceited of themselves, and their own judgment and justice, as if their delivering a man up, under the general character of a malefactor, were sufficient for the civil magistrate to ground a judicial sentence upon, than which what could be more naughty?

3. The judge remained till to their own court; (v. 33.) Take ye him, and judge him according to your own law; and do not trouble me with him."

Now,

(1.) Some think Pilate herein complimented them, acknowledging the remains of their power, and allowing them to exert it. Corporal punishment they might inflict, as scourging in their synagogues; whether capital or no, is uncertain; But, "Said Pilate, "Go as far as your law will allow you, and if you go further, it shall be connived at." This he said, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, but unwilling to do them the service they required.

(2.) Others think he battered them, and upbraided them with their present state of weakness and subjection. They would be the sole judges of the guilt; "Pray," said Pilate, "if you will be so, go on as you have begun; you have found him guilty by your own laws, condemn him, if you dare, by your own laws, to carry on the humour." Nothing is more absurd, nor more deserves to be exposed, than for those to pretend to dictate, and boast of their wisdom, who are weak and in subordinate stations, and whose lot is it to be dictated to. Some think Pilate here reflects upon the law of Moses, as if that allowed them that which the Roman law would not by no means have allowed. Running over the laws, he says; "It may be, your law will suffer such a thing, but our's will not." Thus, through their corruptions, the law of God was blasphemed; and so is his gospel too.

4. They disowned any authority as judges, and (since it must be so) are content to be prosecutors. They now grow less insolent and more submissive, and own, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death save the king of the Jews."

(1.) Some think they had lost their power to give judgment in matters of life and death, only by their own carelessness, and cowardly yielding to the darning impieties of the age; so Dr. Lightfoot. — It is not in our power to pass sentence of death upon him; we do, we shall have the mob about us immediately.

(2.) Others think their power was taken from them by the Romans, because they had not used it well, or because it was thought too great a trust to be lodged in the hands of a conquered and yet an unsubdued people. Their acknowledgement of this they designed for a compliment to Pilate, and to atone for their rudeness; (v. 30.) but it amounts to a full evidence that the scutchure was departed from Judah, and therefore that now the Messiah was to come, Gen. 49. 10. If the Jews have no power to put any man to death, where is the scripture? Yet they ask not, Where is the Shiloh?

(3.) However, there was a providence in it, that either they should have no power to put any man to death, or should decline the exercise but upon this occasion, That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spoke, signifying what death he should die. 3. Observe.

[1.] In general, that even they who designed the defeating of Christ's sayings, beyond their intention, were made serviceable to the fulfilling of them by an over-ruling hand of God. No word of Christ shall fall to the ground; he can never either deceive or be deceived. Even the chief priests, while they persecuted him as a deceiver, had their spirits so directed as to help to prove him true, even to think that by taking other measures they might have defeated his predictions. Howbeit, they meant not so, Isa. 10. 7.

[2.] Those sayings of Christ in particular were fulfilled, which he had spoken concerning his own death. Two sayings of Christ concerning his death were fulfilled, by the Jews' declining to judge him according to their law. First, He had said that he should be delivered up to the Gentiles, and that they should put him to death. (Matt. 20. 19. Mark 10. 33. Luke 18. 32.) and hereby that saying was fulfilled. Secondly, He had said that he should be crucified. (Matt. 20. 19. —26.) lifted up, ch. 3. 14. — 12. 32. Now if they had judged him by their laws, he had been stoned, burning, strangled, and beheading, were in some cases used among the Jews, but never crucifying. It was therefore necessary that Christ should be put to death by the Romans, that, being hanged upon a tree, he might be made a curse for us, (Gal. 3. 13.) and his hands and feet might be pierced. As the Roman power had brought him to be born at Bethlehem, so now to die upon a cross, and both according to the scriptures. It is likewise determined concerning us, though not discovered to us, what death we shall die, which should free us from all disputing cares about that matter; "Lord, when, and when, and how, thou hast appointed."

II. Here is Pilate's conference with the prisoner, v. 33. &c. where we have,

1. The prisoner set to the bar. Pilate, after he had conferred with the chief priests at his door, entered into the hall, and called for Jesus to be brought in. He now, as he was put, could no longer pretend to continue the interrogation of a man unheard; if it may be, your law will suffer such a thing, but our's will not. Thus, through their corruptions, the law of God was blasphemed; and so is his gospel too.

4. They disowned any authority as judges, and (since it must be so) are content to be prosecutors. They now grow less insolent and more submissive, and own, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death save the king of the Jews."

(1.) Some think they had lost their power to give judgment in matters of life and death, only by their own carelessness, and cowardly yielding to the darning impieties of the age; so Dr. Lightfoot. — It is not in our power to pass sentence of death upon him; we do, we shall have the mob about us immediately.

(2.) Others think their power was taken from them by the Romans, because they had not used it well, or because it was thought too great a trust to be lodged in the hands of a conquered and yet an unsubdued people. Their acknowledgement of this they designed for a compliment to Pilate, and to atone for their rudeness; (v. 30.) but it amounts to a full evidence that the scutchure was departed from Judah, and therefore that now the Messiah was to come, Gen. 49. 10. If the Jews have no power to put any man to death, where is the scripture? Yet they ask not, Where is the Shiloh?

It is likewise determined concerning us, though not discovered to us, what death we shall die, which should free us from all disputing cares about that matter; "Lord, when, and when, and how, thou hast appointed."

II. Here is Pilate's conference with the prisoner, v. 33. &c. where we have, persecuted? Art thou king de jure—of right, while the emperor is only king de facto—in fact?" Since it could not be proved he ever said it, he would constrain him to say it now, that he might proceed upon him as a professed rebel.

(2.) Christ answers this question with another; not for evasion, but as an intimation to Pilate to consider what he did, and upon what grounds he went; (v. 34.) "Sayest thou this thing of thyself, from a suspicion arising in thy own breast, or didst others tell thee of me, and dost thou ask it only to oblige them?"

(3.) "It is plain that thou hast no reason to say that of thyself." Pilate was obliged by his office to take care of the interests of the Roman government, but he could not say that that was in any danger, or suffered any damage, from any thing our Lord Jesus had ever said or done. He never appeared in worldly pomp, never assumed any secular power, never acted as a judge or divider; never were any traitorous principles or practices objected to him, nor any thing that might give the least umbrage or suspicion.

(2.) "If others tell thee of me, to incense thee against me, thou oughtest to consider who they are, and upon what principles they go, and whether they who represent me as an enemy to Caesar, are not really such themselves, and therefore use this only as a pretence to cover their malice; which, if, ought, he well weighed by a judge that would do justice." Nay, if Pilate had been as insidious as he ought to have been in this matter, he would have found that the true reason why the chief priests were outrageous against Jesus, was, because he did not set up a temporal kingdom in opposition to the Roman power; if he had done that, and would have wrought miracles to bring them out of the Roman bondage, as Moses did to bring them out of the Egyptian, they would have been far from siding with the Romans against him, that they would have made him their king, and have fought under him against the Romans; but he not answering this expectation of their's, they charged that upon him, which they were themselves most notoriously guilty of—disaffection to, and design against, the present government; and this was such an information as this fit to be given to Pilate against Christ.

[1.] Christ had asked him, whether he spake of himself? No, says he, "I am that Jor, that thou suspectedst me to be in the plot against thee? Know nothing of the Messiah, nor desire to know, and therefore need not myself in the dispute who is the Messiah, and who not, it is all alike to me." Observe, with what disdain Pilate asks, Am I a Jew? The Jews were, upon many accounts, an honourable people; but, having corrupted the covenant of their God, he made them contemptible and base before all the people, (Mal. 2, 8, 9,) so that a man of sense and honour reckoned it shameful to be counted a Jew, and was often such for the sake of the bad men that wear them. It is sad, that when a Turk is suspected of dishonesty, he should ask, "What! do you take me for a christian?"

[2.] Christ had asked him, whether others told him? Yes, says he, "and these things were, who, one would think, should be biased in favour of thee, and the priests, whose testimony (in person acceonta—on the word of a priest,) ought to be regarded; and therefore I have nothing to do but to proceed upon their information." Thus Christ, in his religion, still suffers by those that are of his own nation, even the priests, that profess relation to him, but do not live up to their profession.

[3.] Christ had declined answering that question, Art thou the King of the Jews? And therefore Pilate puts another question to him more general, "What hast thou done? What provocation hast thou given to thy own nation, and particularly the priests, to be so violent against thee? Surely there can't be all this smoke but there is some fire, what is it?"

(4.) Christ, in his next reply, gives a more full and direct answer to Pilate's former question, Art thou a king? Explaining in what sense he was a king, but not such a king as was any ways dangerous to the Roman government, not a secular king, for his interest was not supported by secular methods, v. 10. Ob.

(1.) An account of the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom; it is not of this world; it is expressed negatively what it is not, to rectify the present mistakes concerning it; but the positive is implied, it is the kingdom of heaven, and belongs to another world; he is a king, and has a kingdom, but not of this world. First, Its rise is not from this world; the kingdom of men arise out of the seat and the earth, (Dan. 7, 3, Rev. 1, 11,) but the holy city comes down from God out of heaven, Rev. 21, 2. His kingdom is not by succession, election, or compuot, but by the immediate and special designation of the divine will and counsel. Secondly, Its nature is not worldly; it is a kingdom within men, (Luke 17, 21,) set up in their hearts and consciences, (Rom. 14, 17,) upon the principles of peace, faith, love, spiritual, and all its glory within. The rulers of state in Christ's kingdom have not the spirit of the world, 1 Cor. 2, 12. Thirdly, Its guards and supports are not worldly; its weapons are spiritual; it need not, nor used, secular force to maintain and advance it, nor was it carried on in a way hurtful to kings or provinces; it did not in the least interfere with the prerogatives of princes, or the rules practised in a worldly, spiritual, and all its glory within. The rulers of state in Christ's kingdom have not the spirit of the world, 1 Cor. 2, 12.
(5.) In answer to Pilate's further query, he replies yet more directly. (v. 37.) where we have,

1. Pilot's plain question; "Art thou a king then? Thou speakest of a kingdom thou hast; art thou then, in any sense, a king? And what colour hast thou for such a claim? Explain thyself.

2. The good confession which our Lord Jesus witnessed before Pontius Pilate, in answer to this; (1 Tim. 6. 13.) Thou sayest that I am a king, that is, It is as thou sayest, I am a king; for I came to bear witness of the truth.

First, He grants himself to be a king, though not in the sense that Pilate meant it. The Messiah was expected as the character of a king, Messiah, the Prince; and therefore he was happy to explain that he was the Christ, he would not disown to Pilate that he was a king, lest he should seem inconsistent with himself. Note, Though Christ took upon him the form of a servant, yet even then he justly claimed the honour and authority of a king.

Secondly, He explains himself, and shews how he is a king; as he came to bear witness of the truth, he rules in the midst of men by the power of truth. If he had meant himself a temporal prince, he would have said, For this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, to rule the nations, to conquer kings, and take possession of kingdoms; no, he came to be a witness, a witness for the God that made the world, and against sin that ruins the world, and who will be the heir of all things, and sets up, and keeps up, his kingdom in the earth.

First, To reveal it, to discover to the world, that which otherwise could not have been known concerning God and his will, and good-will to men, ch. 1. 18.—17. 26. Secondly, To confirm it, Rom. 1. 3. By his miracles he bare witness to the truth of religion, the truth of divine revelation, and of the perfections and providence, and the truth of his providential claim, that all men through him might believe. Now by doing this he is a king, and sets up a kingdom.

1. The foundation and power, the spirit and genius, of Christ's kingdom, is truth, divine truth. When he said, I am the truth, he said, in effect, I am a king. He conquers by the convincing evidence of truth, he rules by the commanding power of truth, and in his majesty rules prosperously, because of truth. Ps. 45. 4. It is with his truth that he shall judge the people, Ps. 96. 13. It is the sceptre of his kingdom; he draws with the cords of a man, with truth revealed to us, and received by us, in the love of it; and thus he brings thoughts into obedience. He came a light into the world, and rules as the sun by day.

2. The subjects of this kingdom are those that are of the truth. All that by the grace of God are rescued from under the power of the father of lies, and are disposed to receive the truth, and submit to the power and influence of it, will hear Christ's voice, will become his subjects, and will bear faith and true allegiance to him. Every one that has any real sense of religion, will entertain the christian religion, and then belong to his kingdom; by the power of truth he makes them willing, Ps. 110. 5. All that are in love with truth, will hear the voice of Christ, for greater, better, surer, sweeter truths can no where be found, than are found in Christ, by whom grace and truth came; so that by hearing Christ's voice, we know that we are of the truth, 1 John 3. 19.

(6.) Pilate, hereupon puts a good question to him, but does not stay for an answer, v. 38. He said, What is truth? and immediately went out again. [1.] It is certain that this was a good question, and could not be put to one that was better able to answer it. Thus the heart of great priee, which the human understanding has a desire to, and is in quest of; for it cannot rest but in that which is, or at least is apprehended to be, truth. When we search the scriptures, and attend the ministry of the word, it must be with this inquiry, What is truth? and with this prayer, Lead me in thy truth; into all truth. But many put this question, that have not patience and constancy enough to persevere in their inquiries into the things of truth; or not humility and sincerity enough to receive it when they have found it, 2 Tim. 3. 7. Thus many deal with their own consciences; they ask them those needful questions, "What am I?" "What have I done?" but will not take time for an answer.

[2.] It is uncertain with what design Pilate asked this question.

First, Perhaps he spake it as a learner, as one that began to think well of Christ, and to look upon him with some respect, and desired to be informed what new notions he advanced, and what improvements he pretended to in religion and learning. But while he desired to hear some new truth from him, as Herod to see some miracle, the clamour and outrage of the priests' mob at his gate, obliged him at last to have it.

Secondly, Some think he speaks it as a judge, inquiring further into the cause now brought before him; "Let me into this mystery, and tell me what the truth of it is, the true state of this matter."

Thirdly, Others think he speaks it as a scoffer, in a jeering way; "Thou talkest of truth; canst thou tell what truth is, or give me a definition of it? Th little he makes a jest of the everlasting gospel, that great truth, which the chief priests hated and persecuted, and which Christ was now witnessing to, and suffering for; and, like men of no religion, who take a pleasure in bantering all religions, he ridicules both sides; and therefore Christ made him no reply.

Answer not a fool according to his folly; cast not pearls before swine. But though Christ would not tell him what truth is, he has told his disciples, and by them has told us, ch. 14. 6.

III. The result of both these conferences with the prosecutors and the prisoner, (v. 38—40.) in two things:

1. The judge appeared his friend, and favourable to him, for,

(1.) He publicly declared him innocent; (v. 38.) Upon that whole matter, I find in him no fault at all. He supposes there might be some controversy in religion between him and them, wherein he was as likely to be in the right as they; but nothing criminal appears against him. This solemn declaration of Christ's innocency, was, [1.] For the justification and honour of the Lord Jesus. By this it appears, that though he was treated as the worst of malefactors, he had never merited such treatment. [2.] For the explaining of the design and intention of his death; that he did not die for any sin of his own, even in the judgment of the judge himself, and therefore he died as a sacrifice for our sins, and that, even in the judgment of the prosecutors themselves, one man should die for the people, ch. 11. 50. This is that he did no violence, neither was any deceit in him, (Isa. 53. 9.) who was to be cut off, and stand for himself, Dan. 9. 26. [3.] For the aggravating of the sin of the Jews that prosecuted him with so much violence. If a prisoner has had a fair trial, and has been acquitted by those that are proper judges of the crime, especially if there be no cause to suspect them partial in his favour he must be believed innocent, and his accusers are bound to acquiesce. But our Lord Jesus, though brought in as Not guilty, is still run down as a malefactor, and his blood thirsted for.

(2.) He proposed an expiatory for his discharge: (v. 39.) You have a custom, that I should render you a prisoner at the passover; shall it be this King of the Jews? He proposed this not to the chief priests, (he knew they would never agree to it,) but to the multitude; it was an appeal to the people, as appears, Matt. 27. 15.

(3.) Probably, he had heard how this Jesus had been attended but the other day with the hosannas of the common people; he therefore looked upon him to be the darling of the multitude, and the envy only of the rulers, and therefore he made no doubt but they would demand the release of Jesus, and that would stop the mouth of the prosecutors, and all would be well.

(4.) He allows their custom, for which, perhaps, they had had a long prescription, in honour of the passover, which was a memorial of their release. But it was adding to God's words, as if he had not instituted enough for the due commemoration of that deliverance, and, though an act of mercy, might be injustice to the public, Prov. 17. 15.

(5.) He offers to release Jesus to them, according to the custom. Pilate had had the heart and courage that became a judge, he would not have named an innocent person to be competitor with a notorious criminal for this favour; if he found no fault in him, he was bound in conscience to discharge him. But he was willing to trim the matter, and please all sides; and was governed more by worldly wisdom than by the rules of equity.

(2.) The people appeared his enemies and implacable against him: (v. 40.) They cried out again and again, Not this man, let him be released, but Barabbas. Observe,

(1.) How fierce and outrageous they were. Pilate proposed the thing to them calmly, as worthy their mature consideration, but they resolved it in a heat, and gave in their resolution with clamour and noise, and in the utmost confusion. Note, The enemies of Christ's holy religion cry it down, and so hope to run it down; witness the outcry at Ephesus, Acts 19. 34. But those who think the worse of things or persons, merely for their being thus exclaimed against, have a very small share of constancy and consideration. Nay, there is cause to suspect a deficiency of reason and justice on that side which calls in the assistance of popular tumult.

(2.) How foolish and absurd they were, intimated in what account here given of the other candidates: (v. 41.) Ver Barabbas was a robber; and therefore--

[1.] A breaker of the law of God; and yet he shall be spared, rather than one who reproved the pride, avarice, and tyranny of the priests and elders. Though Barabbas be a robber, he will not rob them of Moses's seat, nor of their traditions, and then no matter.

[2.] He was an enemy to the public safety, and personal property. The cause of the popular cry to release Barabbas: (Job 30. 3.) Men cried after us as after a thief, yea here it is for one. Thus they do, who prefer their sins before Christ. Sin is a robber, every base lust is a robber, and yet foolishly chosen rather than Christ, who truly enrich us.

CHAP. XIX.

Though in the history hitherto this evangelist seems industriously to have declined the recording of such passages as had been related by the other evangelists, yet when he comes to the sufferings and death of Christ, instead of passing them over out of his master's claim and concern, and looking upon them as the blemishes of his story, there he repeats what had been before related, with considerable enlargements, as one that desired to know nothing but Christ, and him crucified; to glory in nothing save in the cross of Christ. In the story of this chapter, we have,

1. The moment of Christ's trial before Pilate, which was tumultuous and confused, v. 1-15. 2. Sentence given, and execution done upon it, v. 16-23. 3. The title over his head, v. 16, 18, 19. 4. The hour and manner of his death, v. 24-29. 5. The giving him vinegar to drink, v. 28, 29. 6. His dying word, v. 30, 31. 7. The parting of his side, v. 31, 32. 8. The burial of his body, v. 32, 33. 9. That in meditating on these things, we may experimentally know the power of Christ's death, and the fellowship of his sufferings.

1. WHEN Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him. 2. And the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and they put on him a purple robe. 3. And said, Hail, King of the Jews! and they smote him with their hands. 4. Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, Behold, I bring forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him. 5. Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man! 6. When the Chief Priests therefore and officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucify him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Take ye him, and crucify him: for I find no fault in him. 7. The Jews answered him, We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. 8. When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he was the more afraid; 9. And went again into the judgment hall, and saith unto Jesus, Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer. 10. Then saith Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee? 11. Jesus answered, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin. 12. And from henceforth Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Caesar. 13. When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he brought Jesus forth, and sat down in the judgment seat in a place that is called the Pavement, but in the Hebrew, Gabbatha. 14. And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour: and he saith unto the Jews, Behold your king. 15. But they cried out, Away with him, away with him, crucify him. Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your king? The chief priests answered, We have no king but Caesar.

Here is a further account of the unfair trial which they gave to our Lord Jesus. The prosecutors carrying it on with great confusion among the people, and the judge with great confusion in his own breast; between both the narrative is such as is not easily reduced to a method; we must therefore take the parts of it as they lie.

1. The judge abuses the prisoner, though he declares him innocent, and hopes therewith to pacify the prosecutors; wherein his intention, if indeed it were, would consist, would be to justify his proceedings, which were palpably unjust.

He ordered him to be whipped as a criminal, v. 1. Pilate, seeing the people so outrageous, and being disappointed in his project of releasing him upon the people's choice, took Jesus, and scourged him; that is, appointed the actors that attended him, to do it. But it is opinion, that Pilate scourged Jesus himself, with his own hands; he took him, and scourged him, that it might be done favourably. Matthew and Mark mention his scourging after his condemnation, but here it appears to have been before.

St. Luke speaks of Pilate's offering to chastise him, and let him go; which must be before sentence. This scourging of him was designed only to pacify the Jews, and in it Pilate put a compliment upon them, that he would take their word against his own sentiments so far. The Roman scourgings were ordinarily very severe, not limited, as among the Jews, to forty stripes; yet this pain and shame Christ submitted to for our sakes.

(1.) That the scripture might be fulfilled, which spake of his being stricken, smitten, and afflicted, and the chastisement of our peace being upon him; Isa. 53. 5. But Christ under-went the stripes for us, bearing the rod of his Father's wrath, Lanth. 3. 1. Pilate's design in scourging him, was, that he might not be condemned, which did not take effect, but intimidated what was God's design, that his being scourged might prevent our being condemned, we having fellowship in his sufferings, and that did take effect: the physician scourged, and so the patient healed.

(2.) That by his stripes we might be healed, 1 Pet. 2. 24. We deserved to have been chastised with whips and scorpions, and to be beaten with many stripes, having known our Lord's will and not done it; but Christ suffered for the stripes for us, bearing the rod of his Father's wrath, Lanth. 3. 1. Pilate's design in scourging him, was, that he might not be condemned, which did not take effect, but intimidated what was God's design, that his being scourged might prevent our being condemned, we having fellowship in his sufferings, and that did take effect: the physician scourged, and so the patient healed.

(3.) That by his stripes we might be healed, or, that we might as they did, rejoice in that shame, (Acts 5. 41—16. 22, 25,) as Paul did, who was in stripes above measure, 2 Cor. 11. 23. Christ's stripes take out the sting of their's, and alter the property of them. We are chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. 11. 32.

2. He turned him over to his soldiers, to be ridiculed and made sport with as a fool; (v. 2. 3.) The soldiers, who were the governor's life-guard, put a crown of thorns upon his head; such a crown fittest for such a king; they put on him a purple robe, some old tattered coat of that colour, which they thought good enough to be the badge of his royalty; and they complimented him with, Hail, King of the Jews! (it is a people like king,) and then smote him with their hands.

(1.) See here the baseness and injustice of Pilate, that he would suffer one whom he believed an innocent person, and if so, an excellent person, to be thus abused and trampled on by his own servants. They who are under the arrest of the law, ought to be under the protection of it; and their being secured is to be the worse for it. But Pilate did this, [1.] To oblige his soldiers' merit, and perhaps it was his own too, notwithstanding the gravity of the fault, might have expected in a judge. Herod, as well as his men of war, had just before done the same, Luke 23. 11. It was as good as a stage-play to them, now that it was a festival time; as the Philistines made sport with Samson. [2.] To oblige the Jews' malicious humour, and to gratify them, who desired that all possible disgrace might be done to Christ, and the utmost indignities put upon him.

(2.) See here the rudeness and insolence of the soldiers, how perfectly lost they were to all justice and humanity. I would mind to speak of this, in a pamphlet on the stubbornness of man, and one that had been in reputation for wisdom and honour, and never did any thing to forfeit it. But thus hath Christ's holy religion been basely misrepresented, dressed up by bad men at their pleasure, and so exposed to contempt and ridicule, as Christ was here. [1.] They clothe him with a mock robe, as if it were a sham and a jest, and nothing but a piece of contempt and ridicule, crazed imagination. And as Christ is here represented a king in conceit only; so is his religion as a concern in conceit only, and God and the soul, sin and duty, heaven and hell, are with them all chimeras. [2.] They crown him with thorns, as if it were a perfect penance, and the greatest pain and hardship in the world; as if to submit to the conduct of God and conscience were to thrust one's head into a thicket of thorns; but this is an unjust imputation; thorns and snares are in the way of the froward, but roses and laurels in religion's ways.

(3.) See here the wonderful concordance of our Lord Jesus in his sufferings for us. Great and generous minds can bear anything better than ignominy; any toil, any pain, any loss, rather than reproach; and for our salvation. Herein he contented his love, that he would not only die for us, but die as a fool dies. First, He endured the pain; not the pangs of death only, though in the death of the cross those were most exquisite; but, as if those were too little, he submitted to those previous pains. Shall we complain of a thorn in the flesh, and of being buffeted by affliction, because we need it to hide pride from us, when, as it stands written, we were to bear these thorns on the head, and those buffets on our backs, to save and teach us; 2 Cor. 12. 7. Secondly, He despised the shame, the shame of a fool's coat, and the mock respect paid him, with, Hail, King of the Jews! If we be at any time ridiculed for well-doing, let us not be ashamed, but glory God, for thus we are partakers of Christ's sufferings. He that bore these shame honours, was recompensed with real honours, and so shall we, if we patiently suffer shame for him.

II. Pilate, having thus abused the prisoner, presents him to the prosecutors, in hope that they would now be satisfied, and drop the prosecution. v. 4. 5. Here he proposes two things to their consideration: 1. That he had not found any thing in him, which made him obnoxious to the Roman government; (v. 4.) I find no fault in him; which if, indeed, he said not to much maliciously, he could not but be thinking to himself, he might as well have said; I find no fault in him. Yet this he might with good conscience say. Upon further inquiry, he repeats the declaration he had made, ch. 18. 38. Hereby he condemns himself; if he found no fault in him, why did he scourge him, why did he suffer him to be abused? None ought to suffer ill but those that do ill; yet thus many banter and abuse religion, who yet, if they be serious, cannot but own they find no fault in it. If he was born and bred in heathen, he might that much harshly abuse his own conscience; and, not immediately release him, if he ought to have done? If Pilate would have consulted his own conscience only, he had neither scourged Christ, nor crucified him; but, thinking to trim the matter, to please the people by scourging Christ, and save his conscience by not crucifying him, behold he does both; whereas, if he had at first re¬solved to crucify him, the government and the people would have crucified him. It is common for those who think to keep themselves from greater sins by venturing upon lesser sins, to run into both.

2. That he had done that to him, which would make him the less dangerous to them and to their government, v. 5. He brought him out to them, wearing the crown of thorns, his head and face all bloody, and said, Behold the man who have so jealously of; intimating, that though his having been so popular might have given them some cause to fear that his interest in the country would lessen their's, yet they had taken an effectual course to prevent it, by treating him as a slave, and exposing him to contempt, after which he supposed the people would never look upon him with any respect, nor could he ever retrieve his reputation again. Little did Pilate think with what vehemence even these sufferings of Christ would in after-ages be commemorated by the best and greatest of men, who would glory in that cross and those stripes which he thought would have been to him and his followers a perpetual and indeclinable reproach.

(1.) Observe here how our Lord Jesus shews himself dressed up in all the marks of ignominy. He came forth to them, and was made to be held at, as no doubt he was, when he came forth in this garb, knowing that he was set for a sign that should be spoken against, Luke 2. 34. Did he go forth thus bearing our reproach? Let us go forth to him bearing his reproach, Heb. 13. 13.

(2.) How Pilate shews him: Pilate sath unto them, Behold the man. He sath unto them; so the original is, and the immediate antecedent being Jesus, I see no sentence in his name in the Greek copies, and the generality of the translators, supply it as we do; Pilate sath unto them, with a design to qualify them, Behold the man; not so much to move their pity, Behold a man worthy your compassion, as to silence their jealousy. Behold a man not worthy your suspicion; a man from whom you can henceforth fear no danger; his crown is fire¬famed and cast to the ground, and now all mankind will make a jest of him.

The word however is very affecting; Behold the man. It is good for every one of us, with an eye of faith, to behold the man Christ Jesus in his sufferings. Behold this king with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him; the crown of thorns, Cant. 3. 11. “Behold him, and be suitably affected with the sight. Behold him, and mourn because of him. Behold him, and love him; be still looking unto Jesus.”

III. The prosecutors, instead of being pacified, were but the more exasperated, v. 6, 7. 1. Observe here their clamour and outrage. The chief priests, who headed the mob, cried out with fury and clamour, their officers, or servants, who must say as they said, joined with them in crying, Crucify him, crucify him. The common people perhaps would have acquiesced in Pilate's declaration of his innocence, but their leaders, the priests, caused them to err. Now by this it appears that their malice against Christ was, (1.) Unreasonable and most absurd, in that they offer not to make good their charge against him, or to object against the judgment, of Pilate concerning him; but, though he be innocent, he must be crucified. (2.) It was insa¬table and very cruel. Neither the extremity of his scourging, nor his patience under it, nor the ten¬der expostulations of the judge, could mollify them in the least; no, nor could the jest into which Pi¬late turned the case, put them into a pleasant humour. (3.) It was violent and exceeding resolute; they would have it their own way, and hazard the welfare of the public, the city, and their own safety, rather than abate of the utterance of their demands. Were they so violent in running down our Lord Jesus, and in crying, Crucify him, crucify him; and shall we be vigorous and zea¬lous in advancing his name, and in crying, Crucify him, crown him? Did their hatred of him sharpen their endeavours against him, and shall not our love to him quicken our endeavours for him and his kingdom?

2. The check Pilate gave to the fury still insist¬ing upon the prisoner's innocence; “Take ye him, and crucify him, if he must be crucified.” This is spoken ironically, he knew they could not, they dared not, crucify him; but it is as if he should say, “You shall not make me a drudge to your malice; I cannot with a safe conscience crucify him.” A good resolve, if he could but have stuck to it. He found no fault in him, and therefore should not have continued to parley with the prosecutors. They that would be safe from sin, should be deaf to temptation. Nay, he should have secured the prisoner from their insults. What was he armed with power for, but to protect the injured? The guards of governors ought to be the guards of justice. But Pilate had not courage enough to act according to his conscience; and his cowardice betrayed him into a snare.

3. The further colour which the prosecutors gave to their demand; (v. 7.) We have a law, and by our law, if it were but in our power to execute it, he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. Now here observe,

(1.) They make their breach of the law, even then, when through breaking the laws they dishonoured God, as is charged upon the Jews, Rom. 2. 23. They had indeed an excellent law, far exceeding the statutes and judgments of other nations; but in vain did they boast of their law, when they abused it to such bad purposes.

(2.) They discover a restless and inveterate malice against our Lord Jesus. When they could not in¬cense Pilate against him by alleging that he pretend¬ed himself a king, and by representing him to be a dangerous competitor for the kingdom, that he pretended himself a God. Thus they turn every stone to take him off.

(3.) They pervert the law, and make that the instrument of their malice. Some think they refer to a law made particularly against Christ, as if, being a law, it must be executed right or wrong; whereas there is a worse to them that deceive unrighteous govern¬ments, and that write the grievousness which they have prescribed, Isa. 10. 1. See Mic. 6. 16. But it should rather seem they refer to the law of Moses; and if so, [1.] It was true that blasphemers, idolators, and false prophets, were to be put to death by that law. Whoever falsely pretended to be the Son of God, was guilty of blasphemy, Lev. 24. 16. But then, [2.] It was false that he pretended to be the Son of God, for he received no such name or title from the proving he produced of his being so. If he said that he was the Son of God, and the scope and tendency of his doctrine were not to draw people from God, but to bring them to him, and he confirmed his mission and doctrine by miracles, as undoubtedly he did beyond contradiction, by their law they ought to hearken to him, (Deut 18. 15, 18.) and if they did not, they were to die by it. That which his name and pretensions might have been their happiness, if they had not stood in their own light, they impute to him as a crime, for which he ought to die; yet if he ought to die by their law, he ought not to be crucified, for that was no death inflicted by their law.

IV. The judge brings the prisoner again to his trial, upon this new suggestion. Observe,
1. The concern Pilate was in, when he heard this alleged; (v. 8.) when he heard that his prisoner pretended not to royalty only, but to deity, he was the more afraid. This embarrasmed him more than ever, and made the case more difficult both ways; for, (1.) There was the more danger of offending the people, if he should acquit him, for he knew how jealous that people were for the unity of the godhead, and what aversion they now had to other gods; and therefore, though he might hope to pacify their rage against a pretended king, he could never reconcile them to a pretended god. "If this be at the bottom of the tumult," thinks Pilate, "it will not be turned off with jests; there was a large load of honour upon this man, in his own conscience, if he should condemn him. "Is he one," (thinks Pilate) "that makes himself the Son of God; and what if it should prove that he is so? What will become of me then?" Even natural conscience makes men afraid of being found fighting against God. The heathen had some fabulous traditions of incarnate deities appearing sometimes in mean circumstances, and treated by some as if they had paid dear for their doing. Pilate fears, lest he should thus run himself into a premunire.

2. His further examination of our Lord Jesus thereupon, v. 9. That he might give the prosecutors all the fair play they could desire, he resumed the debate, went into the judgment hall, and asked Christ, "Art thou a dearer than we?" Observe,

(1.) The place he chose for this examination; he went into the judgment hall for privacy, that he might be out of the noise and clamour of the crowd, and might examine the thing the more closely. They that would find out the truth as it is in Jesus, must get out of the noise of prejudice, and retire as it were into the judgment hall, to converse with Christ.

(2.) The question he put to him; Whence art thou? Art thou from men or from heaven? From beneath or from above? He had before asked directly, Art thou a king? But here he does not directly ask, Art thou the Son of God? Lest he should seem to meddle with divine things too boldly; but in general, Whence art thou? Where wast thou, and in what world hast thou a being, before thy coming into this world?

(3.) The silence of our Lord Jesus when he was examined upon this head: but Jesus gave him no answer. This was not a sullen silence, in contempt of the court, nor was it because he knew not what to say; but,

[1.] It was a patient silence, that the scripture might be fulfilled; as a sheep before the shearer is dumb, so he opened not his mouth, Isa. 53. 7. This silence loudly spake his submission to his Father's will in his present sufferings, which thus accommodated himself to, and composed himself to bear. He was silent, because he would say nothing to hinder his sufferings. If Christ had avowed himself a God as plainly as he avowed himself a king, it is probable he would not have condemned him, (for he was afraid, at the mention of it by the prosecutors;) and the Romans, though they triumphed over the kings of the nations they conquered, yet stood in awe of their gods. See 1 Cor. 2. 8. If they had known him to be the Lord of glory, they would not have crucified him; and how then must we have believed? [2.] It was a prudent silence. When the chief priests asked him, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? He answered, I am, for he knew they went upon the scriptures of the Old Testament which spoke of the Messiah; but when Pilate asked him, he knew he did not understand his own question, having no notion of the Messiah, and of his being the Son of God, and therefore to what purpose should he reply to him whose head was filled with the pagan theology, to which he would have turned his answer?

(4.) The haughty check which Pilate gave him for his silence; (v. 10.) Speakest thou not unto me? Do you put such an affront upon me as to stand mute? What, knowest thou not, that, as president of the province, I have power, if I think fit, to crucify thee; and have power, if I think fit, to release thee? Observe here,

[1.] How Pilate magnifies himself, and boasts of his own authority, as not inferior to that of Nebuchadnezzar, of whom it is said, that whom he would he made to play, and whom he would he kept alive, Dan. 5. 19. Men in power are apt to be puffed up with their power, and the more absolute and arbitrary it is, the more it gratifies their pride, and humours that. But he magnifies his power to an exorbitant degree, when he boasts that he had power to crucify one whom he had declared innocent, for no prince or potentate has authority to do wrong. Id possuit, quod juro possimum.—We can only do that which we can justly do.

[2.] How he tramples upon our blessed Saviour! Speakest thou not unto me? He reflects upon him, First, As if he were undutiful and disrespectful to those in authority, not speaking when he was spoken to. Secondly, As if he had been ungrateful to one that had been tender of him; for, Speakest thou not unto me? Though he had been the subject of his regard. Thirdly, As if he were narrow for himself; "Wilt thou not speak to clear thyself to one that is willing to clear thee?" If Christ had indeed sought to save his life, now had been his time to have spoken; but that which he had to do, was, to lay down his life.

(5.) Christ's pertinent answer to this check, v. 11. who,

[1.] He boldly rebukes his arrogance, and rectifies his mistake; "Big as thou lookest and talkest, thou couldst have no power at all against me; no power to scourge, no power to crucify, except it were given thee from above." Though Christ did not think fit to answer him when he was imperious, (then answer not a fool according to his folly,) lest thou also be like him,) yet he did think fit to answer him when he was infectious; then answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit, Prov. 26. 4, 5. When Pilate used his power, Christ silently submitted to it; but when he grew proud of it, he made him know himself; "All the power thou hast, is given thee from above;" which may be taken in two ways. First, As reminding him that his power, in general, as a magistrate, was a limited power, and he could do no more than God would suffer him to do. God is the fountain of power; and the powers that are, as they are ordained by him, and derived from him, so they are subject to him. They ought to go no further than his law directs them; they can go no further than his providence permits them. They are God's hand, and his sword, Ps. 144. 15. Though the axe and the sword be against him that breaketh him therewith, yet still it is but a tool, Isa. 10. 5, 15. Let the proud oppressors know that there is a higher than they, to whom they are accountable, Excl. 5. 8. And let this silence the murmuring of the oppressed, It is the Lord; (God has bid Shimei curse David;) and let it comfort them, that their persecutors cannot do more than God will let them. See Isa. 31. 12.

Secondly, As informing him that his power against him in particular, and all the efforts of that power, were by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God, Acts 2. 23. Pilate never fancied himself to look so great as now, when he sat in judgment upon such a prisoner as this, who was looked upon by many as the Son of God and King of Israel, and had the fate of so great a man at his disposal; but Christ lets him know that he was herein but an instrument in God's hand, and could do nothing against him but by the appointment of heaven, Acts 4. 27, 28."

[2.] He mildly excuses and extenuates his sin, in comparison with the sin of the ringleaders; "Therefore he that delivered me unto thee, his less greater guilt; for thou as a magistrate hast power from above, and art in thy place; thy sin is less than theirs, who, from envy and malice, urge thee to abuse thy power."

First, It is plainly intimated that what Pilate did, was sin, a great sin, and that the force which the Jews put upon him, and which he put upon himself in it, would not justify him. Christ hereby intended a hint for the awakening of his conscience, and the increase of the fear he was now under. The guilt of others will not acquit us, nor will it avow in the great day to say, that others were worse than we, for we are not to be judged by comparison, but must bear our own burthen.

Secondly, Yet their's that delivered him to Pilate, was the greater sin; by this it appears that all sins are not equal, but some more heinous than others; some comparatively, as grats, others as camels; some much worse, others as beams; some as pence, others as pounds. He that delivered Christ to Pilate, was either,

1. The people of the Jews, who cried out, Crucify him, crucify him; they had seen Christ's miracles, which Pilate had not: to them the Messiah was first sent, they were his own, and to them who were now enslaved, a Redeemer should have been most welcome, and therefore it was much worse in them to appear against him than in Pilate.

2. Or rather he means Caiaphas in particular, who was at the head of the conspiracy against Christ, and first advised his death, ch. XI. 49, 50. The sin of Caiaphas was abundantly greater than the sin of Pilate. Caiaphas prosecuted Christ from pure enmity to him and his doctrine, deliberately and of malice prepense. Pilate condemned him purely for fear of the people, and it was a hasty resolution which he had not time to cool upon.

3. Some think Christ means Judas; for though he did not immediately deliver him into the hands of Pilate, yet he betrayed him to those that did. The sin of Judas was, upon many accounts, greater than the sin of Pilate. Pilate was a stranger to Christ, Judas was his friend and follower. Pilate found no fault in him, but Judas knew a deal of good by him. Pilate, though bribed, was not bribed, but Judas took a reward against the innocent; the sin of Judas was a leading sin, and let in all that followed. He was a guide to them that took Jesus. So great was the sin of Judas, that vengeance suffered him not to live; but when Christ said this, or soon after, he was gone to his own place.

V. Pilate struggles with the Jews to deliver Jesus out of their hands, but in vain. We hear no more after this of any thing that passed between Pilate and the prisoner: what remains, lay between him and the prosecutors.

1. Pilate seems more zealous than before to get Jesus discharged: (r. 12.) from henceforth, from this time, and for this reason, because Christ had given him that answer, (r. 11.) which, though it had a rebuke in it, yet had so great a key; and the chief priests could not have him, he still continued to find no fault in Christ, but sought to release him, desired it, endeavoured it; he sought to release him, he contrived how to do it handsomely and safely, and so as not to disable the priests. It never does well, when our resolutions to do our duty are swallowed up in projects how to do it plausibly and conveniently. If Pilate's policy had not prevailed above his justice, he would not have been long seeking to release him; but would have done it; But justice, what can—let justice be done, though heaven itself should fail.

2. The Jews were more furious than ever, and more violent to get Jesus crucified. Still they carry on their design with noise and clamour as before; so now they cried out. They would have it thought that the commonality was against him, and therefore laboured to get him cried down by a multitude, and that he was a man of no account, and no matter to pack a murder, that the fair poll had been granted, I doubt not but it would have been carried by a great majority for the releasing of him. A few madmen may out-shout many wise men, and then fancy themselves to speak the sense (when it is but the nonsense) of a nation, or of all mankind; but it is not so easy a thing to change the sense of the people as it is to misrepresent it, and to change their cry. Now that Christ was in the hands of his enemies, his friends were shy and silent, and disappeared; and those that were against him, were forward to shew themselves so, and this gave the chief priests an opportunity to represent it as the concurring vote of all the Jews, that he should be crucified. In this outcry they endeavoured two things.

1. To blacken the prisoner as an enemy to Cæsar. He had refused the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them, had declared his kingdom not to be of this world, and yet they will have it that he speaks against Cæsar; —695— he opposes Cæsar; invades his dignity and sovereignty. It has always been the artifice of the enemies of religion, to represent it as hurtful to kings and provinces, when it would be highly beneficial to both.

2. To frighten the judge, as no friend to Cæsar; "If thou let this man go unpunished, and let him go on, these are not Cæsar's friend, and therefore false to thy truth and the duty of thy place, and obnoxious to the emperor's displeasure, and liable to be turned out." They intimated a threatening that they would inform against him, and get him displaced; and here they touched him in a sensible and very tender part. But of all people those Jews should not have pretended a concern for Cæsar, who were themselves so ill affected to him and his government. They should not talk of being friends to Cæsar, who were themselves such back friends to him; yet thus a pretended zeal for that which is good, often serves to cover a real malice against that which is better.

When other expedients had been tried in vain, Pilate slightly endeavoured to banter them out of their fury, and yet, in doing that, betrayed himself to them, and yielded to the rapid stream, r. 15—15. After he had stood it out a great while, and seemed now as if he would have made a vigorous resistance upon that attack, (r. 12.) he basely surrendered. Observe here,

(1.) What it was that shocked Pilate— (r. 13.) When he heard that saying, that he could not be true to Cæsar's honour, nor sure of Cæsar's favour, if he did not put Jesus to death, then he thought it was time to look about him. All they had said to prove Christ a malefactor, and that therefore it was Pilate's duty to condemn him, did not move him, but he still kept to his conviction of Christ's innocence; but when they urged that it was his interest to condemn Christ, then he gave in. They that bind up their happiness in the favour of men, make themselves an easy prey to the temptations of Satan.

(2.) What preparation was made for a definitive sentence upon this matter; Pilate brought Jesus forth, and he himself in great state took the chair; we may suppose that he called for his robes, that he might look big, and then he sat down in the judgment seat. He was condemned with all the ceremony that could be. [1.] To bring us off at God’s bar, and that all believers through Christ, being judged here, might be acquitted in the court of heaven. [2.] To take off the terror of pompous trials, which his followers might be brought to for his cause. Or might the better stand at Caesar’s judgment sent, when his Master had stood there before him.

Note is here taken of the place and time.

First, The place where Christ was condemned; in a place called the Pavement, but in Hebrew, Gabbatha, probably the place where he used to sit to the business of his temple. Some make Gabbatha signify an enclosed place, fenced in by the inclosures of the people, whom therefore he did the less need to fear; others, an elevated place, raised that all might see him.

Secondly, The time. v. 14. It was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour. Observe, 1. The day; it was the preparation of the passover, that is, for the passover-sabbath, and the solemnities of that, and the rest of the days of the feast of unleavened bread. This is plain from Luke 23. 54. It was the preparation, and the sabbath drew on. So that this preparation was for the sabbath. Note, Before the passover there ought to be preparation. This is mentioned as an aggravation of their sin in persecuting Christ with so much malice and fury; for it was when they should have been purging out the old leaven, that is, for the passover, but the better the day the worse the deed.

2. The hour; it was about the sixth hour. Some ancient Greek and Latin manuscripts read it about the third hour, which agrees with Mark 15. 25. And it appears by Matt. 27. 43. that he was upon the cross before the sixth hour. But it should seem to have been, not as a precise determination of the time, but as an additional aggravation of the sin of his prosecutors, that they were pushing on the prosecution, not only on the solemn day, the day of the preparation, but from the third to the sixth hour, which was, as we call it, church-time; on that day they were employed in this wickedness, so that for this day, though they were priests, they dropped the temple-service, for they did not leave Christ till the sixth hour, when the darkness began, which frightened them away. Some think that the sixth hour, with this evangelist, is, according to the Roman reckoning and our six of the clock in the morning, answering to the Jews’ first hour of the day; this is very probable, that Christ’s trial before Pilate was at the height about six in the morning, which was then a little after sun-rising.

3. The rascal Pilate had with the Jews, both priests and people, before he proceeded to give judgment, endeavouring in vain to stem the tide of their rage.

[1.] He said unto the Jews, Behold your King. This is a reproach to them for the absurdity and malice of their murmurs, that this Jesus made himself a king; Behold your King, him whom you accuse, look to your crown. Is this a man likely to be dangerous to the government? I am satisfied he is not, and you may be so too, and let him alone. Some think he hereby upbraids them with their secret disaffection to Caesar; You would have this man to be your king, if he would but have headed a rebellion against Caesar. But Pilate, though he was far from meaning so, seems as if he were a voice tender to the crown. Is this a man likely to be dangerous to the government? I am satisfied he is not, and you may be so too, and let him alone.

[2.] They cried out with the greatest indignation, Away with him, away with him, which speaks disdain as well as malice, ἄνειρον αὐτόν, ἀπείρον αὐτόν. Take him, he is none of ours; we disown him for our kinsman, much more for our king; we have not only no veneration for him, but no compassion, even with him out of our sight.” for so it was written of him, he is one whom the nation abhors, (Isa. 49.7.) and they hid as it were their faces from him, Is. 53. 2, 3. Away with him from the earth, Acts 22. 22. This shews, First, How we desired to have been treated at God’s tribunal; we were by sin become odious to God’s holiness, which cried, Away with them, away from the earth, or is of harsper eyes than to behold iniquity; we were also become obnoxious to God’s justice, which cried against us, Crucify them, crucify them, let the sentence of the law be executed. Had not Christ interposed, and been thus rejected of men, we had been for ever rejected of God. Secondly, It shews how we ought to treat our sins; we are often in scripture said to crucify sin, in conformity to Christ’s death; now that they that crucified Christ, did it with contumely. With criminal indignation we should run down sin in us, as they with an impious indignation ran him down, who was made sin for us. The true penitent casts away from him his transgressions, Away with them, away with them, (Isa. 53. 20—29. 22.) crucify them, crucify them; it is not fit that they should live in my soul, Hos. 14. 11.

[3.] Pilate, willing to have Jesus released, and yet that it should be their doing, asks them, Shall I crucify your king? In saying this, he designed either, First, To stop their mouths, by shewing them how absurd it was for them to reject one who offered himself to them to be their king, at a time when they needed one more than ever. Have they no sense of slavery? No desire of liberty? No value for a deliverer? Though he saw no cause to fear him, they might see cause to hope for something from him; since crushed and sinking interests are ready to catch at any thing. Or, Secondly, To stop the mouth of his own conscience; “If this Jesus be a king,” (thinks Pilate,) “he is only king of the Jews, and therefore I have nothing to do but to make a fair tender of him to them; if they refuse him, let them have their king crucified, what is that to me?” He banterers them for their folly in expecting a Messiah, and yet running down one that bid so fair to be he.

[4.] The chief priests, that they might effectually renounce Christ, and engage Pilate to crucify him, but otherwise sorely against their will, cried out, We have no king but Caesar. This they knew would please Pilate, and so they hoped to carry their point, though at the same time they hated Caesar and his government. But observe here, First, What a plain indication this is, that the time for the Messiah to appear, even the set time, was now come; for if the Jews have no king but Caesar, then is the scripture departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet, which should never be till this, but come supposing a spiritual kingdom. And Secondly, What a righteous thing it was with God to bring upon them that ruin by the Romans, which followed not long after. 1. They adhere to Caesar, and to Caesar they shall go. God soon gave them enough of their Caesars, and, according to Joatham’s parable, since the trees choose the bramble for their king, rather than the vine and the olive, an evil spirit is sent among them, for the time to try them in this temptation. From henceforward they were rebels to the Caesars, and the Caesars tyrants to them, and it ended in the overthrow of their place and nation. It is just with God to make that a scourge and weapon, to which we prefer before Christ. 2. They would have no other king than Caesar, and never have they had any other to this day, but have now above many days without a king, and without a prince, (Hos. 3. 4.) without any of their own, but the kings of the nations have ruled over them; for they have not had a king but Caesar, so shall their doom be, themselves have decided it.

16. Then delivered he him therefore unto them to be crucified. And they took Jesus, and led him away. 17. And he bearing his cross went forth into a place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew Golgotha: 18. Where they crucified him, and two other with him, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst.

We have here sentence of death passed upon our Lord Jesus, and execution done soon after. A mighty struggle Pilate had had within him between his convictions and his corruptions; but at length his convictions yielded, and his corruptions prevailed, the fear of man having a greater power over him than the fear of God.

1. Pilate gave judgment against Christ, and signed the warrant for his execution, v. 16. We may see here,

1. How Pilate sinned against his conscience; he had again and again pronounced him innocent, and yet he was condemned as guilty. Pilate, however, came to be great in name only; in matters disoblige him, and exasperated the Jewish nation, for he was a man of a haughty, implicable spirit, and extremely wedded to his humour. He had seized upon the Coritan, and spent it upon a water-work; he had brought in shields stamped with Caesar's image, which was very provoking to the Jews; he had sacrificed the lives of many to his resolutions herein, for which reason he should be complained of, for those and other insensibilities, he was willing to gratify the Jews. Now this makes the matter much worse. If he had been of an easy soft and pliable disposition, his yielding to so strong a stream had been the more excusable; but for a man that was so wilful in other things, and so fierce a resolution, to be overcome in a thing of this nature, shews him to be a bad man indeed, that could better bear the wronging of his conscience than the crossing of his humour. Caesar.

2. How he endeavoured to transfer the guilt upon the Jews. He delivered him, not to his own officers, (as usual,) but to the procurators, the chief priests and elders; so excusing the wrong to his own conscience with this, that it was but a permissive condemnation, and that he did not put Christ to death, but only connived at those that did it.

3. How Christ was made sin for us. We deserved to have been condemned; but Christ was condemned for us, that to us there might be no condemnation. God was now entering into judgment with his Son, that he might not enter into judgment with his servants.

II. Judgment was no sooner given than with all possible expedition the prosecutors, having gained their point, resolved to lose no time, 1. Lest Pilate should change his mind, and order a reprieve. Those are enemies to our souls, the worst of enemies, that hurry us to sin, and then leave us no room to undo what we have done amiss. 2. Lest there should be an uproar among the people, and there should have been a greater number against them, than they had with so much artifice got to be for them.

It were well if we would be thus expedients in that which is good, and not stay for more difficulties.

(1.) They immediately hurried away the prisoner. The chief priests greedily flew upon the prey which they had been long waiting for; now it is drawn into their net. Or they, that is, the soldiers who were to attend the execution, they took him, and led him forth to the place where he was to come, and thence to the place of execution, as is usual with us, but directly to the place of execution. Both the priests and the soldiers joined in leading him away. Now was the Son of man delivered into the hands of men, wicked and unreasonable men. By the law of Moses (and in appeals by our law) the prosecutors were to be the executors, Deut. 17. 7. And the priests here were proud of the business.

His sentence led himself to all their own. He had to have made any opposition, but the scripture must be fulfilled, he was led as a sheep to the slaughter, Acts 8. 32. We deserved to have been led forth with the workers of iniquity as criminals to execution, Ps. 118. 5. But he was led forth for us, that we might escape.

(2.) To add to his misery, they obliged him, as long as he was able, to carry his cross, (v. 17.) according to the custom among the Romans; hence Furey was among them a name of reproach. Their crosses did not stand up constantly, as our gibbets do in the places of execution; because the malefactor was nailed to the cross as it lay along upon the ground, and then it was lifted up, and fastened in the earth, and removed when the execution was over, and commonly buried with the body; so this carried his cross to the execution place and was even. Now Christ's carrying his cross may be considered, [1.] As a part of his sufferings; he endured the cross literally. It was a long and thick piece of timber, that was necessary for such a use, and some think it was neither seasoned nor hewn. The blessed body of the Lord Jesus was tender, and accustomed to such burdens; it had now lately been harassed and tired out. His shoulders were sore with the weight of this burden, and the weight of the cross would renew his smart, and be apt to strike the thorns he was crowned with into his head; yet all this he patiently underwent, and it was but the beginning of sorrows. [2.] As answering the type which went before him; Isaac, when he was to be offered, carried the wood on which he was to be bound, and with which he was to be burned. [3.] As very significant of his undertaking, the Father having laid upon him the sins of the world, (Ps. 49. 6.) and he being to take away sin, by bearing it in his own body upon the tree, 1 Pet. 2. 24. He had said in effect, On me be the curse; for he was made a curse for us, and therefore on him was the cross. [4.] As very instructive to us. Our Master hereby taught all his disciples to take up their cross, and follow him. Whatever cross he calls us out to bear at any time, we must remember that he bore the first, and by bearing it for us, he carried us in a great measure, for thus he hath made his yoke easy, and his burden light. He bore that end of the cross that had the curse upon it, that was the heavy end; and thence all that are his, are enabled to call their afflictions for him light, and but for a moment.

(3.) They brought him to the place of execution: he went forth, not dragging against his will, but voluntary in his sufferings. He went forth out of the city, for he was crucified without the gate, Heb. 12. 12. And to put the greater infamy upon his sufferings, he was brought to the common place of execution, as one in all points numbered among the transgressors; a place called Golgotha, the place of a skull, where they threw dead men's skulls and bones, or where the heads of beheaded malefactors were left. He was cast among them. It was only Christ suffered, because he was made sin for us, that he might purge our consciences from dead works, and the pollution of the soul. If one would take notice of the traditions of the elders, there are two which are mentioned by many of the ancient writers concerning this place. [1.] That Adam was buried here, and that this was the place of his skull, and they observed that there where death triumphed over the first Adam, there death also triumphed over him. Gertrude quotes for this tradition, Origin, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Austin, Jerom, and others. [2.] That this was that mountain in the land of Moriah, on which Abraham offered up Isaac, and the ram was a ransom for Isaac.

(4.) There they crucified him, and the other malefactors with him; (c. 18.) There they crucified him. Observe, First, What Christ did; the death of the cross, a bloody, painful, shameful death, a cursed death. He was nailed to the cross, as a sacrifice bound to the altar, as a Saviour fixed for his undertaking: his ear nailed to God's doorpost, to serve him for ever. He was lifted up, as the brasen serpent, hung between heaven and earth, because we were unworthy of either, and abandoned by both. His hands were stretched out to invite and embrace us; he hung upon the tree some hours, dying gradually in the full use of reason and speech, that he might actually resign himself a sacrifice. Secondly, In what company he died; two other with him. Probably, those had not been executed at that time, but at the request of the chief priests, to add to the disgrace of our Lord Jesus; which might enhance the guilt of the priests, and reveal him, because their death was hastened for his sake. Had they taken two of his disciples, and crucified them with him, it had been an honour to him; but if such as they had been partakers with him in suffering, it would have looked as if they had been undertakers with him in satisfaction. Therefore it was ordered that his fellow-sufferers should be the worst of sinners, that he might bear our reproach, and that the merit might appear to be his only. This exposed him much to the people's contempt and hatred, who are apt to judge of persons by the lump, and are not curious in distinguishing, and would conclude him not only a malefactor because he was voked with malefactors, but the worst of the three, because put in the midst. But thus the scripture was fulfilled: he was numbered among the transgressors. He did not die at the altar among the sacrifices, nor mingle his blood with that of bulls and goats; but he died among the criminals, and mingled his blood with their's who were sacrificed to public justice.

And now let us pause a while, and with an eye of faith look upon Jesus. Was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow? See him, who was clothed with glory, stripped of it all, and clothed with shame; him, who was the praise of angels, made a reproach of men; him, who had been with eternal delight and joy in the bosom of his Father, now in the extremities of pain and agony. See him bleeding, see him suffering, see him dying, see him and love him, love him and live to him, and study what we shall render.

19. And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS. 20. This title then read many of the Jews: for the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city: and it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin. 21. Then said the Chief Priests of the Jews to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews; but that he said, I am King of the Jews. 22. Pilate answered, What I have written I have written. 23. Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part: and also his coat: now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout. 24. They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did. 25. Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. 26. When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son! 27. Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home. 28. After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst. 29. Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar: and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth. 30. When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished: and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.

Here are some remarkable circumstances of Christ's dying, more fully related than before, which they will take special notice of, who covet to know Christ, and him crucified.

1. The title set up over his head. Observe, 1. The inscription itself which Pilate wrote, and ordered to be fixed to the top of the cross, declaring the cause for which he was crucified, v. 19. Matthew called it, στίχος—the accusation; Mark and Luke called it, ἀκολούθων—the inscription; John calls it by the proper Latin name, titulus—the title: and it was this, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. Pilate intended this for his reproach, that he, being Jesus of Nazareth, should pretend to be King of the Jews, and set up in competition with Caesar, to whom Pilate would thus recommend himself, as very jealous for his honour and interest, when he would treat but a titular king, a king in metaphor, as the worst of malefactors; but God over-ruled this matter, (1.) That it might be a further testimony to the innocence of our Lord Jesus; for here was an accusation, which, as it was worded, could not be excused. If this be that, if this be all they have to lay to his charge, surely he has done nothing worthy of death or of bonds. (2.) That it might shew forth his dignity and honour. This is Jesus the Saviour, Ναζαρηνής, the blessed Nazarene, sanctified to God; this is the King of the Jews, Messiah the Prince, the sceptre that should rise out of Israel, as Balaam had foretold; dying for the good of his people, as Cæphas had foretold. Thus all these three had men witnessed to Christ, though they meant not so.

2. The notice taken of this inscription: (v. 20.) Many of the Jews read it, not only those of Jerusalem, but those out of the country, and from other countries, strangers and proselytes, that came up to worship at the feast. Multitudes read it; and it occasoned a great variety of reflections and speculations, as men stood affected. Christ himself was set for a sign, a title.

Here are two reasons why the title was so much read.

1. Because the place where Jesus was crucified, though without the gate, was yet high the city; which intimates that if it had been any great distance off, they would not have been led, no not by their curiosity, to go and see it, and read it. It is an advantage to have the means of knowing Christ brought to our doors.

2. It was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin, which made it legible to all they all understood one or other of these languages, and none were more careful to bring up their children to read than the Jews generally were. It likewise made it the more considerable; every one would be curious to inquire what it was, which was so industriously published in the three most known languages.

In the Hebrew, the oracles of God were recorded; in Greek, the learning of the philosophers; and in Latin, the laws of the empire. In each of these Christ is proclaimed king, in whom are hid all the treasures of revelation, wisdom, and power; so ordering it, that this should be written in the three then most known tongues; it was intimated thereby, that Jesus Christ should be a Scion of all nations, and not to the Jews only; and also that every nation should be written in the Hebraic, Greek, and Latin, the vulgar languages at that time in this part of the world; so that this is so far from intimating (as the Papists would have it) that the scripture is still to be retained in these three languages, that on the contrary it teaches us that the knowledge of Christ ought to be diffused throughout every nation in their own tongue, as the proper vehicle of it, that people may converse as freely with the scriptures as they do with their neighbours.

3. The offence which the prosecutors took at it, v. 21. They would not have it written, the King of the Jews; but that he said of himself, I am the King of the Jews. Here they shew themselves, (1.) Very spiritless and malicious against Christ. It was now enough to have him crucified, but they must have some curse or tokens as a terrible punishment in giving him such bad treatment, that they should themselves concerned to give him a bad character, and to represent him as an usurper of honours and powers that he was not entitled to. (2.) Foolishly jealous of the honour of their nation; though they were a conquered and enslaved people, yet they stood so much upon the punctilio of their reputation, that they seemed to have it said, that this was their king. (3.) They shew themselves very inipertinent and troublesome to Pilate; they would not be sensible that they had forced him, against his mind, to condemn Christ, and yet, in such a trivial thing as this, they continue to tease him. It was so much the worse, in that, though they had charged him with pretending to be the King of the Jews, yet they had not proved it, nor had he ever said so.

Pilate's resolution to adhere to it, v. 21. What I have written I have written, and will not alter it to humour them.]

(1.) Hereby an affront was put upon the chief priests, who would still be dictating. It seems, by Pilate's manner of speaking, that he was uneasy in himself for yielding to them, and vexed at them for forcing him to it; and therefore he was resolved to be crucified with them; and by this inscription intimates, (1.) That notwithstanding their pretences, they were not sincere in their pretensions to Caesar and his government; they were willing enough to have a king of the Jews, if they could have one to their mind. (2.) That such a king as this, so mean and desppicable, was good enough to be the king of the Jews; and this would be the fate of all that should dare to oppose the Roman power.

[3.] That they had been very unjust and unreasonable in prosecuting this Jesus, when there was no fault to be found in him.

(2.) Hereby Pilate was done to the Lord Jesus, Pilate stuck to it with resolution, that he was the King of the Jews; what he had written, was what God had first written, and therefore he could not alter: for thus it was written, that Messias the Prince shall be cut off, Dan. 9. 26. This therefore is the true cause of his death; he dies, because the King of Israel must die, must thus die. When the Lord Jesus was condemned, he would not have united, and will not have him for their king, Pilate, a German, stick to it that he is a king; which was an earnest of what came to pass afterwards, when the Gentiles submitted to the kingdom of Messiah, which the unbelieving Jews had rebelled against.

11. The dividing of his garments among the executioners, v. 23, 24. Four soldiers were employed, when they had crucified Jesus, had nailed him to the cross, and fastened the nap to him upon it, and nothing more was to be done, since he was impiring through the extremity of pain, as, with us, when the prisoner is turned off, then they went to make a dividend of his clothes, each claiming an equal share, and so they made four parts, as near of the same value as they could, to every soldier a part; but his coat, or upper garment, whether dicky brown, being a pretty piece of curiosity, without seams, was given to him who should hang it out, they agreed to cast lots for that. Here observe,

1. The shame they put upon our Lord Jesus, in stripping him of his garments before they crucified him. The shame of nakedness came in with sin. He therefore who was made sin for us, bare that shame, to roll away our reproach. He was stripped, that we might be clothed with white righteousness, Rev. 1:5. and when we are much clothed, we may not be found naked.

2. The wages with which these soldiers paid themselves for crucifying Christ. They were willing to do it for his old clothes. Nothing is to be done so bad, but there will be found men had enough to do it for a trade. Probably, they hoped to make more than ordinary advantage of his clothes, having a kind of fines wrought by the touch of the hem of his garments; expecting that his admirers would give any money for them.

3. The sport they made about his seamless coat; we read not of anything about him valuable or remarkable but that, and that not for the richness, but only the variety of it, for it was woven from the top throughout; there was no curiosity therefore in the shape, but a contrived plainness; Tradition says, his mother was in him, and adds this further, that it was made for him when he was a child, and, like the Israelites' clothes in the wilderness, were old; but that is a groundless fancy. The soldiers thought it pity to rend it, for then it would unravel, and a piece of it would be good for nothing; they would therefore cast lots for it. While Christ was in his dying agonies, they were merrily dividing his silts.

The preserving of Christ's seamless coat is commonly alluded to, to shew the care all Christians ought to take, that they rend not the church of Christ with strife and divisions; yet some have observed, that the reason why the soldiers would not rend Christ's coat, was not out of any respect to Christ, but because each of them hoped to have it entire for himself. And so many cry out against schism, only that they may engross all the wealth and power to themselves. Those who opposed Luther's separation from the church of Rome, urged much the tunica inewearis—the stainless coat; and some of them had so much stress upon it, that they were called the Incomtartcularly of the Apocalypse. 4. The fulfilling of the scripture in this, David, in spirit, foretold this very circumstance of Christ's sufferings, in that passage, Ps. 22. 18. The event so exactly answering the prediction, proves, (1.) That the scripture is the word of God, which foretold contingent events concerning Christ so long before, and they came to pass according to the prediction. (2.) That Jesus is the true Messiah, for she and Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah had, and have, their full accomplishment. These things therefore the soldiers did.

III. The care that he took of his poor mother. 1. His mother attends him to his death; (v. 25.) There stood by the cross, as near as they could get, his mother, and some of his relations and friends with her. At first, they stood near, as it is said here; but, it is probable, afterward the soldiers forced them to stand far off, as it is said in Matthew and Mark: or they themselves removed out of the ground.

(1.) See here the tender affection of these pious women to our Lord Jesus in his sufferings. When all his disciples, except John, had forsaken him, they continued their attendance on him. Thus the feeble were on David, (Zech. 12. 8.) they were not deserted by the fear of the cross, or the burden of the sight; they could not rescue him or relieve him, yet they attended him, to show their good-will. It is an impious and blasphemous construction which some of the popish writers put upon the Virgin Mary standing by the cross, that thereby she contributed to the satisfaction he made for sin, no less than he did, and so became a joint-mediated and co-redemptor in our salvation.

(2.) We must easily suppose what an affliction it was to those poor women, to see him thus abused, especially to the blessed virgin. Now was fulfilled Simeon's word, A sword shall pierce through thine own soul, Luke 2. 35. His torments were her tortures; she was upon the rack, while he was upon the cross; and her heart bled with his wounds; and the reproaches wherewith they reproached him, fell on them that attended him.

(3.) We may justly admire the power of divine grace in supporting these women, especially the Virgin Mary, under this heavy trial. We do not find his mother wringing her hands, or tearing her hair, or rending her clothes, or making an outcry; but, with a wonderful composure, standing by the cross, and her hands with him. Surely she and they were strengthened by a divine power to this degree of patience; and surely the Virgin Mary had a fuller expectation of his resurrection than the rest had, which supported her thus. We knew not what we can bear till we are tried, and then we know who has said, My grace is sufficient for thee.

2. He tenderly provides for his mother at his death. It is probable that Joseph, his uncle, and was long, and that his son, Jesus, had supported her, and her relation to him had been her maintenance; and now that he was dying, what would become of her? He saw her standing by, and knew her cares and griefs, and he saw John standing not far off, and so he settled a new relation between his beloved mother, and his beloved disciple; for he said to her, Woman, behold thy son; for whom henceforth shall he be called, John. Now he says to him, Rebald thy mother; to whom thou must pay a filial duty. And so from that hour, that hour never to be forgotten, that disciple took her to his own home. See here.

(1.) The care Christ took of his dear mother. He was not so much taken up with a sense of his sufferings as to forget his friends; all whose concerns he bore upon his heart. His mother, perhaps was so taken up with his sufferings, that she thought not what would become of her; but he admitted that thought. Silver and gold he had none to leave, no state to provide for his relations; soldiers had seized, and we hear no more of the bag since Judas, who had carried it, hanged himself. He had therefore no other way to provide for his mother, than by his interest in a friend, which he does here.

(1.) He calls her woman, not mother, not out of any disrespect to her, but because mother would have been a cutting word to her that was already stung to the heart with griefs; like Isaac saying to Abraham, My father. He speaks as one that was now no more in this world, but was already dead to those in it that were dearest to him. His speaking in this seemingly slight manner to his mother, as he had done formerly, was designed to obviate and give check to the undue honours which he foresaw would be given her in the Romish church, as if she were a joint-beneficer with him in the honours of the Redeemer.

(2.) He directs her to look upon John as her son; "Behold him as thy son, who stands there by thee, and be as a mother to him." See here, First, An instance of divine goodness, to be observed for our encouragement. Sometimes, when God removes one comfort from us, he raises another for us, perhaps better, or looks to the future, as here, where all the children which the church shall have after she has lost the other, Isa. 49. 20. Let none therefore reckon all gone with one cistern dried up, for from the same fountain, another may be filled. Secondly, An instance of filial duty, to be observed for our imitation. Christ has here taught children, to the utmost of their power, to provide for the comfort of their aged parents. When David was in distress, he took care of his parents, and found out a shelter for them; (1 Sam. 22. 3.) so the Son of David here. Children, at their death, according to their ability, should provide for their parents, if they survive them, and need their kindness.

(2.) The confidence he reposed in the beloved disciple. It is to him he says, Behold thy mother, I recommend her to thy care; be thou as a son to her to guide her, (Isa. 51. 18.) and forsake her not when she is old. Prov. 23. 22. Now, [1.] This was an honour put upon John, and a testimony both to his prudence and to his fidelity. If he, who knows all things, had not known that John loved him, he would not have made him his mother's guardian. It is a great honour to be employed for Christ, and to be trusted with the cares of his faithful. But, [2.] It would be a care and some charge to John; but he cheerfully accepted it, and took her to his own home, not objecting the trouble or expense, or his obligations to his own family, or the ill-will he might contract by it. Note, Those that truly love Christ, and are loved of him, will be glad of an opportunity to do any service to him, or his. Neh. 8. 12. John 19. 26, 27. Thus, that the Virgin Mary lived with John, for eleven years, and then died. Others, that she lived to remove with him to Ephesus.

IV. The fulfilling of the scripture, in the giving of him to drink. v. 28, 29. Observe, 1. How much respect Christ shewed to the scripture: (v. 28.) Knowing that all things hitherto were accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled; he said, 1. I thirst, that is, he called for drink.

(1.) It was not at all strange that he was thirsty; we find him thirsty in a journey, (ch. 4. 6, 7.) and now thirsty when he was just at his journey's end. Well might he thirst, after all the toil and hurry which he had undergone; and being now in the agonies of death, ready to expire purely by the loss of blood and extremity of pain. The termens of hell are represented by a violent thirst in the complaint of the rich man that begged for a drop of water to cool his tongue. To that everlasting thirst we have been condemned, had not Christ suffered for us.

(2.) But the reason of his complaining of it is somewhat surprising; it is the only word he spake, that looked like complaint of his outward sufferings. When they scourged him, and crowned him with thorns, he did not cry, O my head! or, My back! But now he cried, I thirst. For, [1.] He would thus express the travail of his soul, Isa. 53. 11. He thirsted after the shewing of God, and the accomplished prophecies of our redemption, and the happy issue of his undertaking. [2.] He would thus take care to see the scripture fulfilled. Hither-to, all had been accomplished, and he knew it; for this was the thing he had carefully observed all along; and now he called to mind one thing more, which this was the proper season for the performance of. By this it appears that he was the Messiah, in that not only the scripture was punctually fulfilled in him, but it was strictly eyed by him. By this it appears that God was with him of a truth—that in all he did, he went exactly according to the word of God, taking care not to destroy, but to fulfill, the law and the prophets.

Now, First, The scripture had foretold his thirst, and therefore he himself related it, because it could not be otherwise. He was saying, I thirst; it is here foretold that his tongue should cleave to his jaws, Ps. 22. 15.}/p. 5s. San Simon, an eminent type of Christ, when he was lying the Philistines heaves upon heaves, was himself sore thirsty; (Judg. 15. 18.) so was Christ, when he was upon the cross, spitting principalities and powers. Secondly, The scripture had foretold that in his thirst he should be given vinegar to drink, Ps. 69. 21. But he had given him vinegar to drink before they crucified him, (Matt. 27. 34.) but the prophecy was not exactly fulfilled in that, because that was not in his thirst; therefore now he said, I thirst, and called for it again; then he would not drink, but now he received it. Christ would rather court an affront than see any prophecy unfulfilled. This should satisfy us under all our trials, that the will of God is done, and the word of God accomplished.

2. See how little respect his persecutors showed to him; (v. 29.) There was set a vessel full of vinegar, probably, according to the custom at all executions of this nature; or, as others think, it was now set designedly for an abuse to Christ, instead of the cup of wine, which they used to give to them that were ready to perish; with that they filled a sponge, for they would not allow him a cup, and they put it upon his head, a heave-stick, and with that heaved it to his mouth; τῷ ἱππήλατῳ δὲ τούτῳ—stuck it round with hippéla; so it may be taken; or, as others, they mingled it with wine-water, and this they gave him to drink when he was thirsty; a drop of water would have cooled his tongue better than a draught of vinegar; yet this he submitted to for us; we had taken the sour grapes, and by his suffering we are saved; we have received all comforts and refreshments, therefore they were withheld from him; when heaven denied him a beam of light, earth denied him a drop of water, and put vinegar in the room of it.

V. The dying word whereby he breathed out his soul; (v. 30.) When he had received the vinegar, as much of it as he thought fit, he said, I am finished; and with that, bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. Other passages,

1. What he said, and we may suppose him to say it with triumph and exultation, τελεσθείη—It is finished, a comprehensive word, and a comfortable one.

(1.) It is finished, that is, the labour and anxiety of his persecutors had now done its worst; when he had received that last indignity in the vinegar they gave him, he said, This is the last; I am now going out of their reach, where the wicked cease from trampling.

(2.) It is finished, that is, the counsel and commandment of his Father concerning his sufferings were now fulfilled: it was a determinate counsel, and he took care to see every iota and tittle of it exactly answered, Acts 2. 25. He had said, when he entered upon his sufferings, Father, this will be done; and now he said with pleasure, It is done. It was his bread, and drink to finish his work, (ch. 4. 34.) and the meat and drink refreshed him, when they gave him gall and vinegar.

(3.) It is finished, that is, all the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, which pointed at the sufferings of the Messiah, were accomplished and answered. He speaks as if, now that they had given him the vinegar, he could not bethink himself of any word in the Old Testament that was to be fulfilled between him and his death, but it had its accomplishment; such as, his being sold for thirty pieces of silver, his hands were, feet being pierced, and his garments being divided; and now that this is done, It is finished.

(4.) It is finished, that is, the ceremonial law is abolished, and a period put to the obligation of it. The substance is confirmed, and all the shadows are done away. Just now the veil of the temple; if a part of partition is taken down, even the law of commandments, contained in ordinances, Eph. 2. 14. 15. The Mosaic economy is dissolved, to make way for a better hope.

(5.) It is finished, that is, sin is finished, and an end made of transgression, by the bringing in of an everlasting righteousness. It seems to refer to Dan. 9. 24. The Lamb of God was sacrificed to take away the sin of the world, and it is done, Heb. 9. 26.

(6.) It is finished, that is, his sufferings were now finished, both those of his soul, and those of his body; the storm is over, the worst is past; all his pains and agonies are at an end, and he is just going to paradise, entering upon the joy set before him. Let all that suffer for Christ and with Christ, comfort themselves with this, that yet a little while, and they also shall say, It is finished.

(7.) It is finished, that is, his life was now finished, he was just ready to breathe his last, and now he is no more in this world, ch. 17. 11. This is like that of blessed Paul, (2 Tim. 4. 7.) I have finished my course, my race is run, my glass is out, mene, mene—numbered and finished. This we must all come to shortly.

(8.) It is finished, that is, the work of man's redemption and salvation is now completed, at least the hardest part of the undertaking is over; a full satisfaction is made to the justice of God, a fatal blow given to the power of Satan, a fountain of grace opened, that shall ever flow, a foundation of peace and happiness laid, that shall never fail. Christ had now gone through with his work, and finished it, ch. 17. 4. For, as for God, his work is perfect; and when I began (saith he) I continued it, 2 Sam. 20. 21.

And as in the purchase, so in the application, of the redemption, he that has begun a good work, will perform it; the mystery of God shall be finished.

2. What he did; He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. He was voluntary in dying; for he was not only the sacrifice, but the priest and the offerer: and the animus officenti—the mind of the offerer; and all in all, the sacrifice. Christ showed his will in his sufferings; by the which will we are sanctified.

(1.) He gave up the ghost. His life was not forcibly extorted from him, but freely resigned. He had said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit; thereby expressing the intention of this act. I give up myself as a ransom for many; and, accordingly did he give up his spirit, paid down the price of pardon and life at his Father's hands. Father, glorify the name.

(2.) He bowed his head. They that were crucified, in dying stretched up their heads to gasp for breath, and did not drop their heads till they had breathed their last; but Christ, to shew himself active in dying, bowed his head first, composing himself, as it were, to fall asleep. God had laid upon him the majesty of all, putting them upon the head of every creature, and some think that by this bowing of his head he would intimate his sense of the weight upon him. See Ps. 38. 4.—50. 12. The bowing of his head shews his submission to his Father's will, and his obedience to death. He accommodated himself to his dying work, as Jacob, who gathered up his feet into the bed, and then yielded up the ghost.

31. The Jews therefore, because it was the preparation, that the bodies should not remain upon the cross on the sabbath-day, (for that sabbath-day was an high day, ) besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. 32. Then came the soldiers, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him. 33. But when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs: 34. But one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water. 35. And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe. 36. For these things were done, that the Scripture should be fulfilled. A bone of him shall not be broken. 37. And again another Scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced.

This passage concerning the piercing of Christ's side after his death, is recorded only by this evangelist.

1. Observe the superstition of the Jews which occasioned it; (v. 31.) Because it was the preparation for the sabbath, and that sabbath-day, because it fell in the passover-week, was a high day, that they might shew a veneration for the sabbath, they would not have the dead bodies to remain on the cross on the sabbath-day, but besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, which would be a certain, but cruel dispatch, and that then they might be buried out of sight.

Note here, 1. The esteem they would be thought to have for the approaching sabbath, because it was one of the days of unleavened bread, and (some reckon) the day of the offering of the first-fruits. Every sabbath-day is a holy day, and a good day, but this was a high day, a sabbath-high—a great day. Passover sabbaths are high days; sacrament-days, supper-days, communion-days, are high days, and there ought to be more than ordinary preparation for them, that these may be high days indeed to us, as the days of heaven.

2. The reproach which they reckoned it would be to that day, if the dead bodies should be left hanging upon the cross. Dead bodies were not to be left at any time; (Dent. 21. 23.) yet, in this case, the Jews would have left the Roman custom to take place, had it not been an extraordinary day; and many strangers from all parts being then at Jerusalem, it would have been an offence to them; nor could they well bear the sight of Christ's crucified body, for, unless their consciences were quite seared, the想到 that their rage was a little over, they would upbraid them.

3. Their petition to Pilate, that their bodies, now as good as dead, might be dispatched; not by strangling or beheading them, which would have been a compassionate hastening them out of their misery, like the coup de grace (as the French call it) to them that are broken upon the wheel, the stroke of death, which would carry them off in the most exquisite pain. Note, (1.) The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. (2.) The pretended sanctity of hypocrites is abominable. These Jews would be thought to bear a great regard to the sabbath, and yet had no regard to justice and righteousness; they made no conscience of bringing an innocent and excellent person to the cross, and yet scrupled letting a dead body hang upon the cross.

II. The dispatch of the two thieves that were crucified with him, v. 32. Pilate was still gratifying the Jews, and gave orders as they desired; and the soldiers came, hardened against all impressions of pity, and broke the legs of the two thieves, which, no doubt, extorted from them hideous outcries, and made them die according to the bloody disposition of the sabbath. Christ, Nerio, so as to feel themselves die. One of these thieves was more corrupt, and had [Christ an assurance that he should shortly be with him in paradise, and yet died in the same pain and misery that the other thief did; for all things come alike to all; many go to heaven, that have hands in their death, and die in the bitterness of their soul. The extremity of dying agonies is no obstruction to the living comforts that wait for holy souls on the other side death. Christ died, and went to paradise, but appointed a guard to convey him thither. This is the order of going to heaven—Christ, the first-fruits and forerunner, afterward they that are Christ's.

III. The trial that was made whether Christ was dead or no, and the putting of it out of doubt.

1. They supposed him to be dead, and therefore did not break his legs; v. 33. Observe here, (1.) That Jesus died less than persons crucified ordinarily did. The structure of his body, his hands, and feet, being extraordinarily fine and tender, was the sooner broken by pain; or, rather, it was to shew that he laid down his life of himself, and could die when he pleased, though his hands were nailed. Though he yielded to death, yet he was not conquered. (2.) That his enemies were satisfied he was really dead. The Jews, who stood by to see the execution effectually done, would not have omitted this piece of cruelty, if they had not been sure he was got out of the reach of it. (3.) Whatever devices are in men's hearts, the counsel of the Lord shall stand. It was fully destined to break his legs, but, God's counsel being otherwise, see how it was prevented.

2. Because they would be sure he was dead, they made such an experiment as would put it past dispute. That of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, aiming at his heart, and forthwith came there out blood and water; v. 34.

(1.) The soldier hereby designed to decide the question whether he was dead or no, and, by this honourable wound in his side, to supersede the ignominious method of dispatch they took with the other two. Tradition says that this soldier's name was Longinus, which signifies, he that, by the sight of his eyes, he was immediately cured of it, by some drops of blood that flowed out of Christ's side lighting on them: significant enough, if we had any good authority for the story.

(2.) But God had a further design herein, which was,
[1.] To give an evidence of the truth of his death, in order to the proof of his resurrection. If he was only in a trance or swoon, his resurrection was a sham; but, by this experiment, he was certainly dead, for this spear broke up the very fountains of life, and, according to the law and course of nature, it was impossible a human body should survive such a wound in the vitals, and such an evacuation thence.

[2.] To give an illustration of the design of his death. There was much of mystery in it, and its being so solemnly attested, (2.) intimates there was something miraculous in it, that the blood and water shone together, and separate for the same wound; however, that was very significant; this same apostle refers to it as a very considerable thing, 1 John 5. 6, 8.

First, The opening of his side was significant. When we protest our sincerity, we wish there were a window in our hearts, that the thoughts and intents of them might be visible to all. Through this window, opened in Christ's side, you may look into his heart, and see love flaming there, love strong as death; see our own names written there. Some make it an allusion to the opening of Adam's side in innocency. When Christ, the second Adam, was fallen into a deep sleep upon the cross, then was his side opened, and out of it was his church taken, which he espoused to himself. See Eph. 5. 30, 32. Our great poet, Mr. George Herbert, in his poem called The Rags, very affectingly brings in our Saviour, when his side was pierced, thus speaking to his disciples:

If ye have any thing to send, or write, (I have no bag, but here is room,) Unto my Father's hands and sight (Believe me) it shall safely come.

Then I shall mind what you impart,
Look, you may put it very near my heart;
Or if hereafter any of my friends
Will use me in this kind, the door Shall still be open; what he sends
I will present, and somewhat more,
Not to his hurt. Sighs will convey Any thing to me. Hark, Despair, away,
Secondly, The blood and water that flowed out of it were significant:

1. They signified the two great benefits which all believers partake of through Christ—justification and sanctification. This is the law and course of regeneration; blood for atonement, water for purification. Blood and water were used very much under the law. Guilt contracted must be expiated by blood; stains contracted must be done away by the water of purification. These two must always go together. Ye are sanctified, ye are justified, 1 Cor. 6. 11. Christ has joined them together, and we must not think to put them asunder. The gate from the pierced side of our Redeemer, To Christ crucified we owe both merit for our justification, and Spirit and grace for our sanctification; and we have as much need of the latter as of the former, 1 Cor. 1. 30.

2. They signify the two great ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, by which those benefits are represented, sealed, and applied to believers; they both owe their institution and efficacy to Christ. It is wet the water in the font that will be to us the washing of regeneration, but the water out of the side of Christ; not the blood of the grape that will pacify the conscience and refresh the soul, but the blood out of the side of Christ. Now was the rock smitten, (1 Cor. 10. 4.) now was the fountain opened, (Zech. 13. 1.) now were the wells of salvation digged, Isa. 12. 3. Here is the river, the streams where shall make glad the city of our God. IV. The atestation of the truth of this by an eyewitness, (v. 35.) the evangelist himself. Observe,

1. What a competent witness he was of the matters of fact. (1.) What he bare record of he saw; he had it not by hearsay, nor was it only his own conjecture, but he was an eye-witness of it; it is what we have seen and looked upon, (1 John 1. 1.) and, according to the perfect understanding of Luke 1. 3. (2.) What he saw he faithfully bare record of; as a faithful witness, he told not only the truth, but the whole truth; and did not only attest it by word of mouth, but left it upon record in writing, in perfectum veri memoriam—an unifying memorial. (3.) His record is undoubtedly true; for he wrote not only from his own personal knowledge and observation, but from the dictates of the Spirit of truth, that leads into all truth. (4.) He had himself a full assurance of the truth of what he wrote, and did not persuade others to believe that which he did not believe himself; he knows that he saith true. (5.) He therefore witnessed these things, that we might believe; he did not record them merely for his own satisfaction or the private use of his friends, but made them public to the world; not to please the curious or entertain the ingenuous, but to draw men to believe the gospel in order to their eternal welfare.

2. What care he shewed in this particular instance. That we may be well assured, both of the truth of Christ's death, he saw his heart's blood, his life's blood, let out; and also of the benefits that flow to us from his death, signified by the blood and water which come from his side. We here silence the fears of weak christians, and encourage their hopes, iniquity shall not be their ruin, for there came both water and blood out of Christ's pierced side, both to justify and sanctify them; and if you ask, How can we be sure of this? You may be sure, for he that saw it bare record.

V. The accomplishment of the scripture in all this; (v. 36.) that the scripture should be fulfilled, both in the Old Testament preserved, and the truth of the New Testament confirmed. Here are two instances of it together.

1. The scripture was fulfilled in the preserving of his legs from being broken; wherein that word was fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. (1.) There was a promise of this made indeed, to all the righteous, but principally pointing at Jesus Christ the righteous; (Ps. 34. 20.) He keepeth all his bones, none of them is broken. And David, in spirit, says, All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto thee? Ps. 35. 10.

(2.) There was a type of this in the paschal lamb, which seems to be especially referred to here, (Exod. 12. 46.) Neither shall ye break a bone thereof; and it is repeated, (Num. 9. 12.) Ye shall not break any bone of it; for which law the will of the law-maker is the reason, but the antitype must answer the type. Christ our passover is sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. 5. 7. He is the Lamb of God, (ch. 1. 59.) and, as the true passover, his bones were kept unbroken. This commandment was given concerning his bones, when dead, as of Joseph's, Hcb. 11. 22.

(3.) There was a significance in it; the strength of the body is in the bones. The Hebrew word for the bones signifies the strength, and therefore not a bone of Christ's body be broken, lest though he be crucified in weakness, his strength to save is not at all broken. Sin breaks our bones, it broke David's, (Ps. 51. 8.) but it did not break Christ's bones; he stood firm under the barthen, mighty to save.

2. The scripture was fulfilled in the piercing of his side; (v. 57.) They shall look on him whom they have pierced; so it is written, Zech. 12. 10. And there the same that pears out the spirit of grace, and can be no less than the God of the holy prophets, says, They shall look upon me, which is here applied to Christ. They shall look upon him. (1.) It is here implied that the Messiah shall be pierced; and here it had a more full accomplishment than in the piercing of his hands and feet; he was pierced by the Senate; by the Sanhedrim, as the inhabitants of Jerusalem, wounded in the house of his friends, as it follows, Zech. 13. 6. (2.) It is promised that when the Spirit is poured out, they shall look on him and mourn. This was in part fulfilled, when many of those that were his betrayers and murderers, were struck to the heart, and brought to believe in him; but as he would save the many, when all Israel shall be saved; and in wrath, when they who persisted in their iniquity, shall see him whom they have pierced, and wail because of him, Rev. 1. 7. But it is applicable to us all; we have all been guilty of piercing the Lord Jesus, and are all concerned with suitable affections to look on him.

38. And after this Joseph of Arimathea, being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews, besought Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus; and Pilate gave him leave. He came therefore, and took the body of Jesus. 39. And there came also Nicodemus, which at the first came to Jesus by night, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight. 40. Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. 41. Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid. 42. There laid they Jesus therefore because of the Jews’ preparation-day; for the sepulchre was nigh at hand.

We have here an account of the burial of the blessed body of our Lord Jesus. The solemn funerals of great men are looked at with curiosity; the mournful funerals of dear friends are attended with concern. Come and see an extraordinary funeral; never was the like! Come and see a burial that conquered the grave, and buried it, a burial that beautified the grave, and softened it for all believers! Let us turn aside now, and see this great sight.

Here is:

1. The body begged, v. 38. This was done by the interest of Joseph of Arimathea, or Arimathia, of whom no mention is made in all the New Testament story, but only in the narrative which each of the evangelists gives us of Christ’s burial, wherein he was chiefly concerned. Observe,

- The character of this Joseph. He was a disciple of Christ iniquitatem. He was a better friend to Christ than to himself, and would not be known to him. It was his honour that he was a disciple of Christ; and some such there were, that are themselves great men, and unavoidably linked with bad men; but it was his weakness that he was so secretly, when he should have confessed Christ before men, yea though he had lost his preference by it. Disciples should openly own themselves, yet Christ may have many that are his disciples secretly, though secretly, better secretly than not at all, especially if, like Joseph here, they grow stronger and stronger. Some who in lesser trials have been timorous, yet in greater have been very courageous; so Joseph here. He concealed his affection to Christ for fear of the Jews, lest they should put him out of the synagogue, at least out of the Sanhedrim, which all was they could do. To Pilate the governor he went boldly, and yet feared the Jews. The impotent malice of those that can but censure, and revile, and clamour, is sometimes more formidable even to wise and good men than one would think.

2. The part he bore in this affair. He, having by his place access to Pilate, desired leave of him to dispose of the body. His mother and dear relations have neither spirit nor interest to attempt such a thing. His disciples were gone; if nobody appear, the Jews or soldiers would bury him with the thieves; therefore God raised up this gentleman to interpose in it, that the scripture might be fulfilled, and the doctrine of the approaching resurrection maintained. Note, When God has work to do, he can find out such as are proper to do it, and spirit them for it. Observe it as an instance of the humiliation of Christ, that his dead body lay at the mercy of a heathen judge, and must be beggared before it could be buried; and also that Joseph would not take the body of Christ till he had asked and obtained leave of the governor; for in these things wherein the power of the magistrate is concerned, we must ever pay a deference to that power, and peaceably submit to it.

11. The embalming prepared, v. 39. This was done by Nicodemus, another person of quality, and in a public post. He brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, which, some think, were bitter ingredients, to embalm the body, others fragrant ones, to perfume it. Here is:

- The character of Nicodemus, which is much the same with that of Joseph; he was a secret friend to Christ, though not his constant follower. He at first came to Jesus by night, but now owned him publicly, as before, ch. 7. 50, 51. That grace which at first is like a bruised reed, may afterward become like a strong staff; and the trembling lamb become a lion. See Rom. 14. 4. It is a wonder that Joseph and Nicodemus, men of such interest, did not appear sooner, and solicit Pilate not to condemn Christ, especially seeing him so loath to do it. Begging his life would have been a nobler piece of service than begging his body. But Christ would have none of his friends to endeavour to prevent his death when his hour was come. While his persecutors were forwarding the accomplishment of the scriptures, his followers must not obstruct it.

2. The kindness of Nicodemus, which was considerable, though of a different nature. Joseph served Christ with his interest, Nicodemus with his purse. Probably, they agreed it between them, that while one was procuring the grant, the other should be preparing the spices; and that for expedition, because they were straitened in time. But why did they make this ado about Christ’s dead body?

(1) Some think we may see in it the weakness of their faith. A firm belief of the resurrection of Christ the third day, would have saved them this care and cost, and have been more acceptable than all spices; and he who is a friend to Christ is a friend to his friends, is a long home, need to be clad accordingly; but what need of such furniture of the grave for one that, like a way-faring man, did but turn aside into it, to tarry for a night or two?

(2) However, we may plainly see in it the strength of their love. Hereby they shewed the value they had for his person and doctrine, and that he was not possessed of the reproach of the cross. They that had been so industrious to profane his crown, and lay his honour in the dust, may already see that they imagine a vain thing; for as God had done him honour in his sufferings, so did men too, even great men. They shewed not only the charitableness of committing his body to the earth, but the honourable respect shewed to great men. This they might do, and yet believe and look for his resurrection; nay, this they might do the more and the more. For since God designed honour for this body, they would put honour upon it. However, we must do our duty according as the present day and opportunity are, and leave it to God to fulfil his promises in his own time and thing. This is our constant duty. Those of us that have bodies must think of them. There is neither the garden nor the sepulchre; and this we ought to remember, as we are both to aim to the midst of our pleasure.

II. The body got ready, v. 40. They took it into a some house adjoining, and, having washed it from blood and dust, wound it in linen clothes very decently, with the spices melted down, it is likely, into an ointment, as the manner of the Jews is to bury, or to embalm, (so Dr. Hammond,) as we near dead bodies.

Here was care taken of Christ's body; it was "wound in linen clothes." Among other clothing that belongs to us, Christ put on even the "grave-clothes," to make them easy to us, and to enable us to call them our "wedding-clothes." They wound the body with the spices, for all his garments, his grave-clothes not excepted, smell of myrrh and aloes, (the spices here mentioned,) out of the "wax vessels"; (Ps. 44.8.) and an ivory palace the sepulchre hewn out of a rock, to Christ. Dead bodies and graves are unsound and offensive; hence sin is compared to a body of death and an open sepulchre; but Christ's sacrifice, being to God as a sweet-smelling savour, hath taken away our pollution. No ointment or firm can rejoice the heart, so the grave of our Redeemer does, where there is faith to conceive the fragrant odours of it.

God, in bringing to this example, we ought to have regard to the dead bodies of Christians; not to enshrine and adore their relics, no not those of the most eminent saints and martyrs, (nothing like that was done to the dead body of Christ himself,) but carefully to deposit them, the dust in the dust, as those who believe the dead bodies of the saints are still united to Christ, and designed for glory and immortality at the last day. The resurrection of the saints will be in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and therefore in burying them we should have an eye to Christ's burial, for he, being dead, thus spaketh,

"They dead men shall live, Isa. 26.19." In burying our dead, it is not necessary, that in all circumstances we imitate the burial of Christ, as if we must be buried in linen, and in a garden, and be embalmed as he was; but he being buried after the manner of the Jews, it is enough that we bury as near the nature we should conform to the usages of the country where we live, except in those that are superstitions.

IV. The grave pitched upon in a garden which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, very near the place where he was crucified. There was a sepulchre, or vault, prepared for the first occasion, but not used, v. 39. Observe, v. 41. This Christ was buried without the city, for thus the manner of the Jews was to bury, not in their cities, much less in their synagogues, which some have thought better than our way of burying; yet there was then a peculiar reason for it, which does not hold now, because the touching of a grave contracted a ceremonial pollution; but now that the resurrection of Christ has altered the property of the grave, and the power which it has to pollute, it is a dead body, which was in a dead body, is incapable of a good improvement, to have the congregation of the dead in the church yard, encompassing the congregation of the living in the church, since they also are dying, and in the midst of life we are in death. Those that would not superstition, but by faith, visit the holy sepulchre, must go forth out of the midst of this world, v. 42.

2. The Sepulchre described in a garden, Observe, [1.] That Joseph had his sepulchre in his garden; so he criticised it, that it might be a memorandum, to himself while living; when he was taking the pleasure of his garden, and reaping the products of it, let him think of dying, and be quickened to prepare for it. The garden is a proper place for meditation, and a sepulchre there may furnish us with a proper object for meditation, and such a view of it, as we are both to aim at and think of in the midst of our pleasure. [2.] To his heirs and successors when he was gone. It is good to acquaint ourselves with the place of our father's sepulchres; and perhaps we might make our own less formidable, if we made their's more familiar.

(2.) That in a sepulchre in a garden Christ's body was laid. In the garden of Eden, death and corruption first began; and in the garden they are conquered, disarmed, and triumphed over. In a garden Christ began his passion, and from a garden he would rise, and begin his exaltation. Christ fell to the ground as a corn of wheat, (ch. 12.24.) and therefore was sown in a garden among the seeds, for his death is as the dew of herbs, Isa. 26.19. He is the fountain of gardens, Cant. 4.15.

3. That he was buried in a new sepulchre. This was so ordered, (1.) For the honour of Christ; he was not a common person, and therefore must not mix with common dust. He that was born from a virgin-womb, must rise from a virgin-tomb. (2.) For the confirming of the truth of his resurrection; that it might not be suggested that it was not he, but some other that those men, who had so many of Christ's respects, that he rose by the power of some other, as the man that was raised by the touch of Elisha's bones, and not by his own power. He that has made all things new, has made the grave for us.

V. The funeral solemnized; (v. 42.) There laid they Jesus, that is, the dead body of Jesus. Some think the calling of that Jesus, intimates the inseparable relation between the dead body and the sepulchre. Even this dead body was Jesus—a Saskhoun, for his death is our life; Jesus is still the same, Heb.13.8. There they laid him because it was the preparation day.

1. Observe here the deference which the Jews paid to the sabbath, and to the day of preparation. Before the passover-sabbath they had a solemn day of preparation. This day had been kept by the chief priests and scribes, because the sabbath-day was well kept by the disciples of Christ, who were branded as dangerous to the church; and it is often so. (1.) They would not put off the funeral till the sabbath-day, because the sabbath is to be a day of holy rest and joy, with which the business and sorrow of a funeral do not well agree. (2.) They would not drive it too late on the day of preparation for the sabbath. What is to be done on the evening before the sabbath, should be so contrived, that it may neither intrude upon sabbath-time, nor indispose us for sabbath-work.

2. Observe the convenience they took of an adjoining sepulchre; the sepulchre they made use of, was nigh at hand. Perhaps, if they had had time, they would have carried him to Bethany, and buried him among his friends there. And I am sure he had more right to be there, and to have been buried in the chief of the sepulchres of the sons of David than any of the kings of Judah had; but it was so ordered, that he should lie had in a sepulchre nigh at hand. (1.) Because he was to lie there but a while, as in an inn, and therefore he took the first that offered itself. (2.) Because this was a new sepulchre. They that prepared it, little thought who should handle it; but the wisdom of God has reaches infinitely beyond ours, and makes what use he pleases of us and all we have. (3.) We are hereby taught not to be over-curios in the place of our burial. Where the tree falls, why should it not lie? For Christ was buried in the sepulchre that was next at hand. It was in the promise of Cainan, that directed the patriarchs to be carried thither for a burying-place; but now that that promise is superseded by a better, that care is over.

This without pomp or solemnity is the body of Jesus laid in the cold and silent grave. Here lies our Saviour undisturbed for our debts, till if he be released, his discharge will be our's. Here is the sum of righteousness set for a while, to rise again in greater glory, and set no more. Here lies a seeming captive to death, but a real conqueror over death; for here lies death itself shorn, and the grave conquered. Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory.

CHAP. XX.

This evangelist, though he began not his gospel as the rest did, yet concludes it as they did, with the history of Christ's resurrection; not of the thing itself, for none of them describe how he rose, but of the proofs and evidences of it, which demonstrate that he was risen. The proofs of Christ's resurrection, which we have in this chapter, are

1. Such as occurred immediately at the sepulchre. 1. The sepulchre found empty, and the grave-clothes in good order, v. 11, 12. 2. Two angels appearing to Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre, v. 11, 13. 3. Christ himself appearing to her, v. 14, 16. II. Such as occurred afterward at the meetings of the apostles. 1. At one, the same day at evening that Christ rose; when Thomas was absent, v. 19, 25. 2. At another, that day seven-night, when Thomas was with them, v. 26, 31. What is related here, is mostly what was omitted by the other evangelists.

1. The first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulchre.

2. Then she runneth, and cometh to Simon Peter, and to the other disciple, whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him. 3. Peter therefore went forth, and that other disciple, and came to the sepulchre. 4. So they ran both together: and the other disciple did out-run Peter, and came first to the sepulchre. 5. And he stooping down, and looking in, saw the linen clothes lying; yet went he not in. 6. Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and seeth the linen clothes lie, 7. And the napkin, that was about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wrapped together in a place by itself. 8. Then went in also that other disciple, which came first to the sepulchre, and he saw, and believed. 9. For as yet they knew not the Scripture, that he must rise again from the dead. 10. Then the disciples went away again unto their own home.

There was no one thing which the apostles were more concerned to produce substantial proof of, than the resurrection of their Master. 1. Because that was it which he himself had appealed to as the last and most cogent proof of his being the Messiah. They that would not believe other signs were referred to this sign of the prophet Jonas. And therefore his enemies were most solicitous to stifle the notice of this, because it was put on this issue; and if he be risen, they are not only murderers, but murderers of the Messiah. 2. Because this was that upon which the performance of his undertaking for our redemption and salvation did depend. If he give his life a ransom, and do not resume it, it does not appear that his giving of it was accepted as a satisfaction. If he be imprisoned for our debt, and lie by it, we are undone, 1 Cor. 15. 17. 3. Because he never shewed himself to any other besides Peter and John, nor to the disciples, Acts 10, 40, 41. We should have said, 'Let his ignominious death be private, and his glorious resurrection public.' But God's thoughts are not as our's; and he ordered it that his death should be public before the sun, by the same token that he blushed and hid his face upon it. But the demonstrations of his resurrection should be reserved as a favour for his particular friends, and by the result published to the world, that they might be blessed, who have not seen, and yet have believed. The method of proof is such as gives abundant satisfaction to those who are piously disposed to receive the doctrine and law of Christ, and yet leaves room for those to object, who are willingly ignorant and obstinate in their unbelief. And this is a fair trial, suited to the nature of the case, and the object.

In these verses, we have the first step toward the proof of Christ's resurrection, which is, that the sepulchre was found empty. He is not here, and if so, they must tell us where he is, or we conclude him risen.

1. Mary Magdalene, coming to the sepulchre, finds the stone taken away. This evangelist does not mention to any of the other women that went with Mary Magdalene, but her only, because she was the most active and forward in this visit to the sepulchre, and in her appeared the most affection; and, 1. It was an affection kindled by a good cause, in consideration of the great things Christ had done for her. Much was forgiven her, therefore she loved much. 2. She had shewed her affection to him while he lived, attended his doctrine, ministered to him of her substance, Luke 8, 2, 3. It does not appear that she had any business now at Jerusalem, but to wait upon him, for the women were not bound to go up to the feast; and, probably, she and others now followed him the closer, as Elisha did Elijah, now that they knew their master should shortly be taken from their head, 2 Kings 2, 1, 2. 3. The continued instance of his affection to her, at a most critical time, to prove the sincerity of her love. Note, Love to Christ, if it be cordial, will be constant. Her love to Christ was strong as death, the death of the cross, for it stood by that; cruel as the grave, for it made a visit to that, and was not deterred by its terrors.

1. She came to the sepulchre, to wash the dead body with her tears, for she went to the grave, to meet there the risen, and anoint the body, as she had prepared. The grave is a house that people do not care for making visits to. They that are free among the dead, are separated from the living; and it must be an extraordinary affection to the person, which will endure his grave to us. It is especially frightful to the weak and timorous soul. Could she, that had not strength enough to roll away the stone, prove so ready to meet the risen, even in the grave? The Jews' religion forbade them to meddle any more than needs must with graves and dead bodies. In visiting Christ's sepulchre she exposed herself, and perhaps the disciples, to the suspicion of a design to steal him away; and what real service could she do him by it? But her love answers these and a thousand such objections. Note, [1.] Most of all, it is for Christ's sake; in those things wherein yet we cannot be profitable to him. [2.] Love to Christ will take off the terror of death and the grave. If we cannot come to Christ but through that darksome valley, even in that, if I love him, we will fear no evil.

2. She came as soon as she could, for she came, [1] upon the first day of the week, as soon as ever the sabbath was gone, having not got to tell even, to set forth where, (as Amos 8. 5.) but to be at the sepulchre. The Lord that love Christ, will take the first opportunity of testifying their respect to him. This was the first christian sabbath, and she begins it preceded by inquiries after Christ. She had spent the day before in commemorating the work of creation; and therefore rested; but now she is upon search into the work of redemption, and therefore makes a visit to Christ, and him crucified.

Secondly, she sets herself early in the morning when it was yet dark. Some early did she set out. Note, Those who would seek Christ, so as to find him, must seek him early; First, Seek him soberly, with such a care as even breaks the sleep; be up early for fear of missing him. Secondly, seek him industriously; we must deny ourselves, and our own repose in pursuit of Christ. Thirdly, seek him betimes, early in our days, early every day. My voice shall thou hear in the morning. This day is a fair way to be well ended, that is thus begun. They that diligently inquire after Christ while it is yet dark, shall have such light given them concerning him as shall shine more and more.

3. She found the stone taken away, which she had seen rolled to the door of the sepulchre. Now this was,

[2.] a surprise to her, for she little expected it. Christ crucified is the fountain of life, his grace one of the wells of salvation, if we come to it in faith, though to a carnal heart it be a spring shut up; we shall find the stone rolled away, (as Gen. 29. 10.) and free access to the comforts of it. Surprising comforts are the frequent encouragements of early seekers.

[3.] It was the beginning of a glorious discovery; the Lord was risen, though she did not at first apprehend it so. Note, First, They that are most constant in their adherence to Christ, and most diligent in their inquiries after him, have commonly the first, and sweetest notices of the divine grace. Mary Magdalene, who followed Christ to the last of his humiliation, met him with the first in his exaltation. Secondly, God ordinarily reveals himself and his grace, to us by degrees; to raise our expectations and quicken our inquiries.

II. Finding the stone taken away, she hastens back to Peter and John, who, probably, lodged together at that end of the town, not far off, and acquaints them with it; They have taken the Lord out of the sepulchre, enring him the honour of such a decent burying place, and we know not where they have laid him, nor where to find him, that we may give him the remainder of our last respects. Observe here,

1. What a notion Mary had of the thing as it now appeared; she found the stone gone, looked into the grave, and saw it empty. Now one would expect that the first thought that offered itself, should have been, Surely the Lord is risen; for whenever he had told them that he should be crucified, such did she now hardly believe it. She was so sensible of his suffering, and of the same breath, that the third day he should rise again. Could she feel the great earthquake that happened as she was coming to the sepulchre, or getting ready to come, and see the grave empty, and yet have no thought of the resurrection enter into her mind; what, no conjecture, no suspicion? So it seems by the construction she puts upon the case. The view of the stone, which was very far fetched. Note, When we come to reflect upon our own conduct in a cloudy and dark day, we shall stand amazed at our dullness and forgetfulness, that we could miss of such thoughts, as afterward appear obvious, and how they could be so far out of the way, when we had occasion for them. She succeeded. They have taken away the Lord; either the chief priests have taken him away, to put him in a more private place, or Joseph and Nicodemus have, upon second thoughts, taken him away, to avoid the ill-will of the Jews. Wherever her suspicion, it seems, was, it was not vexation and disturbance to her, that the body was gone; whereas, if she had understood it rightly, nothing could be more happy. Note, Weak believers often make that the matter of their complaint, which is really just ground of hope, and matter of joy. We cry out into this, and the other enemies of the kingdom of Christ, as if they were the chief instruments of our trouble, and the way how to retrieve them, when indeed the removal of our temporal comforts, which we lament, is in order to the resurrection of our spiritual comforts, which we should rejoice in too.

2. What a narrative she made of it to Peter and John. She did not stand poring over the grief herself, but acquaints her friends with it. Note, The communication of sorrows is one good improvement of the communion of saints. Observe, Peter, though he had denied his Master, had not deserted his Master's friends; by this appears the sincerity of his repentance, that he associated with the disciple whom Jesus loved. And the disciples keeping up their intimacy with him as formerly, notwithstanding his fall, teaches us to restore those with a spirit of meekness, that have been faulty. It God has delivered them upon their repentance, why should we not?

III. Peter and John go with all speed to the sepulchre, to satisfy themselves of the truth of what was told them, and to see if they could make any further discoveries. v. 3, 4. Some think that the other disciples were with Peter and John when the news came; for they told these things to the eleven, Luke 24. 9. Others think that Mary Magdalene told her story only to Peter and John, and that the other women told their's to the other disciples; yet none of them went to the sepulchre but Peter and John, who were two of the first three of Christ's disciples, often distinguished from the rest by special favours. Note, It is well when those that are more honoured than others with the privileges of disciples, are more active than others in the duty of disciples, more willing to take pains, and run hazards in a good work.

1. See here what use we should make of the experience and observations of others. When Mary told them what she had seen, they would not in this sense take her word, but would go and see with their own eyes. Do others tell us of the comfort and benefit of ordinances? Let us be engaged thereby to make trial of them. Come and see how good it is to turn near to God.

2. See how ready we should be to share with our friends in their cares and fears. Peter and John hasten to the sepulchre, that they might be able to give Mary a satisfactory answer to her jealousies. We should not grudge any pains we take for the succouring and comforting of the weak and timorous followers of Christ. See what haste we should make in a good work, and when we are going on a good errand. Peter and John consulted neither their ease nor their vanity, but ran to the sepulchre, that they might shew the strength of their god and affection, and much lose no time. If we are in the way of God's commandments, we should run that way.

3. See what a good thing it is to have good company in one's work. We can hardly imagine but that many of those disciples would have ventured to the sepulchre alone, but being both together, they made no difficulty of it. See Exe. 4. 9.

ST. JOHN, XX.

5. See what a haleful emulation it is among disciples to strive which shall excel, which shall exceed, in that which is good. It was no breach of all manners for John, though the younger, to out-run Peter, and get before him. We must do our best, and try the very those that can do better, nor despise those that do as they can, though they come behind.

(1.) He that got foremost in this race, was the disciple whom Jesus loved in a special manner, and who therefore in a special manner loved Jesus. Note, Sense of Christ's love to us, kindling love in us to him again, will make us excel in virtue. The battle of Christ will constrain us more than anything to abound in duty.

(2.) He that was east behind, was Peter, who had denied his Master, and was in sorrow and shame for it, and this clogged him as a weight; sense of guilt cramps us, and hinders our enlargements in the service of God. When conscience is offended, we lose ground.

IV. Peter and John being come to the sepulchre, prosecute the inquiry, yet improv'd little in the discovery.

1. John went no further than Mary Magdalene had done.

(1.) He had the curiosity to look into the sepulchre, and saw it empty. He stooped down, and looked in. Those that would find the knowledge of Christ, must stoop down, and look in, must with an humble heart, and a heart prepared, run to the authority of divine revelation; and must look wisely.

(2.) Yet he had not courage to go into the sepulchre. The warmest affections are not always accompanied with the boldest resolutions; many are swift to run religion's race, but are not stout to fight her battles. Peter, though he came last, went in first, and made a more exact discovery than John had, v. 6.

2. Though John out-run him, he did not therefore turn back, or stand still, but made after him as fast as he could; and while John was with a deal of caution looking in, he came, and with a deal of courage went into the sepulchre.

(1.) Observe here the boldness of Peter, and how God dispenses his gifts variously. John could out-run Peter, but Peter could out-dare John. It is seldom true of the same persons, what David says politically of Saul and Jonathan, that they were swifter than eagles, and yet stronger than lions, 2 Sam. 1. 27. Some disciples are quick, and they are useful to quicken them that are slow; others are bold, and they are useful to hearten them that are timorous; diversely gifted, but one Spirit.

Peter's venturing into the sepulchre may teach us.

[1.] That those who in good earnest seek after Christ, must not frighten themselves with bugbears and foolish fancies: There is a lion in the way, a ghost in the grave.

[2.] That good christians need not be afraid of the grave, since Christ has him in it: for to them there is nothing in it frightful; it is not the pit of destruction, nor the snare of a never-dying worm. Let us therefore not indulge, but consider the fear we are apt to conceive upon the sight of a dead body, or being alone among the graves; and, since we must be dead and in the grave shortly, let us make death and the grave familiar to us, as near kindred.

[3.] We must be willing to go through the grave to Christ; that is, if we love him, and our affections are to him indissolubly united, we cannot see God's face and live, better die than never see it. See Job 19. 25, &c.

(2.) Observe the posture he found things in, in the sepulchre.

[1.] Christ had left his grave-clothes behind him there; what clothes he appeared in to his disciples we are not told, but he never appeared in his grave clothes, as ghosts are supposed to do; no, he laid them aside. First, because he rose to die no more, death was to have no more dominion over him, Rom. 6. 9. Lazarus came out with his grave-clothes on, for he was to use them again; but Christ, rising to an immortal life, came out free from those incumbrances. Secondly, because he was going to be clothed with the robes of glory, therefore he laid aside these rags; in the heavenly paradise there will be no more occasion for clothes than there was in the earthly. The ascending prophet dropped his mantle. Thirdly, When we rise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, we must leave our grave-clothes behind us. Robbers of tombs have been known to take away the clothes, and leave the body; but none ever took away the body, and left the clothes; especially when it was fine linen and new, Mark 15. 46. Any one would rather choose to carry a dead body in its clothes, than naked. Or, if they that were supposed to have stolen it, would have left the grave-clothes behind, yet it is more probable they should find leisure to fold up the linen.

(3.) See how Peter's boldness encouraged John; now he took heart, and ventured in; (v. 8.) and he saw and believed; not barely believed what Mary said, that the body was gone; (no thanks to him to believe what he saw;) but he began to believe that Jesus was risen to life again, though his faith, as you saw, was small and wavering. Peter could not have been in the sepulchre if Peter had not gone in first. Note, It is good to be imbued with a great work by the boldness of others. The dread of difficulty and danger will be taken off by observing the resolution and courage of others. Perhaps John's quickness had made Peter run faster, and now Peter's boldness makes John venture further, than otherwise either the one or the other would have done; though Peter had lately fallen under the disgrace of being a deserter, and John had been advanced to the honour of a confident, (Christ having committed his mother to him,) yet John not only associated with Peter, but thought it no disparagement to follow him.

[2.] Yet, it should seem, John got the start of Peter in believing. Peter saw and wondered, (Luke 24. 12.) but John saw and believed. A mind disposed to contemplate, may perhaps sooner receive the evidence of divine truth than a mind disposed to action.

But what was the reason that they were so slow of heart to believe? The evangelist tells us, (v. 9.) that Peter went not into the sepulchre, and therefore not to consider, and apply, and duly improve, what they knew of the scriptures, that he must rise again from the dead. The Old Testament speaks of the resurrection of the Messiah; they believe him to be the Messiah; he himself had often told them that, according to the scriptures of the Old Testament, he should rise again; but they had not presence of mind so to set down the two, to explain the present appearances. Observe here.

First, How unapt the disciples themselves were, at first, to believe the resurrection of Christ, which confirms the testimony they afterward gave with so much assurance concerning it: for by their backwardness to believe it, it appears that they were not.

Mr. Henry would not express himself thus, were we now living.—Ed.
credulous concerning it, nor of those simple ones that believe every word. If they had had any design to advance their own interest by it, they would greedily have caught at the first spark of its evidence, would have raised and supported one another's expectations of it, and have prepared the minds of those that followed them to receive the notices of it; but we find, on the contrary, that their hopes were frustrated, it was to them as a strange thing, and one of the fourest things from their thoughts. Peter and John were so shy of believing at first, that nothing less than the most convincing proof the thing was capable of, could bring them to testify it afterward with so much assurance. Hereby it appears that they were not only honest men, who would not deceive others, but cautious men, who would not themselves be imposed upon.

Secondly, What was the reason of their slowness to believe; because as yet they knew not the scripture. This seems to be the evangelist's acknowledgment of his own fault among the rest; he does not say, "For as yet Jesus had not appeared to them, had not shewed them his hands and his side," but, "As yet he had not opened their understandings to understand the scriptures." (Luke 24. 44, 45.)

2. Peter and John pursued their inquiry no further, but desisted, hovering between faith and unbelief (v. 10.). The disciples went away, not much the wiser, to their own home, to their own friends and companions, the rest of the disciples; to their own lodgings, for homes they had none at Jerusalem. They went away.

(1.) For fear of being taken up upon suspicion of a design to steal away the body, or of being charged with it now that it was gone; instead of improving their faith, their care is to secure themselves, to shift for their own safety. In difficult dangerous times, it is hard even for good men to go on in their work with the resolution that becomes them.

(2.) Because they were at a loss, and knew not what to do next, nor what to make of what they had seen; and therefore, not having courage to stay at the grave, they resolve to go home, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto them; which is an instance of their weakness as yet.

(3.) It is probable that the rest of the disciples were together; to them they return, to make report of what they had discovered, and to consult with them what was to be done; and, probably, now they agreed in their meeting in the evening, when Christ came to them.

It is observable that before Peter and John came to the sepulchre, an angel had appeared there, rolled away the stone, frightened the guard, and comforted the women; as soon as they were gone from the sepulchre, Mary Magdalene here sees two angels in the sepulchre, (v. 12.) and yet Peter and John come to the sepulchre, and go into it, and see none; what should they think of this? When was it, think you, when Peter and John were at the sepulchre, who appeared there before and after? [1.] Angels appear and disappear at pleasure, according to the orders and instructions given them. They may be, and are really, where they are not visibly; nay, it should seem, may be visible to one, and not to another, at the same time, 2 Kings 6. 17. Num. 22. 23. God is so ready, so able, so willing to make themselves visible, then invisible, and then visible again, if it be proper for us to inquire; but that they do so is plain from this story. [2.] This favour was shown to these who were early and constant in their inquiries after Christ, and was the reward of them that came first, and stood last, but denied to them that made a transient visit. [3.] The apostles were not to receive their instructions from the angels, but from the Spirit of grace. See Heb. 2. 5.

11. But Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping; and as she wept, she stooped down, and looked into the sepulchre. 12. And seeth two angels in white sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain. 13. And they say unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She saith unto them, Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. 14. And when she had said this, she turned herself back, and saw Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus. 15. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou? She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. 16. Jesus saith unto her, Mary. She turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni; which is to say, Master. 17. Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father; but go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father, and your Father; and to my God, and your God. 18. Mary Magdalene came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her.

St. Mark tells us, that Christ appeared first to Mary Magdalene; (Mark 16. 9.) that appearance is here largely related; and we may observe,

The constancy and fervency of Mary Magdalene's affection to the Lord Jesus, v. 11.

1. She stood at the sepulchre, when Peter and John were gone, because there her Master had lain, and there she was likeliest to hear some tidings of him. Note, (1.) Where there is a true love to Christ, there will be a constant adherence to him, and a resolution with purpose of heart to cleave to him. This good woman, though she has lost him, yet rather than seem to desert him, will abide by his grave for his sake, and continue in his love, even when she wants the comfort of it. (2.) Where there is a true desire of acquaintance with Christ, there will be a constant attendance on the means of knowledge. See Hos. 6. 2, 3. The third day, he will raise us up; and then shall we know the meaning of that resurrection, if we follow on to know, as Mary here.

2. She stood there weeping, and these tears loudly spake her affection to her Master. They that have lost Christ, have cause to weep; she wept at the remembrance of his bitter sufferings; wept for his death, and the loss which she and her friends and the country sustained by it; wept to think of returning home without him; wept because she did not now find his body. They that seek Christ, must weep for him, (Luke 2. 48.) must weep, not for him, but for themselves.

3. As she wept, she looked into the sepulchre, that her eye might affect her affection. When we are in search of something we have lost, we look again and again in the place where we last left it, and expected to have found it; she will look nevemore times, not knowing but that at length she might see some encouragement. Note, (1.) We must not hinder seeking. Though she wept, she stooped down, and locked in. (2.) Those are likely to seek and find, the seek with affection, that seek in tears.

11. The vision she had of two angels in the sepulcher, is here.

1. The description of the persons she saw. They were two angels in white, sitting, (probably, on some benches or ledges hewn out in the rock,) one at the head, and the other at the feet, of the grave. Here we have,

(1.) Their nature: they were angels, messengers from heaven sent on purpose, on this great occasion, [1.] To honour the Son, and to grace the solemnity of his resurrection. Now that the Son of God was again to be brought into the world, the angels have a charge to attend him, as they did at his birth, Heb. 1. 6. [2.] To comfort the saints; to speak good words to them that were in sorrow, and, by giving them notice that the Lord was risen, to prepare them for the sight of him.

(2.) Their number; two, not a multitude of the heavenly host, to sing praise, only two, to bear witness; for out of the mouth of two witnesses this word would be established.

(3.) Their array; they were in white; denoting,

[1.] Their purity and holiness. The best of men, standing before the angels, and compared with them, are as filthy rags (Isa. 6. 5.); but angels are spotless; and glorified saints, when they come to be as the angels, shall walk with Christ in white. [2.] Their glory, and glorying, upon this occasion. The white in which they appeared, represented the brightness of that state into which Christ was now risen.

(4.) Their posture and place. They sat, as it were, reposing themselves in Christ's grave; for angels, though they needed not a restoration, were obliged to Christ for their establishment. These angels went into the grave, to teach us not to be afraid of it, nor to think that our resting in it awhile, will be any prejudice to our immortality; no, matters are so ordered, that the grave is not much out of our way to heaven. It intimates likewise that angels are to be employed about the saints, not only at their death, to carry their souls into Abraham's bosom, but at the great day, to raise their bodies, Matt. 24. 31. These angelic guards, (and angels are called watchers, Dan. 4. 23.) keeping possession of the sepulcher, where they had frightened away the guards which the enemies had set, represents Christ's power; and the power of darkness, routs and defeating them. These Michael and his angels are more than conquerors. Their sitting to face one another, one at his head's head, the other at his head's feet, denotes their care of the entire body of Christ, his mystical as well as his natural body, from head to foot; it may also remind us of the two cherubims placed one at either end of the mercy-seat, Exod. 25. 18. Christ crucified was the great propitiation, when the head and feet of which were these two cherubims, not with flaming swords, to keep us from, but welcome messengers, to direct us to the way of life.

2. Their compassionate inquiry into the cause of Mary Magdalene's grief: (v. 13.) Woman, why weepest thou? This question was, (1.) A rebuke to her, for grieving on. Whencepest thou, when he had cause to rejoice? Many of the floods of her tears would dry away before such a search as this into the fountain of them. Why art thou cast down? (2.) It was designed to show how much angels are concerned at the grief of the saints, having a charge to minister to them for their comfort. Christians should thus sympathize with one another. (3.) It was designed also to make an occasion of informing her of that which would turn her mourning into rejoicing, would put off her sackcloth, and gird her with gladness.

3. The melancholy account she gives them of her present distress; Because they have taken away the blessed body I came to embalm, and I know not where they have laid it, v. 2. In it we may see,

(1.) The weakness of her faith. If she had had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, this mournful would have been removed; but we often perplex ourselves needlessly with imaginary difficulties, which faith would discover to us as real advantages. And yet this people build their hopes on the darkness and darkness they are under, which are the necessary methods of grace for the humbling of their souls, the mortifying of their sins, and the endearing of Christ to them.

(2.) The strength of her love. They that have a true affection for Christ, cannot but be in great affliction when they have lost either the comfortable tokens of his love in their souls, or the comfortable opportunities of conversing with him, and doing him honour, in his ordinances. Mary Magdalene is not diverted from her inquiries by the surprise of the vision, nor satisfied with the honour of it; but she harps upon the same string; They have taken away my Lord. A sight of angels and their smiles, will not suffice without a sight of Christ, and Mary was so much in Mary's, 2. 19. sight of angels that she sought an opportunity of pursuing her inquiries after Christ. All creatures, the most excellent, the most dear, should be used as means, and but as means, to bring us into acquaintance with God in Christ. The angels asked her, Why weepest thou? I have cause enough to weep, says she, for they have taken away my Lord, and, like Mary, What have I more? Do you ask, Mary? I weep? My beloved has withdrawn himself, and is gone. Note, None know, but they that have experienced, the sorrows of a deserted soul, that has had comfortable evidences of the love of God in Christ, and hopes of heaven, but has now lost them, and walks in darkness; such a wounded spirit who can bear?

111. Christ's appearing to her while she was talking with the angels, and telling them her case; before they had given her any answer, Christ steps in himself, to satisfy her inquiries, for God now speaketh to us by his Son; none but he himself can direct us to himself. Mary would fain know where her Lord is, and behold, he is at her right hand. Note, 1. Those that will be content with nothing short of a sight of Christ, shall be put off with nothing less. 2. The poor soul is not to be usr, who to ask or think. Is it Christ thou wouldest have? Christ thou shalt have. 2. Christ, in manifesting himself to those that seek him, often outdoes their expectations. Mary hopes to see the dead body of Christ, and complains of the loss of that, and, behold, she sees him alive. Thus he does for his praying people more than they can think. He makes them to sit upon the midst of the earth, Ps. 124. 10. In the presence of Christ to Mary, v. 12.

(1.) How he did at first conceal himself from her.

[1.] He stood as a common person, and she looked upon him accordingly, v. 14. She stood expecting an answer to her complaint from the angels; and either seeing the shadow, or hearing the tread of some person behind her, she turned herself back from talking with the angels, and asked, Is this Jesus himself? and, though every person she was looking for, and yet she knew not that it was Jesus. Note, First, The Lord is nigh to them that are of a broken heart, (Ps. 34. 18.) nearer than they are aware. They that seek Christ, though they do not see him, may yet be sure he is not far from them. Secondly, Those that diligently seek the Lord, will turn every stone in their way, in hopes of discovering him. Mary turned every stone in her way after him. Many times has she seen the shadow, but never saw the person. She was looking for, and yet she knew not that it was Jesus. Note, Thirdly, The ancients suggest, that Mary was directed to look behind her, by the angels rising up, and doing their obedience to the Lord Jesus, whom they saw before Mary did; and that she looked back to see who it was they paid such a profound reverence to. But if so, it is not likely that she would have taken him for the gardener; rather, therefore, it was her earnest desire in seeking, that made her turn every wave. Thirdly, Christ is often near his people, and they are not aware of him. She knew not that it was Jesus; not that he appeared in any other likeness, but either it was a careless transient look she cast upon him, and her eyes being full of care, she could not so well distinguish, or they were hidden, that she should not know him, as those of the two disciples, Luke 24. 16.

[9] Common question, and she answered him accordingly, v. 13. First, The question she asked was natural enough, and what any one would have asked her: "Woman, why wepest thou? Whom seekest thou? What business hast thou here in the garden so early? And what is all this noise and ado for?"

Perhaps, it was spoken with some roughness, as Joseph spoke to his brethren when he made himself strange, before he made himself known to them. It should seem, this was the first word Christ spake after his resurrection: "Why wepest thou? I am risen." The resurrection of Christ has enough in it to allay all our sorrows, to check the streams, and dry up the fountain, of our tears. Observe here, Christ takes cognizance, 1. Of his people's griefs, and inquires, Whom seest thou? He blesseth their tears, and upbraids me with my tears? You know why Jesus' cares, and inquires, Whom seek ye, and what would ye have? When he knows they are seeking him, yet he will know it from them; they must tell him, how they seek.

Secondly, The reply she made him is natural enough: she does not give him a direct answer, but, as if she should say, "Why do you banter me, and upbraide my with my tears? You know why Jesus' cares, and inquires, Whom seek ye, and what would ye have? When he knows they are seeking him, yet he will know it from them; they must tell him, how they seek." Observe here, the error of her understanding; she supposed our Lord Jesus to be the gardener, perhaps, because he asked what authority she had to be there. Note, Troubled spirits, in a cloudy and dark day, are apt to misrepresent Christ to themselves, and to put wrong constructions upon the methods of his providence and grace.

2. The truth of her affection. See how her heart was upon it to find Christ! She puts the question, to every one she meets, like the careful spouse, Say me when my soul loved? She speaks respectfully to a gardener, and calls him Sir, in hopes to gain some influence from him concerning her beloved. When she speaks of Christ, she does not name him; but, If thou hast borne him hence, pray tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. See here, the error of her understanding: she supposed our Lord Jesus to be the gardener, perhaps, because he asked what authority she had to be there. Note, Troubled spirits, in a cloudy and dark day, are apt to misrepresent Christ to themselves, and to put wrong constructions upon the methods of his providence and grace.

3. The truth of her affection. She makes her heart to be upon it to find Christ! She puts the question, to everyone, as if she were in great danger: Say me when my soul loved? She speaks respectfully to a gardener, and calls him Sir, in hopes to gain some influence from him concerning her beloved. When she speaks of Christ, she does not name him; but, If thou hast borne him hence, pray tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. Another evidence of the strength of her affection was, that, wherever he was laid, she would undertake to remove him. Such a body, with such a weight of spices about it, was much more than she could pretend to carry; but true love thinks it can do more than it can, and makes nothing difficulties. She supposed this gardener gladly that the body of one that was ignominiously crucified, should have been removed from the place where it was laid; and that therefore he had removed it to some sorry place, which she thought fitter for it. Yet Mary does not threaten to tell his master, and get him turned out of his place for it; but undertakes to find out some other sepulcher, to which he might be welcome. Christ needs not to stay where he is thought a burden.

4. Observe, [1.] How Christ discovered himself to this good woman that was seeking him in tears; (v. 16.) Jesus saith unto her, Mary. It was said with an emphasis, and that air of kindness and freedom which with which he spake to his disciples, he exchanged his voice, and spoke like himself, not like the gardener. Christ's was eto make himself known to his people by his word, his words applied to their souls, speaking to them in particular. When those, whom God knew by name in the councils of his love, (Exod. 33. 12.) are called by name in the efficacy of his grace, then he reveals his Son in them, as in Paul, (Gal. 1. 16.) when Christ called to him by name, Saul, Saul. Christ's shew his voice, ch. 10. 4. This one word Mary, was like that to the disciples in the storm, It is I. Then the word of Christ does us good, when we put our names into the precepts and promises. "In this Christ calls me, and speaks to me."

[2] How readily she received this discovery; when Christ said, "Mary, dost thou not know me?" she said, "Lord, dost thou not know me?" she was present aware of this, as the apostle: (1 Cor. 12. 8.) It is the voice of my beloved. She turned herself, and said, Rabban, My master. It might properly be read with an interrogation, is it my master? Nay, but is it indeed? Observe, First, The title of respect she gives him: My master; since—a teaching master. The Jews, when they loved their doctors Rabban, great affection. Their critics tell us, that Rabban was with them a more honourable title than Rabbi; and therefore Mary chooses that, and adds a note of approbation, My great Master. Note, Notwithstanding the freedom of communion which Christ is pleased to admit us to with himself, we must remember that he is our Master, and to be approached with a godly fear. Secondly, What a difference there was in love which she gives this title to Christ. She turned herself from the angels whom she had in her eye, to look unto Jesus. We must take off our regards from all creatures, even the brightest and best, to fix them upon Christ, from whom nothing must divert us, and with whom nothing must interfere. When she thought it had been the gardener, she locked another way when she spoke to him; but now that she knew the voice that heard Christ's voice, and is turned to him, calls him, with joy and triumph, My Master. See with what pleasure those who love Christ, speak of his authority over them! My Master, my great Master.

[3] The further instructions that Christ gave her: (v. 17.) Touch me not, but to carry the news to the disciples. First, He diversifies her from the expectation of familiar society and conversation with him at this time: Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended. Mary was so transported with the sight of her dear Master, that she forgot herself, and that state of grief into which he was now entering, and was ready to express her joy by affectionate embraces of him, which Christ here forbids. Touch me not, for I am ascending to heaven. He bid the disciples touch him, for the confirmation of their faith; he allowed the women to take hold of his feet, and worship him; (Matt. 28.
3.) But Mary, supposing that he was risen, as Lazarus was, to live among them constantly, and converse with them freely as he had done, upon that presumption was about to take hold of his hand with her. But this mistake rectified; she must believe him, and adore him, as exalted, but must not expect to be familiar with him as formerly. See 2 Cor. 5. 16. He forbids her to doubt upon his bodily presence, to set her heart on that, or expect the continuance of that, and leads her to the spiritual converse and communion which she should have with him after he was ascended to his Father. By his ascension, he makes it that it was a step toward his ascension. Mary thought, now that her Master was risen, he would presently set up a temporal kingdom, such as they had long promised themselves. "No," says Christ, "touch me not, with any such thought; think not to lay hold on me, so as to detain me here; for though I am not yet ascended, I am to my brethren, and tell them, I am to ascend." As before his death, so now after his resurrection, he still harps upon this, that he was going away, was no more in the world; and therefore they must look higher than his bodily presence, and look farther than the present state of things.

1.) Touch me not, do not stay to touch me now, stay not now to make any further inquiries, or give any further expressions of joy, for I am not yet ascended, I shall not presently depart, it may as well be done another time; the best service thou canst do now is, to carry the tidings to the disciples; lose no time therefore, but go away with all speed." Note. Public service ought to be preferred before private satisfaction. It is more blessed to give than to receive. Jacob must let an angel go when the day breaks, and it is time for him to look after his family. Mary must not stay, to talk with her Master, but must carry his message; for it was a day of good tidings, which she must not engross the comfort of, but hand it to others. See that story, 2 Kings 7. 9.

Secondly, He directs her what message to carry to his disciples; But go to my brethren, and tell them, not only that I am risen, she could have told them that of herself, for she had seen him, but that I ascend. Observe,

1. To whom this message is sent; Go to my brethren with it; for he is not ashamed to call them so. (1.) Though he was now entering upon his glory, and was declared to be the Son of God with greater form and power, yet he owns his disciples as his brethren, and expresses himself with more tender affection to them than before; he had called them friends, but never brethren till now. Though Christ be high, yet he is not haughty. Notwithstanding his elevation, he disdains not to own his poor relations. (2.) Though his disciples had lately carried themselves very dishonorously toward him; he had not forsaken them, nor forgotten him, though they crucified him. He rises, adorned, and clothed, when he was apprehended; justice might have now sent them an angry message; "Go to yonder treacherous deserters, and tell them, I will never trust them more, or have any thing more to do with them." No, he forgives them, he forgets, and does not publish.

2. Do what he is sent; by Mary Magdalene, out of region, even in east seven days, yet now well favored. This was her reward for her constancy in adhering to Christ, and inquiring after him; and a trust rebuke to the apostles, who had not been so close as she was in attending on the dying Jesus, nor so early as she was in meeting the rising Jesus; she becomes an apostle to the apostles.

3. What the message itself is; I ascend to my Father. Two full breasts of consolation here are in these words;

(1.) Our joint relation to God, resulting from our union with Christ, is an unspakenable comfort. Speaking of that inexpressible spring of light, life, and bliss, he says, I am thy Father, and thy Father, thy God, and thy God, and your God. This is very expressive of that near relation that is between Christ and believers, that he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is in him, their Father. A vast difference indeed there is between the respective foundations of the relation; he is Christ's Father by eternal generation, our's by a gracious adoption; yet even that warrants us to call him, as Christ did, Abba, Father. This gives a reason why Christ called them brethren, because his Father was their Father. Christ was now ascending to appear as an Advocate with the Father, with his Father; and therefore we may hope he will prevail for any thing with our Father, and therefore we may hope he will prevail for us.

(2.) It is the great condescension of Christ, that he is pleased to own the believer's God for his God; and therefore God of God; God, in one, that he must be your's; the God of the Redeemer to save us, and to show us, (Ps. 89. 26.) that he might be the God of the redeemed, to save them. The summary of the new covenant is, that God will be to us a God; and therefore Christ being the Surety and Head of the covenant, who is primarily dealt with, and believers only through him as his spiritual seed, this covenant relation to God, and with God, God becomes his Father, and so our's; we partaking of a divine nature, Christ's Father is our Father; and he partaking of the human nature, our God is his God.

(2.) Christ's ascension into heaven in further prosecution of his undertaking for us, is likewise an unspakenable comfort; "Tell them I must shortly ascend; that is the next step I am to take." Now this was intended to be,

[1.] A word of caution to these disciples, not to expect the continuance of his bodily presence on earth, nor the setting up of his temporal kingdom among men, which they dreamed of; "No, tell them, I am risen, not to stay with them, but to go on their errand to heaven." Thus they who are raised to a spiritual life, in conformity to Christ's resurrection, must reckon that they rise, to have and to be quickened with Christ, that they may sit with him in heavenly places, Eph. 2. 5. 6. Let them not think that this earth is to be their home and rest; no, being born from heaven, they are bound for heaven; their eye and aim must be heavenward, and this ever upon their hearts, I ascend, therefore must I seek things above. (1.) Nothing is to distress, no, not one single thing, and to all that shall believe in him through their word, he was then ascending, he is now ascended to his Father, and our Father. This was his advancement, he ascended, to receive those honours and powers which were to be the recompense of his humiliation; he says it with triumph, that they who love him may rejoice. This is our advantage; for he ascended, for their advantage; for their advantage, for our advantage; (Ps. 68. 18.) he ascended as our forerunner, to prepare a place for us, and to be ready to receive us. This message was like that which Joseph's brethren brought to Jacob concerning him, (Gen. 45. 26.) Joseph is yet alive, and not only so, but in such dignity, as he lived, it comes into the senate too; he is governor over all the land of Egypt; all power is in his. One makes these words, I ascend to my God, and your God, to include a promise of our resurrection, in the version of Christ's redemptive work for us. Christ had proved the resurrection of the dead, in these words,

I am the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Mat. 22. 32. So that Christ here inquires, "As he is my God, and hath therefore raised me, so he is your God, and will therefore raise you, and be your God, Rev. 21. 3. Because I live, ye shall live also. I now ascend, to honour my God, and ye shall ascend to him as your God."

Lastly, Here is Mary Magdalene's faithful report of what she said and heard, to the disciples; v. 18. She came and told the disciples, whom she found together, that she had seen the Lord. Peter and John had left her seeking him carefully with tears, and would not stay to seek him with her; and now she comes, to tell them that she had found him, and to rectify the mistake she had led them into, by inquiries after the dead body, for now she found it was a living body, and a glorified one; so that she found what she sought, and what was infinitely better, she had joy in her sight of the Master himself, and was willing to communicate of her joy, for she knew it would be good news to them. When God comforts us, it is with this design, that we may comfort others.

And as she told them what she had seen, so also what she had heard; she had seen the Lord alive, of which this was a token, (and a good token it was,) that he had spoken these things unto her, as a message to be delivered to them, and she delivered it faithfully. They that are acquainted with the word of God, themselves, should communicate their knowledge for the good of others, and not grudge that others should know as much as they do.

19. Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you. 20. And when he had so said, he shewed unto them his hands and his side. Then were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. 21. Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you; as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. 22. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: 23. Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained. 24. But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came. 25. The other disciples therefore said unto him, We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.

The infallible proof of Christ's resurrection, was, his shewing himself alive, Acts 1. 3. In these verses, we have an account of his first appearance to the college of the disciples, on the day on which he rose. He had sent them the tidings of his resurrection by trusty and credible messengers; but, to shew faith to them, and confirm their faith in him, he came himself, and gave them all the assurances they could desire of the truth of it, that they might not have it by hearses only, and at second hand, but might themselves be eye-witnesses of his power, because they must attest it to the world, and build the church upon that testimony. Now observe here,

1. When, and where, this appearance was, v. 19. It was the same day that the bretheren came to him, whom Christ had appointed to be witnesses of his resurrection, the third day after the Jewish sabbath, at a private meeting of the disciples, ten of them, and some more of their friends with them, Luke 24. 33.

There are three secondary ordinances (as I may call them) instituted by our Lord Jesus, to continue in his church, for the support of it, and for the due administration of the principal ordinances—the word, sacraments, and prayer. The first of these is the Lord's day solemnized by the preaching of the word. The mind of Christ concerning each of these is plainly intimated to us in these verses, and of the two first, here, in the circumstances of this appearance, the other. v. 21. Christ's kingdom was to be set up among men, immediately upon his resurrection; and, accordingly, we find the very day he rose, though but a day of small things, yet graced with those solemnities which should help to keep up a fire of religion throughout all the ages of the church.

1. Here is a christian sabbath observed by the disciples, and owned by our Lord Jesus. The visit Christ made to his disciples, was, on the first day of the week. And the first day of the week is (I think) the only day of the week, or month, or year, that is ever mentioned by number in all the New Testament; and that is several times spoken of as a day of religious observance. Though it was, expressly, (v. 1.) that Christ was the first day of the week, and it might have been sufficient to say here, (v. 19.) he appeared the same day at evening; yet, to put an honour upon the day, it is repeated, being the first day of the week; not that the apostles designed to put honour upon the day, (they were yet in doubt concerning the occasion of it,) but God designed to put honour upon it, God stole the glory, and their visit, is Christ's first visit on that day. Thus, in effect, he blessed and sanctified that day, because in it the Redeemer rested.

2. Here is a Christian assembly solemnized by the disciples, and that also owned by the Lord Jesus. Probably, the disciples met here for some religious exercise, to pray together; or, perhaps, they met to consult what was to be done; whether they should keep together, or scatter: they met, to know one another's mind, strengthen one another's hands, and take proper measures to be taken in the present critical juncture. This meeting was private, because they durst not appear publicly, especially not in a body; they met to discourse, compare scriptures, and observe sufficient evidence of their Master's resurrection, and to consult what was to be done; whether they should keep together, or scatter; they met, to know one another's mind, strengthen one another's hands, and take proper measures to be taken in the present critical juncture. but no real reproach, to Christ’s disciples, thus to abscond.

II. What was said and done in this visit Christ made to his disciples, and this interview between them.

1. When they were assembled, Christ came among them, in his own likeness, yet, drawing a veil over the brightness of his body, now began to be glorified, else it would have dazzled their eyes, as in his transmutation. Christ came among them, to give them a specimen of the performance of his promise, that, where two or three are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them.

2. He came, though the doors were shut. This does not at all weaken the evidence of his having a real human body after his resurrection; though the doors were shut, he knew how to open them without any noise, and come in so that they might not hear him, as formerly he had walked on the water, and yet had a true body. It is a comfort to Christ’s disciples, when their solemn assemblies are reduced to privacy, that no doors can shut out Christ’s presence from them.

We have five things in this appearance of Christ:

1. Christ and familiar salutation of his disciples: he said, Peace be unto you. This was not a word of course, though commonly used so at the meeting of friends, but a solemn uncommon benediction, conferring upon them all the blessed fruits and effects of his death and resurrection. The phrase was common, but the sense was now peculiar. Peace be unto you, is as much as, All good be to you. Peace be in your hearts, peace be in your own consciences, peace with one another; all this peace be with you; not peace with the world, but peace in Christ. His sudden appearing in the midst of them, when they were full of doubts concerning him, full of fears concerning themselves, could not but put them into some disorder and consternation, the noise of which waves he stills with this word, Peace be unto you.

2. He cleared away all his former appearances of his resurrection, and disappeared in your own consciousness, peace with one another; all this peace be with you; not peace with the world, but peace in Christ. His sudden appearing in the midst of them, when they were full of doubts concerning him, full of fears concerning themselves, could not but put them into some disorder and consternation, the noise of which waves he stills with this word, Peace be unto you.

3. Wherein his clear and undisguised manifestations of himself to them, p. 20. And here observe,

[1.] The method he took to convince them of the truth of his resurrection. They now saw him alive, whom multitudes had seen dead two or three days before. Now the only doubt was, whether this that they saw alive, was the same individual body that had been seen dead, and none could desire a further proof that it was so, than the scars or marks of the wounds in the body. Now, First, The marks of the wounds, and very deep marks, (though without any pain or soreness,) remained in the body of the Lord Jesus even after his resurrection, that they might be demonstrations of the truth of it. Conjurer’s glory in the marks of their wounds. Christ’s wounds were to speak on each other. That it was he himself, and therefore he rose with them; they were to speak in heaven, in the intercession he must ever live to make, and thereby he ascended with them, and appeared in the midst of the throne, a Lamb as he had been slain, and bleeding afaroff, Rev. 5. 6. Nay, it should seem, he will come again with his scars, that they may look on his wounds, and know it was he himself.

Secondly, These marks he showed to his disciples, for their conviction. They had not only the satisfaction of seeing him look with the same countenance, and hearing him speak with the same voice they had been so long accustomed to, Sic eccles., sic manum, sic ora, forebati—such were his gestures, such his eyes and hands! but they had the further evidence of those peculiar marks; he opened his hands to them, that they might see the marks of the wounds on them; he opened his breast, as the nurse her’s to the child, to shew them the wound there. Note, the exalted Redeemer will ever shew himself open-handed and open-hearted to all his faithful friends.

When Christ manifests his love to believers by the comfort of his presence, he assures them that because he lives, they shall live also, then he shews them his hands and his side.

[2.] The impression it made upon them, and the good it did them.

First, They were convinced that they saw the Lord; so was their faith confirmed. At first, they thought they saw an appearing only, a phantasm; but now they knew it was the Lord himself. Thus many true believers, who, while they were weak, feared their comforts were but imaginary, afterward find them, through grace, real and substantial. They ask not, Is it the Lord? but are assured, It is he.

Secondly, They were glad; that which strengthened their faith, raised their joy; believing, they rejoice. The evangelist seems to write it with something of transport and triumph. Then! then! were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. If it revived the spirit of Jacob, to hear that Joseph is yet alive; how would it revive the heart of those disciples, to hear that Jesus is again alive? It is life from the dead to them. Now that word of Christ was fulfilled to them, to be his age. I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. This wiped away all tears from their eyes. Note, A sight of Christ will gladden the heart of a disciple at any time; the more we see of Christ, the more we shall rejoice in him; and our joy will never be perfect till we come there where we shall see him as he is.

(3.) The honourable and ample commission he gave them to be his agents in the planting of his church, p. 21. Here is,

[1.] The preface to their commission, which was the solemn repetition of the salutation before; Peace be unto you. This was intended, either, First, To raise their attention to the commission he was about to give them. The former salutation was to still the tumult of their fear, that they might calmly attend to the purpose of his resurrection; this was to redress the transport of their joy, that they might sedately hear what he had further to say to them; or, Secondly, To encourage them to accept of the commission he was giving them. Though it would involve them in a great deal of trouble, yet he designed their honor and comfort in it, and, in the issue, it would be peace to them. Gideon received his commission with this word, Peace be unto thee, Judg. 6. 22, 23. Christ is our peace; if he be with us, peace is to us. Christ was now sending the disciples to publish peace to the world; (Isa. 52. 7.) and Christ here not only confers it upon them for their own satisfaction, but commits it to them as a trust to be by them transmitted to all the sons of peace, Luke 10. 5, 6.

[2.] The commission itself, which sounds very great, As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. First, It is easy to understand how Christ sent them; he appointed them to go on with his work upon earth, and to lay out themselves for the spreading of his gospel, and the setting up of his kingdom, among men. He sent them authorized with a divine warrant, armed with a divine power, sent them as ambassadors and follow the peace, and as it were to proclaim it; sent them as servants to kid the marriage. Hence they were called apostles—men sent.

Secondly, But how Christ sent them as the Father sent him, is not so easily understood; certainly then commissions and powers were infinitely inferior to his; but,
1. Their work was of the same kind with his, and they were to go on where he left off. They were not sent to his parents and kindred, like his apostles or prophets. As he was sent to bear witness to the truth, so were they; not to be mediators of the reconciliation, but only preachers and publishers of it.
Was he sent, not to be ministered to, but to minister;
not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him; not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfill them? So were they. As the Father sent him into the midst of the house of Israel, so he sent them into all the world.

2. He had a power to send them, equal to that which the Father had to send him. Here the force of the comparison seems to lie. By the same autho-ritv that the Father sent me, do I send you. This proves the Godhead of Christ; the commissions he gave, were of equal authority with those which the Father gave, and as valid and effectual to all intents, and purposes; equal with those he gave to the Old Testament prophets in visions. The commissions of Peter and John by the plain word of Christ, are as good as those of Isaiah and Ezekiel, by the Lord sitting on his throne; may, equal with that which was given to the Mediator himself for his work.
He had an incontestable authority, and an irresistible power, which he did not leave them to carry out upon God's errand, as they had for their's.
Or thus. Is the Father hath the Holy Ghost? Is the recital of his power; by virtue of the authority, given him as Mediator, he gave authority to them,
as his ministers, to act for him, and in his name,
with the children of men; so that they who received them, or rejected them, received or rejected him, and him that sent him, ch. 13. 20.

(4.) The qualifications of them for the discharge of the great commission in their own persons by their commission; (v. 22.) He breathed on them, and said, Receive the Holy Ghost. Observe, [1.] The sign he used to assure them of, and afflict them with, the gift he was now about to bestow upon them; he breathed on them; not only to shew them by this breath of life, that he himself was really alive, but to signify to them the spiritual life and power which they should receive from him for all the services that lay before them. Probably, he breathed upon them all together, not upon each separately; and though Thomas was not with them, yet the Spirit of the Lord knew where to find him, as he did Elisha and Medad. Numb. 11. 26. Christ here seems to refer to the creation of man at first,
by the breathing of the breath of life into him, (Gen.
2. 7.) and to intimate that he himself was the author of that work, and that the spiritual life and strength of ministers and christians are derived from him, and depend up on him, as much as the natural life of Adam and his seed. As the breath of the Almighty gave life to man and began the old world, so the breath of the mighty Saviour gave life to his ministers, and began a new world, Job 33. 4.
And even as Christ received his power from the breath of Christ, proceeding from the Son, The Spirit, in the Old Testament, is compared to breath; (Ezek. 37. 9.) Come, O breath; but the New Testament tells us, it is Christ's breath. The breath of God is put for the power of his wrath, (Isa. 11. 4.— 30. 33.) but the breath of Christ signifies the power of his grace; the breathing of threatenings is changed into the breathings of love by the mediation of Christ for their sins and us through our breath, so the word of Christ is spirit and life. The word comes from the Spirit, and the Spirit comes along with the word. Secondly, That the Spirit is the gift of Christ.
The apostles communicated the Holy Ghost by the blowing on of hands. These hands being first lifted up in prayer, for they could only beg this blessing, and carry it as messengers; but Christ conferred the Holy Ghost by breathing, for he is the author of the gift, and from him it comes originally. Moses could not give his Spirit, God did it; (Num. 11. 17.) but Christ did for them, who were not his spiritual children.

[2.] The solemn grant he made, signified by this sign, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, in part now, as an earnest of what you shall further receive not many days hence. They now received more of the Holy Ghost than they had yet received. Thus spiritual blessings are given gradually; to him that had shall be given. Now that Jesus began to be glorified, more of the Spirit was to begin to be poured out, (see ch. 7. 39.) Let us see what is contained in this present work.

First, Christ hereby gives them assurance of the Spirit's aid in their future work; in the execution of the commission now given them; "I send you, and you shall have the Spirit to go along with you."
Now the Spirit of the Lord rested upon them, to qualify them for all the services that lay before them. When Christ employs he will clothe with his Spirit, and furnish with all needful powers.

Secondly, He hereby gives them experience of the Spirit's influences in the present case. He had shewed them his hands and his side, to convince them of the truth of his resurrection; but the plainest evidences will not of themselves work faith, witness the infidelity of the soldiers, who were the only eyewitnesses of the resurrection. Therefore receive the Holy Ghost, and work faith in us, and to open your understandings." They were now in danger of the Jews; "Therefore receive ye the Holy Ghost, to work courage in you." What Christ said to them, he says to all true believers, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, Eph. 1. 13. What Christ gives we must receive, must submit ourselves and our whole souls to the quickening sanctifying influences of the blessed Spirit; receive his motions, and gradually receive his powers, and make use of them; and they who thus obey his word as a precept, shall have the benefit of it as a promise; they shall receive the Holy Ghost as the guide of their way, and the earnest of their inheritance.

(5.) One particular branch of the power given to them by their commission, particularized; (v. 23.)
"Who soever receiveth you, receiveth me; and who soever receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me." What the powers ye are entrusted with, they are remitted to them, and they may take the comfort of it. And whose soever sins we retain, pronounce unpardoned,
and the guilt of them bound on, they are retained, and the sinner may be sure of it, to his sorrow." Now this follows upon their receiving the Holy Ghost;
for if they had not an extraordinary spirit of disc-cerning, they had not been fit to be entrusted with such an authority; for, in the strictest sense, this is a special commission to the apostles themselves, and the first preachers of the gospel, who could distinguish who were in the gait of bitterness and bond of iniquity, and who were not. By virtue of this power, Peter struck Ananias and Sapphira dead, and Paul struck Elymas blind. Yet it must be understood as a special commission, not to the apostle and his church, nor to any one church, but not securing an infallibility of judgment, for they were but either company of men, in the world, but encouraging the faithful stewards of the mysteries of God to stand to the gospel they were sent to preach, for that God himself will stand to it. The apostles, in preaching remission, must begin at Jerusalem,
though she had lately brought upon herself the guilt of Christ's blood; "Yet you may declare the Christ, being risen for our justification, sends his gospel-heralds to proclaim the jubilee begun, the act of indemnity now passed; and by this rule men shall be judged, ch.
12. 48. Rom. 2. 16. Jam. 2. 12. God will never alter this rule of judgment, nor vary from it; those whom the gospel acquits, shall be acquitted, and those whom that condemns, shall be condemned; which puts immense honour upon the ministry, and should put immense courage into ministers.

Two ways the apostles and ministers of Christ remit and retain sin, and both as having authority.

[1.] By sound doctrine. They are commissioned to tell the world, that salvation is to be had upon Gospel-terms, and no other, and they shall find God will have Jesus to it; so shall their doom be. [2.] By a strict discipline, applying the general rule of the gospel to particular persons. "Whom you admit into communion with you, according to the rules of the gospel, God will admit into communion with himself; and whom you cast out of communion, as impenitent and obstinate in scandalous and infectious sins, shall be bound over to the righteous judgment of God."

III. The incredulity of Thomas, when the report of this was made to him, which introduced Christ's second appearance.

1. Here is Thomas's absence from this meeting, v. 24. He is said to be one of the twelve, one of the college of the apostles, who, though now eleven, had been but six; so that there were but eleven, and one of them was missing; Christ's disciples will never be all together till the general assembly at the great day. Perhaps it was Thomas's unhappiness that he was absent; either he was not well, or had not notice; or perhaps it was his sin and folly; either he was diverted by business or company, which he preferred before this opportunity. The discourse was not come for fear of the Jews, or the account which the other disciples gave him of the visit their Master had made them, v. 25. The next time they saw him, they said unto him, with joy enough, We have seen the Lord; and, no doubt, they related to him all that had passed, particularly the satisfaction he had given them, by shewing them his hands and his side. It seems, though Thomas was absent from them, and long from them, he did not lose his charge as apostles for ever; Thomas is not Judas. Observe with what exultation and triumph they speak it: "We have seen the Lord, the most comfor- table sight we ever saw." This they said to Thomas, (1.) To upbraid him with his absence: "We have seen the Lord, but thou hast not." Or rather, (2.) To inform him: "We have seen the Lord, and wish thou hadst been here, to see him too, for thou wouldst have seen enough to satisfy thee." Note, The disciples of Christ should endeavour to build up one another in their most holy faith, both by repeating what they have heard, to those that were absent, that they may hear it at second hand; as also by communicating what they have experienced. They that by faith have seen the Lord, and tasted that he is gracious, should tell others what God had done for their souls; only let boasting be excluded.

3. The objections Thomas raised against the evidence, to justify himself in his loathness to admit it. "Tell me not that you have seen the Lord alive, you are too credulous, somebody has made fools of you; for my part, I shall not only see in his hand the print of the nails, but put my finger into it, and thrust my hand into the wound in his side, I am resolved I will not believe." Some, by comparing this with what he said, (ch. 11. 16.—14. 5.) conjecture him to be a man of a rough, morose temper, apt to speak peevishly; for all good people are not alike happy in their temper; however, there was certainly much amiss in this here.

1. He had either not heeded, or not duly regarded, what Christ had so often said, and that too according to the Old Testament, that he would rise again the third day; so that he ought to have said, He is risen, though he had not seen him, nor spoken with any that had.

2. He did not pay a just deference to the testimony of his fellow-disciples, who were men of wisdom and integrity, and ought to be credited. He knew them to be honest men; they all ten of them concurred in the testimony with great assurance; and yet he cannot persuade himself to say that their record is true. Christ had chosen them to be his witnesses of this very thing to all nations; and yet Thomas, one of their own fraternity, would not show them to be competent witnesses, nor trust them further than he can see them. It was not, however, their veracity that he questioned, but their prudence; he feared they were too credulous.

3. He tempted Christ, and limited the Holy One of Israel, when he would be convinced by his own evidence. He must have said, I will not believe, unless—some, that the print of the nails, which the apostles told him they had seen, would admit the putting of his finger into them, or the wound in his side the thrusting in of his hand; nor was it fit to deal so roughly with a living body; yet Thomas ties up his faith to this evidence; either he will be humoured, and have his fancy gratified, or he will not believe; see Matt. 16. 17.

4. The open avowal of this in the presence of the disciples, was an offence and discouragement to them. It was not only a sin, but a scandal. As one coward makes many, so does one unbeliever, one sceptic, making his brethren's heart to faint like his heart, Deut. 20. 8. Had he only thought this evil, and then laid his hand upon his mouth, to suppress it, his error had remained with himself; but his proclaming of his infidelity, and that so peremptorily, might be of ill consequence to the rest, who were as yet weak and wavering.

26. And after eight days again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them: then came Jesus, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, Peace be unto you. 27. Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing.

28. And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God. 29. Jesus saith unto him, Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed. 30. And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: 31. But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name.

We have here an account of another appearance of Christ to his disciples, after his resurrection, when Thomas was now with them. And concerning this we may observe, I. When it was that Christ repeated his visit to his disciples, after eight days; that day seven-night after he rose, which must therefore be, as that was, the first day of the week.
1. He deferred his next appearance for some time, to shew his disciples that he was not risen to such a life as he had formerly lived, to converse constantly with them, but was as one that belonged to another world, and visited this only as angels do, now and then, when there was occasion. Where Christ was during these eight days, and the rest of the time of his abode on earth, is fully to inquire, and presumption to determine. Wherever he was, no doubt, angels ministered unto him. In the beginning of his ministry, he had been forty days unseen, tempted by the evil spirit, Matt. 4. 1, 2. And more at the beginning of his glory he was forty days, for the most part unseen, attended by good spirits.

2. He deferred it so long as seven days. And why so?

(1.) That he might put a rebuke upon Thomas for his incredulity; he had neglected the former meeting of the disciples: and to teach him to prize those seasons of grace better for the future, he cannot have such another opportunity for several days. He that slips one tide, must stay a good while for another. A very melancholy week, we have reason to think, Thomas had of it, drooping, and in suspense, while the other disciples were full of joy; and it was owing to himself and his own folly.

(2.) That he might try the faith and patience of the disciples. The week, and particularly that point when they were satisfied that they had seen the Lord; then were the disciples glad; but he would try whether they could keep the ground they had got, when they saw no more of him for some days. And thus he would gradually wear them from his bodily presence, which they had dated and defended too much upon.

(3.) That he might put an honour upon the first day of the week, and give a plain intimation of his will, that it should be observed in his church as the Christian sabbath, the weekly day of holy rest and holy convocations. One day in seven should be religiously observed, was an appointment from the beginning, as old as innocence; and that in the kingdom of the Messiah the first day of the week should be that solemn day, this was indication enough, that Christ on that day once, and again meet his disciples in a religious assembly; and it is very likely, that in his former appearance to them he appointed them that day seven nights to be together again, and promised to meet them; and also, that he appeared to them every first day of the week, beside other times, during the forty days. The religious observance of that day has been from thence transmitted down to us through every age of the church. This therefore is the day which the Lord has made.

II. Where and how, Christ made them this visit: it was at Jerusalem, for the doors were shut now, as before, for fear of the Jews. There they said, to keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, which expired the day before this; yet they would not set out on their journey to Galilee, on the first day of the week, lest they be belated on the Christian sabbath, but staid till to the day after.

1. That Thomas was with them; though he had withdrawn himself once, yet not a second time, when we have lost one opportunity, we should give the more earnest heed to lay hold on the next, that we may recover our losses. It is a good sign if such a loss what our desires, and a bad sign if it cost them. The disciples admitted him among them, and did not insist upon his believing the resurrection of Christ, as they did, because as yet it was but darkly revealed; they did not receive him to doubtful disputes, but bid him welcome to come and see. But observe, Christ did not appear to Thomas, for his satisfaction, till he found him in society with the rest of his disciples, because he would countenance the meetings of Christians and ministers, but there will he be in the midst of them. And besides, he would shew all the disciples witnesses of the rebuke he gave to Thomas, and yet withheld the tender care he had of him.

2. That Christ came in among them, and stood in the midst, and they all knew him, for he shewed himself now, just as he had shewed himself before, (v. 19,) still the same, and no changeling. See the confessions of our Lord Jesus'! The gates of hell were not opened to him, and there might have been in the midst of the adorations of a world of angels; yet, for the benefit of his church, he lingered on earth, and visited the little private meeting of his poor disciples, and is in the midst of them.

3. He saluted them all in a friendly manner, as he had done before; he said, Peace be unto you. This was no vain repetition, but significant of the abundance and stored peace which Christ gives, and of the continuance of his blessings upon his people, for they fail not, but are now every morning, every new meeting.

III. What passed between Christ and Thomas at this meeting; and that only is recorded, though we may suppose he said a deal to the rest of them. Here is,

1. Christ's gracious confessions to Thomas, v. 27. He singled him out from the rest, and made him personally particular to him; Reach hither thy finger, and since thou wilt have it so, behold my hands, and satisfy thy curiosity to the utmost about the print of the nails; reach hither thy hand, and if nothing less will convince thee, thrust it into my side. Here we have,

(1.) An implicit rebuke of Thomas's incredulity, in the plain reference which is here had to what Thomas had said before, namely, that he had not believed if he had not seen and touched the Lord's body, in all things, and had not heard it, though unseen; and one would think that his telling him of it should put him to the blush. Note, There is not an unbelieving word in our tongues, no, nor thought in our minds, at any time, but it is known to the Lord Jesus, Ps. 78. 21.

(2.) An express confessions to his weakness, which appears in two things. [1.] That he suffers his wisdom to be prescrib'd. Great spirits will not be dictated to by their inferiors, neither in their acts of grace; yet Christ is pleased here to accommodate himself even to Thomas's fancy in a needless thing, rather than break with him, and leave him in his unbelief. He will not break the brazen reed, but, as a good shepherd, gathers that which was driven away, Ezek. 34. 16. We ought not to here the infirmities of the weak, Rom. 15. 1, 2. [2.] He suffers his wounds to be raked into, to show Thomas even to thrust his hand into his side, if then at last he would believe. Thus, for the confirmation of our faith, he hath instituted an ordinance on purpose to keep his death in remembrance, though it was an ignominious shameful death, and, one would think, should rather have been forgotten, and no more said of it; yet because it was such an evidence of love, as would be an encouragement to our faith, he permits the thought to be celebrated. And in that ordinance wherein we shew the Lord's death, we are called, as it were, to put our finger into the print of the nails. Reach hither thy hand to him, who reacheth forth his helping, inviting, giving hand to thee.

It is an affecting word with which Christ closes up what he had to say to Thomas, Be not faithless but believing, we beseech thee, and sin not through unbelief; as if he should have been scaled up under unbelief, had he not yielded now. This warning is given to us all, Be not faithless; for, if we are faithless, we Christless and graceless, hopeless and joyless; let us therefore say, Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief.
2. Thomas's believing consent to Jesus Christ. He is described as ashamed of his incredulity, and cries out, My Lord and my God, v. 28. We are not told whether he did put his finger into the print of the nails; it should seem, he did not, for Christ says, (v. 29.) Thou hast seen and believed; seeing suffered. And now faith comes off a conqueror, after a struggle with unbelief.

(1.) Thomas is now fully satisfied of the truth of Christ. He knew that he whom Jesus that was crucified, is now alive, and this is his. His slowness and backwardness to believe may help to strengthen our faith; for hereby it appears that the witnesses of Christ's resurrection, who attested it to the world, and pawned their lives upon it, were not easy credulous men, but cautious enough, who suspended their belief of it till they saw the utmost evidence of it they could desire. Thus out of the eater came forth meal.

(2.) He therefore believed him to be Lord and God, and we are to believe him so. [1.] We must believe his deity—that he is God; not a man made God, but God made man, as this evangelist had laid down his thesis at first, ch. 1. 1. The author and head of our holy religion has the wisdom, power, sovereignty, and majesty, which belongs to God alone; who was not made, because he was to be not only the founder of it, but the foundation of it for its constant support, and the fountain of life for its supply. [2.] His mediation—that he is the Lord, the one Lord, 1 Cor. 8. 6. 1 Tim. 2. 5. He is sufficiently authorized, as plenipotentiary, to settle the great concerns that lie between God and man; to take up the controversy whether there has been or been no such a being as God; who was not made, because he was to be not only the founder of it, but the foundation of it for its constant support, and the fountain of life for its supply.

(3.) He consented to him as his Lord and his God. In faith there must be the consent of the will to gospel-terms, as well as the consent of the understanding to gospel-truths. We must accept of Christ to be that to us, which the Father hath appointed him. My Lord refers to Adonai—my foundation and stay; My God, to El-bbim—my prince and judge.

God having constituted him the umpire and referee, we must approve the choice, and entirely refer ourselves to him. This is the vital act of faith, He is mine, Cant. 2. 16.

(4.) He made an open profession of this, before those that had been the witnesses of his unbelieving doubts. He said, It is my Lord and my God; or, speaking to his brethren, This is my Lord and my God. Do we accept of Christ as our Lord and God? We must go to him, and tell him so, as David, (Ps. 16. 2.) deliver the surrender to him as our act and deed, tell others so, as those that triumph in our relation to Christ; This is my beloved.

Thomas speaks with an ardency of affection, as one that had beheld Christ with all his might, My Lord and my God.

3. The judgment of Christ upon the whole; (v. 29.) "Thou hast seen me, thou hast believed, and it is well thou art brought to it at last upon any terms; but blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Here.

(1.) Christ owns Thomas a believer. So had and single belief, or belief when a man is convinced, shall be graciously accepted of the Lord Jesus. They who have long stood it out, if at last they yield, shall find him ready to forgive. No sooner did Thomas consent to Christ, than Christ gives him the comfort of it, and lets him know that he believes.

(2.) He upbraids him with his former incredulity. He might well be ashamed to think, [1.] That he had been so backward to believe, and came so slowly to his own comforts. They that in sincerity have closed with Christ, see a great deal of reason to lament that they did not do it sooner. [2.] That it was not without much ado that he was brought to believe at last; "If thou hadst not seen me alive, thou wouldest not have believed;" but if no evidence must be admitted but that of our own senses, and we must believe nothing but what we ourselves are eye-witnesses of, farewell all commerce and conversation. If this must be the only method of proof, how must the world be converted to the faith of Christ? He is therefore justly blamed for laying so much stress upon the evidence of the eye.

(3.) He commends the faith of those who believe upon easier terms. Thomas, as a believer, was truly blessed; but rather blessed are they that have not seen. It is not meant of not seeing the objects of faith, (for those are invisible, Heb. 11. 1. 2 Cor. 4. 18.) but the motives of faith—Christ's miracles, and especially his resurrection; blessed are they that see not these, and yet believe in Christ. This may look, either backward, upon the Old Testament saints, who had not seen the things which they saw, and yet believed the promise made unto the fathers, and lived by that faith; or forward, upon them who should afterward believe; the Gentiles; who had never seen Christ in the flesh, as the Jews had. This faith is more humble and praise-worthy than that which saw the Lord, and believed; and being had by a better temper of mind in those that do believe. Not to see, and yet to believe, argues greater industry in searching after truth, and greater ingenuity of mind in embracing it. He that believes upon that sight, has his resistance conquered by a sort of violence; but he that believes without that, like the hecates, is more noble. [2.] It is a greater instance of the power of divine grace. The less sensible the evidence is, the more does the work of faith appear to be the Lord's doing. Peter is blessed in his faith, because flesh and blood have not revealed it to him, Matt. 16. 17. Flesh and blood contribute more to their faith that see and believe, than to those who see not, and yet believe.

Dr. Lightfoot quotes a saying of one of the Rabbis, That one proselyte is more acceptable to God than all the thousands of Israel that stood before mount Sinai; for they saw and received the law, but a proselyte sees not, and yet receives it."

IV. The remark which the evangelist makes upon his narrative, like an historian drawing towards a conclusion, v. 30, 31. And here.

1. He assures us that many other things occurred, which are not written in the book: many signs. Some refer this to all the signs that Jesus did during his whole life, all the wondrous words he spake, and all the wonderful works he did. But it seems rather to be confined to the signs he did after his resurrection, for these were in the presence of the disciples only, which are here spoken of, Acts 10. 41. Divers of his appearances are not recorded, as appears, 1 Cor. 15. 5. 8. 9.

(1.) We may here improve this general attestation, that there were other signs, many other, for the confirmation of our faith; and, being added to the particular narratives, they very much strengthen the evidence. They that recorded the resurrection of Christ, were not put to fish for evidence, to take up such short and scanty proofs as they could find, many is the case, but rest with conjecture: no, they had evidence enough and to spare, and more witnesses to produce than they had occasion for. The disciples, in whose presence these other signs were done, were to be preachers of Christ's resurrection to others, and therefore it was requisite they should have proofs of it ex abundanti—in abundance, that they might have a strong consolation, who ventured life and all upon it.

(2.) We need not ask why they were not all written, or why not more than these, or other than these; for it is enough for us, that so it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration this was given. Had this history been a mere human composition, it had been swelled with a multitude of depositions and affidavits, to prove the contested truth of Christ's resurrection, and long arguments drawn up for the demonstration of it; but, being a divine history, the author wrote with a wise simplicity, rec-taining what amounted to a competent proof, sufficient to convince those that were willing to be taught, and to culminate those that were obstinate in their unbelief; and if this satisfy not, more would not. Men produce all they have to say, that they may gain credit; but God does not, for he can give faith.

This history has been written for the entertainment of all men. If the events be serious, the record is credible; and wise, according to the occasion of the name, is appointed of God to be a Prince and a Saviour. Secondly, That he is the Son of God; not only as Mediator, (for then he had not been greater than Moses, who was a prophet, intercessor, and lawgiver,) but antecedent to his being the Mediator; for he had not been a divine person, endowed with the power of God, and entitled to the glory of God, he had not been qualified for the undertaking; not fit either to do the Redeemer's work, or to wear the Redeemer's crown.

What the great gospel-blessedness is, which we are to hope for—That believing we shall have life through his name. This is, First, To direct our faith; it must have an eye to the life, the crown of life, the tree of life, set before us. Life through Christ is, the life promised in the covenant which is made him who is Christ, is given us to propose to ourselves as the fulness of our joy, and the abundant recompense of all our services and sufferings. Secondly, To encourage our faith, and invite us to believe. Upon the prospect of some great advantage, men will venture far; and greater advantage there cannot be than that which is offered by the words of this life, as the gospel is called, Acts 5:20. It includes both spiritual life, in conformity to God and communion with him, and eternal life, in the vision and fruition of him. Both are through Christ's name, by his merit and power, and both indefeasibly sure to all true believers.

The evangelist seemed to have concluded his history with the foregoing chapter; but, as St. Paul sometimes his epistles, new matter occurring, he began again. He had said, that there were many other signs which Jesus did for the proof of his resurrection. And in this chapter he mentions one of these many, which was Christ's appearance to his disciples at the sea of Tiberias, in which we have an account. 1. How he discovered himself to them as they were fishing, filled their net, and then very familiarly came and admonished them. 2. Concerning John, v. 24., 23. 25. The solemn conclusion of this gospel, v. 24, 25.

It is strange that a chapter of such importance was added by some other hand, when it is expressly said, (v. 24), that the disciples whom Jesus loved, is he which testifieth of these things.

1. A FTER these things Jesus shewed himself again to the disciples at the sea of Tiberias: and on this wise shewed he himself. 2. There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee, and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of his disciples. 3. Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth, and entered into a ship immediately; and that night they caught nothing. 4. But when the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore: but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus. 5. Then Jesus saith unto them, Children, have ye any meat? They answered him, No. 6. And he said unto them, Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes. 7. Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, It is the Lord. Now when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fisher's coat about him, (for he was naked,) and did cast himself into the sea. 8. And the other disciples came in a little ship; (for they were not far from land, but as it were two hundred cubits,) dragging the net with fishes. 9. As soon then as they were come to land, they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread. 10. Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught. 11. Simon Peter went up, and drew the net to land full of great fishes, an hundred and fifty and three: and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken. 12. Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine. And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord. 13. Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise. 14. This is now the third time that Jesus shewed himself to his disciples, after that he was risen from the dead.

We have here an account of Christ's appearance to his disciples at the sea of Tiberias. Now,

1. Let us compare this appearance with those that went before. In those Christ shewed himself to his disciples when they were met in a solemn assembly, (it should seem, for religious worship,) upon a Lord's day, and when they were all together, perhaps expecting his appearing; but in this he shewed himself to some of them occasionally, upon a week-day, when they were fishing, and little thought of it. Christ has many ways of making himself known to his people; usually in his ordinances, but sometimes by his Spirit he visits them when they are employed in common business, as the shepherds who were keeping their flock by night, (Luke 2:8) even so here also, Gen. 16. 13.

2. Let us compare it with that which followed at the mountain in Galilee, where Christ had appointed them to meet him, Matt. 28. 16. Thitherward they moved as soon as the days of unleavened bread were over, and disposed of themselves as they thought fit, till the time fixed for this interview, or general rendezvous, should appear; and then they were waiting for that, that they might not be weary of waiting. Christ is often better than his word, but never worse; often prevents and outdoes the believing expectations of his people, but never disappoints them.

As to the particulars of the story, we may observe,

1. Who they were, to whom Christ now shewed himself; (v. 2.) not to all the twelve, but to seven of them only. Nathanael is mentioned as one of them, whom we have not met with since ch. 1. But some think he was the same with Bartholomew, one of the twelve. The two not named, are supposed to be Philip of Bethsaida, and Andrew of Capernaum. Observe here,

1. It is good for the disciples of Christ to be much together; not only in solemn religious assemblies, but in common conversation, and about common business. Good Christians should by this means both testify and increase their affection to, and delight in, each other, and edify one another both by discourse and example.

2. Christ chose to manifest himself to them when they were together; not only to communicate with them, but also to be joint witnesses of the same matter of fact, and so might corroborate one another's testimony. Here were seven together, to attest this; on which occasion some observe, that the Roman law required seven witnesses to a testament.

3. Thomas was one of them, and is named next to Peter, as if he now kept closer to the meetings of the apostles than ever. It is well, if losses by our neglects make us more careful afterward not to slip opportunities.

II. How they were employed. v. 3.

1. Their agreement to go a-fishing. They knew not well what to do with themselves. For my part, says Peter, I will go a-fishing; We will go with thee then, says they, for we will keep together. Though truly only two of a trade cannot agree, yet they could. Some think they did amiss in returning to their boats and nets which they had left; but then Christ would not have countenanced them in it with a visit. It was rather commendable in them; for they did it, (1.) To redeem time, and not be idle. They were not yet appointed to preach the resurrection; their commission was in a drawing, but not perfected. The hour for entering upon action was not come. It is probable that their Master had directed them to say nothing of his resurrection till after his ascension, nay, not till after the pouring out of the Spirit, and then they were to begin at Jerusalem. Now, in the mean time, rather than do nothing, they would go a-fishing; not for recreation, but for business. It is an instance of their humility; though they were advanced to be sent of Christ, as he was of the Father, yet they did not take state upon them, but remembered the rock out of which they were hewn. It is an instance likewise of their industry, and speaks them good husbands of their time. When they were waiting, there would be nothing to be done. Those who would give an account of their time with joy, should contrive to fill up the vacancies of it, to gather up the fragments of it. (2.) That they might help to maintain themselves, and not be burdensome to any. While their Master was with them, those who ministered to him were kind to them; but now that the bridegroom was taken from them they must be idle those days, and therefore their own hands, as Paul's, must minister to their necessities; and for that reason Christ asked them, Have ye any meat? This teaches us with quietness to work, and eat our own bread.

2. Their disappointment in their fishing. That night they caught nothing, though, it is probable, they toiled all night, as Luke 5. 5. See the vanity of this world. It is good to expect good; but it must be expected in the way of God's grace. As every design that is very gracious has often designs that are very grievous. Man has indeed a dominion over the fish of the sea, but they are not always at his beck; God only knows the paths of the sea, and commands that which passeth through them.

III. After what manner Christ made himself known to them. It is said, (v. 1.) He shewed himself. His body, though a true and real body, was raised, as our's will be, a spiritual body, and so was visible only when he himself was pleased to make it so; or, rather, came and removed so quickly, that it was here or there in an instant, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.

Four things are observable in the appearance of Christ to them.

1. That he appeared to them seasonably, (v. 4.) When the morning was now come, after a fruitless night's toil, Jesus stood on the shore. Christ's time of making himself known to his people, is, when they are most at a loss. When they think they have lost themselves, he will let them know they have not lost him. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh when Christ comes, in the morning. He appeared to them, not walking upon the water, because, being risen from the dead, he was not to be with them as he had been; but standing upon the shore, because now they were to make toward him. Some of the ancients put this significance upon it, that Christ, having finished his work, was got through a stormy sea, a sea of blood, to a safe and quiet shore, where he stood in triumph; but the disciples, beholding their work before them, were yet at sea, in toil and peril. It is a comfort to us, when our passage is rough and stormy, that our Master is at shore, and we are hastening to him.

2. He shewed himself to them gradually. The disciples, though they had been intimately acquainted with him, knew not, all at once, that it was Jesus. Little by little, waiting to see him then, and not looking intently upon him, they took him for some common person waiting the arrival of their boat, to buy their fish. Note, Christ is often nearer us than we think he is, and so we shall find afterward, to our comfort.
3. He showed himself to them by an instance of his power; and this perfected the discovery; (v. 6.) he ordered them to cast the net on the right side of the ship, the contrary side to what they had been casting it on; and then they who were going home empty-handed, were enriched with a great draught of fishes.

(1.) The orders Christ gave them, and the promise annexed to these orders; Cast the net there in such a place, and you shall find. He from whom nothing is hid, no, not the inhabitants under the waters, (Job 36. 5.) knew on what side of the ship the shoal of fishes was, and to that side he directs them. Note, Divine Providence extends itself to things most minute and contingent; and there are the care and knowledge that how to take hints from thence in the conduct of their affairs, and acknowledge it in all their ways.

(2.) Their obedience to these orders, and the good success of that. As yet they knew not that it was Jesus; however, they were willing to be advised by any body, and did not bid this supposed stranger mind his own orders, and not meddle with their's, but took his counsel: in being thus observant of strangers, they were obedient to their Master undeserved. And it sped wonderfully well: now they had a draught that paid them for all their pains. Note, Those that are humble, diligent, and patient, (though their labours may be crossed,) shall be crowned; they sometimes live to see their affairs take a happy turn, after many struggles and fruitless labours.

Thus the disciples discovered Christ's orders. Those are likely to succeed well, that follow the rule of the word, the guidance of the Spirit, and the intimations of Providence; for that is casting the net on the right side of the ship.

Now the draught of fishes may be considered,

[1.] As a miracle in itself: and so it was designed, to prove that Jesus Christ was raised in power, though seen in weakness, and that all things were put under his feet, the fishes of the sea not excepted.

[2.] As a mercy to them; for the reasonable and abundant supply of their necessities. When their ingenuity and industry failed them, the power of Christ came in opportune for their relief; for he would take care that they who had left all for him, should not want any good thing. When we are most at a loss, Deifick-grace is given us.

[3.] As the memorial of a former mercy, with which Christ had formerly recompenced Peter for the loss of his boat, Luke 5. 4, 8. This miracle nearly resembled that, and could not but put Peter in mind of that, which helped him to improve this; for both that, and this affected him much, as meeting him in his own element, in his own employment. Latter favours are designed to bring to mind former favours, that eaten bread may not be forgotten.

[4.] As a mystery, and very significant of that work to which Christ was now with an enlarged commission sending them forth. The prophets had been fishing for souls, and caught nothing, or very little; but the apostles, who let down the net at Christ's word, had wonderful success.

Many were cast into the ship, where there were great numbers of fishes; and very many years at last, after this, they were first made fishes of men, had had small success in comparison with what they should now have. When, soon after this, three thousand were converted in one day, then the net was cast on the right side of the ship. It is an encouragement to Christ's ministers to continue their diligence in their work. One happy draught, at length, may be sufficient to make up for any many years of unfruitfulness.

IV. How the disciples received this discovery which Christ made of himself, v. 7, 8. Where we find,

1. That John was the most intelligent and quick-sighted disciple. He whom Jesus loved, was the first that said, It is the Lord; for those whom Christ loves he will in a special manner manifest himself to. Of his seeing Christ's face, he is the more disposed to admire and consider more closely to his Master in his sufferings than any of them; and therefore he has a clearer eye and a more discerning judgment than any of them, in recompense for his constancy.

When John was himself aware that it was the Lord, he communicated his knowledge to those with him; for this dispensation of the Spirit is given to every one, as his profit should be. They that knew Christ themselves, should endeavour to bring others acquainted with him, we need not engross him, there is enough in him for us all. John tells Peter particularly his thoughts, that it was the Lord; knowing he would be glad to see him above any of them. Though Peter had denied his Master, yet, having repented, and being taken into the communion of the disciples again, they were as free and familiar with him as ever.

2. That Peter was the most zealous and warm-hearted disciple; for as soon as he heard it was the Lord, (for which he took John's word,) the ship could not hold him, nor could he stay the bringing of it to shore, but into the sea he throws himself presently, that he might come first to Christ.

(1.) He showed his respect to Christ by girding his fisher's coat round him, lest he might appear before his Master in the best clothes he had, and not rudely rush into his presence, stripped as he was to his waistcoat and drawers, because the work he was about was toilsome, and he was resolved to take pains in it. Perhaps this fisher's coat was made of... leather, or oil-cloth, and would keep out wet; and he girt it to him, that he might make the best of his way through the water to Christ, as he used to do after his acts, wherein he was intent upon his fishing his good-will and aim to be with Jesus. “If Christ suffer me,” (thinks he) “to drown, and come short of him, it is but what I desire for denying him.” Peter had had much forgiven, and made it appear he loved much by his willingness to run hazards, and undergo hardships, to come to him. They that have been with Jesus, will be willing to swim through a stormy sea, a sea of blood, to come to him. And it is a laudable contention among Christ's disciples, to strive who shall be first with him.

3. That the rest of the disciples were careful and honest-hearted. Though they were not in such a transport of zeal as to throw themselves into the sea, like Peter, yet they hastened in the boat to the shore, and made the best of their way; (v. 5.) They were all the better for the first discovered that it was Christ, came, slowly, yet they came to Christ. Now here we may observe,

(1.) How variously God dispenses his gifts. Some excelled, as Peter and John; are very eminent in gifts and graces, and are thereby distinguished from their brethren; others are but ordinary disciples, that mind their duty, and are faithful to him, but do nothing to make themselves remarkable; and yet both the one and the other, the eminent and the obscure, shall sit down together with Christ in glory; nay, and perhaps the last shall be first. Of those that do excel, some, like John, are eminently contemplative, have great gifts of knowledge, and serve the church with that; others, like Peter, eminently active and courageous, are strong, and do exploits, and are thus very serviceable to their generation. Some are useful as the church's eyes, others as the church's hands, and all for the good of the body.

(2.) What a great deal of difference there may be between some good people and others in the way of their honouring Christ, and yet both accepted of him. Some serve Christ more in acts of devotion, and extraordinary expressions of a religious zeal; and Christ's call, the Lor and their. Potought not to be undeserved for casting himself into the sea, but commended for his zeal and the strength of his affection; and so must they be, who, in love to Christ, quit the world, with Mary, to sit at his feet. But others serve Christ more in the affairs of the world; they continue in that ship, drag the net, and bring the fish to shore, as the other disciples here; and though they, I suppose, can be esteemed as worthily, for they, in their place, are as truly serving Christ as the other, even in serving tables. If all the disciples had done as Peter did, what had become of their fish and their nets? And yet if Peter had done as they did, we had wanted this instance of holy zeal. Christ was well pleased with both, and so must we be.

(3.) That there are several ways of bringing Christ's disciples to shore from off the sea of this world. Some are brought to him by a violent death, as the mariners, who threw themselves into the sea, in their zeal for Christ; others are brought to him by a natural death, dragging the net, which is less terrible; but both meet at length on the safe and quiet shore with Christ.

V. What entertainment the Lord Jesus gave them when they came ashore.

1. He had provision ready for them. When they came to land, wet and cold, weary and hungry, they found a good fire there to warm them and dry them, and a fish and bread; competent provision for a good meal.

(1.) We need not be curious in inquiring whence this fire, and fish, and bread, came, any more than whence the meat came, which the ravens brought Elijah. He that could multiply the loaves and fishes that were, could make new ones if he pleased, or turn stones into bread, or send his angels to fetch them there if it was to be had. It is uncertain whether this provision was made in the open air, or in some fisher's cabin, or hut, upon the shore; here was nothing stately or delicate; we should be content with mean things, for Christ was.

(2.) We may be comforted in this instance of Christ's care of his disciples; he has wherewith to supply all our needs, and knows what things we have need of. He kindly provided for these fishermen, when they came weary from their work; for verily they shall be fed, who trust in the Lord, and do good. It is encouraging to Christ's ministers, whom he hath made fishers of men, that they may depend upon him who employs them, to provide for them; and if they should miss of encouragement in this world, should be assured of it in the next. Let the genuine and sincere, and feelings often, let them content themselves with what they have here; they have better things in reserve, and shall eat and drink with Christ at his table in his kingdom, Luke 22. 30. A while ago, the disciples had entertained Christ with a broided fish, (Luke 24. 42.) and now, as a friend, he returned their kindness, and entertained them with one; nay, in the draught of fishes, he repaid them more than a hundred fold.

2. He called for some of that which they had caught, and they produced it, v. 10, 11. Observe here,

(1.) The command Christ gave them to bring their draught of fish to shore; “Bring of the fish which you have now caught, and let us have some of them,” not as if he needed it, and could not make up a dinner for them without it; but, [1.] He would have them eat the labour of their hands, Ps. 128. 2. What is got by God's blessing on our own industry and honest labour, if withal God give us power to eat of it, and enjoy good in our labour, hath a peculiar sweetness in it. It is said of the slothful man, that he roset not that which he took in hunting; he could not find in his house the victual he had provided for himself and his family, Prov. 12. 27. But Christ would hereby teach us to use what we have. [2.] He would have them taste the gifts of his miraculous bounty, that they might be witnesses both of his power and of his goodness. The benefits Christ bestows upon us, are not to be buried and laid up, but to be used and laid out. [3.] He would give a specimen of the spiritual entertainment he has for his faithful believers, which, in this respect, is most free and familiar—that he supplies with them, and with them; their graces are pleasing to him, and his comforts are so to them; what he works in them he accepts from them. [4.] Ministers, who are fishers of men, must bring all they catch to their Master, for on him their success depends.

(2.) The obedience to this command, v. 11. It was said, (v. 6,) They were not able to draw the net to shore, for the multitude of fishes; that is, they found it difficult, it was more than they could well do; but that bade them bring it to shore, made it easy. Thus the fishers of men, when they have opened souls in the gospel-net, cannot bring them to shore, cannot carry on and complete the good work begun, without the continued influence of the divine grace. If he then helped us to catch them, when, without his help, we should have caught nothing, do not help us to keep them, and draw them to land, or build them up in their most holy faith, we shall lose them at last, 1 Cor. 3. 7.

Observe, [1.] Who it was, that was most active in landing the fishes; it was Peter; who, as in the former instance, (v. 7.) had shown a more zealous affection to his Master's person than any of them, so in this he shewed a more ready obedience to his Master's command; but all that are faithful, are not alike forward.

[2.] The number of the fishes that were caught. They had the curiosity to count them, and perhaps it was in order to the making of a dividend; they were in all a hundred and fifty, and all great fishes. These were many more than they needed for their present supply, but they might sell them to Christ, as he directed them to, and so serve to bear their charges back to Jerusalem, whether they were shortly to return.

[3.] A further instance of Christ's care of them, to increase both the miracle and the miracle; for all there were so many, and all great fishes too, yet was not the net broken; so that they lost none of their fish, nor damaged their net. It was said, (Luke 5. 6.) They could not take it in; for they had long since left their own; and if so, Christ would teach them to take care of what we have borrowed, as much as if it were our own. It was well that their net did not break; for they had not the leisure they had had, to mend their nets. The net of the gospel has enclosed multitudes, thousands in one day, and yet is not broken; it is still as mighty as ever, bearing them on to the kingdom of heaven.

8. He invited them to dinner. Observing them to keep their distance, and that they were afraid to ask him, Who art thou? because they knew it was their Lord, he called to them very familiarly, Come, and dine.

(1.) See here how free Christ was with his disciples; he treated them as friends; he did not say, Come, and wait, come, and attend me, but Come, and dine, and do. Go do by yourselves, as servants are appointed to do, but Come, and dine with me. This kind invitation may be alluded to, to illustrate, [1.] The call Christ gives his disciples into communion with him in grace here. All things are now ready; Come, and dine. Christ is a feast; Come, dine upon him; his flesh is meat indeed, his blood drink indeed. Christ is a friend; come, dine with him; for this is my friend, a personal friend, a close and intimate friend, he will give them into the fruition of him in glory hereafter; Come, ye blessed of my Father; come, and sit down with Abraham, with Isaac, and Jacob. Christ has wherewithal to dine all his friends and followers; there is room and provision enough for them all.

(2.) See how reverent the disciples were before Christ; they were somewhat shy of using the freedom he invited them to, and by his courtly treating them to their meat, it should seem that they stood passine. Being to eat with a ruler, such a ruler, they consider diligently what is before them. None of them dare ask him, Who art thou? Either, [1.] Because they would not be so bold with him. Though perhaps he appeared now in something of a disease at first, as to the two disciples, when they came to the shore, (v. 1.) he said, when, might he not shew such, as having an earnest desire, though they had had very good reason to think it was he, and could be no other. Or, [2.] Because they would not so far betray their own folly. When he had given them this instance of his power and goodness, they must be stupid indeed if they judged whether it was he or no. When God, in his providence, has given us sensible proofs of his care for our bodies, and had given us, in his grace, manifest proofs of his goodness to our souls, and good work upon us, we should be ashamed of our distrusts, and not dare to question that which, or has left us no room to question. Groundless doubts must be stifled, and not started.

4. He carves for them, as the Master of the feast, v. 13. Observing them to be still shy and timorous, he comes, and takes bread himself, and gives them, some to each of them, and fish likewise. No doubt, he had a heart to grace and refresh them all; (vs. 24. 36.) but, it being his known and constant practice, it did not need to be mentioned.

(1.) The entertainment here was but ordinary; it was but a fish-dinner, and scarcely dressed; here was nothing pepsous, nothing curious; pleasant indeed, but plain and homely. Hunger is the best sauce. Christ, though he ordered upon his excited promises, therefore shewing him, not shewing himself a prince by feasting. Those that could not content themselves with bread and fish, unless they have sauce and wine, would scarcely have found in their hearts to dine with Christ himself here.

(2.) Christ himself began. Though, perhaps, having a glorified body, he needed not to eat, yet he showed he had a true body which was capable of eating. The apostle produces this as one proof of his resurrection, that they had eaten and drunk with him, Acts 10. 41.

(3.) He gave the meat about to all his guests. He not only provided it for them, and invited them to it, but he himself divided it among them, and put it into their hands. Thus to him we owe the application, as well as the purchase of the benefits of redemption. He gives us power to eat of them.

The evangelist leaves them at dinner, and makes this remark, (v. 14.) This is the third time that Jesus shewed himself alive to his disciples, or the greater part of them. This is the third day; so some. On the day he rose, he appeared five times; the second day was that day seven night; and this was the third. Or this was his third appearance to any considerable number of his disciples together; though he had appeared to Mary, to the women, to the two disciples, to Cephas, yet he had but twice before this appeared to any company of them together. This is taken notice of. [1.] For the confirming the truth of his resurrection; the vision was doubled, was tripled, for the thing was certain. They who believed not the first sign, would be brought to believe the voice of the latter signs. [2.] As an instance of Christ's continued kindness to his disciples. His call will be heard, and his grace will be received; you will have grace to the full; you will not be left to yourselves. [3.] As a proof of the benefits of his grace. For he calls me to keep account of them, and they will be remembered against us if we walk unworthily of them, that we were against Solomon, when he was reminded that the Lord God of Israel had appeared unto him twice. This is the third; have we made a due improvement of the first and second? See 2 Cor. 12. 14. This is the third, perhaps it may be the last.

15. So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs, 16. He saith to him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my sheep. 17. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all.
things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep. 18. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not. 19. This spake he, signifying by what death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, Follow me.

We have here Christ's discourse with Peter after dinner, so much of it as relates to himself; in which

He examines his love to him, and gives him a charge concerning his flock, v. 15—17. Observe

1. When Christ entered into this discourse with Peter; it was after they had dined; they had all eaten, and were filled, and, it is probable, were entertained with such edifying discourse as our Lord Jesus used to make his table-talk. Christ foresaw that what he had to say to Peter, would give him some uneasiness, and therefore would not say it till they had dined, because he would not spoil his dinner. Peter was conscious to himself that he had incurred his Master's displeasure, and could expect no other than to be upbraided with his treachery and ingratitude. "Was this thy kindness to the friend? Did not I tell thee what a coward thou wouldest prove?" Nay, he might justly expect to be struck out of the roll of the disciples, and to be expelled the sacred college. Twice, if not thrice, he had seen his Master since his resurrection, and he said not a word to him of it. We may suppose Peter full of doubt upon what terms he stood with his Master; sometimes hoping the best, because he had received favours from him in common with the rest; yet not without some fears, lest the chiding would come at last, that would pay for all. But now, at length, his Master put him out of his pain, said what he had to say to him, and confirmed him in his place as an apostle. He did not tell him of his fault hastily, but deferred it for some time; did not tell him of it unseasonably, to disturb the company at dinner, but when they had dined together in token of reconciliation, then discourse he with him about it, not as with a criminal, but as with a friend. Peter had reproached himself for it, and therefore Christ did not reproach him for it, nor tell him of it directly, but only by a tacit intimation; and being satisfied in his sincerity, the offence was not only forgiven, but forgotten; and Christ let him know that he was as dear to him as ever. Herein he has given us an encouraging instance of his tenderness toward penitents, and has taught us, in like manner, to restore sinners, not with a spirit of meanness or contempt, but with a spirit of affection, and with a spirit of love.

2. What was the discourse itself. Here was the same question three times asked, the same answer three times made, and the same reply three times given, with very little variation, and yet no vain repetition. It was repeated by our Saviour, in the speaking of it, the more to affect Peter, and the other disciples that were present; it is repeated by the evangelist, in his writing of it, the more to affect us, and all that read it.

(1.) Three times Christ asks Peter whether he loves him or no. The first time the question is, Simon, son of Jonas, loveth thou me more than these? Observe

[1.] How he calls him: Simon, son of Jonas. He speaks to him by name, the more to affect him, as Luke 22. 31. Simon, Simon. He does not call him Cephas, or Peter, the name he had given him, for he had lost the credit of his strength and stability, which those names signified, but his original name, Simon. Yet he gives him no hard language, does not call him out of his name, though he deserved it; but as he had called him when he pronounced him blessed, Simon Bar-jona, Matt. 16. 17. He calls him son of Jonas, (or John, or Jokanaan,) to remind him of his extraction, how mean it was, and unworthy the honour to which he was advanced.

[2.] How he catechises him; Lovest thou me more than these? First, Lovest thou me? If we would try whether we are Christ's disciples indeed, this must be the inquiry, Do we love him? But there was a special reason why Christ put it now to Peter.

1. His fall had given occasion to doubt of his love; "Peter, I have cause to suspect thy love; for if thou hadst loved me, thou wouldest not have been ashamed and afraid to own me in my sufferings. How canst thou say thou lovest me, when thy heart was not with me?" Note, We must not reckon it an affront to have our sincerity questioned, when we ourselves have done that which makes it questionable; after a shaking fall, we must take heed of setting too soon, lest we settle upon a wrong bottom. The question is affecting; he does not ask, "Dost thou love me?" but, "Dost thou love me?" Give but proofs of that, and the affront shall be passed by, and no more said of it. Peter had professed himself a penitent, witness his tears, and his return to the society of the disciples; he was now upon his probation as a penitent; but the question is not, "Simon, how much hast thou repented?" How often hast thou fasted, and afflicted thy soul? but, "Dost thou love me? That is it which will make the other expressions of repentance acceptable. The great thing Christ eyes in penitents, is, their eyeing him in their repentance. Much is forgiven her, not because she wept much, but because she loved much.

2. His function would give occasion for the exercise of his love. Before Christ would commit his sheep to his care, he asked him, Lovest thou me? Christ has such a tender regard to his flock, that he will not trust it with any but those that love him, and therefore will love all that are his for his sake. Those that do not truly love Christ, will never truly love the souls of men, nor will naturally care for their state as they should; nor will that minister love his work, that does not love his Master. Nothing can be the love of Christ to Christ himself so beautiful as the love of Christ to Christ. Our Saviour sets his love to Christ as a most excellent thing, and he invites his disciples to go cheerfully through the difficulties and discouragements they meet with in their work, 2 Cor. 5. 15, 14. But this love will make their work easy, and them in good earnest in it.

Secondly, Lovest thou me more than these? οὐκ ἐστιν τοιαύτα. 1. "Lovest thou me more than thou lovest these, more than thou lovest these persons? Dest thou love me more than thou lovest John, thy intimate friend? Or Andrew, thy own brother and companion?" Those do not love Christ aright, that do not love him better than the best friend they have in the world, and make it to appear whenever they stand in comparison or in competition. Or, "more than thou lovest these things, these beasts and nets; more than all the pleasure of fishing; which some make a great value of, and imagine a great content in; while others make a calling of." Those only love Christ indeed, that love him better than all the delights of sense and all the profits of this world. "Lovest thou me more than thou lovest these occupation: thou art now employed in? If so, leave them, to employ thyself wholly in feeding my flock." So Dr. Whitby. 2. "Lovest thou me more than these love me, more than any of the rest of the disciples love me?" And then it is either to upbraid him with his vain-glorying boast that he had done so, he will not. Art thou still of the same mind? Or to intimate to him, that he had now more reason to love him than any of them had, for more had been forgiven to him than to any of them, as much as his sin in denying Christ was greater than their's in forsaking him. Tell me therefore which of them will love him most? Luke 7: 42. Note, We should all strive to be more tenderhearted to Christ, and more ready to give him the peace of the believer, and to strive which shall love Christ best; nor any break of good manners, to go before others in this love.

The second and third time that Christ puts this question, (1.) He left out more than these; because Peter, in his answer, modestly left it out, not willing to compare himself with his brethren, much less to prefer himself before them. Though we cannot say, We love Christ more than others do, yet we shall be accepted, if we can say, We love him indeed. (2.) In the last he altered the word, as it is in the original. In the two first inquiries, the original word is, ἀγαπᾷς μου; Dost thou retain a kindness for me? In answer to which, Peter uses another word, more emphatical, ἀγαπάω - I love thee dearly. In putting the question the last time, Christ uses that word; and with it, doth put in the second time, which word puts it into an orphan; and with that word he alters the word, which word he uses, to Dost thou love me? which word suits the case of the question better. (2.) Three times Peter returns the same answer to Christ: Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. Observe,

[1.] Peter does not pretend to love Christ more than the rest of the disciples did; he is now ashamed of that rash word of his, though all men deny thee, yet will not I; and he had reason to be ashamed of it. Note, Though we must not think less of others, yet we must, in baseness of mind, esteem others better than ourselves; for we know more evil of ourselves than we do of any of our brethren.

[2.] Yet he professes again and again, that he loved Christ; " Yea, Lord, surely I love thee; I were unworthy to live, if I did not." He had a high esteem and value for him, a grateful sense of his kindness, and was entirely devoted to his honour and interest; his desire was to own him, and to be he was undone without; and his delight in him, as one should be unspeakably happy in. This amounts to a profession of repentance for his sin, for it grieves us to have affronted one we love; and to a promise of adherence to him for the future; Lord, I love thee, and will never leave thee. Christ prayed that his faith might not fail, (Luke 22. 32.) and because his faith did not fail, his love did not; for faith will work by love. Peter had forfeited his claim of relation to Christ; he was now to be re-admitted, upon his repentance; Christ puts his trial upon this issue; Dost thou love me? And Peter joins issue upon it; Lord, I love thee. Note, Those who can truly say, through grace, that they love Jesus Christ, may take the comfort of their interest in him, notwithstanding their daily infirmities; and to Christ himself for the proof of it; Thou knowest that I love thee; and the third time yet more emphatically; Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee. He does not wrong his fellow-disciples to witness for him, they might have received in him; nor does he think his own word might be taken, the credit of that was destroyed already; but he calls Christ himself to witness. First, Peter does not dare that Christ knew all things, and particularly that he knew the heart, and was a divisor of the thoughts and intents of that, ch. 16. 30. Secondly, Peter was satisfied of this, that Christ, who knew all things, knew the sincerity of his love to him, and would be ready to attest it in his favour. It is a terror to a hypocrite, to think that Christ knows all things; for the divine omniscience will be a witness against him. But it is a comfort to a sincere christian, that he is thus to appeal to. My case is in heaven, my record is kept. For, though we know not our own uprightness, he does.

[3.] He was grieved, when Christ asked him the third time, Lovest thou me? v. 17. First, Because it put him in mind of his threefold denial of Christ, and was plainly designed to do so; and when he thought thereof he wept. Every remembrance of sin is a burden and a sorrow to the sincere christian; it is a sad thought of him that should be a true penitent. Thou shalt be ashamed, when I am justified toward thee. Secondly, Because it put him in fear, lest his Master foresaw some further miscarriage of his, which would be as great a contradiction to his profession of love to him as the former was, "Surely," thinks Peter, "my Master would not thus put me upon the rack, if he did not some cause for it. What would become of me, if I should be again tempted?" Godly sorrow works carefreeness and fear. 2 Cor. 7. 11.

(3.) Three times Christ committed the care of his flock to Peter; Feed my lambs; feed my sheep; feed my sheep. (1.) Those whom Christ committed to Peter's care, were his lambs and his sheep. The church of Christ is his flock, which he has committed to his faithful stewards. Matt. 28. 20. and he is the Chief Shepherd of it: in this flock some are lambs, young and tender and weak, others are sheep, grown to some strength and maturity. The Shepherd here takes care of both, and of the lambs first, for upon all occasions he shewed a particular tenderness for them; the lambs he gathered in his arms, and carries in his bosom. Isa. 40. 11.

[2.] This is the office he gives him concerning them, to feed them. The word used, (v. 15. 17.) is σκυλλίω, which signifies, to give them food; but the word used, (v. 16.) is πρόφυανο, which signifies more largely to do all the offices of a shepherd to them; Feed the lambs with that which is proper for them, and the sheep likewise with food convenient. The best sheep of the house of Israel, suck and feed them, and the other sheep also which are not of this fold. Matt. 9. 36. The office of every pastor is the duty of all Christ's ministers, to feed his lambs and sheep. Feed them, that is, teach them; for the doctrine of the gospel is spiritual food. Feed them, that is, "Lead them to the green pastures, presiding in their religious assemblies, and ministering all the ordinances to them. Feed them by personal application to their respective state and case; not only lay meat before them, but feed them with it, that are wilful and will not, or weak and cannot, feed themselves." When Christ ascended on high, he gave pastors; left his flock with them that loved him, and would take care of them for his sake.

[3.] But why did he give this charge particularly to Peter? Ask the advocates for the pope's supremacy, and they will tell you, that Christ hereby designed to give to Peter, and therefore to his successors, and therefore to the bishops of Rome, an absolute and peculiar honor and authority, as the head of a christian church; as if a charge to serve the sheep, gave a power to lord it over all the shepherds; whereas, it is plain, Peter himself never claimed such a power, nor did the other disciples ever own it in him. This charge given to Peter to preach the gospel, is by a strange fetch made to support the usurpation of his pretended successors, that fiece the sheep, and, instead of feeding them, feed upon them. The particular application to Peter here, was designed, First, to restore him to his apostleship, now that he repented of his abjuration of it, and to renew his commission, both for his own satisfaction, and for the satisfaction of his brethren. A commission given to one convicted of a crime, is supposed to amount to a pardon; no doubt, this commission given to Peter, was an evidence that Christ was reconciled to him, else he would never have reposed such a confidence in him. Of some that have deceiv'd us we say, 'Though we forgive them, we will not forget them'; but Christ, when he forgave Peter, trusted him with the most valuable treasure he had on earth. Secondly, It was designed to quicken him to a diligent discharge of his office as an apostle. Peter was a man of a bold and zealous spirit, always forward to speak and act, and, lest he should be tempted to take upon him the directing of the shepherds, he is charged to feed the sheep, as a shepherd does them, and, do, and, not to lord it over God's heritage, 1 Pet. 5. 2. 3. If he will be doing, let him do this, and pretend no further. Thirdly, What Christ said to him, he said to all his disciples; he charged them all, not only to be fishers of men, (though that was said to Peter, Luke 5. 10.) by the conversion of sinners, but feeders of the flock, by the edification of saints.

11. Christ, having thus appointed Peter his doing work, next cuts out to him his suffering work. Having confirmed to him the honour of an apostle, he now tells him of further preferment designed him—
the honour of a martyr. Observe,

1. How his martyrdom is foretold; (v. 18.) Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, being compelled to it, and another shall gird thee, (as a prisoner that is pinioned) and carry thee whither naturally thou wouldst not.

(1.) He prefaces the notice he gives to Peter of his sufferings, with a solemn asseveration, Verily, verily, I say unto thee. It was not spoken of as a thing probable, which perhaps might happen, but as a thing certain, I say it to thee. "Others, perhaps, will say to thee, as thou hast to Peter, 1. This shall not be done;" and I say it shall," As Christ foresaw all his own sufferings, so he foresees the sufferings of all his followers, and foretold them, though not in particular, as to Peter, yet in general, that they must take up their cross. Having charged him to feed his sheep, he bids him not to expect ease and honour in it, but trouble and persecution, and to suffer ill for doing well.

(2.) He foretells particularly that he should die a violent death, by the hands of an executioner. The stretching out his hands, some think, points at the manner of his death by crucifying; and the tradition of the ancients, if we may rely upon that, informs us that Peter was crucified at Rome under Nero, A. D. 68, or as others say, 79. Others think, it points at the bonds and imprisonments which those were hampered with, that are sentenced to death. The pomp and solemnity of an execution add much to the terror of death, and to an eye of sense make it look doubly formidable. Death, in these horrid shapes, has often been the lot of Christ's faithful ones, who yet have overcome it by the blood of the Lamb. This prediction, though pointing chiefly at his death, was to have its accomplishment in his premortals by Peter, doubly, and most perently, when he was imprisoned, Acts 4. 5.—5. 18. —12. 4. No more is implied here in his being car-rried whither he would not, than that it was a violent death that he should be carried to; such a death as even innocent nature could not think of without dread, nor approach without some reluctance. He that puts upon the Christian, does not put off the man; Christ himself being the pledge of a pardon, gives a natural aversion to pain and death is well reconcile-able with a holy submission to the will of God in both. Blessed Paul, though longing to be unloaded, owes he cannot desire to be unclothed, 2 Cor. 5. 4.

(3.) He compares this with his former liberty.

Time was, when thou knewest not any of these hardships, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest. Where trouble comes, we are apt to aggravate it with this, that it has been other wise; and to fret the more at the grievances of restraint, sickness, and poverty, because we have known the sweets of liberty, health, and plenty, Job 29. 2. Ps. 43. 4. But we may turn it the other way, and reason thus with ourselves, "How many years of prosperity have I enjoyed more than I deserved and improved? And, having received good, shall not I receive evil also?" See here,

[1.] What a change may possibly be made with us, as to our condition in this world! They that have girded themselves with strength and honour, and indulged their flesh, when they died, were perhaps, perhaps looses, may be reduced to such circumstances as are the reverse of all this. See 1 Sam. 2. 5.

[2.] What a change will certainly be made with us, if we should live to be old! They who, when they were young, had strength of body and vigour of mind, and could easily go through business and hardship, and take the pleasures they had a mind to, when they shall be old, will find their strength gone, like Samson, when his hair was cut, and could not sh</textarea>
3. The word of command he gives him hereupon: "When he had spoken thus, observing Peter perhaps to look blank upon it, he saith unto him, Follow me. Probably, he rose from the place where he had sat at dinner, walked off a little, and bid Peter attend him. This word, Follow me, was, (1.) A further confirmation of his restoration to his Master's favour, and to his apostleship: for, Follow me, was the first word (2.) It was an explication of the preceding sentence, which perhaps Peter at first did not fully understand, till Christ gave him that key to it, Follow me; "Expect to be treated as I have been, and to tread the same bloody path that I have trod before thee; for the disciple is not greater than his Lord." (3.) It was to excite him to, and encourage him in, faithfulness and diligence in his work as an apostle. He had bid him feed his sheep, and, therefore, what greater encouragement could they have than this, both in services and in sufferings? [1.] That herein they did follow him, and it was their present honour; who would be ashamed to follow such a leader? [2.] That hereafter they should follow him, and that would be their future happiness; and so is it a repetition of the promise Christ had given Peter, (ch. 13. 35.) "Then shall follow me afterwards. They that faithfully follow Christ in grace, shall certainly follow him to glory.

20. Then Peter, turning about, seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved following; which also leaned on his breast at supper, and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee? 21. Peter seeing him saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do? 22. Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me. 23. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him. He shall not die: but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? 24. This is the disciple which testified of these things, and wrote these things: and we know that his testimony is true. 25. And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen.

In these verses, we have,
1. The conference Christ had with Peter concerning John, the beloved disciple: in which we have,
1. The eye Peter cast upon him; (ch. 20.) Peter, in obedience to his Master's orders, followed him, and, turning about, pleased with the honour his Master now did him, he sees the disciples whom Jesus loved following likewise. Observe here,
(1.) How John is described; he does not name himself, as thinking his own name not worthy to be preserved in these records; but gives such a description of himself as sufficiently informs us whom he meant, and withal gives us a reason why he followed Christ so close; he was a disciple whom Jesus loved, whom he had a particular kindness for above the rest; and therefore you cannot blame him for coveting to be as much as possible within hearing of Christ's gracious words during these few precious minutes with which Christ favoured his disciples; it is probable that mention is here made of John's having leaned on Jesus' breast, and his insinuating thus it; but this seems to be the insertion of Peter (ch. 13. 24.) as a reason why Peter made the following inquiry concerning him, to repay him for the former kindness. Then John was in the favourite's place, lying in Christ's bosom, and he improved the opportunity to oblige Peter. And now that Peter was in the favourite's place, called to take a walk with Christ, he thought himself bound in gratitude to Peter by that act of kindness to which he thought he would oblige him, we all being desirous to know things to come. Note, As we have interest at the throne of grace, we should improve it for the benefit of one another. They that help us by their prayers at one time, should be helped by us with ours at another time. This is the communion of saints.

(2.) What he said; he also followed Jesus; which shows how well he loved his company; where he was, there also would this servant of his be. When Christ called Peter to follow him, it looked as if he designed to have some private talk with him; but such an affection John had to his Master, that he would rather do a thing that seemed rude than lose the benefit of any of Christ's discourse. What Christ said to Peter, he took as said to himself: for the word of an epitome, was given to all the disciples. However, he desired to have fellowship with those that had fellowship with Christ, and to accompany those that attended him. The bringing of one to follow Christ, should encourage others. Draw me, and we will run after thee, Cant. 1. 4.

(3.) The notice Peter took of it; he, turning about, seeth him. This may be looked upon either,
1. As a culpable diversion from following his Master; he should have been wholly intent upon that, and have waited to hear what Christ had further to say to him, and then was he looking about him to see who followed. Note, The best men find it hard to attend upon the Lord without distraction; hard to keep their minds so closely fixed as they should be, in following Christ; and a needless and unreasonable regard to our own comfort, diverges us from his word as much as not attending to our work. Or, [2.] As a sensible concern for his fellow-disciples. He was not so elevated with the honour his Master did him, in singing him out from the rest, as to deny a kind look to one that followed. Acts of love to our brethren must go along with acts of faith in Christ.

2. The inquiry Peter made concerning him; (v. 21.) "Lord, and what shall this man do?" Thou wilt tell me the truth, which is the less; but how, let us be carried whither I would not. What shall it be his work, and his lot? Now this may be taken as the language, (1.) Of concern for John, and kindness to him; "Lord, then shewest me a great deal of favour; here comes thy beloved disciple, who never forsook thy favour, as I have done; he expects to be taken up, and I am left behind; and now nothing to say to him?" Why not tell him he must be employed, and how he must be honoured?
(2.) Of unceasing at what Christ had said to him concerning his sufferings; "Lord, must I alone be carried whither I would not? Must I be marked out to be run down, and must this man have no share of the cross?" It is hard to reconcile ourselves to distinguishing sufferings, and the troubles in which we think we stand alone.
(3.) Of curiosity, and a fond desire of knowing things to come, concerning others, as well as himself. It seems, by Christ's answer, there was something amiss in the question; when Christ had given him the charge of such a trust, and the notice of such a trial, it had well become him to have said, "Lord, and what shall I do then to appear faithful to such a trust, in such a trial? Lord, increase my faith. As my day is, let my strength be." But instead of this,

[1.] He seems more concerned for another than for himself. So apt are we to be busy in other men's matters, but negligent in the concerns of our own souls; quick-sighted abroad, but dim-sighted at home; judging others, and measuring others what they will do, when we have enough to do to prove our own work, and understand our own way.

[2.] He seems more concerned about event than about duty. John was younger than Peter, and, in the course of nature, likely to survive him; "Lord," says he, "what times shall he be reserved for?" Whereas, if God by his grace enable us to persevere to the end, and finish well, and get safe to heaven, we need not ask, "What shall be the lot of those that shall come after us?" Is it not well if peace and truth be in my days? Scripture-predictions must be eyed for the directing of our consciences, not the satisfying of our curiosity.

3. Christ's reply to this inquiry; (v. 22.) "If I were to come to you, and did suffer as thou, what is that to thee? Mind thou thy own duty, the present duty, follow thou me." (1.) There seems to be here an intimation of Christ's purpose concerning John, in two things.

[1.] That he should not die a violent death, like Peter, but should tarry till Christ himself came by a natural death to fetch him to himself. The most credit of this instance of the history tells us, that John was the only one of all the twelve that did not actually die a martyr. He was often in jeorship, in bonds and banishments; but at length died in his bed in a good old age. Note, First, At death Christ comes to us to call us to account; and it concerns us to be ready for his coming. Secondly, Though Christ calls out some of his disciples to resist unto blood, yet not all. Though the crown of martyrdom is very glorious, yet the beloved disciple comes short of it.

[2.] That he should not die till after Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem: so some understand his tarrying till Christ comes. All the other apostles died before that destruction; but John survived it many years. God wisely so ordered it, that one of the apostles should live so long as to close up the canon of the New Testament; which John did solemnly, Rev. 22. 18. And to obviate the design of the enemy that sought to destroy the church, and set up another Christ, John lived to confront Elyon, and Cerinthus, and other heretics, who rose betimes, speaking erroneous things.

(2.) Others think that it is only a rebuke to Peter's curiosity, and his tarrying till Christ's second coming, that only the supposition of an absurdity, "Wherefore askest thou after that which is foreign and secret? Suppose I should design that John should never die; what does that concern thee? It is nothing to thee, when, or where, or how, John must die. I have told thee how thou must die for thy part; it is enough for thee to know that. Follow thou me." Note, It is the will of Christ, that his disciples should mark his coming, and his coming to his duty. Some, while they inquire about future events, concerning either themselves or others. [1.] There are many things we are apt to be solicitous about, that are nothing to us. Other people's characters are nothing to us; it is out of our line to judge them: Rom. 14. 4. Whatever they are, saith Paul, it makes no matter to me. Other people's affairs are nothing to us to intermeddle in; we must quietly work, and mind our own business. Many nice and curious questions are put by the Scribes and Pharisees of this world concerning the counsels of God, and the state of the invisible world, concerning which we may say, "What is that to me?" What do you think will become of such and such? Is a common question, which may easily be answered with another; What is that to me? To his own Master he stands or falls. What is it to us to know the times and the seasons? Secret things belong not to us. [2.] The great thing that is all in all to us is duty, and not event; for duty is our's, events are God's; our own duty, and not the duty of the time to come; for sufficient to the day is the burden thereof: a good man's steps are ordered by the Lord; (Ps. 37. 23.) he is guided step by step. Now all our duty is summed up in this one, of following Christ; we must attend his motions, and accommodate ourselves to them, follow him to do him honour, as the servant his master; we must walk in the way in which he walked, and aim to be where he is. And if we will closely attend to the duty of following Christ, we shall find neither heart nor time to meddle with that which does not belong to us.

4. The mistake which arose from this saying of Christ, that that disciple should not die, but abide with the church to the end of time; together with the supposed duty of the succession of Christ's words, v. 23. Observe here, (1.) The easy rise of a mistake in the church by misconstruing the sayings of Christ, and turning a supposition to a position. Because John must not die a martyr, they conclude he must not die at all.

(4.) They were inclined to expect it, because they could not choose but desire it. Quod volumus facie credimus—We easily believe what we wish to be true. For John to abide in the flesh when the rest were gone, and to continue in the world till Christ's second coming, they think, will be a great blessing to the church, which in every age might have recourse to him as an oracle; when they must lose Christ's bodily presence, they will seek his spiritual presence in his servant; and that, if it be, will satisfy the want of his; forgetting that the blessed Spirit the Comforter was to do that. Note, We are apt to deate too much on men and means, instruments and external helps, and to think we are happy, if we may but have them always with us; whereas God will change his workmen, and yet carry on his work, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of men. There is no need of immortal ministers to be the guides of the church, while it is under the conduct of an eternal Spirit.

[2.] Perhaps they were confirmed in their expectations, when they now found that John survived all the rest of the apostles; because he lived long, they were ready to think he should live always; whereas that which waxeth old, is ready to vanish away, 1 Pet. 8. 16.

[5.] However, it took rise from a saying of Christ's, misunderstood, and then made a saying of the church. Hence learn,

First, The uncertainty of human tradition, and the folly of building our faith upon it. Here was a tradition, an apostolical tradition, a saying, that went abroad among the brethren; it was early, it was common, it was sudden, it was particular. How little then are those unwritten traditions to be relied upon, which the council of Trent hath decreed to be received with a veneration and pious affection equal to that which is owing to the holy scripture? Here was a traditional exposition of scripture; no new saying of Christ's advanced, but only a construction put by the brethren upon what he did really say, and yet it was a misconstruction. Let the scripture be its own interpreter, and explain itself, as it is in a great measure its own evidence, and proves itself, for it is light.

Secondly, The aptness of men to misinterpret the sayings of Christ. The grossest errors have sometimes shrouded themselves under the umbrage of incontestable truths; and the scriptures themselves have been wrested by the unlearned and unstable. We must not think strange, if we hear the sayings of Christ misinterpreted, vouch'd to patronize the errors of antichrist, and the impudent doctrine of transubstantiation, for instance, pretending to build upon that blessed word of Christ, This is my body.

(2.) The easy rectifying of such mistakes, by adhering to the word of Christ, and abiding by that. So the evangelist here corrects and controls that saying among the brethren, by repeating the very words of Christ. He did not say so then; he said, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? He said so, and no more. Add thou not unto his words. Let the words of Christ speak for themselves, and let no sense be put upon them but what is genuine and natural; and in that let us agree.

Note, The best end of men's controversies, would be to keep to the express words of scripture, and speak, as well as think, according to that word. Is scripture-language the surest and most proper vehicle of scripture truth: the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. 2. 13. As the scripture itself, duly attended to, is the best weapon wherewith to wound all dangerous errors, (and therefore Deists, Socinians, Papists, and Enthusiasts, do all they can to derogate from the authority of the scripture,) so the scripture itself, humbly subscribed to, is the best weapon to heal the wounds that are made by different men's various expressions concerning the same truths. Those that cannot agree in the same logics and metaphysics, and the propriety of the same terms of art, and the application of them, may yet agree in the same scripture-terms, and then may agree to love one another.

II. We have here the conclusion of this gospel, and with it of the evangelical story, v. 24, 25. This evangelist ends not so abruptly as the other three did, nor without a sequel.

1. It concludes with an account of the author or penman of it, connected by a decent transition to that which went before; (v. 24.) This is the disciple which testifieth of these things to the present age, and wrote these things for the benefit of posterity, even this same that Peter and his Master had that conference about in the foregoing verses—John the apostle.

(2.) Observe here, those who wrote the history of Christ, were not ashamed to put their names to it. John here does in effect subscribe his name. As we are sure who was the author of the first five books of the Old Testament, which were the foundation of that revelation, so we are sure who were the penmen of the Four Gospels and the Acts, the pentateuch of the New Testament. The record of Christ's life and death is not the report of we knew not who, but was drawn up by men of known integrity, who were really, and not only to dispose it upon oath, but which was more, to seal it with their blood.

(2.) Those who wrote the history of Christ, wrote upon their own knowledge, not by hearsay, but what they themselves were eye and ear witnesses of. The penman of this history was a disciple, a beloved disciple, one that had leaned on Christ's breast, that had himself heard his sermons and conferences, had seen his miracles, and the proofs of his resurrection. This is he who testifieth what he was well assured of.

(3.) Those who wrote the history of Christ, as they testified what they had seen, so they wrote what they had first testified. It was published by word of mouth, with the greatest assurance, before it was committed to writing. They testified it in the pulpit, testified it at the bar, solemnly averred it, stedfastly avowed it, as not travellers give account of their travels, to entertain the company, but as witnesses upon oath give an account of what they know in a matter of consequence, to be examined and to be, if need be, to be verified on. What they wrote, they wrote as an affidavit, which they would abide by. Their writings are standing testimonies to the world of the truth of Christ's doctrine, and will be testimonies either for us or against us, according as we do or do not receive it.

(4.) It was graciously appointed for the support and benefit of the church, that the history of Christ should be put in writing, that it might with the greater facility and certainty spread to every place, and last through every age.

2. It concludes with an attestation of the truth of what had been here related; We know that his testimony is true. This may be taken either,

(1.) As speaking the common sense of mankind in matters of this nature, which is, that the testimony of one who is an eye-witness, is of unspotted reputation, solemnly declared what he had seen, and is the most powerful evidence for the greater certainty of an intangible, but unexceptionable evidence. We know, that is, All the world knows, that the testimony of such a one is valid, and the common faith of mankind requires us to give credit to it, unless we can disprove it; and in other cases verdict and judgment are given upon such testimonies. The truth of the gospel comes confirmed by all the evidence we can rationally desire or expect in a thing of that nature. The matrices of the facts, if we choose, will produce such testimonies, and work such miracles, and rise from the dead, is proved beyond contradiction, by such evidence as is always admitted in other cases, and therefore to the satisfaction of all that are impartial; and then let the doctrine recommend itself, and let the miracles prove it to be of God. Or,

(2.) As speaking the satisfaction of the churches at that time, concerning the truth of what is here recorded. They make it for the subscription of the church of Ephesus; others of the angels or ministers of the churches of Asia to this narrative. Not as if an inspired writing needed any attestation from men, or could from thence receive any addition to its credibility; but thereby they recommended it to the notice of the churches, as an inspired writing, and declared the satisfaction they received by it.

Or,

(3.) As speaking the evangelist's own assurance of the truth of what he wrote, like that, (ch. 19, 35.) He knoweth that he saith true. He speaks of himself in the plural number, We know, not for majesty-sake, but for modesty-sake, as 1 John 1. 1. That which we have seen; and 2 Pet. 1. 16. Note, The evangelists themselves were entirely satisfied of the truth of what they have testified, and transmitted to us. They do not require us to believe what they did not believe themselves; no, they know their testimony was true; for they ventured both this life and the other upon it; threw away this life, and depended upon another, on the credit of what they spake and wrote.

3. It concludes with another exhortation; with a reference to many other things, very memorable, said and done by our Lord Jesus, which were well known by many then living, but not thought fit to be recorded for posterity, v. 25. There were many things very remarkable and improbable, which, if they should be written at large, with the several circumstances of them, even the world itself, that is, all the libraries.
in it, could not contain the books that might be written. Thus he concludes like an orator, as Paul, (Heb. 11. 23.) What shall I more say? For the time would fail me.

If it be asked why the gospels are not larger, why they did not make the New Testament history as copious and as long as the old; it may be answered, (1.) It was not because they had exhausted their subject, and had nothing more to write, that was worth writing; no, there were many of Christ's sayings and doings not recorded by any of the evangelists, which yet were worthy to be written in letters of gold. For, (1.) Every thing that Christ said and did, was worth our notice, and capable of being improved. He never spoke an idle word, nor did an idle thing; nay, he never spake or did any thing mean, or little, or trifling, which is more than can be said of the wisest or best of men. (2.) His miracles were many, very many, of many kinds, and the same often repeated, as occasion offered. Though one true miracle might perhaps suffice to prove a divine commission, yet the repetition of the miracles upon a great variety of persons, in a great variety of cases, and before a great variety of witnesses, helped very much to prove them true miracles. Every new miracle rendered the report of the former the more credible; and the multitude of them render the whole report incontestable. (3.) The evangelists upon several occasions give general accounts of Christ's preaching and miracles, inclusive of many particulars, as Matt. 4. 23, 24.—9. 35.—11. 1—14. 14, 15, 30.—19. 2, and many the like. When we speak of Christ, we have a copious subject before us, the reality exceeds the report, and, after all, the one half is not told us. St. Paul quotes one of Christ's sayings, which is not recorded by any of the evangelists; (Acts 20. 35.) and doubtless there were many more. All his sayings were apophthegms.

(2.) But it was for these three reasons, (1.) Because it was not needful to write more. This is implied here; there were many other things, which were not written because there was no occasion for writing them. What is written, is a sufficient revelation of the doctrine of Christ, and the proof of it, and the rest was but to the same purpose. They that from hence argue against the sufficiency of the scripture, as the rule of our faith and practice, and for the necessity of unwritten traditions, ought to shew what there is in the traditions they pretend to, perfective of the written word; we are sure there is that which is contrary to it, and therefore reject them. By these therefore let us be admonished, for of writing many books there is no end, Eccl. 12. 12. If we do not believe and improve what is written, neither would we if there had been much more.

(2.) It was not possible to write all. It was possible for the Spirit to indite all, but morally impossible for the penmen to pen all. The world could not contain the books. It is an hyperbole common enough and justifiable, when no more is intended than this, that it would fill a vast and incredible number of volumes. It would be such a large and overgrown history as never was; such as would justle out all other writings, and leave us no room for them. What volumes would be filled with Christ's prayers, had we the record of all those he made, when he continued all night in prayer to God, without any vain repetitions? Much more if all his sermons and conferences were particularly related, his miracles, his cures, all his labours, all his sufferings; it would have been an endless thing.

(3.) It was not advisable to write much; for the world, in a moral sense, could not contain the books that should be written. Christ said not what he might have said to his disciples, because they were not able to bear it; and for the same reason the evangelists wrote not what they might have written. The world could not contain,_xxviis._ It is the word that is used, ch. 8. 57. My word has no place in you; they would have been so many, that they would have found no room. All people's time would have been spent in reading, and other duties would thereby have been crowded out. Much is overlooked of what is written, much forgotten, and much made the matter of doubtful disputation; this would have been the case much more, if there had been such a world of books of equal authority and necessity as the whole history would have swelled to; especially since it was requisite that what was written should be meditated upon, and exjoumled, which God wisely thought fit to leave room for. Parents and ministers, in giving instruction, must consider the capacities of those they teach, and, like Jacob, must take heed of over-driving. Let us be thankful for the books that are written, and not prize them the less for their plainness and brevity, but diligently improve what God has thought fit to reveal, and long to be there where our capacities shall be so elevated and enlarged, that there will be no danger of their being over-loaded.

The evangelist concluding with Amen, thereby sets to his seal, and let us set to our's, an Amen of faith, subscribing to the gospel, that it is true, all true; and an Amen of satisfaction in what is written as able to make us wise to salvation. Amen; so be it.
